"The populace then," says another writer, "took possession of the scaffold, loosed the rope, and after some time succeeded in restoring him to his senses. They then tried to bear him off, and had proceeded some way down the High Street, when the officers of police, who had abandoned their post at the scaffold, proceeded with their bludgeons to assail them, and recovered possession of the culprit. A spectacle now presented itself equal in horror to anything in Paris during the Revolution. The unhappy man, half alive, stripped of part of his clothes, and his shirt turned up, lay on the ground in the middle of the street. At last, some of the officers laid hold of him and dragged him along the ground for about twenty paces into the Police Office. He remained there for about half-an-hour, where he was bled in both arms and in the temporal vein by a surgeon, and his half-suspended animation restored; but he uttered not a word. Meantime, a military force came from the castle. The soldiers surrounded the place of execution; he was carried again to the scaffold; his clothes thrown about him so that he seemed half-naked, and they fell down in such a manner as to shock decency. While they were adjusting his clothes he was left vibrating, upheld partly by the rope and partly by his feet on the table. At last the table was removed, when, to the indescribable horror of the spectators, he was seen suspended with his face uncovered, and one of his hands loose from the cords. Cries were heard from every quarter. A chair was brought and the hand disengaged from the noose in which it had been twisted. The executioner descended, leaving the face still uncovered, exhibiting a spectacle too shocking to be described. This continued till twenty-three minutes past 4 o'clock, when the street lamps were lighted for the night, and the moon and stars distinctly visible."

This writer concludes:—

"The above is a true account by an eye-witness, taken down by him in writing during the same evening, as the writer hopes to see God in mercy."

The legality of this proceeding was much questioned at the time, and apparently with justice, for the criminal had been out of the power of the magistrates; and though they recovered possession of his person, there was a want of judicial identification. In this respect the case differed from the late one at Leeds, which it exceeds much also in the horror of its incidents. G.

Edinburgh.

H. H. PRINCE FRANCIS RHODOCANAKIS.

(3rd S. iv. 453; vii. 267, 348.)

In reply to the query of your correspondent BREVIN, I have to say that Constantine Rhodocanakis, or in Latin Rhodocanaces (genitive case, Rhodocanacidis), was the younger son of Prince Demetrius and of Theodora, only daughter of Theodorus Palaeologus, of the imperial house of that name, whose tomb exists till now in the parish church of Landulph, in the eastern extremity of Cornwall (see Archæologia, vol. xviii. p. 90, and "N. & Q.") from his first wife Eudoxia Comnena; and consequently grandson of Prince Francis Rhodocanakis, Duke, &c., &c.

He was born on the 5th of December, 1635, in Rhodocanaki Castle, situated a few miles from the capital of the Isle of Chios, and built during the tenth century by his ancestor Andronicus, then Lord High Admiral of Romanus II., Emperor of the Byzantine Empire.

There he remained until the age of twenty, when he departed in company with his learned uncle Stephanus, under whose tuition he was, for Flanders and France, where he became acquainted with the exiled young monarch of England, Charles II., at whose restoration to the throne of his ancestors, he wrote in Greek a congratulatory poem, dedicated to his friend Sir William Seymour, Duke of Somerset, Marquis and Earl of Hertford, &c., and entitled—

"Carmen Græca Rhythmica gratulatoria de reditu Carolus Secundus, et Theophylakti Principis Caroli II. Magnæ Britanniae, Galliae et Hiberniae Regis Com-

posita a Constantino Rhodocanacide Chiensi tunc com-morante in celeberrima Academia Oxoniensi. Oxoniae, A.D. 1660. Typis, A. & L. Lichfield, Academ. Typograph." [In small 8vo.]

During the year 1667, he returned to his native isle, Chios, where he married the Duchess Henrietta Koressy, his cousin, but whence he was obliged, a few months afterwards, by the Turkish Government, on account of his political and religious opinions, to depart, and return to London, where he remained many years, always honoured with the friendship of H. M. King Charles II.

He died, not in London during the great plague, as an eminent English novelist of our days erroneously stated in one of his romances, but in Amsterdam, the 13th of August, 1689, whence his mortal remains were a few years later exhumed by his nephew, Prince Francis and his only daughter, transported in the Isle of Chios, and buried in our family mausoleum near his ancestors.

I conclude, observing that all his published literary works are preserved in the Library of the British Museum except the two following ones, both written in English:—

1. "Infallible Remedy against the Plague, by Doctor Constantine Rhodocanaces, Byzantine Nobleman, and Honorary Physician to His Majesty King Charles II. London. Printed by R. D. in the year 1665." Small 4to.

2. "The Last of the Greek Emperors; or, the Fall of Constantinople; written by Konstantinos D. Rhodocanakis, Grecian of the Isle of Chios, &c., and dedicated to H. H. Prince Pantoleon D. Rhodocanakis, Duke, &c., &c. London: Printed by R. D. in the year 1670." In 4to.

RHODOCANAKIS.

Higher Broughton, near Manchester.

"LANG-NEBBED THINGS."

(3rd S. vii. 334.)

Shall I be wrong in identifying the goblin whaap, the long-billed monster] SIR J. EMERSON TENNENT is inquiring for, in the bittern?

"This bird," says Bewick, "flies in the same heavy manner as the heron, and might be mistaken for the heron, were it not for the singular resounding cry which it utters from time to time when on the wing; but this cry is feeble when compared to the hollow booming noise which it makes during the night from its swampy retreats:—

'The Bittern booms along the sounding marsh.'

Compare Isaiah xiv. 23, when foreboding desolation, "I will also make it a possession for the bittern; and I will sweep it with the besom of destruction, says the Lord of hosts." Again, at xxxiv. 11: "The cormorant and the bittern shall possess it; the owl and the raven shall dwell in it." This exactly corresponds with the words in Zephaniah ii. 14: "The cormorant and the shall lodge in the upper lintels of it; their shall sing in the windows; desolation shall the thresholds." All these prophetic passages are strictly in accordance with the descriptions in classical writers of Nocturnæ Striges, or ill-omened birds. The —

" . . . feralia bubo Dainna canens" of Statius is none other than the screech owl of Virgil: —

" Ferali carmine bubo Sæpe queri et longas in fletum ducere voces."

The n. v. bubo is translated "to cry like a bittern."

The long ears of the horned owl, in the dim and dismal night, might easily have led superstitious rustics to class it among "lang-nebbit things." Superstition and alarm are the parents of much of our folk lore. The long and terrible beaks of birds of prey were constantly floating in the imagination of Celt or Saxon in bygone ages; and the scream or croak from them added horror to the nervous feelings of a lonely churl crossing "Mucklestane" or any other dreary "Moor," more especially in the gloom of night. Yes, so it has ever been! Hence —

" . . . rostroque immanis Vultur obunco Immortale jecur tundens."

that preyed upon the vitals of Tityon in the infernal regions, corresponds with the long-beaked monster astride St. Antony in his "Persecution" in the picture of Salvator Rosa. The "Iwy" of Theocritus, a name, according to Aristotle from its cry or shriek, is the wash-dish, or rather wag-tail (Motacilla) in the West of England, where the peasantry to this day believe when it flaps against and strikes with its beak the cottage window, that the death of one of the inmates is at hand. The connection, then, of long-beaks with misty demons and incubi by artists from the eleventh to the eighteenth century, correctly represents the fearful superstition innate in the human mind; and from this only can we hope to find any elucidation of the legendary belief about grallatorial birds, i. e. Birds on Stilts. QUEEN'S GARDENS.

In India there is a peculiar performance of jugglers and players, in which a man dressed in a cloak of feathers, with the mask of a bird with a very long beak, causes invariably much excitement amongst the native spectators.

Amongst the African negroes of the West Indies, a similar figure causes the like agitation, and in this latter case, I have been led to suppose that there may be some connection between it and the feathers which invariably enter into the composition of an Obeah ball, such as is placed near the person whose life is being practised on.

I might add a curious coincidence connected with such superstitions, but fear I should be transgressing the limits of the present subject.

SPAL.

May I request Sir J. E. TENNENT to reconsider his assertion respecting the curlew? he says: —

"Why, then, in the instance of the curlew, has the accident of the prolonged bill inspired a kindred dread, there being nothing in the tone of its voice to give rise to terror?"

The following passage from Recollections of Edward Williams, or Iolo-Morganwg, B.B.D., by the (late) E. Waring, illustrates both the terror caused by the "lang-nebbet things" and the source of the nocturnal cries.

In discussing various Cambrian superstitions, Mr. Waring says: —

"The Cwn Wybr, Dogs of the Sky, otherwise called Cwn Annwn, Dogs of Hell (or of the Abyss), are imaginary spirits of the same family as the diabolical sky hunts of German demonology. They are heard in the deep gloom of night over some dreary mountain or moorland district, appalling the benighted traveller, or the lonely dwellers in those remote places, by baying or yelling in the most horrid chorus. They are not, however, accused of doing any harm beyond the torments they are supposed to inflict on disembodied spirits, abandoned to their mercy in the region of air, doubtless in retribution for some heinous sins committed on earth.

"It was after the bard's death that I asked the late ingenious and well-informed Mr. William Weston Young, then residing at Newton Nottage, in Glamorgan, and riding and walking in all directions indifferently by night or by day, whether he had ever heard the Cwn Wybr in his nocturnal travels? He replied in the affirmative, and said the strange aerial noises had at first greatly startled and perplexed him. Mr. Young, however, was not superstitious, and being a good naturalist, was observant of the notes of birds, and of the remarkable variation between the diurnal and nocturnal note of the same species; the latter often producing a supernatural effect when heard in darkness and solitude. He suspected these Cwn Wybr to be really some gregarious birds flying by night, and at length perfectly satisfied his own mind on the subject. In the course of his business as a land surveyor, he was on a pony one intensely dark night, crossing a desolate tract of mountains, when he heard the most extraordinary yelping and clamorous noises over his head, in various keys, not unlike the cries of hounds and huntsmen in full chase. He looked intently upwards, but the darkness was impenetrable. His quick ear, however, soon caught a rushing sound, which he knew was the burr of pinions against the air, and presently a large flight of curlews descended so near him, that some of their wings brushed his hat as they swept obliquely down to the heather. They had no sooner settled on their feet than the Cwn Wybr ceased to be heard. He then recollected having heard the same peculiar nocturnal cry from the curlew on former occasions, but had never before encountered such an overpowering orchestra of these wild serenaders upon the wing. Mr. Young admitted that nothing could be more natural than the terror of a superstitious or uninformed person at the strange aerial cries he had listened to that night, amidst mountain echoes, and in so desolate a spot." (Pp. 141, 142.)

In addition to the report of Mr. Waring, I may mention that more than thirty years ago the late Mr. W. W. Young gave me an exactly similar account of the manner in which he discovered that the nocturnal cry of the curlew is the cause of the fearful Cwn Wybr.

Are the "Dogs of Tregeagle," in some parts of Cornwall, the same? LÆLIUS.

With reference to the popular superstition which associated "lang-nebbed things" with hags or witches, your learned correspondent, SIR J. EMERSON TENNENT, asks — "Is there any theory or conjecture to elucidate this legendary belief, or to account for the connexion of the long bill of the gullatorial birds with this midnight superstition?" In reply to this question I would venture to offer the following suggestions.

It is to be remarked in the first place that the "lang-nebbed things," though we find them mentioned in connexion with witches, do not appear to be identical with them, but to constitute a distinct class. They were, I would suggest, the imps or familiars, whom the hags were so often accused of suckling; and the lang neb, or long bill, was for the purpose of getting at the secret teat, which was supposed to be often placed at no very accessible part of the person.

The idea of suction, as connected with the Roman striges, strigæ, or lamie, is one which frequently occurs in Roman writers. But then it is the strix herself who sucks — not suckles: and the idea of the creature's having a neb or bill adapted to the purpose — though it had not yet decidedly taken the form of a lang neb — already began to make its appearance in classic times. Thus Ovid, Fest. vi. 131: —

"Grande caput, stantes oculi, rostra apta rapinae."

So that, line 138,

" . . . plenum poto sanguine guttur habent."

And Q. Sereus Sammonicus, who lived in the early part of the third century, towards the close of his medical poem comes still nearer to the idea of lang nebs: —

"Præterea si forte premit strix atra puellas, Virosa immulgens exsertis ubera labris."

Eræstis, put forth, drawn out. Thus the nebs began to grow. We shall presently see how in mediæval times they acquired their full length.

The mediæval witchfinders, in accusing their hapless victims of giving suck, had, as they supposed, a very high authority. In the Vulgate Version, the first part of Lam. iv. 3 is thus translated: — "Sed et lamie nudaverunt mammam, lactaverunt catulos suos;" quite sufficient authority for accusing an imaginary witch of suckling an imaginary imp or familiar.

But now, as to that special point, the said familiar's having a "lang neb," or a long bill. Reference has been already made to the out-of-the-way position of the supposed teat. The best explanation, however, is to be found in the old-fashioned notion that long-billed birds lived by suction. Thus, in Ornithologia Libri III. 1676, edited by Ray on the basis of MS. left by F.

Willughby, we find the following heading, p. 213: "Aves aquaticæ limosuge, rostris tenuibus longissimis, rectis;" under which head appear the scolopax (woodcock), gallinago minor (snipe), &c.

Here we have the lang neb evidently connected with suction; and though the above heading is modified in Ray's translation, published in 1678, he there, in describing the snipe, has added, as if motu proprio, "It lives especially on the fatty unctuous humour it sucks out of the earth." Indeed, the idea of sucking, as connected with the long-billed snipe, is still vernacular amongst us in country places; and if a patient is unable to take solid food, one may hear it said, "Why, you are like a snipe; you live by suction!"

From these premises we may easily understand how sucking imps were supposed to have long bills. SCHIN.

PORTRAIT OF MILTON (3rd S. iv. 26.) — The "Onslow" portrait, inquired for by MR. SCHARF has, I believe, not yet come to light. Can it be the same which I saw at Cambridge about five and twenty years ago, in the possession of a solicitor named Cannon, representing Milton as a very young man? The "Onslow" portrait, if I remember rightly, was made when he was about twenty. Mr. Cannon told me that he had bought the picture in bad condition, and without a frame, from some dealer, either at Ipswich or Bury St. Edmunds, I cannot now recollect which. When I saw it it had been restored and put into a decent frame. But where is it now? Soon after the appearance of MR. SCHARF's query I wrote to Cambridge, but unfortunately my correspondent could give me no information on the subject, and only knew that Mr. Cannon had been dead for some years, and that his effects had been sold by auction. Surely there can be no great difficulty in pushing the investigation, if it is worth while (and I confess that to me it seems so), beyond the point at which I leave it. Q.

HACKNEY HORSES: AFFRI (3rd S. vii. 55.) — This is simply an attempt to Latinize the popular word for cattle, whether horses or oxen, employed in drawing carts or ploughs, and a word which is still in use in the North. It is "aver." The unsuccessful farmer in Scott's Pirate says of the produce of his farm, "the carles and cart-avers (i. e. the labourers and cattle employed) make it a'; and the carles and cart-avers eat it a'." The word is often found in old books.

May I ask what is its derivation? Du Cange thinks "averia" (the usual Low Latin word) to be derived from the Old French "avoir," to have, and that it simply means possession. In this he certainly is fortified by the Latin analogy, "pecunia" is derived from "pecus," and in Teutonic, where "feoh," which originally cattle, at last became to be considered a "fee" or freehold possession. Can your readers assist me to a conclusion?

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

MARTIAL'S EPIGRAM (3rd S. vii. 97, 148, 229.)—There is no doubt that the phrase, "duri ingeni," is to some extent depreciatory; but not to the degree of imputing ignorance, or foolishness. "Stupidus" and "stolidus" clearly have such a meaning. "Crassus" is supposed by some to have the same sense as our "thick-headed;" but though Horace (Sat. ii. 2) applies this phrase to Ofellus, "crasseque Minerva," it is clear he means nothing like stupidity, for in the very same line he calls him "sapiens."

With all respect for the great authorities against me—"pace tantorum virorum"—I still think that my notion of the meaning of the Latin word durus is exactly that of our English word hard. Of course, no scholar for one minute would translate "durus arator," "durus amor," by any word, however euphemized, that would indicate stupidity. The "pater durus" of Ovid (Mét. xiv. 587) means, a hard-hearted parent—not one who lacks brain. And in the Oration of Cicero for Archias, which has been cited, it is not attempted for a moment to impute stupidity to Marius; but simply to say that the poet Archias, when a young man, was quicker in understanding the measures of the Cimbri than the old soldier Marius. This surely did not impute stupidity to the latter. Many an old general of the present day would be glad of the assistance of a subaltern in French, German, or Danish, or of a young attaché, as to the secrets of the various foreign courts.

The "os durum" (Ovid, Mét. v. 457) is exactly our phrase, "hard-mouthed;" and no one who reads Juvenal, would ever interpret "durumque Catonem" as "stupid Cato."

Again, suppose we refer directly to the expression used as regards the fine arts. Pliny (xxxv. 40,) speaks of Mechophanes as "durus in coloribus et sile multus;" and from the same expression as to other painters—"Antidotus in coloribus severior," "Athenion austerior colore"—the meaning is not that Mechophanes was ignorant as to colouring, but that he painted in a low tone, using ochre instead of the brighter yellows.

I will not multiply examples; but still think the expression "duri ingeni" to be exactly our "hard-headed": not brilliant, but shrewd, clever, and business-like—exactly the qualities an architect ought to have.

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

POSTERITY OF KING HAROLD (3rd S. v. 35, 217; vi. 318, 436.)—The arms borne by the family of Muskett of Intwood are almost identical with those ascribed to King Harold: arg. between 2 bars gu. six leopards' faces of the second, 3, 2,

1. These arms were confirmed to the family in 1570 by Cooke, the then Clarencieux, in the following words:—

"And being required of Henry Muskett of Halston, in the county of Suffolk, Gent., to make serche in the registers and records of my office, for such arms and crest as he may lawfully have; whereupon at his request I have made serche accordingly, and do find that he may lawfully have the arms and crest hereafter followinge, &c." (Hollingworthe's Stowmarket, p. 125, quoted from Harl. MS. 2146.)

The Musketts held the manor of Harleston or Haroldstow (Haroleston of Domesday), co. Suffolk, whither they are supposed to have migrated from Somersetshire and Dorsetshire, and their arms appear to have been originally three muschets (sparrow-hawks) in allusion to the name. Is it possible that Cooke merely adopted the arms of Harold to the family into whose hands certain of the lands of that prince had fallen?

JAMES A. HEWITT.

Capetown, S.A.

ADVERBS IMPROPERLY USED (3rd S. vii. 363.) I am tempted to add a few more instances of strange uses of adverbs. In Norfolk, one often hears of a person unwell, that he is "very sadly;" and when his health is improved, we are told that he is "finely," or "good tidily." But many years ago I was amused at a speech in Gloucestershire. It is common in the Western counties to say that a person is "pure," to signify that he is pretty well in health. "How do you do, this morning?" "Pure, thank ye." So on one occasion which I remember, an honest farmer, intending to inquire in the most respectful manner after the health of a family inhabiting a mansion in the place, said without the least consciousness of any equivocal signification in his phraseology: "I hope, Sir, the ladies are all pure."

F. C. H.

There is in the use of the verb "to be" an ambiguity similar to that which I pointed out (p. 225) in the use of the verbs "to look," "to feel."

1. "To be" may be simply the copula, and if by means of it, as such, I wish to predicate a quality of any subject, I use an adjective, as "the rose is sweet."

2. "To be" may be the verbum secundæ adjectivæ, as the scholastic logicians term it; in other words, it may of itself containing, that is, a predicate in itself, predicate existence of the subject—e. g. Deus est, God is.

If, then, I wish to qualify the existence thus expressed, to add its state and conditions, I employ an adverb to modify the force of the verb "to be." Hence I say "She is well, is poorly," &c., because I refer to the present conditions of her being.

Now to compare our usage with that of the Greek and Latin languages. Our phrases "It is well," "She is well," correspond exactly to the Latin "Bene est," "Bene se habet,"* "Bene valeamus;" and to the Greek ἐὶς ἕνα· ἐὶς διακρίσθαι. They may imply a certain activity (cf. "agere vitam," and perhaps the connection between Blos, Bla, vivo, vita, vis, vir), which is correctly qualified by an adverb. This activity is seen more plainly in two phrases which express the same meaning in different words. I mean the Greek ἐὶς ἁπάρτω and our "He shall do well," "How do you do?" In Latin we find the phrase "Satine salve?" (e. g. Liv. i. 58), which is often written "Satine salvæ," the question arising whether the Roman meant to say, "Satine salve res se habet?" "Satine salve est—agitur?" or "Satine salvæ res sunt?" I have no doubt that the reading "salve" and the construction it involves is the more correct, especially since in the Trinummus of Plautus we have the inquiry "Satine salve? dic mihi," answered by an adverb "Recte."

After all it is undeniable that such an expression as "She is nicely" does sound peculiar and even incorrect. I apprehend the reason to be this: the construction by which "is" is merely the copula, and an adjective is used to predicate a quality of the subject is so much simpler than the adverbial construction which I have attempted to explain, that long use of such adverbial phrases as "He is well," "He is poorly," &c., has made us regard the words "well," "poorly," as adjectives. It is only on examination that their true character appears. But in the phrase, "She is nicely," familiarity has not yet bred contempt for the character of the word "nicely." We realise its adverbial importance, and hesitate to use it because it is not an adjective, because, that is, it will not resign its adverbial pretensions to accommodate itself to a mistaken notion. FABRUS OXONIENSIS.

MEANING OF ARBERY (3rd S. vii. 345).—Perhaps your recent decision in "Notices to Correspondents," against receiving just now any more notes about Cold Harbour, will not forbid my saying just a word or two in reply to C. T. I have something of my own to say about Cold Harbour, but will not intrude it upon you at present. I make no motion; "I only rise to explain." C. T. says, "Arbery is an old English word for wood-fuel;" but his quotation from Mandeville does not warrant this assertion: "In that contree is but lyttill arbery, ne trees that beren fruite, ne othere." "Arbery" is here used in the sense of "wood"=sylva, wald; not "wood"=ignem, holz. J. DIXON.

THE PHILIPS, EARLS OF PEMBROKE (3rd S. vii. 378).—Your correspondent will find in Sir R. C. Hoare's Wiltshire, vol. ii. p. 144, that the first Philip, Earl of Pembroke, died 23rd January, 1669-70, and was buried in Salisbury Cathedral, "Where a splendid monument was designed to perpetuate his memory, for which a statue of brass, of extraordinary size, was cast, representing him clothed in armour, but it was never erected." From the same writer he will learn (ibid, p. 147) that the second Philip died in 1669-70, and was buried in the family vault in Salisbury Cathedral. T.

DALYELL'S "SCOTTISH POEMS" (3rd S. vii. 254.) Half mark steikis. This, I think, simply means half-mark pieces; i. e. pieces of money of half a mark each in value. The context is clearly to this effect—

"Su gat thair handfull of thir half mark steikis."

That steik may mean a piece of money is evident from the use of the German stück; compare A.-S. sticce.

Tottis.—Compare Burns's use of tawted or tawtie hair, meaning locks of hair matted (twisted?) together.

Bedene.—Bidding, commandment, seems most likely. W. W. SKRAT.

22, Regent Street, Cambridge.

THE LINCOLNSHIRE CHURCH-NOTES OF GERVASE HOLLES (3rd S. vii. 356, 380) have been partially published in several of the works that have treated of portions of that county. In "An Account of the Churches of the Division of Holland, in the County of Lincoln," with sixty-nine illustrations, published at Boston in 1843, they are given, and the following remarks are made in the Preface:—

"The notes taken on these Churches by Col. Holles, immediately previous to the visits of the Parliamentary perpetrators of sacrilege, are especially valuable; and they show how much the deadly hatred of the Puritan faction robbed and pillaged our sacred edifices, after the 'superstitious furniture' had been removed. They also show that the parochial clergy were very liberal benefactors to the edifices under their charge, giving windows and sedilia, and sometimes even entire chancels, at their own cost."

In Creasey's History of Sleaford, and the neighbouring parishes, 8vo, Holles's Notes for several churches are also published; and so also, in Thompson's Boston, fol. 1856, pp. 191—194; and Weir's Horncastle, 4to, 1820, p. 31.

J. G. N.

ROYAL FRANKING (3rd S. vii. 279, 350, 385).—The misapprehension as to H. R. H. the Duke of Kent having franked by his Christian name, "Edward," may have arisen from his having so written his name on the address of letters not sent by post. I believe autograph-collectors will say that such has been a frequent practice with members of the royal family. But in the case of the late Duke of Gloucester, I have now before me two actual franks (that have passed the post) dated in 1830 and 1833, on which his Royal Highness has signed, not Gloucester, but William Frederick.

J. G. N.

* Cf. the French "Il se porte bien."

PAGAN CARICATURE (3rd S. vii. 330).—MR. WALFORD is quite correct in stating that the "quotation wanted" occurs in one of the early chapters of Tertullian's Apology, and I have pleasure in furnishing your readers with the passage:—

"Sed nova jam Dei nostri in istâ proxime civitate editio publicata est, ex quo quidam frustrandis bestiis mercenarius noxius picturam proposuit cum ejusmodi inscriptione, DEUS CHRISTIANORUM ONOCHOËTES. Is erat auribus asininis, altero pede unguatus, librum gestans, et togatus. Risimus et nomen et formam."—Tertullian, Apologeticus adversus Gentes, § 16, p. 17 D, edit. Paris, 1641.

In the margin of my copy is the following manuscript note on the word Onochætes, written in a beautiful, clear, upright hand of the seventeenth century:—

"Legendum est Ononychotos, quod reperitur in Vossii etymologico, et notat Asinum unguatum, 'Ovos et' Ono & ungula. Vide Bibl. Bremensem, class. III. fasc. vi. pp. 1041, 1036; et Heinii Diss. Sacr., lib. ii. cap. 10, in Bib. [bibliotheca] Germ., t. xl. p. 193."

There is a reference to the same caricature in another work of Tertullian, in which he retorts with stinging severity upon the polytheistic heathens. The following is the passage:—

"Nova jam de Deo nostro fama suggestit. Adeo nuper quidam perditissimus in istâ civitate, etiam suis religionis desertor, solo detrimento cutis Judæus, utique magis post bestiarum morsus, ad quas se locando quotidie toto jam corpore decutit, cum incedit picturam in nos proposuit sub istâ proscriptione, ONOCHOËTES. Is erat auribus canteriorum, et in toga, cum libro, altero pede unguato; et credidit vulgus Judæo. Quod enim aliud genus seminarium est infamie nostræ? Itaque in totâ civitate Onochætes prædicatur. Sed et hoc tamque hesternum, et auctoritate temporis destitutum, et qualitate auctoris infirmum, libenter excipiam studio retorquendi. Videamus igitur, an hic quoque nobiscum deprehendamus. Neque enim interest quâ formâ, dum deformia simulacra curemus? Sunt penes vos et canino capite, et leonino, et de bove, et de ariete et hircu, cornuti dii, caprigenæ, vel anguini, et alites plantâ fronte et tergo. Quid itaque nostrum unicum denotatis? Plures Onochœta penes vos deprehenduntur."—Ad Nationes, lib. i. § 14, p. 59 C, D.

H. W. T.

THE THIRD PLAGUE OF EGYPT (3rd S. vii. 207, 305.)—There are only two kinds of insects, the louse and the gnat, on which we have to decide. The evidence on which this question rests, consists of, 1, the context; 2, parallel passages; 3, the ancient versions; and 4, the rationale of the case. 1. The context speaks of the insects being on or in man and beast; this best applies to the louse, which, as Aristotle shews, is a parasite* on man and beast, and also on birds and fish (Hist. An., v. 31); but does not so well apply to the gnat.

* So ἰσ, place or situation (Gen. xl. 13, xli. 13), a stand, base, or pedestal (Is. xxxiii. 23, 1 Kings vii. 81), which is the root of ἰσ; for there is no proof of the latter being an Egyptian word, as Rosenmüller conjectures.

2. The only parallel passage to Exodus viii. is Psalm cv. 31, for the word צִיָּצִים, ciytsim, does not elsewhere occur; but as it merely refers to this insect being in all their coasts, borders, or territories, in terms of Exodus x. 14, furnishes no proof either way. 3. The ancient versions chiefly read the louse, but the Septuagint and Vulgate read the gnat, which shows that between the event of the plague, B.C. 1491, and the translation of the Septuagint, B.C. 277, an interval of twelve centuries, doubt had crept in as to the kind of insect. A still longer interval occurred before the Syriac, Arabic, Latin, and other ancient versions were made. 4. As to the rationale of the case, I may refer to the improbability of the gnat or mosquito, on the ground that such a plague was avoidable, either by ascending to an elevation, inasmuch as this insect does not fly high, or by a covering of a curtain or net, for even a fisherman's net will suffice to keep off the mosquito, although the meshes are large (Herod. ii. 95). There appears also to be a special reason for Moses creating this plague of the louse, where the Egyptian priests first failed in imitating the plague, because, according to Herodotus, such priests shaved, every third day, all hairs from every part of their bodies, expressly to prevent the louse or any dirt from accumulating on their skin (ii. 37, Philo, De Circumcisione, vol. ii. p. 211; Maimonides, De Suppellectile Templi, ix.; Schmidt, De Sacerd. et Sacrif. Egypt., p. 15, note; and Larcher's note in loco). Those who have read modern works on Egypt, as Lane's, Mrs. Poole's, &c., or on the Hottentots of South Africa, will be aware that the louse is still an almost unavoidable plague. Up to the time of Bochart there was general uniformity of opinion amongst Hebraists, beginning with Josephus, as to the louse, but after the publication of Oedmann's Vermischte Sammlungen aus der Naturkunde zur Erklärung der heiligen Schrift (P. i. c. vi. p. 74-91), the gnat has been preferred by Rosenmüller and the German school (Scholia in Ex. viii. 13).

T. J. BUCKTON.

Lichfield.

CARABOO (3rd S. vii. 209, 310.)—This remarkable woman was born Nov. 11, 1792, at Witheridge, Devonshire, and was the second child of Thomas Willcocks, an honest hardworking man, by trade a cobbler, and of Mary his wife, a sober industrious woman, whose maiden name was Burgess. This daughter was named Mary, and was admitted into the Magdalen Hospital, London, under the feigned name of Anne Burgess, on Feb. 4, 1813, previously to which she had led a loose life for some years. One of the men with whom she cohabited, and to whom she stated she was married after two months' acquaintance by a Romish priest, was named Bakerstendht or Beckerstein, a foreigner, from whom doubtless she learnt the Malay language, and thus became acquainted with Asiatic customs and idioms, so useful to her in practising her subsequent impositions. Anglicising his name, she changed hers from Mary Willcocks into that of Mary Baker; although, after the discovery of her imposture, we find her in 1817 entered as a passenger on board the Robert and Ann, Captain Robertson, for Philadelphia as "Mrs. Burgess." How long she remained in America I am unable exactly to ascertain, but believe about seven years; and she afterwards exhibited herself in London, which, however, gratified her overweening vanity only for a time, when she travelled on the continent, where she remained some years in the South of France and North of Spain.

I became acquainted with her in Bristol in December, 1849, when, after much reluctance, she gave me her signature as "Mary Baker." She then lived under Pyle Hill, Bedminster, and gained her livelihood as well as supported her daughter, still living, by selling leeches to our Infirmary Hospital, and to many of our druggists.

She avoided as much as possible any conversation with regard to her former career, of which I think she was much ashamed; and nothing annoyed her more than when a neighbour's child ventured to call after her "Caraboo!"

She died in December last year, but I have not yet been able to ascertain the exact date.

BRISTOLIENSIS.

CUISEA: CUISHEAG (3rd S. vii. 338.)—Cuisheag, or cuisheog, is a diminutive, formed from cas, a stalk, or tendril—Irish and Gaelic. The Irish pronunciation is cushogue. I am not aware that it denotes any particular variety of grass. The word is used in the Ossianic poems for the grass swept by the wind over the tomb of the hero, &c. The cotton grass (Eriophorum, one of the sedges) also furnishes a comparison for the white bosoms of the Ossianic maidens, the seeds of that plant being furnished with a pencil of snow-white filaments. This is the canach (canach) of the Irish and Gaelic. Cushag (cushag) is the wild mustard plant.

J. L.

Dublin.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN (3rd S. vii. 356.)—The following extract is from The Streets of London, by J. T. Smith, 1854 (Richard Bentley), and refers to the query of S. W. P. in the last number:—

"Duke Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields is memorable as the scene of the early life of Franklin. His lodgings were in Duke Street, and he worked as a journeyman printer in the office of Mr. Watts in Great Wyld Street adjoining. He first of all worked for a twelve month at a printer's named Palmer, in Bartholomew Close; but he worked for Mr. Watts during the remainder of his stay in England. It was in 1725 that he took his lodgings, consisting of one room, at the house of a widow lady opposite the Catholic chapel, which he paid for at the rate of 2s. 6d. a week. The landlady was a clergyman's daughter; who, marrying a Catholic, had abjured Protestantism, and became acquainted with several distinguished families of that persuasion."

At that time Franklin was about nineteen years of age, and the house where he lived probably No. 8. Some time back, I made the following note in connection with Franklin:—Pursuant to an order of the Court of Chancery, dated the 8th August, 1772, made in the matter of the proprietors of the Pennsylvania Land Company of London, a sum of money was directed to be paid to "Dr. John Fothergill, me Benjamin Franklin, and me David Barclay, as attorneys to the managers of the Pennsylvania Hospital in Pennsylvania." This sum of money was accordingly received on the 27th August, 1772, by B. Franklin and D. Barclay for themselves, and as attorneys for Dr. John Fothergill, the eminent Quaker physician.

ALBERT BUTTERY.

DESCENDANT OF SARSFIELD (3rd S. vii. 378.)—I presume MR. REDMOND means the celebrated Patrick Sarsfield, Earl of Lucan. Irish pedigrees have generally an exceedingly uncertain notoriety, particularly among those who are best acquainted with genealogical difficulties and inquiries; but the following, having the sanction of a title, I am happy to give it to MR. REDMOND quantum valeat.

Sir John Bingham, Bart., married Anne, daughter of Agmondesham Vesey, Esq., niece or grandniece of Patrick Sarsfield, Earl of Lucan. He died in 1749, and was succeeded by his eldest son, who, dying without issue in 1752, the baronetcy devolved upon his brother, Sir Charles Bingham, who was raised to the peerage in 1776 as Baron Lucan of Castlebar, and advanced to be Earl of Lucan, 1795. Any peerage will tell the rest.

WILLIAM PINKERTON.

THE O'CONNORS OF KERRY (3rd S. vii. 280, 364.) I have pleasure in referring your correspondent for much interesting information to the Kerry Magazine, 1855, vol. ii. pp. 181-188. ABHBA.

"WODROW'S PRIVATE LETTERS" (3rd S. vii. 378.)—This was one of the many works issued by the late John Stevenson, bookseller, Edinburgh (Sir Walter Scott's "True Jock"). In the Preface thereto it is remarked that—

"Although the ensuing Letters are both curious and interesting, their peculiar and local nature renders them best suited for private circulation among those persons who think there is no very great harm in being diverted with such (antiquated) scandal as afforded amusement to a person so truly respectable and virtuous as Mr. Robert Wodrow, Minister of the Gospel at Eastwood, to whom (with the exception of a very few) they are all addressed."

In Fraser's London Magazine for March, 1834, p. 326, there appeared a very clever and amusing review of this curious little volume, where it is asserted that it was the joint productions of the late celebrated facetious Peter, Lord Robertson, and a highly popular clergyman. The impression having been limited to some fifty or seventy cop-it is now entirely out of print, and consequently rare.

T. G. S.

Edinburgh.

THE IMMORTALITY OF THE BRUTE CREATION (3rd S. vi. 415; vii. 339, 385.)—Those who are interested in this question may consult the Lettres de quelques Juifs à Voltaire, tom. iii. p. 394; Carpenter's Instinct in Animals; Gregory's Comparative View of Men and Animals; Turner's Sacred History of the World; * Hume's Essays, vol. ii. pp. 111-117; Rowton's Debater, p. 243; Jesse's Anecdotes of Dogs, and Gleanings in Natural History; Waterton's Essay on Natural History; Aimé Martin, On Education (by Lee); Vestiges of Natural History of Creation, p. 333; Reid, On the Mind, p. 480; Fletcher, On Cruelty to Animals; Willis, De Animâ Brutorum.

Your correspondent's hint in p. 339 induces me to confine the above references to the works of laymen only. I avail myself of this opportunity to express my thanks for the varied information supplied by MR. WOODWARD, P.M., J. B. SHAW, F.P.L. (in whom I have the pleasure of recognising an old archæological friend), MR. W. D. HOYLE, R.I.F., and on several occasions by yourself.

H. W. T.

MANETHO (3rd S. vii. 356, 389.)—As regards the credibility of the history circulated under Manetho's name, see Faber, Horæ Mosaicæ, i. 251; and Rawlinson's Bampton Lectures, p. 56, and note.

H. W. T.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series of the Reign of Elizabeth, 1581-1590, preserved in Her Majesty's Record Office. Edited by Robert Lemon, Esq., F.S.A., under the Direction of the Master of the Rolls, &c. (Longman.)

Mr. Lemon has not done justice to himself or to the value of the present Calendar by omitting an introduction. But it is impossible to open the book at any page without perceiving at a glance how full of interest are the documents relating to this period of Elizabeth's reign which are preserved in the Record Office, and how carefully Mr. Lemon has calendered them. Thus at p. 209, while the majority of the documents recorded on it relate to the works then (1584) in hand at Dover Castle, we find the Queen thanking the Captains of the Trained Bands for the diligence they had shown; and Sir Christopher Hatton writing to Burghley of the "illness of Her Majesty through eating for breakfast a confection of barley sodden with sugar and water, and made exceeding thick with bread."

The Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties. By George L. Craik, M.A. A New Edition revised and enlarged. (Bell & Daldy.)

This book, the object of which is so well conceived, and which has been as ably carried out by Mr. Craik; this book so happily named by Lord Brougham; for, as we learn from the present edition, Lord Brougham suggested the alteration of the proposed title, The Love of Knowledge overcoming Difficulties in the Pursuit, into its present terser and better form, this book will ever be a favourite, and Messrs. Bell & Daldy have done wisely in adding portraits to it, and including it in Bohn's Illustrated Library Series.

* I greatly regret not having any specific reference to vol. and page.

Devotions before and after Holy Communion. (J. H. & J. Parker.)

The well-known initials T. K. will sufficiently explain how the author has drawn up this little manual, "in the true spirit of the Ancient Liturgies and of our own."

The Fortnightly Review. Edited by George Henry Lewes. No. 1. (Chapman & Hall.)

A new candidate for the favour of the periodical-reading public, based on the idea of the Revue des Deux Mondes, and intended to further the cause of progress. The first number exhibits a goodly array of contributors, and a pleasant variety of subjects treated by them.

Mr. J. Payne Collier five-and-forty years ago proved himself a diligent student of Early English Literature by his Poetical Decameron. Mr. Lilly is now about to publish a couple of octavo volumes, in which our old friend and correspondent, will give us the fruits of that additional forty-five years' study under the title of A Bibliographical and Critical Account of the Rarest Books in the English Language, alphabetically arranged, accompanied with Numerous Extracts, in Verse and Prose, and a very copious and useful Index, which during the last fifty years have come under the observation of J. Payne Collier, F.S.A.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Particulars of Price, &c., of the following Books to be sent direct to the gentleman by whom they are required, and whose name and address are given for that purpose:—

REV. A. HOME'S CLERICAL LABOUR: ITS OCCASIONAL CHARACTER AND EXTENT. 1861.

CHURCH EXTENSION IN LIVERPOOL, 1861?
GLADSTONE (RT. HON. W. E.), LETTER TO RIGHT REV. W. SKIFFER, D.D., BISHOP OF ABERDEEN AND FRIBURG. London, 1862.

Wanted by Rev. Aiken Irvine, Kilbride, Bray.

Notices to Correspondents.

G. O. L.'s query about Vines was, we presume, intended for The Gardener's Chronicle, to which it has been forwarded, and where our Quærist will doubtless get the information he desires.

ROBERT PARKER. For the origin of the passage in the Burial Service, "In the midst of life we are in death," consult "N. & Q." and S. v. 177, Feb. 27, 1864.

R. I. The MS. plays presented to the British Museum by Mr. Coventry Patmore are not at present available. The seven dramas inquired after are of the eighteenth century.

ERRATUM.—3rd S. vii. p. 277, col. ii. line 33, for "Baltimore" read "Bartymore."

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 6d.

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STRAITS CROWN for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly INDEX) is 11s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. SMITH, 22, WELLINGTON STRAITS, STRAND, W.C., where also all COMMUNICATIONS FOR THE EDITOR should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

CURE OF DISEASE OF THE CHEST BY DR. LOOCK'S FOLIOLETTES WAYNE. From Mr. Thomas Wilks, Market Deeping: "Your valuable Waynes are very efficient for Chest Diseases. I have tried them myself, and recommended them to several friends, and proved their beneficial effects. —T. WILKS." They give instant relief, and rapidly cure asthma, consumption, and coughs, and all disorders of the breath and lungs. Price 1s. 1½d., 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per box. Sold by all Druggists.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 178.

NOTES:—The Origin of Smithfield Cattle-Market, 411—Cervantes and Lope de Vega, 413—Master John Schorne, ib.—Ugrians in Britain, 414—Irish Books printed at Home and Abroad, ib.—Literary Forgeries—Duc de Chateherault—Inedited Work by Sir Christopher Heydon—Whetstone's "Censure of a Loyall Subject"—Gibbon's Autobiography: Heraldic Term misused—William Molyneux's Monument—Families of Danish or British Descent—Hoity-Toity, 418.

QUERIES:—Borwens—"Bonnie Dundee"—George Christian Braun—Bull of Clement VI.—Cannel Coal—Caraboo—The Devil's Music—Dragon in Heraldry—"The Bishop of Dublin's Prophecy," &c.—Ecclesiological Destruction or Desecration—The Exodus of the Israelites—German Drama—Horse: Grace—"Journey through Switzerland"—Epigrams by W. S. Lander—William Pennoek—Sundry Queries concerning Proverbs, &c.—John Ritchie—Shakespeare's Works, 1800—Provincial Synod of Dublin, 1803—Tip—Travelling Scotchmen—Witches and Brooms, 418.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Memoria Technica—"An Essay towards an History of the English Tongue"—Books on Magic—Clocks, Watches, Horology, and Horologists—"Big-headed Men"—Bridge Inscription—Lewis, 320.

REPLIES:—William, Son of King Stephen, 421—Shelves in Whitshire, 423—Fires how anciently Kindled, 423—Ignition of Wood by Friction, ib.—Men of Kent and Kentish Men, ib.—Transmutation of Metals, 424—Cary Family—Kox Ompar—"Melanthe"—Robert Cranmer—Words used in different Senses—May-day Songs—Fences or Sheaves—Ansaryri—Jack Stones—Mistletoe—Adverts improperly used—Chap—Assumption of Arms—Uricanism, or Wroxteter—Quotation Wanted—Coronets—Hag's Prayer, &c., 424.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

THE ORIGIN OF SMITHFIELD CATTLE-MARKET.

The following "Orders in Council" (which I met with quite accidentally while searching for other matters), show conclusively that the Cattle Market in Smithfield was not established from "time immemorial," as was asserted by the opponents to its removal to Islington a few years since. It appears, from these documents:—

1st. That the Cattle Market was not held in Smithfield till the year 1631.

2nd. That it was established there "against all warrant of law, or intention of any particular charter" . . . "by a combination of the Butchers of London."

3rd. That the market had, theretofore, been held at Chipping-Barnet.

4th. That a quo warranto was directed to be issued in the King's Bench against the Charter of the Butchers' Company.

5th. That four Commissioners, Justices of the Peace for the County of Middlesex, were appointed "to take the same into serious consideration" . . . "and to find out the best and readiest means to be applied for remedy of the said abuses."

6th. That the Act of Incorporation of the Butchers' Company ordered, 11th July, 1637, was rescinded on the 31st March, 1639.

"ORDERS IN COUNCIL, IN RELATION TO SMITHFIELD CATTLE MARKET.

"At Whytehall, the 16th of February, 1630-1.

"Whereas, it hath beene lately represented to the Board, as well by the Petition of the Inhabitants of Chipping-Barnet, in the County of Hertford, as by Complaint otherwise on the behalfe of divers Counties northward, lying upon that Roade, consisting chiefly of grazeing and feedeing of Cattell, that they being heretofore accustomed to bring theire Cattell noe further then to the usuall Munday Markett at Barnet, where by reason that the London Butchers and Forraignors resorting thither to buye, had equall Priveledges and Imunities, they made theire Marketts at such rates as were reasonable and indifferent betweene Buyer and Seller. That now by suppression of the said Markett (wrought by the Combination of the Butchers of London) in erecting a new Munday Markett at West Smythfield, and by the said Butchers becoming graziers themselves in hyreing all the best Marshes and feedeing grounds within five myles or more distant from London, wherby they are able to supply the Markett themselves, and by confederacie to raise or beate downe the same at theire pleasure, and to make all Forraignors to sell as they list. That by this means, as well noble men, Gent., and others of the said Counties Northward (whose lands consist chiefly in grazeing and feedeing Cattell as aforesaid), as the said towne of Barnet in particular, sustained much prejudice and damage in theire Estates. And, therefore, were humble Suitors to the Board for some course to be taken for Redresse and remeadie therof.

"Theire Lordships, after mature advise and deliberacion had therupon, being well inclyned to restore and uphold the said Markett, as a Remedie in some degree to the Greevances complaind of, and being satisfied as well upon severall Informacions heretofore given, as upon consideracion had of the Articles presented by the Petitioners that the Practizes and Combinacions of the Butchers of London in governing the Marketts there as they list, was greatly to the prejudice of the publique, and against all Warrant of Lawe, or intencion of any particular Charter to them granted, did thinke fitt and order that his Majesties Attorney-Generall be hereby required to take the same into Consideracion, as a business of more then ordenarie Consequence, and wherof this Board hath taken noe light impresson; and that hee proceede with speede and effect, as well in the Examination of any such Combinacion and indirect Practizes, as are complaind of, as in advicing of and providinge such Reamedie therin, either by Proceeding against those in an Exemplarie way who shalbe found offenders, or by questioning theire Charter (if there be Cause), or by such other fitt course, as the case shall require, and as to Justice and equitie shall appertaine. And to make Reporte to the Board of his doings and proceedings thereon with all convenient Expedition."

"At Whitehall, the 4th of May, 1631.

"Mr. Attorney is required to Command the Butchers' Bookes of Common Acts, and other bookes which may anie way give Light what Practise, Combinacion, or Order, hath bin taken in that Companie to overthrow or hinder Barnet Markett.

"To enquire what Butchers of London use grazeing about the Cittie, and what quantitie of Lands, or Marsh Grounds they have nere about London, and where.

"To enquire of the practises and abuses of Smythfield Monday Markett, to the prejudice of the Gent., Grasiars, and of all others repaireing to the said Markett to buy and sell Cattle, and of the Courses holden in ordering the Markett, takeing toll, governing the Prices, &c.

"To take anie other course he shall finde fitt by Wittnesses, or otherwise, for discovery by what meanes, and by colour of what Graunts, Charters, Ordinances, or Orders, these things are practised."

"At Whytehall, the 15th of June, 1631.

"Upon consideracion this day had at the Board, of a Certificate made by his Majestie's Attorney-Generall, upon a former reference to him from their Lordships, concerning the overthrowing of Barnett Markett by undue practize and Combination of the Butchers of London, to the great prejudice of all Landlords and Graiziers dwelling northward from thence, and tending to the enhancing of the Prizes of all sorts of Butcher's meate, to the Greate damage of his Majestie's Subjects in and neere the City of London. Their Lordships being of opinion, that the overthrowe of the said Markett at Barnet, and the practize of the Butchers of London, becoming Graiziers as well as Butchers, and hyeing to that purpose most of the Marshes and feeding grounds neere the City, are (amongst other things fitt alsoe to be considered of) the cheefe Causes of the aforesaid mischeefes and inconveniences, did thinke fitt and order that his Majestie's Attorney-Generall, calling unto him Mr. Serjant Barkley, should advise of a Proceeding to be had against the said Butchers, as well by a Quo Warranto in the King's Bench against the Charter, under which they are protected, as by Information in the Starr-Chamber for the discoverie of the indirect practizes and Combinacions amongst themselves, wherein especially for that information in Starr-Chamber their Lordships expect the same should be hastened, to the end some farther Proceedings may be had therupon this Tearme."

"1634. Touching Barnet Market and the Butchers of London.

"At Starr-Chamber, the 10th October, 1634.

"Upon consideracion this day had of severall former orders of the Board, concerning the combination of the Butchers of London, in the putting downe of Barnett Market, and their practize in becoming Graiziers, as well as Butchers, and hyeing to that purpose most of the Marshes and feeding Grounds neere London, both which tend to the greate damage and Prejudice of all Landlords and Graiziers dwelling northward from thence, and the later of them tending to the Greate Prejudice of Noblemen, Gent., and other his Majestie's Servants and Subjects, liveing neere or resorting to London, by converting all those Grounds which formerly furnished the City with hay into Graizeing, and upon Consideracion in particular of an order of the 15th of June, 1631, with a Certificate of his Majestie's then Attorney-Generall concerning the same. Their Lordships did thinke fitt and order, that the said order and certificate should be herewithall sent unto his Majestie's now Attorney-Generall. Praying and requiring him to cause a speedie and effectuell proceeding to be had according to the opinion delivered in the said Certificate, and the Direccions of the said order; or in such other way as he shall think fittest for the discoverie and reformation of the said abuse."

"1635. Touching London Butchers.

"At Whytehall, the 26th of June, 1635.

"Whereas, a Petition was this day presented to the Board by Abraham Cornish and others, Butchers of London, expressing the causes of the inhauncing the prizes of all sorts of Butcher's meate, together with a list of the names of the principall offenders therein. Their Lordships, upon consideracion had therof, as alsoe of severall former orders, one of the 15th of June, 1631, and th'other of the 10th of October last, made concerning the same, did now againe thinke fitt and order: That his Majestie's Attorney-Generall should be hereby prayed and required, to cause such proceeding to be therein had, as by the said orders is directed, or as he shall conceive to be most effectuell for the discovery and reforming of the said abuses and practizes mentioned in the said orders and Petition, and for the punishment of the said offenders."

"1636. Touching the Butchers of London turnings Graiziers, and Barnett Markett.

"At Whitehall, the 30th of March, 1636."

"Upon serious consideracion of the many greate and growing mischiefs, as well to the Inhabitants in and neare the City of London as to forraigne Graiziers and Landlords, by the indirect practises and combination of the Butchers of London, in becoming Graiziers, and in hiring of Grounds in and neare the said City to feed Cattle. Their Lordships did this day order, that the severall former orders of the Boord, hereunto annexed, should bee sent unto Sr Henry Spiller, K^t, Charles Harbert, Esqr, his Majestie's Surveyor-Generall, Lawrence Whitaker, Esq., Clerke of the Councell in extraordinary, and George Longe, Esq., being all Justices of the Peace in the County of Middlesex, requiring them or any two, three, or more of them, to take the same into serious consideracion, and calling before them as well such Butchers, Graiziers, and others, as they shall thinke fitt, to examine them concerning the said businesse. And for their further informacion therein to viewe the Books and Common Acts of the Company of Butchers aforesaid: And likewise to consider of the consequence of the overthrow of Barnet Market. To recover, if it may bee, the certificate mentioned in the orders annexed, dated the 15th of June, 1631; and of the 10th of October, 1634. And to examine and performe whatsoever is by the said annexed orders directed to bee done, for better discovery not only of the said Combination and indirect Practizes of the said Butchers, and the inconveniences and manifold prejudices arising by the same to the publike, but also to discover and finde out the best and readiest meanes to bee applied for remedy of the said abuses. And of their proceedings and opinions in the premises to make Certificate to the Boord with all convenient expedition.

(Signed) "Ew. NICHOLAS."
[Clerk to the Privy Council.]

"1637. Concerning the Butchers' Patent for a Corporacion.

"At the Starr-Chamber, the 11th of July, 1637.

"It was this day ordered that his Majestie's Attourney Generall should bee hereby prayed and required, in drawing up the Patent for the Corporacion of Butchers, to insert these Acts following, viz:—

"2 & 3 Edw. VI. Cap. 5. An act touching Victuallers and Handicraftsmen. [About setting of prices.]

"24 Hen. VIII. [Cap.] 9. Butchers shall sell no Wainelings under the age of two yeares.

"3 & 4 Edw. VI. Cap. 19. An act for the buying and selling of Rother [Rother? sic orig.] Beasts and Cattell.

"Not to buy and sell at one and the same Markett; nor to buy fatt Cattell and sell them alive.

"31 Hen. III. That a Butcher shall not sell contagious flesh, or that dyed of the Murren.

"1 Jac. 22 Cap. That Butchers shall not gash hydes; nor shall kill any Calfe to sell under 5 weekes old.

"6 Edw. VI. Cap. 14. An Act against Regrators, Forestallers, and Engrossers. That none shall buy oxen, sheepe, &c., liveing, and sell the same againe, unless he keepe and feede them 5 weekes.

"All which Acts the said Corporacion and Members thereof, are to bee enjoyed by the said Patent to cause to bee duely observed, so farre forth as shall bee in their power."

" At Whytchall, the 30th of March, 1638.

" Things desired by the City to be granted, wherof some are newe, for strengthening of Government. Some Explanatorie of the matters containd in the former Agreement, consented unto by the Lords and others appointed by his Majestie to treat with the City."

[Among numerous other matters, 23 Articles in all, is the following:]—

" That noe Markett shall be granted, erected, or suffered within seven myles of London."

" 1639. About the Recalling of Certain Pattents and Comissions.

" At Whitehall, the last of March, 1639.

" According to his Majestie's especiall direction, their Lordships having this day considered of divers Graunts, Lycences, and Commissions, which have bene procured upon untrue Suggestions, or which upon experience doe proove very burdensome and grievous to the King's Subjects, and of other intended Graunts which have not as yett passed the Great Seale, have thought fitt and ordered that his Majestie's Attorney-Generall shall draw a Proclamation for their Lordships to signe for revocation of the Commissions, Lycences, Letters Pattents, and Intended Graunts following, or for the prohibition of the execution of them, as the case shall require, which Declaration of his Majestie's Attorney-Generall is to proceed legally to revoke them. That is to say:—

" No. 18. 'Petitie Corporations to bee recalled, such as are not past the Great Seale, the rest to bee prohibited to bee executed, and declared that they shall bee proceeded agaynst by Quo Warranto. Combmakers, Hatband-makers, Gutstring-makers, Butchers, Tobacco-pipe makers, Horners, Spectacle-makers.'"

[32 various Patents, &c., named in the list, of which the above forms No. 18.]

G. A.

Barnsbury.

CERVANTES AND LOPE DE VEGA.

It has been asserted by some English and even Spanish writers, that Cervantes treated his contemporary, Lope de Vega, with great contempt and injustice. This assertion, I believe, cannot be supported. It is indeed true, that the illustrious author of Don Quixote spoke of Lope de Vega's better judgment occasionally yielding to the temptation of securing immediate profit, by sacrificing his permanent fame to a fleeting popularity with the public. But this was a fact which Lope himself often acknowledged; and while his admirers styled him the "Phoenix of Spain," Cervantes called him "a prodigy of Nature." Indeed Cervantes possessed too much generosity and nobleness of mind, not to acknowledge the merits and literary excellence of Lope de Vega. This he does in two passages—1. In his Viage de Parnaso, where the following lines are applied to his rival:—

"Poeta insigne, a cuyo verso o prosa, Ninguno le aventaja, ni aun le llega." *

2. A remarkable testimony to his poetic merits

* "Distinguished bard, whom none of modern time Can pass, or even reach, in prose or rhyme."

occurs also in a prologue to one of the plays. These are the words of Cervantes:—

" At last appeared that prodigy of nature, the great Lope de Vega, and established himself the monarch of the stage: he subjected it to his controul, and placed all its actors under his jurisdiction. He also filled the world with plays, written well and with much purity. The number amounted to so many, that they exceed eighteen hundred sheets of paper. But what is the most wonderful of all that can be said on the subject, every one of these plays I have either seen acted myself, or have heard of their being so from those who had seen them. And if any persons, of whom in truth there are not a few, desired to enter into competition with him and share the glory of his labours, all that they have done, when put together, would not equal the half of what has been done by him alone."—Quoted by Ticknor in his History of Spanish Literature, vol. ii. p. 85, ed. Lond. 1849.

In the original Spanish, the expression "El monstruo de naturaleza, el gran Lope de Vega," must mean "the prodigy of Nature, the great Lope de Vega," &c. But, in Don Quixote (Primera Parte, cap. 46), Cervantes makes use of the words, monstruo de naturaleza, in a bad sense: thus, "Vete de mi presencia, monstruo de naturaleza, depositario de mentiras," &c. The expression is, however, frequently used in a complimentary sense. Thus Lope de Vega, in his Hermosa Ester (Comedias, tom. xv., Madrid, 1621), near the end of the first act, makes Ashuerus exclaim in admiration of the fair Esther:—

"Tanta belleza, Monstruo será de la naturaleza," &c.

Cervantes no doubt used the words "prodigy of nature," in admiration of the prodigious fertility of Lope's muse, of which Montalvan (Parnaso Español) gives us such wondrous accounts, and also Lord Holland in his Life of Lope de Vega, London, 1817; Appendix, No. 1, vol. i.

J. DALTON.

Norwich.

MASTER JOHN SCHORNE.

Happening to take up the May number of the Gentleman's Magazine, I found under the heading of "Minor Correspondence," an inquiry from CANON DALTON of Norwich, for any references to publications containing accounts of Sir John Schorne. As I have no doubt that he will see "N. & Q.," I forward the following in reply to his inquiry. All that is known of this venerated person may be found in Ashmole's History of Windsor, Lipscombe's Bucks, and Lysons's Magna Britannia. Among the papers of the Norfolk and Norwich Archæological Society, there is a very interesting one on this subject by Rev. Jas. Bulwer, in vol. ii. p. 280. In Chambers' Book of Days, vol. i. p. 609, is given nearly all that is known of Master John Schorne. There was a painting of him in Marston church, but three panel paintings only now remain, representing him with the devil in a boot; one at Cawston, another at Gately (both in Norfolk), and a third exhibited in 1850 at Sudbury, supposed to have belonged to the rood-screen of a church in that town.

An interesting account of this panel painting may be seen in the Literary Gazette for Oct. 19, 1850. But we need not go beyond the universal repertory of "N. & Q." In the second vol. were several articles on Master John Schorne; one by the Editor at p. 387, another by MR. ALBERT WAY at p. 450, and two others at p. 520 by correspondents signed respectively W. H. K. and E. S. T. These communications indeed include nearly all that is left on record of Sir John Schorne. But curiosity will be disappointed if it expects much. It will learn little more than that he was rector of North, or Great Marston, Bucks; of which the church is a striking edifice, with a good sacristy containing a piscina, and a staircase to an upper room, with a fire-place and a small opening through a blank window into the chancel. The will of this John Schorne is dated May 8, 1308. His remains were removed to Windsor, but brought back afterwards to Great Marston, which became a famous place of pilgrimage. As to the origin of the devil in the boot, with which he is always represented, nothing can now be ascertained with anything like certainty. Indeed it is not clear whether he is confining the devil in a boot, or causing him to come out of it. It is known that he was invoked for the ague; and if for the gout also, it is not unlikely that this emblem may have been intended to represent cures of that excruciating malady, obtained by his intercession. This is mere conjecture; but it is perhaps worth quite as much as any other hazarded upon Sir John Schorne's devil and boot.

F. C. H.

UGRIANS IN BRITAIN.

The -by termination and the Klint hills of East Anglia are Danish; but just where the -bys lie thickest northward of Yarmouth, I think we find a hint of a more northern origin, suggesting a link in the Ugrian or Finn chain. There, on the edge of that wide spread marshland, where Flora gains no wreath but of cotton grass, bulrush, and nag-wort; where the "Broads" tempt the ornithologist and fisherman, but repel the artist, we find the villages of east and west Somerton situated on a rather steep but short ascent: and on the edge of the higher ground which bounds the Mad-discoe marshes, we have a place called Somerleyton; while in Lincolnshire, among the -bys east of Louth, are north and south Somercote overlooking the Saltfleet marshes. Now, in Dr. Latham's Native Races of Russia, p. 75, is this sentence:—

"The native name for the Tavastrians and Karelians—Hamalaiset and Kirialaiset—collectively, is Suomalaiset; from whence Suoma, marsh or fen; Suomalaiset, the people of the marsh, swamp."

The Tavastrians and the Karelians lie in the Grand Duchy of Finland, between the gulfs of Bothnia and Finland. By these, Dr. Latham, p. 115, thinks—

"It (Suoma) was applied to the country occupied by their Samoyed neighbours, and taken up from the Karelian or Siranian by the Russians, from whom it spread over the learned world of Europe at large. If this be true, it is the same root that appears in the name Suomalaiset and Sabine, Fin and Lap."

Dr. Latham says, "How it came into our language is a difficult question." Let us turn to Herodotus, who declares himself unable to obtain any information respecting the Hyperboreans from the Scythians of Little Tartary; their neighbours, the Essedones, being the sole people who knew anything about them. Here we are reminded of the British war chariot, Essedon or Essedum, brought hither by the Belgæ. Connected with the Hyperboreans were the Arimaspians, whom the historian almost treats as fabulous. After giving his reasons for his opinion, Dr. Latham (p. 80) says, "At present I commit myself to the idea that, name for name, the modern word Tsherenis is the ancient word Arimaspi."

These Tsherenis lie on the western bank of the Volga, in the Government of Viatka; the Essedones lay probably to the west of them, as that would be the direction of the Hyperborean country; but I find no means in Dr. Latham of fixing their station. I end with a suggestion—that it might be worth while to seek in the neighbourhood of the villages I have named for relics of our earliest ancestors, bone or flint.

F. C. B.

IRISH BOOKS PRINTED AT HOME AND ABROAD.

Space having been courteously afforded to the notices which, from time to time, I have contributed on Irish manuscripts, and to my recent supplementary list of published Gaelic grammars, I am led to opine that this communication will also be honoured with a place in the imperishable collection of "N. & Q." With many others I regret that "untoward" events, most potential amongst them national prejudices and mistaken notions of policy, secular and religious, proscribed for many years both the literature and language of Keltic Ireland. To this state of things is attributable the limited list I send. Though few the books I note, I believe this list is the most replete which has appeared in print, or indeed has yet been made, of Irish books printed before the nineteenth century. One beneficial result I anticipate, that it will lead to the discovery of other publications in the Irish language. And here again I have to express my obligations for some additions to Mr. John Power, compiler of the Bibliotheca Hibernica, now in preparation.

Rev. James Dowling, Suim Bhunúdasach an Teagúig Chriosduíge a Chrosagundhan, i. e., the Sum and Substance of the Christian Doctrine, in Prose and Verse, 12^o, Louvain, 1728.

Rev. John O'Keernaigh, treasurer of St. Patrick's: An Exposition of the Christian Doctrine, Articles of Faith and Prayers; printed in Irish in Dublin at the expense of Mr. John Usher (Usher), Alderman, at the head of the bridge, on 20th June, 1571.—This is said to be "certainly the first book printed with a view to the instruction of the Native Irish." A copy in the British Museum. This gentleman declined the archbishoprick of Tuam.

Dr. Nehemias Donellan, Archbishop of Tuam: Communion Book and New Testament.—Anderson, in his "Native Irish," says, it appears by a Privy Seal, dated 24 May, 1595, that he (the Archbishop) had taken great pains in translating and putting to the press the above-mentioned works in the Irish language, which Queen Elizabeth greatly approved of" (3rd edition, p. 32).

Dr. William O'Donnell, Archbishop of Tuam: The New Testament, 1608; The Book of Common Prayer, fol., 1608.

Hugh McAingil, Scathan Shacramuinte na haitrighe, ar na cuma don bhraithair bhocht d'ord. Froinsias, Louvain, 1608.

Rev. Bonaventura Hussey (Hosæus): Catechism, Louvain, 1608.—This is the first Irish book known to have been printed on the Continent, and is in the Irish character. It was reprinted at Antwerp, 1611, and again in 1618.

Rev. Hugh Mac Caghwell (Cavellus): Mirror of the Sacrament of Penance, 1618.

Rev. Florence Coury, or O'Mulconaire: Mirror of Religion, a Catechism in the Irish character, Louvain, 1626.

Rev. Florence Gray, Lecturer in the College of Louvain, wrote an Irish Grammar, supposed to have been printed about 1626.

Theobaldus Stapleton, Sacerdos Hibernus: Catechism in parallel columns, Latin and Irish; it is entitled "Catechismus, seu Doctrina Latino-Hibernica per modum dialogi inter magistrum et discipulum," 4^o, Bruxellis, 1639. To this is appended, "Modus perutilis legendi linguam Hibernicam."—There is a copy in the British Museum, press mark 1353 b; another in Trinity College; and one in the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin.

Rev. Michael O'Clery: Sanasan Nuadh; a Dictionary of the most obsolete and difficult Irish words, 8^o, Louvain, 1648.

F. C. (Mr. Daly): Expositor, in Irish Character, 1648.

Rev. Anthony Gearnon: Parthas an Anna, or Paradise of the Soul, 1645.—Copies, though very scarce, are still in the possession of several Irish gentlemen.

Godfrey Daniel, printed in Dublin the following:—A Catechism, all with Scripture proofs, in Irish, 1652; Church Catechism, with the elements of the Irish language, 1680; The New Testament, 1681; The Old Testament, 4^o, 1686.

Rev. Richard Mac Giolla-Cuddy, or Arsdekin: Essay on Miracles done by the Relics of St. Francis Xavier, in the Jesuit's College at Mechlin, 8^o, Louvain, 1667.—This seems to have been the first book printed in Irish and English.

The Rev. Francis O'Molloy: Lochran an Chreidimh—Lucerna Fidelium; Lamp of the Faithful, 12^o, Rome, 1678.

F. C. (Mr. Collins): Christian Doctrine, in Irish. Rome, 1678.

I have some grounds for concluding that in the seventeenth century other Irish publications were produced on the Continent for the instruction of the Irish-speaking Roman Catholics. I was shown, some years ago, a small Irish Prayer Book, printed I think in Louvain; and of those above-mentioned the most, if not all, ran through two, three, or more editions.

The following issued from the press during the eighteenth century:—

Edward Lhuyd, M.A. Jesus College, Keeper of the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford: Fochloir Gaoidheilige-Shagsonach; No Bearlador Scot-Sagsamhuil.—An Irish-English Dictionary, Tit. X.; Archaeologia Britannica, pp. 310—434 (an Irish Grammar precedes it), folio, Oxford, 1707.—A copy in the British Museum.

The Rev. John Richardson, Rector of Annagh or Belurbet, in the diocese of Kilmore, and the Rev. John Brady, of the same diocese:—

1. Sermons: Selections from Bishop Beveridge and others. 8vo, London, 1716.
2. Liturgy, with parallel columns in English, 6,000 copies, 1712.
3. Church Catechism, with Lewis's Scripture proofs, 6,000 copies.

A portion of both publications were distributed in the Highlands of Scotland.

The Church Catechism (English-Irish), Belfast, 1722.—A copy in the British Museum.

An Irish Almanack for the year of Christ 1724, &c. Dublin, 1724. A copy in the British Museum.—It contains examples in Irish of acquittances, general discharges, promissory notes, last wills, and bonds. It comprises 81 pages.

Dr. James Gallagher, Bishop of Raphoe: Sermons, seventeen in number, 1735 [this work, in 1846, had gone through eighteen editions]; Catechism, 1750.

Rev. Hugh McCurtin: English-Irish Dictionary, 4^o, Paris, 1732.—This was at least completed by the Rev. Connor Begley. A copy in the British Museum.

The Rev. Andrew Donlevy: The Christian Doctrine by way of Question and Answer, with corresponding pages in English, published with the approbation of Louis XV., 8^o, pp. 574, Paris, 1742. A copy in the British Museum.

Dr. John O'Brien, Bishop of Cloyne: Irish-English Dictionary, Paris, 1768. A copy in the British Museum.

Miss Charlotte Brooke: Reliques of Irish Poetry, consisting of Heroic Poems, Odes, Elegies, Songs, translated into English verse, &c. The originals in the Irish character, 4^o, Dublin, 1784. A copy in the British Museum.

A Catechism, &c., to which are prefixed, Brief and Plain Rules for Reading the Irish Language. London, printed by E. Everingham, at the Seven Stars in Ave-Maria Lane, near Ludgate Hill. No date (1712). 16 pages. A copy in the British Museum.

Coyle's (Rt. Rev. Dr., Bishop of Raphoe), Collectanea Sacra; or Pious Miscellany in Verse and Prose, containing the Life of St. Columbkille, St. Fiech's Hymn in Irish and English, Pedigree of the O'Reillys, &c. 2 vols. 8vo. Strabane, 1788.

A list of Irish Grammars having been already given, none of them finds a place in this contribution. In a future paper I will supply a list of Irish books, printed in the nineteenth century; and also, if acceptable, of the various editions of Irish Bibles; Selections of Holy Scriptures; Tracts, and other publications in that language.

Of the Sacred Scriptures I will now confine myself to the following observation on what I esteem good authority. Anderson (Native Irish) says that, independently of portions and editions with exposition, he had numbered 290 editions in the English language from 1700 to 1800. By this time there had been printed and circulated in Welsh not fewer than twelve editions of the Bible, and as many of the New Testament, separately amounting to at least 120,000; of which 3000 Bibles, and 32,000 Testaments, in Gaelic, had been printed during the same period. Even in Manx there had been thousands, and all this before the Bible Society had been thought of; while for the Native Irish there had not been printed, he assures us, one single copy during the whole century.

JOHN EUGENE O'CAVANAGH.

Lime Cottage, Walworth Common, London.

LITERARY FORGERIES. — The following extract from Galignani's Messenger may deserve recording in the pages of "N. & Q." : —

"MARIE-ANTOINETTE'S LETTERS. — In the German literary world a certain sensation has been created by an article of M. de Sybel, the historian of the French Revolution, Professor of the University of Bonn, and formerly member of the Prussian Chamber. It appears in the Historical Review, which comes out at Munich, and discusses the correspondence of the unfortunate Queen of France. It is known that unedited letters and documents of Marie-Antoinette have been successively published; first by the Count Hunolstein (Paris, Dentu, 1864), then by M. Feuillet de Conches (Paris, Plon, 1864), and lastly by a German writer, the Chevalier d'Arneth. This last work appeared, in the course of the year 1865, both at Paris (Hentzel), and at Vienna (Braunmüller). M. Arneth alone indicated the sources of all the letters and documents which he gave to the public. He copied them from the original letters of Marie-Antoinette as they exist in the archives of Vienna, and from the authentic copies of the letters of Maria Theresa, which are also preserved there. M. de Sybel proves that the letters published by MM. Hunolstein and Feuillet de Conches are almost all, if not entirely, apocryphal, and that the autographs obtained by M. Feuillet, and on which his publication is based, must be for the most part the work of a forger. M. de Sybel states that even the most superficial reader of the three collections must have been struck with the circumstance that of the German publication, which is necessarily authentic, as being compiled in the official archives of Vienna, one letter only is found in the French collections, while the ninety-one other letters were as unknown to the French editors as were the fifty of MM. d'Hunolstein and Feuillet to the archives of Vienna. Likewise, even so slight an examination proves that the letters of the French editors, in their style and manner of regarding facts and events, all bear the same stamp, and evidently proceed from the same hand. It is the same with the documents of the German edition, of which the authenticity is proved. Therefore, as the two publications are directly contrary and cannot be reconciled, grave presumptions must at once arise to the detriment of the authentic nature of the French editions. M. de Sybel is not content with these merely negative proofs. He has brought out the manifest contradictions which exist between the letters themselves. To cite only one example: the authentic letter of Marie-Antoinette of May 14, and the answer of Maria Theresa of May 30, 1774, prove that all the letters of Count Hunolstein, from April 30 to May 18, can never have existed, because Marie-Antoinette had written to her family, in the month of May, only one letter, that of May 14, the particulars contained in which it would be impossible to reconcile with the letters of the month of May in the Paris collection. It is the same with several other cases. The letters of the French edition are, at least one-fourth, apocryphal; the others, which resemble them in style, composition, and other epistolary character, are apparently arranged after the Memoirs of Mme. Campan, and some journals of that date. M. de Sybel places side by side the passages of these memoirs and those which correspond to them in the letters, and he comes to the conclusion that MM. de Hunolstein and Feuillet have been the victims of an audacious forger."

PHILIP S. KING.

DUC DE CHATELHERAULT. — I observe from a recent notice in the Globe newspaper, that there is now before the French courts a dispute between the Marquis of Abercorn and the Duke of Hamilton as to their respective rights to the title. Upon looking over a list of the various publications of the late Mr. W. B. D. D. Turnbull, advocate, I discover that he had reprinted, in 1843, through the medium of Mr. Stevenson, the bookseller, in Edinburgh, a rather curious and valuable paper, bearing upon that interesting subject, entitled, —

"Factum of the Earl of Arran touching the Restitution of the Duchy of Chatelherault, 1685. Edited, with a Notice, and an Appendix of curious Illustrative Documents."

Only sixty copies appear to have been printed, and in the Preface thereto Mr. Turnbull remarks, —

"It is of excessive rarity." And again, "I shall merely observe that, in so far as I can see, the Marquis of Abercorn is alone entitled to it, and that his Grace of Hamilton, being neither heir-male nor heir-female, has as much right to it as he has to the throne of China."

The knowledge of such a publication being in existence may be of use to the disputants on this occasion.

T. G. S.

Edinburgh.

INEDITED WORK BY SIR CHRISTOPHER HEYDON. — This gentleman, well known as the author of A Defence of Judicial Astrology, 1603, of which John Gadbury speaks in very high terms in his Nativity of the late King Charles, 1659, 8vo, also wrote the following, which, so far as I know, has never been printed : —

"A Recital of the Cælestiall Apparitions (sic) of this present Trigon now in being: written by Sr Christopher Heydon, Knight."

It is a curious narrative of the eclipses of 1603, 1604, 1605; of the comet of 1607, and of the three comets of 1618; and is contained on fourteen leaves, small 4to, beautifully written in a handwriting of the time. I presume it to be Heydon's autograph MS. prepared for the press. See Evelyn's Diary, anno 1624. W. CAREW HAZLITT.

WHISTONE'S "CENSURE OF A LOYAL SUBJECT."

—Of this tract there were two issues in 1587; one, I think, at the close of January, the other probably about the middle of February. The later impression contains a short account of the execution of Mary Stuart, which occurred Feb. 8, 1586-7, and will be found reprinted in MR. COLLIER'S Illustrations of Early English Popular Literature. Of the January issue, a copy with uncut leaves, as published, is now before me. On the top of the title-page is this memorandum by the original purchaser: "27^o Jan^r 7, 1586, pret^o 4^a," and lower down, above the imprint is written in the same hand, "Rob:" with the motto or legend "1 vite 5 mors 8 via 6."

W. CAREW HAZLITT.

GIBBON'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY: HERALDIC TERM MISUSED. — In the last number of the Edinburgh Review (April, 1865, p. 336), in an article headed "Heraldic Manuals," the following passage occurs:—

"As we come down to later times, commemorative augmentations were freely granted, and symbolisms, often of a ludicrous kind, used in granting and differencing coats. An amusing example is mentioned in Gibbon's autobiography:—'My family arms,' says the historian, 'are the same which are borne by the Gibbons of Kent, . . . a lion rampant gardant between three scallop shells argent, on a field azure . . . About the reign of James I. the three harmless scallop shells were changed by Edward Gibbon, Esq., into three ogresses, or female cannibals, with a design of stigmatising three ladies, his kinswomen, who had provoked him by an unjust lawsuit. But this singular mode of revenge, for which he obtained the sanction of Sir William Segar, King-at-Arms, soon expired with its author; and on his own monument, in the Temple Church, the monsters vanished, and the three scallop shells resumed their proper and hereditary place.'"

The reviewer, strange to say, makes no remark on this passage from Gibbon; but surely the historian, not versed in heraldry, had been misled by the word "ogress," and, assuming it to mean "female cannibal," had accepted a story about unjust kinswomen, which had doubtless been invented as an explanation of the supposed change of armorial bearings. Persons familiar with heraldry are aware that an ogress is synonymous with a pellet, and is represented by a black disk. In tricking a coat of arms, a change from an ogress of this kind to a scallop shell, or vice versa, might readily take place.

J. DIXON.

WILLIAM MOLYNEUX'S MONUMENT. — As is stated in Wills' useful and interesting biographical work, entitled Lives of Illustrious and Distinguished Irishmen, vol. iv. p. 43 (Dublin, 1842,) William Molyneux, who died in Dublin, October 11, 1698, was buried "in St. Andrew's church, where there is a monument and Latin inscription." Mr. Wills is generally very accurate; but here he has made a mistake, which, even at the eleventh hour, I think it well to correct. Molyneux was not buried at St. Andrew's, and happily for sake of the monument; inasmuch, as the building and its contents were destroyed by fire on Sunday morning, January 8, 1860. He was buried in his family vault in the northern aisle of St. Audoen's church, Dublin. It may indeed be said that this is merely a typographical error; but if so, there is another mistake, which certainly cannot be laid to the charge of the printer. The monument in question was removed from St. Audoen's early in the present century by Sir Capel Molyneux, Bart., and for many years past has been safely lodged in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Armagh. A copy of the inscription may be found in Gilbert's History of the City of Dublin, vol. i. p. 283.

Sir Capel Molyneux was the editor of—"Anecdotes of the Life of that celebrated Patriot and Philosopher Wm. Molyneux, author of The Case of Ireland; published from a Manuscript written by himself, Dublin, 1803."

ABHBA.

FAMILIES OF DANISH OR BRITISH DESCENT. — I see in a work lately published, called The Great Governing Families of England, that it is stated that no one can certainly prove their descent from a Danish or British origin. This is, I believe, altogether a mistake; and I should be much obliged if any of your correspondents would prove to the contrary. I am convinced, with a little trouble, that the family of Scarth could clearly show their descent from that Skarhi, to whom King Sweyn raised a stone in Brietrass, A.D. 990, with the accompanying inscription, which I inclose for the perusal of your archaeological readers.

SUIN . KUNUKR . SATI . STIN .
OFTIR . SKARTHA . SIN . HIMTHIKA .
IAS . UAS . FARIN . UESTR .
ION . NU . UARTH . TAUTHE . AT .
HITHABU .
SWAIN, KING, SET [this] STONE
AFTER SKARTHI, SIN
HOME THIGGER [i. e. body guard]
AS WAS FAREN WEST
AN NOW WORTH DEAD AT HEDEBY.

J. S. D.

HOITY-TOITY. — John Selden (Table Talk, ed. Chiswick, 1818, p. 77), describing the customs of the court, says how much the dancing was altered:—

"In Queen Elizabeth's time, gravity and state were kept up. In King James's time, things were pretty well. But in King Charles's time, there has been nothing but French-more, and the cushion dance, omnium gatherum, tolly-polly, hoite-come-toite."

Now this latter phrase in modern French is simply haut comme toit, high as the roof. Is not this the origin of our hoity-toity?

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

Queries.

BORWENS.—What is the meaning of, and whence derived, is this term as a local designation? Farms so called occur in Westmoreland, in the West and North Ridings of Yorkshire, and I believe elsewhere.

WM. MATTHEW.

"BONNIE DUNDEE."—The fifty-seventh song in the Beggar's Opera, beginning thus—

"The charge is prepar'd, the lawyers are met,
The judges all rang'd (a terrible show!),"— is directed to be sung by Macheath, to the tune of "Bonnie Dundee." Is this the air which is now popular, and to which are set the words by Walter Scott, originally published, I believe, in one of the Annals:—

"To the Lords of Convention 'twas Clavers that spoke."

Gay's words will go to the same tune as Scott's, though not so flowingly. As I have never seen the Beggar's Opera on the stage, my knowledge of it is only got from Gay's Works. The copy now before me is dated 1700.

D.

GEO. CHRISTIAN BRAUN.—This German author published in 1821, at Mayence, A Proposal for the Union of all related in the Christian Religion. Can any of your readers inform me whether this theologian was a Lutheran or Romanist? He was author of many other works, some of which were published at Halle, Leipsic, &c., &c.

R. I.

BULL OF CLEMENT VI.—Has the bull of this Pontiff, relating to the marriage of Sir Thomas Holland with the Princess Joan, ever been printed? There is a copy of it in Rymer's MSS., Sloane MS. 4586, where it is said to be taken from the Register of Islip.

HERMENTRUDE.

CANNEL COAL.—Can you give me any information as to the derivation of this term? A writer, in a recent number of Newton's London Journal, says that it was so called because it was brought to Manchester by the Duke of Bridgewater's Canal, which was completed about 1766:—

"At this time," he says, "the word 'kennel,' or 'kannel,' was generally employed in Lancashire and Cheshire to designate an artificial watercourse; and even Brindley himself, in some of his letters, speaks of 'the Duke's kennel.'"

In this way the coal, brought by the Duke's Canal, came to be called "canal" or "cannel" coal. There are, however, two objections to this etymology: 1. Camden, who wrote in the sixteenth century, says, in his Britannia (Gough's edition, vol. iii. p. 390), when speaking of Haigh, near Wigan:—

"This neighbourhood abounds with that fine species of coal called 'canal,' or 'candle.' It is curious and valuable; and besides yielding a clear flame when burnt, and therefore used by the poor as candles, is wrought into candlesticks," &c.

2. The usual name amongst the lower classes for a canal, in the midland and northern districts, is "cut"—the term "canal" being, as a rule, used only by the better-educated classes. I am unable, however, to say when the term "cut" as synonymous with canal was introduced. It appears in Ash's Dictionary (1775), where it is defined as "a canal made by art."

Camden's etymology is not very satisfactory, since cannel coal will not give such a "clear flame when burnt" as to permit of being used instead of a candle. At all events, I can say that I have tried to make it burn in this manner, but have not succeeded. My conclusion is moreover strengthened by the opinion of a chemist, who has devoted particular attention to this subject. Perhaps some correspondent may be able to help me in this matter.

RICHARD H. PROSSER.

25, Southampton Buildings, W.C.

CARABOO.—To complete the history of this celebrated woman (antè, pp. 269, 310, 406), there is still required the date of her death, and the place of her sepulture, with the entries in the parish register.

INQUIRER.

THE DEVIL'S MUSIC.—Can any of your readers inform me of the origin of the saying, that "Whistling is the devil's music"? It is remarkable that wickedly disposed persons, when up to anything wrong and likely to be caught, begin to whistle a tune.

INQUIRER.

DRAGON IN HERALDRY.—Can any of your correspondents kindly inform me the origin of the heraldic dragon? Is it synonymous, or in any way derived from, the dragon so frequently mentioned in the Psalms? In Psalm lxxiii. 14, the Psalmist says:—

"Thou didst crush the heads of the dragons in the waters."

In verse 14 of same psalm:—

"Thou hast broken the heads of the dragons (Hydra?). Thou hast given him to be meat to the Ethiopian people."

Giving one the idea that it signifies the Evil One. Yet, in Psalm cxlviii. 7, we read:—

"Praise the Lord from the earth, ye dragons and all ye deeps."

BLAZON.

"THE BISHOP OF DUBLIN'S PROPHECY," ETC.—Within the last few days I have met with a copy of a strange little publication, entitled The Bishop of Dublin's Prophecy, Dublin, 1722, 12mo, pp. 8. As stated on the title-page, it was—"written by the Reverend Brandan Birr, a Prophet and Divinity Lecturer in the Academies of Ardnamagh and Clonard, in the Year of Man's Salvation, 1089; and was found in the Walls of Merion Church [near Dublin] the 18th of February last, 1721-2, as appears by a Certificate Sworn [by Elizabeth Oge and James Orme] before Alderman Thomas Quin, on Monday the 26th of February, which is annex'd to the Latin Original; of which this is a Translation, word by word."

The original was "to be seen by the curious, at the Sign of the George, in Christ-Church Yard." The letters "L S." are appended to the address from "the Translator to the Reader." And the following recommendation may be found in p. 7:—

"Examin'd and approv'd by the Most Reverend Father in God, Lawrence Toole, by Divine Providence second Lord Archbishop of Dublin, in the Year of Christ, 1162."

Any particulars regarding the authorship, &c., of this literary curiosity, which was "printed by Cor. Carter, in Fish-shamble-street," will be thankfully received. ABHBA.

ECCLESIOLOGICAL DESTRUCTION OR DESECRATION. I should be very grateful for detailed and certain information of destruction, removal, or desecration of (1) stone or wood carvings; (2) furniture, or other articles of interest, either from an antiquarian or art point of view; which has taken place during the last fifteen years; with, in the case of "restoration," the name of the architect employed. Information as to the present fate of any of them would also be acceptable.

The cases would possibly be too numerous for your insertion. If so, direct communication with myself would be much valued.

JOHN C. JACKSON.

5, Chatham Place, East Hackney, N.E.

THE EXODUS OF THE ISRAELITES.—I propose two queries, which I am aware are very difficult to answer. The first is—In what year of the world did the Exodus take place? The second is—Under which Egyptian King did this event happen?

I find that Dr. Kalisch adopts a date different from that advanced by the generality of biblical scholars. He fixes the Exodus in the year of the world 2269. He also mentions, with regard to the second query that, according to the authority of Josephus, who appears to rely on a statement of Manetho, the Israelites left Egypt during the reign of King Ramses V., Amenophis, who was the last monarch of the XVIII. dynasty. (See Commentary on the Old Test. Exodus. Preface, xx.-xxii., London, 1855.)

I should be glad to be informed if this statement of Dr. Kalisch has met with the approval of any sound German scholar or English writer of eminence.

J. DALTON.

Norwich.

GERMAN DRAMA.—Can you inform me whether Gottsched's History of the German Theatre, in two vols., published in or about 1763, contains the titles of all plays by German authors published in Germany from 1450 to 1760? Kayser's Lexicon contains a pretty correct list of dramas printed in Germany, German Switzerland, German provinces of Russia, &c. from 1750 to 1832. Where can I find a good bibliographic catalogue of German dramas published before 1750? If Gottsched's book contains the desired information, can you tell me what is the cost of the book in English money? R. I.

HORSE: GRACE.—In the Second Series of Prof. Müller's Lectures on Language (I speak from memory), he represents the myth of the sun's chariot being drawn by horses, and of Apollo being attended by the Graces, as derived from the same fact and idea; e. g., the common Sanscrit root gha means, to shine: and thence the rays of the sun come to be pictured as horses, for fleetness and sleekness, or shiningness; from thence comes also the legend of the Graces attending on the sun, they likewise being shining or beautiful.

I now ask, do the words horse and grace (χαρις) come from the same root? Horse, of course, has a long genealogy; and comes to us directly from the German Ross. But has it an ultimate Sanscrit root, identical with the root of charis?

Will MR. HEWITT KEY, who so obligingly answered the query about "Disciple," think it worth his while to answer this?

What, moreover, is the root of ἵππος? And how does Iacchus become Bacchus?—the original form being evidently Iakh. ALPHA BETA.

"JOURNEY THROUGH SWITZERLAND."—Who was the author of an 8vo, entitled Sketch of a Descriptive Journey through Switzerland, London, 1796? It appears to have been printed for private circulation; and in my copy the following words have been written: "From the Author, Mr. R. L. Junr., October, 1796." ABHBA.

EPIGRAMS BY W. S. LANDOR.—Where will be found Landor's epigrams upon Pitt, Castlereagh, Napoleon III., &c.? They probably first appeared in The Examiner newspaper. X. Y. Z.

WILLIAM PENNOCK.—Where is an account to be found of the two persons who bore this name? and who are mentioned in the following rather surprising quotation from Kent's Banner Display'd (London, 1728), p. 780:—

"... William Pennock, who invented the Pendulum for Clocks; he lived in the Earl of Arundel's House till it was burnt down by that dreadful Fire in London, in the Year 1666; which afterwards was built into several Houses, and now goes by the Name of Tokenhouse-Yard, in Lothbury. Also ... John Pennock of Jamaica, Goldsmith, the Son of the above William, and ... William Pennock, who invented the Art of Engraving on Wood for the Use of Printing; this William is the Son of the above John of Jamaica."

JOHN WOODWARD.

SUNDRY QUERIES CONCERNING PROVERBS, ETC. Will some one expound the following proverbs culled from Ray's Compleat Collection (1768)?—

"Where the Turk's horse once treads, the grass never grows."

"Fill a fig for your friend, and a peach for your enemy."

"Building is sweet impoverishing. It is called the Spanish plague."

"London bridge was made for wise men to pass over, and for fools to pass under."

"Parsley fried will bring a man to his saddle, a woman to her grave."

ST. SWITHIN.

JOHN RITCHIE, author of "Beaux and Belles, a Dramatic Tale of the Olden Time," 12mo, no date (about 1850), Slater, Oxford. Wanted, any information regarding the author, who is said to have written various other works.

R. I.

SHAKESPEARE'S WORKS, 1800.—I have lately found among some old books an edition of Shakespeare in nine small 16mo vols. It was printed in 1800 at Berwick, by John Taylor. The title-page of the first volume is lost, but on all the others is a small vignette of Shakespeare, and the names of the plays in the volume. The type is miserable, and the paper of the coarsest kind. There are no notes whatever to the plays; they may, perhaps, have been in the last volume, which unfortunately is missing. Some of the acts are divided into as many as ten or twelve scenes. In the first volume is a life beginning: "It seems to be a kind respect due to the memory of excellent men," &c., in which the poet is styled Mr. Shakespeare.

I am anxious to ascertain who is the editor &c. of this edition, and should be much obliged if any of your correspondents would favour me with the required information. I may just add, as another distinctive mark, that in the opening of Measure for Measure, the Duke is made to say:—

" Then no more remains
But that to your sufficiency you join
A will to serve us as your worth is able,
And let them work."

C. HARWAL PERROT.

Rotherham.

PROVINCIAL SYNOD OF DUBLIN, 1862.—The late Archbishop of Dublin (Dr. Whately) convened his provincial synod in 1862, the year of his last triennial visitation. Where will I get any record of this synod. I am acquainted with the form of citation, &c.

AIKEN IRVINE.

TIP.—Is there any earlier instance of this slang phrase than the following?—

"Point out the means of succeeding . . . if a private tip, tell him where to apply it."—Letter of Lord Chesterfield to Dayrolles, 1749.

CYRIL.

TRAVELLING SCOTCHMEN.—In the north of England a large trade has been done by travelling dealers in tea, coffee, drapery, goods, &c., and this business is generally conducted by Scotchmen. The term "travelling Scotchmen" is applied in Lancashire to these house-to-house packmen, irrespective of the place of their nativity. Is the term derived from the nationality of the itinerant tradesmen, or is the packmen's popular style derived from the word "scot," a shot or share of a contribution of the reckoning—from the Anglo-Saxon Scot? And is it merely a singular coincidence, that so many of these scots-men are Scotchmen?

Another trace of the same old word is in the phrase "scot and lot voters." PRESTONLENSIS.

WITCHES AND BROOMS.—Why are witches and brooms so constantly associated in popular legends?

CARILFORD.

Cape Town, S. A.

Queries with Answers.

MEMORIA TECHNICA.—What is the secret of the Memoria Technica made use of in Longfellow's Kavanah (c. xxvi.) by Mr. Churchill, who thus addresses his wife?—

"What day of the week is the first of December? Let me see,—

"At Dover Dwells George Brown, Esquire, Good Christopher Finch And Daniel Friar."

Thursday.'

'I could have told you that,' said his wife, 'by a shorter process than your old rhyme. Thanksgiving Day always comes on Thursday.'

ST. SWITHIN.

[In Rees's Cyclopædia, art. "Dominical Letter," is the following explanation of this well-known couplet:—"When the dominical letter is known, the day of the week corresponding to any day of the month may be easily found by the following Canon:—

"At Dover Dwells George Brown, Esquire, Good Christopher Finch And David Friar."

"These words correspond to the twelve months of the year, and the first letter of each word marks in the order of the dominical letters the first day of each month, whence any other day may be easily found, e.g.: Let it be required to find on what day of the week Christmas day, or the 25th of December, falls in the year 1808, the dominical, or Sunday letter, of which is B. Friar answers to December, and the first day is F, i.e. B. being Sunday, it is Thursday, and therefore Christmas-day is Sunday.]"

"AN ESSAY TOWARDS AN HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH TONGUE." PART I. BY JOHN FREE, D.D. 1749.—This is a thin post 8vo pamphlet of 78 pages, with an Introduction of 7 pages. On the back of the fly-leaf at the end is an advertisement stating that "the Second Part of this Essay will be published with all convenient speed." With reference to this pamphlet and its author, I wish to make the following inquiries, viz., I. Was the second part promised in the advertisement ever published? If so, in what year? 2. Was the author the same person as the writer of that name mentioned by Watt and Darling, as the vicar of East Coker, Somersetshire?

LLALLAWG.

[Dr. Free's Essay on the English Tongue was completed. The Fourth Edition with Additions was published in 1788, 8vo, pp. 148, with a Catalogue of his numerous productions. Dr. Free was presented to the vicarage of East Coker in 1756, and in 1768 was chosen lecturer of Newington in Surrey, and had also the Thursday lecture of St. Mary-at-Hill, founded by Sir J. Leman, Bart. He died at his Chambers in Lyon's Inn on Sept. 9, 1791. For particulars of him, consult the Gentleman's Magazine, lviii. (i.) 381; lxi. (ii.) 966, 1048.]

BOOKS ON MAGIC.—What may be the meaning of the following entry in Watt under the head of "Magic": "1715. Ancient and uncommon Books on Magic see Britton, Thomas, 1815"?

A. CHALLSTETH.

[Watt's reference is to his Index of Subjects, article BRITTON (Thomas), where the very curious Catalogue of the library of the celebrated Small-coal Man is noticed, as containing a collection of every ancient and uncommon book in Divinity, History, Physic, Chemistry, Magic, &c. The date 1815 is clearly a misprint for 1715. Britton died in September, 1714, and his library was sold by Thomas Ballard at Paul's Coffee-house on the 24th of January, 1714-15. It may not be generally known that a portion of Britton's curious collection of books, from some cause or other, had previously been dispersed by John Bullard at Tom's Coffee-house, adjoining to Ludgate, on the 1st of Nov. 1694, of which a Catalogue in 4to is in the British Museum, pp. 40.]

CLOCKS, WATCHES, HOROLOGY, AND HOROLOGISTS.—I shall be glad to have information on any of the above subjects—their history, curiosities, &c. References to works treating thereon or relating thereto will be useful to me.

EDWARD J. WOOD.

Myddelton House, Clerkenwell.

[For information on the above subjects, our correspondent may consult the articles Clock, Chronometer, Horology, and Watch, in Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica, Index of Subjects, and in Lowe's British Catalogue, Alphabet of Subjects, 1837-1857. We would also refer him to the same articles in Rees's Cyclopædia and the various works there cited. For later improvements in Horology, see the article "Clock and Watch Work" in the eighth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, vii. 2-38, and "N. & Q." 1st S. iv. 240, 356.]

"BIG-NOSED MEN."—It is a common tenet with physiognomists that a large nose indicates force of character. I know some remarkable instances to the contrary; but perhaps the rule, as a rule, may hold good. Whose saying was it that, on an emergency, "the big-nosed men always stood by him?" Was this said by Collingwood, or Nelson, or by what other commander? And where is the saying recorded? D.

[It is narrated of Napoleon I. that he was a practical nasologist, and influenced in his choice of men by the size of their noses. "Give me," said he, "a man with a good allowance of nose. Strange as it may appear, when I want any good head-work done, I choose a man—provided his education has been suitable—with a long nose." Notes on Noses, p. 43, 1847, 12mo.]

BRIDGE INSCRIPTION.—On a rude bridge which crosses a mountain stream near Dublin is this inscription: DI SUORE AMABILI. Can any of the correspondents of "N. & Q." tell me what it means? The exact locality of the bridge is, I think, called Kelly's Glen; but of this I am not quite sure. ACHENDE.

Dublin.

[This Italian phrase is probably connected with some local legend or occurrence, in which must be sought the true import of the words as inscribed upon the bridge. The translation is "Of Lovely Sisters." It seems to be the remnant of some longer inscription.]

LEWIS.—What is the origin of this name for the clever contrivance used by masons in raising stones? CPL.

[The word is no doubt derived from the old French lévis, any contrivance for lifting; thus a draw-bridge is called Pont-a-lévis.

This contrivance was known to the Romans, and several have been found among the débris of old buildings, and are now in the Vatican. Our correspondent will find one figured in the Elzevir Vitruvius (fo. Amstel. 1649), page 207.]

Replies.

WILLIAM, SON OF KING STEPHEN.

(3rd S. vii. 201.)

King Stephen had a son William, who was Count of Boulogne. He had a son William who was Count of Mortain; and he had a son William, who, in right of his wife, became Earl Warren and Earl of Surrey. And I think there can be no doubt that these three were all one and the same person. I am not aware of their identity having ever been disputed; and if there were any question about it, the extract which I subjoin from Dugdale's Baronage would, as I conceive, be sufficient to settle the point:—

"This William stiled himself Earl of Bolein, Warren and Moreton, as that Charter of his manifesteth (Monast. Anglic. vol. i. 358, b. n. 10), whereby he confirmed to the monks of Eye, in Suffolk, the Lordships of Acolt and Stoke, which had been given to them by his ancestors."—Baronage, vol. i. p. 76.

The identity being established, we next come to the question of legitimacy.

HERMENTRUDE takes it for granted that William Count of Boulogne was the legitimate son of King Stephen and his wife Matilda; and I am at a loss to conceive on what other hypothesis to account for his succeeding to the County of Boulogne, which was of Matilda's inheritance.

The idea of his being illegitimate probably arose from his not having succeeded his father on the throne of England. It will be remembered that in 1153 an accommodation was settled, by which, to use the language of Hume—

"It was agreed that Stephen should possess the crown during his lifetime, that justice should be administered in his name even in the provinces which had submitted to Henry; and that this latter prince should, on Stephen's demise, succeed to the kingdom, and William, Stephen's son, to Boulogne and his patrimonial estate."

The clause which related to the succession to the throne was couched in the following terms:—

"Sciatis quod ego Rex Angliæ Stephanus Henricum ducem Normanniæ post me successorem Angliæ Regni, et heredem meum jure hereditario constitui, et sic ei et heredibus suis regnum Angliæ donavi et confirmavi."—Fœdera, n. e. vol. i. p. 18.

Roger of Wendover, in giving an account of this treaty, represents it to have been as follows:—

"King Stephen, being destitute of heirs, except only Duke Henry, hereby recognizes, in full assembly of the Bishops and other Nobles of the Kingdom, the hereditary right which Duke Henry had to the Kingdom of England."—Dr. Giles's Translation, A.D. 1153.

It will be seen that Wendover's representation is incorrect. Stephen did not recognise the hereditary right of Henry: he did a very different thing. He gave him the kingdom after his death, and constituted him his heir. Nor did Stephen say anything about his being himself destitute of heirs; but having once so represented the matter, we cannot be surprised that Wendover should afterwards describe William, Earl of Moreton and Warenne, as "the illegitimate son of King Stephen," A.D. 1157. Sandford in his Genealogical History gives what I take to be a correct statement of the matter.

In enumerating the "children of King Stephen by Queen Maud of Boulogne his wife," he makes mention of "William, Earl of Mortaigne and Boulogne, Lord of the Honours of Eagle and of Pevensy, third and youngest son of King Stephen, who, in the right of Isabel his wife, was the fourth Earl Warren and Surrey" (p. 43); and in the next page, coming to the natural issue of King Stephen, he discriminates between William of Boulogne and another William, whose real illegitimacy may have been a source of confusion:—

"William is mistaken of some to be the same William that was Earl of Boulogne; others who knew that William Earl of Boulogne was lawfully born, do think his father had no other son named William but himself; wherein let William Earl of Boulogne be a lawful witness of himself, who, having best cause to know it, doth best prove it. And in an ancient Charter of his, being written in those days, and extant in these, he doth name him for a witness, and calleth him his Brother."—P. 44.

I hope that these somewhat hurried notes may be sufficient to satisfy HERMENTRUDE that the husband of Isabella de Warenne was no other than King Stephen's legitimate son William, who on the death of his brother Eustace, became Count of Boulogne.

MELETES.

SHELVES IN WILTSHIRE.

(3rd S. vii. 241, 301, 330, 362.)

MR. IRVING's remarks on this subject exhibit a curious specimen of what, in Parliamentary slang, is termed "riding off" from a question; as he takes the rather curious mode of investigating Wiltshire shelves by going to look for ancient earthworks in Scotland; and probably we may soon hear of him exercising his hobby among geological phenomena, careering, for instance, along the parallel roads of Glenroy. He has given up the plough, however, and taken to the spade and "lazy bed" for their mode of formation, though as those appliances are used only in the cultivation of potatoes, the "lazy bed" terraces cannot be of a very ancient date. The soil on hill sides is not generally rich. It is mostly barren, and artificial manures being unknown in early times, the people must have been simply mad to endeavour to cultivate such places, when there were plenty of more fertile lands nearer home. "Artificial manures unknown!" Will MR. IRVING tell us how long natural manure has been employed in Scottish agricultural operations? I have somewhere read, that it was the general custom in Scotland, when the midden obstructed the entrance to a farmer's house, the proprietor would take heart of grace some frosty day, and move the manure away to the ice on some river, so that when a thaw came, he would get rid of the obstruction. I cannot quote my author, as I am from home at present, but I am pretty positive that at so late a period as when the first series of Sir John Sinclair's Statistical Account was written, manure was then got rid of, in some Scottish parishes, by moving it to the sea shore, and leaving it there, under high-water mark, as is related in that work. And, in my own memory, I well knew a Scottish farmer, who would not remove the manure heap in front of his house; although he admitted that manure was good enough for a "kail-yard," he considered its virtues lost when placed in a field.

WILLIAM PINKERTON.

FIRES HOW ANCIENTLY KINDLED.

(1st S. xii. 205, 272; 3rd S. vi. 472, 536; vii. 82, 296.)

In reply to the query respecting any passage in the classics bearing on this subject, the following extracts, none of which have hitherto been referred to, will perhaps be acceptable to your correspondent J. N., inasmuch as he will here find mentioned the use of both flint and steel: Corneli Severi Ætna, v. 362. Scaliger adduces in loco, illustrations from Lucretius, lib. i. [v. 896], lib. v. [1095]; Thucydides, lib. ii. [77]; Pliny, Hist. Nat. lib. xvi. c. 40; Homer's Hymn to Mercury [v. 108]; Festus [s. v. Ignis]:—

"Ignis Vestæ siquando interstinctus esset, virgines verberibus afficiebantur a Pontifice: quibus mos erat tabulam [lignum quadratum] felicitatis materiam tamdiu terebrare, quousque exceptum ignem cribro æneo virgo in adem ferret."

Michael du Fay, the Delphin commentator on Lucretius, has the following note:—

Lib. v. 1095. Et ramosa tamen, &c.] "Non ex solis arboribus contritis elici potest ignis, sed ex rebus fere omnibus. Namque ut ait Manil. lib. i. v. 850—

"Sunt autem cunctis permixti partibus ignes;
Qui gravidas halitant fabricantes fulmina nubes;
Et penetrant terras, Ætnamque minantur Olympo,
Et calidas reddunt ipsis in fontibus undas:
Ac illic in dura, viridique in cortice sedem
Inveniunt, cum sylva sibi collisa crematur.
Ignibus usque adeo Natura est omnis abundans."

In Bacon's Advancement of Learning are some most interesting remarks on the inventions and originals of things:—

"If you like better the tradition of the Grecians, and ascribe the first inventions to men; yet you will rather believe that Prometheus first struck the flints, and marvelled at the spark, than that when he first struck the flints he expected the spark; and therefore the West-Indian Prometheus had no intelligence with the European, because of the rareness with them of flint, that gave the first occasion. Neither is the form of invention which Virgil describeth much other:—

"Ut varias usus meditando extunderet artes Paulatim."

Cf. Scaliger, ut ante, and Darwin's Economy of Vegetation, v. 209. In Researches into the Early History of Mankind, and the Development of Civilization, by Edward Burnet Tylor, Lond. 1865,—

"There is an excellent essay on flints and celts, in which it is shown that the transition from implements of stone to those of metal took place in almost every part of the globe, and a progress from ruder to more perfect modes of making fire and boiling food is traced in many different countries."—The Times, April 21, 1865.

BIBLIOTHECAR. CHETHAM.

IGNITION OF WOOD BY FRICTION (3rd S. vii. 296, 306).—Talking lately to the parish schoolmaster, who is a native of the Highlands, of the etymology of the term Beltane, applied to the 1st May (see Calendars in Oliver and Boyd's Edinburgh Almanack), which he derived from the Gaelic teine, fire, quasi the fire of Bel or Baal,—Bealltuin, he mentioned another use of the word teine with reference to a curious custom, which he remembered when he was a boy. This was the kindling of a forced fire called tein'-éiginn, by the violent rubbing of two bits of wood together, to be employed in some superstitious ceremonies for preserving cattle from murrain. It occurs to me that this practice affords a reply to the query of J. H. whether there is any known instance in this country of success in the experiment of producing fire by rubbing one piece of wood against another, as practised by the South Sea Islanders? I have no doubt that the Highlanders were formerly expert at the process, although at present, in consequence of the advance of civilisation and the extensive changes among the Gaelic people, the custom has probably become obsolete. W. E.

MEN OF KENT AND KENTISH MEN.

(3rd S. vii. 324.)

If this matter had not been mooted afresh, I had intended to revive the question which was raised in "N. & Q." 1st S. v. 321, 615. For a man of (East) Kent had had the last say, and had pronounced against the claim of those in the Western parts of the country to the more honourable appellation. And I observe that his arguments in favour of the men of (East) Kent have been adopted as conclusive by "N. & Q." in answering the above new query about the women of the county. This was I suppose of course, as MR. SANDYS has never been gainsaid.

I am not now going to speak of my own knowledge on the subject, or to suppose anything by way of explanation; but as I know my father's opinion about it, and he used to assert it undoubtingly, and as he was an authority in our county history, I wish to say that I have always understood the men of Kent to be those born in the Weald of Kent. I believe it is no question of East and West Kent, no diocesan distinction—nothing to do with a rural residence as compared with a metropolitan neighbourhood. This is the generally received belief of my friends and relations besides those of my late father, the Rev. T. Streatfeild, of Chart's Edge, who certainly was opposed to the view taken by MR. SANDYS. To be sure, those I am quoting were born in the Weald of Kent, and I too, for the same reason, have claimed to be a man of Kent, but the distinction is not one recognised in the world in which we are living; and the tradition in my part of the county is too widely spread to be probably a fiction imagined by some antiquaries for their own benefit. MR. SANDYS supposes many reasons in favour of East Kent, but gives no satisfactory proof; and I hope this protest from one born (it is not a question of residence) at the other end of the county, may be published, though it does not decide the matter.

In Consuetudines Kancie, MR. SANDYS quotes from the Saxon Chronicle, among other passages relating to Kent, one which is apparently against his view:—

"A.D. 853. In the same year Ealhere, with the men of Kent, and Huda, with the men of Surry, fought in Thanet against the heathen army, &c."

Is it not probable that the "men of Surry" would join with those of their next county neighbours who were near to them. If the "men of Kent" in the above passage means the men of East Kent with the "men of Surry," where were the men of West Kent, who were in such a case between the two? I will never believe the West Kent men were passive in such a struggle. But I dispute MR. SANDYS's claim, because my father would have thought him wrong, not for arguments of my own.

May I add to this an enquiry concerning a ballad, which says—

"The men of Kent
To battle went,
So loyal, bold, and free."

I have heard so much of it quoted by my friends and relations in the Weald of Kent, certainly never doubting it was said of their own forefathers. Has the ballad been printed at length? Is it a part of the same as that referred to by MR. SANDYS, "N. & Q." 1st S. v. 616?

J. F. S.

TRANSMUTATION OF METALS.

(3rd S. vii. 200.)

I recollect the paragraph referred to by MR. IRVINE going the round of the papers, but I could never ascertain that there was any truth in it. It is, however, an undoubted fact that about twelve or eighteen months ago bismuth rose in price from 2s. 9d. to 24s. per pound; but I believe the company said to have been formed for transmuting it into silver to be a myth. Perhaps the following facts may clear up the mystery. The chief supply of bismuth is derived from the Royal Saxon mines at Schneeberg, which are also worked for cobalt and nickel. The lode in which these metals occur crosses in one part of its course a thin lode of silver.

At the point of contact a small percentage of this metal is of course obtained; but for some time past it has been so small as not to be worth extracting, and the three metals have been sent together to this country. When the cobalt and nickel have been extracted, whatever trace of silver there may be remains in the bismuth. Possibly some one may have accidentally met with a specimen unusually rich in silver, and thence concluded that the extraction of the precious metal would turn out a profitable speculation. The Schneeberg mines are now only partially worked. A cheaper substitute for cobalt blue has been discovered, and supplies of nickel being obtained from other sources, the prices of both metals have declined. The importation of washed ore obtained from these mines used to be about 700,000 pounds per annum, but it has now fallen to about 50,000 pounds. The supply of bismuth is almost exclusively obtained from Schneeberg, and this falling off in the supply would almost of itself be sufficient to account for the rise in price of the metal. This, I think, satisfactorily disposes of the "Transmutation of Metals Company (Limited);" but I hope in a future communication to show that believers in a sort of modified alchemy are not by any means rare even in the nineteenth century.

RICHARD B. PROSSER.

25, Southampton Buildings, W.C.

CARY FAMILY (3rd S. vii. 117, 170.)—In reply to ABHBA, I beg to explain that my authority for stating that "in 1588 there was a Cary or Carey, Bishop of Killaloe," was a note to the Letters of Sir Robert Cecil, recently published by the Camden Society, p. 157, in which, à-propos of "Mr. Campbell, Deane of Lymbrycke," of whom mention is made in the text, the Editor expresses himself as follows:—

"Dennis Campbell, a native of Scotland, Rector of Dumcliffe in the Diocese of Killaloe. In 1588 he was appointed co-adjutor to his Diocesan, Bishop Carey."

I have no means at hand of verifying the statement. It would, however, be very satisfactory if any of your correspondents could ascertain what was the name of the Bishop of Killaloe in 1588.*

I should also like very much to know where a niche in the pedigree is to be found for Mordecai Cary, Bishop of Killala. Who were his parents? When and where was he born? The Reverend Henry F. Cary, the translator of Dante, was a descendant of his, being, if I am not mistaken, the grandson of the Henry Cary who is mentioned by ABHBA as Archdeacon of Killala.

MELETES.

KONX OMPAX (3rd S. vi. 263, 293, 392.)—After all are these words in their origin anything more than an attempt at a phonetic imitation of the sound of the dicast's pebble striking against the urn. They do not ill represent the noise of a pebble falling, rebounding, and falling again, especially in an urn made of thin metal. I have been led to make this suggestion by the passage quoted in the last reference placed at the head of this note, from Hesychius. Surely βλωφ is nothing but the noise made by the cup of the clepsydra as it marks the time by sinking. I can testify at least from my own experience (for water-clocks are still commonly used in Upper India), that βλωφ does very closely represent the sound so made. If this be so, then may not the passage be wrongly punctuated, and should not a free translation run as follows:—"Konx ompax, a term (applied) to matters finally disposed of; the sound of the dicast's pebble, as the sound of the clepsydra, βλωφ, is similarly used among the Attics?" These two expressions therefore would be in fact equivalent to our own phrases—"The die is cast;" "Time is up," signifying that any matter in hand has been finally and irrevocably settled.

[* Maurice, or Murtogh O'Brien-arra, was Bishop of Killaloe, A.D. 1570-1612.—ED.]

E. C. B.

Calcutta.

"MELANTHE" (3rd S. vii. 401.)—I see that R. I. inquires after a copy of Melanthe, with MS. notes by Dr. Pegge. I beg to inform R. I. that I have that copy, and shall be glad to show it to him if he will favour me with a call:—

"MELANTHE, Fabulæ Pastoralis, acta cum Jacobus Magnus Brit. Rex, Cantabrigiam suam nuper inviseret, ibidemque Musarum atque animi gratiâ dies quinque commemoraretur: egerunt Alumni Coll. San. et Individus Trinitatis, Cantabrigie, 4to. Brown calf, 1l. 11s. 6d. Cantab. 1615.

"This Latin pastoral, which was written by Dr. Brookes of Trinity College, Cambridge, is of very great rarity. The present copy belonged to Dr. Pegge, the antiquary, and is specially referred to in the Gentleman's Magazine for May, 1756. It bears on the title the autograph signature of Matthew Hutton, and has the names of the Masters of Arts, &c., who acted in it before King James on the 10th of March, 1614, written against the various characters on the back of the title. It was afterwards Mr. Bindley's, and has one leaf in MS., but is the only one that can be traced in any sale. See MS. notes by Mr. Mitford.

JOSEPH LILLY.

17—18, New Street, Covent Garden.

ROBERT CRANMER (3rd S. vii. 376.)—I believe he was the great-grandson of the archbishop. In some family papers I find as follows:—

"1562. Thomas Cranmer and others restored in blood. John Cranmer, son of said Thomas.

"May 1617. Robert Cranmer, son of Thomas Cranmer, of Paternoster Row, London, Mercer, baptised."

"The above paper was found among the effects, in the own handwriting of Robert Cranmer aforesaid, of Mitcham, in Surrey, Esq., great Grandson of the Archbishop, and great-grandfather of the Rev. Robert Cranmer, Rector of Nursling, Hants. The date accords with Strype in his Life of Archbishop Cranmer, who says at page 418 (in fine), 'He had children who survived him, for whose sake an Act of Parliament passed in the year 1562 to restore them in blood, their father having been condemned for treason in consenting to the Lady Jane's succession to the Crown, for which act he was pardoned by Queen Mary.'

This was copied from a fly-leaf in the Life of Cranmer, by Gilpin, and the original was written by the aforesaid Rev. Robert Cranmer, whose mother was related to Thomas, Bishop of Winchester (who gave him the living of Nursling) and to the Ogles. Mrs. Cranmer's grandfather was brother to the "judicious" Hooker, and for some time was Receiver-General for the county of Hants, and lived at Worthing, near Winchester, which his son sold to Sir Chaloner Ogle. M. P.

WORDS USED IN DIFFERENT SENSES (3rd S. vii. 278, 367.)—Insense is an expression very commonly used in the north of England with the same meaning as given by your correspondent E. L. S. In the pronunciation of the word, emphasis is laid upon the last syllable. Insensed is also often used when the individual "is insensed with, or understands the whole matter." Awful is another word we frequently hear perverted. How common are such expressions as the following:—"She's an awful fine woman." "He turns out an awful swell;" and of a coat or some other article of dress, "It's an awful good fit," &c. GIBSON.
Liverpool.

MAY-DAY SONGS (3rd S. vii. 373.)—A contributor of the well-known nom de plume, CUTHBERT BEDE, gives in "N. & Q." for May 13 a May-day song sung at Denton and Caldecote, in Huntingdonshire. It consists of five verses. Words differing but slightly from those of the third verse are sung at Combe, in Oxfordshire, by a troop of little girls, dressed up fantastically, and carrying sticks, to the tops of which are tied bunches of flowers. The following is their version of the four lines:—

"Gentlemen and ladies!
We wish you happy May;
We're come to show our garlands,
Because it is May-day."

The same verse, substantially, is the May-day song at Wootton, an adjoining parish. It would seem to be intended for the mouth of a xephyrus. The first line is better than those of the versions sung at Combe and at the two Huntingdonshire villages. The verse runs thus,—

"Good morning, merry gentlefolks!
I wish you happy May;
I'm come to show my May-garland,
Because it is May-day."

The last two of the four lines are sometime as follows:—

"Come, kiss my face, and smell my mace,
And give the lord and lady something."

In this case the final line breaks away from the fetters of rhyme, but only to come to what is, in this prosaic age, the point of the whole custom.

J. H. A.

Combe Parsonage, Oxon.

FOXES OR SHEAVES (3rd S. vii. 338).—I am not aware who first proposed to write shē'alim for shū'alim in Judg. xv. 4. Allow me, notwithstanding, to demur to such an alteration—(1) because shē'alim does not mean "sheaves" at all. The word signifies "the hollow of the hand" (Is. xl. 12), and then as much as could be contained in the hollow of the hand, "a handfull" (1 Kings, xx. 10; Ezek. xiii. 19); it occurs nowhere else in the Bible; (2) the change proposed in Judg. xv. 4, would do violence to the context; sheaves have not "tails," and could not do all that is recorded in verse 5; (3) Parkhurst observes that the practice of tying firebrands to foxes' tails is mentioned in the thirty-eighth fable of Aphthonius, and adds that Ovid (Fasti, iv. 681), speaks of a custom observed at Rome every year, about the middle of April, of turning out foxes into the circus with burning torches to their backs:—

" . . . misse junctis ardentia tædis, Terga ferunt vulpes."

The Hebrew word shū'alim (sing. shū'al) is the original source of our jackal, and perhaps jackals are meant in Judg. xv. 4, as Fürst and others have suggested. B. H. C.

ANSAYRI (3rd S. vii. 358).—Your correspondent W. A. M. will find this Oriental sect described in the following publications in addition to those furnished immediately after his query: Maundrell's Journey to Aleppo; Pocock's Travels; Walpole's Ansayrii, passim; Lyde's Asian Mystery; Conder's Syria, p. 261; North British Review, Nov. 1860, p. 340. H. W. T.

JACK STONES (3rd S. vii. 34, 143).—According to Brand (Pop. Antiquit. vol. ii. p. 165, edit. Bohn), General Vallancey traces this word to the Irish "Seic Seona," which (pronounced Shee Sheona), "Was readily turned into Jack Stones by an English ear, by which name this game is now known by the English in Ireland. It has another name among the vulgar, viz. Gob Stones." (Collect. de Reb. Hib.)

This game is played by the coloured people in different parts of this colony, and is by them termed "Klip Verlaten." It is played by three persons, each having eight stones; one of the players begins by throwing all the stones into the air, and catching as many as possible on the back of the hand and arm.

Dr. Clarke found a similar game among the Russians, played with the joint-bones of sheep (cockalls). "This game," he tells us, "is called 'Dibbs' by the English." (Travels in Russia, 1810, i. 177.)

JAMES A. HEWITT.
Capetown, S.A.

MISTLETOE (3rd S. vii. 76, 157).—

"As the common mistletoe and other Loranthææ are destitute of any true root, they possess the property of penetrating through the bark of the trees to which they are attached, and of fixing the base of their stems into the wood beneath. Thus they absorb the rising sap in its progress towards the leaf." (Botany, by Prof. Henslow, p. 237.)

It is most probably for this reason that Shakespeare applies the epithet "baleful" to the mistletoe; or can he be alluding to an idea that mistletoe was "that forbidden tree" in the midst of the garden,

" . . . whose mortal taste Brought death into the world, and all our woe?"

"For in the Edda, the mistletoe is said to be Balder's death, who yet perished through blindness and a woman." (Gent's Mag. Feb. 1791.)

JAMES A. HEWITT.

Capetown, S.A.

ADVERBS IMPROPERLY USED (3rd S. vii. 152, &c.)

I cannot agree that the words are improperly used. "To look merrily," is to look as if the person were merry, or like a merry person. "To be merry," is an absolute assertion of a fact. "Your offer is fair," is one proposition. "I think you mean fairly," is another. "He is bad in health," means he is really ill. "He feels badly," as if he were bad, or like a man who is bad—he may be well, it may be only his fancy.

Is not the termination -ly, directly the old Anglo-Saxon -lic? Thus worklic, is manly; wiflic, womanly; Godlic, godly; eorðlic, earthly. See Bosworth's Dictionary, 42 d. A. A.

Poets' Corner.

CHAP (3rd S. vii. 380).—I imagine that neither your correspondent CYRIL, nor your own editorial note, has lighted upon the first use of this "favourite slang word" in its now common but very modern signification of "fellow." The quotations from Captain Carleton and from Steele, both present it to us as a mere diminutive of the old Saxon "chapman"—"ceapman," a buyer or customer: and in this sense only I find it in Bailey's Dictionary, edit. 1773. There is no doubt, I venture to assume, of the original identity of the verbs "to chap" and "to cheap" (or "cheapen"); and that a "chap" is, therefore, properly a "cheapener," or one who (as we now say) "haggles" over a bargain. Hence, I suppose, it has come about that, in these days of national shopkeeping and amor nummi, we are all of us "chapmen," and consequently, in our anxiety to save time as well as money, all of us "chaps." But like CYRIL, I too shall be interested, if "N. & Q." will execute on this word one of its most important functions, by telling posterity when and where this deformed offspring of the Saxon language was born?

R. C. L.

From the context, and the use of the phrases "bargain" and "sell," it would seem this phrase is merely an abbreviation of chapman (Anglo-Sax. ceapman), a market man, a buyer and seller. "If you want to sell, here is your chap," i.e. chapman. The same idea is still in common use in the streets: "Come on, I'm your customer." A. A.

Poets' Corner.

ASSUMPTION OF ARMS (3rd S. vii. 381.)—I think the author of the paper in question is unduly severe on the rich tradesman; who acquires, on retirement from business, a coat of arms by purchase.

I scarcely say too much, when I affirm, that a very large proportion of the nobility has sprung from trade; and that in many instances their paternal coats, as well as those which they quarter, have originally been granted to ambitious ancestors retired from business.

Very often we see the most intolerant, those who in reality should be least so. I know a gentleman who laughs at new coat armour, because he firmly believes that he himself has a right to one of great antiquity; and which he considers it a personal insult to question. Nevertheless, he has no real right to any coat of arms whatever; and as he won't purchase one, his posterity will be in the same fix!

One of the very worst errors of the present period of heraldry, is the unchecked liberty which is taken with inexorable truth, by some families "claiming" to bear this or that coat, or to represent this or that ancient family. Such "claims" appear on the face of numerous pedigrees, and seem to give them an undue importance. Moreover they are unfair to those who really do possess valid claims. I now propose that no claim should ever be mentioned,* without a statement of the facts (with full references) on which it is founded; so that the public at large may judge for itself. S.

URICONIUM, OR WROXETER (3rd S. vii. 183, 340.)—How is it that no one has cited a—

* Guide to the Ruins of the Roman City of Uriconium, at Wroxeter, near Shrewsbury. By Thomas Wright, Esq., M.A., F.S.A., Shrewsbury, J. O. Sandford, 12mo, 1859, pp. 92, with twelve plates from drawings by Mr. Hillary Davies, of Shrewsbury? WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

QUOTATION WANTED (3rd S. vii. 241, 328.)—Did not Christopher Love rather refer to one or more of the axioms of the learned Jenkins? As for instance:—

"Ponæ sunt restringendæ."—Cent. 29.

With a recollection also of—

"Favores ampliandi sunt. Odia restringenda." Cent. 186.

These seem nearer the mark than the maxims cited by R. C. L. WILLIAM BATES.
Birmingham.

* This, of course, could only be brought about by a combination.

CORONETS (3rd S. vii. 54.)—The coronets of the Princes of Wales, the princes of the blood royal, and their descendants, and of barons, were ordered to these degrees by King Charles the Second. (Chamberlain, Mag. Brit. Not. i. 60, 165, thirty-eighth edit. 1755.) JAMES A. HEWITT.
Capetown, S.A.

Hog's PRAYER (3rd S. vii. 114.)—I have carefully inquired in Kent, and so have many of my friends, whether they ever heard of such a thing as "a Hog's Prayer." Nothing of the sort could be discovered; but the other day, near Tunbridge, inquiring of a very intelligent old farmer, he said at once, "It is all a blunder; they mean the lag prayer, or prayer to keep away the old witches or hags," and told me it is not uncommonly used by the superstitious to this day. It is the well-known rhyme—

"Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
Bless the bed that I lay on;
Four corners to my bed,
Four angels round it spread;
And if that death should chance to call,
I hope our Lord will save us all."

This is a very old rhyme, and something like it is given in Sinclair's Invisible World Discovered, Relation 3, where he calls it the Black Pater-noster, and says it was used in Scotland. If this information should prove correct, all I can say is, it is a pity to make a charge of such degrading superstition against the lower classes without being perfectly certain of its accuracy. A. A.

Poets' Corner.

STICK (3rd S. vii. 290.)—The meaning here is clearly the composing stick—the implement in which the printer's type is set up. "Our author makes his first paragraph a complete stick of Railing," that is, as much railing as the stick would hold, or a compositor set up at one bout without going to his galley. A. A.

Poets' Corner.

NAVAL VICTORY OF JUNE, 1665 (3rd S. vii. 336.)—A friend has pointed out these mistakes in the above, for which, I have no doubt, my imperfect decyphering of the original has made me answerable. The Editor of "N. & Q." may be glad of the corrections: for Sir John Pawson, read Sir John Lawson; for "perished" read "persued." The writing is very indistinct. E. W.

CUE (3rd S. vii. 317.)—In France, at any opera, play, or other exhibition, the people range themselves in a line, following the order they arrive in, and pass quietly on, one after the other, taking their turn fairly, without that unmannerly pushing and crowding which I believe exists nowhere else but in England. This line they call the "queue," and if any one tries to get out of his place, the cry is "Suivez la queue," take your turn. Is not this the origin of the phrase, "It is your cue," that is, "It is your turn to speak"? The phrase is clearly not confined to the entrance of an actor, for every separate speech has its cue. A. A.

Poets' Corner.

CLASSICAL WASHERWOMEN (3rd S. vii. 34.)—If your correspondent E. S. takes an interest in this subject, I would refer him to a beautiful passage in the Odyssey (&c., the early part of the book), where the Princess Nausicaa goes down to the shore with her suite to wash the royal clothes. A. A.

Poets' Corner.

RUN THE GAUNTLET (3rd S. vii. 374.)—Probably after all this is the correct phrase, and might have been derived at the time when the culprit ran through the double line of men, and was struck by the fist with the gauntlet on, as in later days has been done with the stick. A. A.
Poets' Corner.

THEODOLITE (3rd S. vii. 337.)—The tradition among surveyors is, that land surveying was generally performed by the cross-staff at the date J. C. J. speaks of, 1685. This instrument was superseded by the circumferentor, an instrument much like a theodolite, but without the needle; the angles being taken from back-sights, as is the case with the sextant. The use of the needle in land-surveying is said to have been derived from the practice of mining surveyors. As late as 1760, in the Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, an instrument exactly on the same principle as the theodolite is called a mining dial, and the rules for its use are given under the article "Dialling."

In all probability the word is composed of θε, the ordinary abbreviation of the Greek θεωμαι, and δδω, a way; an instrument by means of which you could see, or find your way. A. A.
Poets' Corner.

MANETHO (3rd S. vii. 389.)—Your learned correspondent, T. J. BUCKTON, has, I think, quite mistaken the question connected with Manetho. My previous note on the subject (3rd S. vii. 357) did not imply an "attempt to disparage the authority of Manetho by Hengstenberg." The two points discussed by this writer are, (1), that Manetho never resided in Egypt; (2), that he did not live earlier than about the commencement of the vulgar era. I did not touch upon the authority or authenticity of the works of Manetho. The questions, therefore, still remain unanswered. Did Manetho ever reside in Egypt, and did he live B.C. 260? Hengstenberg replies in the negative. (Die Bücher Moses und Egypten, p. 237—245, 256.) Your correspondent replies, that Hengstenberg must have "confounded some other name." Surely, whatever weight Mr. T. attach to Heeren's Manual of such a writer as Hengstenberg's deference.

Bunsen, speaking of Manetho, known to the ancients as a priest of Seve The title of high-priest, ascribed to the genuine Manetho, is probably fictitious," &c. (Egypt's Place in Universal History, vol. i. p. 58, ed. London, 1848.) Heeren, however, asserts that he was "High-Priest at Heliopolis." The fact is, we know next to nothing of the personal history of Manetho; and hence we should not speak too positively about him or his works on the complex subject of Egyptian Chronology.

J. DALTON.

Norwich.

TOADS IN STONE (3rd S. vii. 388.)—This interesting question might, I think, be finally settled if any scientific person resident at Bath would obtain the assistance of some of the numerous masons employed in excavating and dressing the freestone on Coombe Down, as when staying in that neighbourhood some five years ago I was informed by a relative that he had on several occasions seen blocks of stone sawn in half, the saw in the course accidentally marked out for it, completely bisecting both the reptile and the closely-fitting cavity in which he lay, the blocks having, as described by your correspondent, neither fissure, "vein, nor chink."

E. JOHNSON.

Cambridge.

THE DUKE OF BRUNSWICK'S "FIFTY REASONS" (3rd S. vii. 68, 121.)—The title of my copy of this work differs in some respects from that given by F. C. H. My copy is styled:—

"Fifty Reasons, or Motives, why the Roman Catholic, Apostolic Religion ought to be preferred to all the Sects this Day in Christendom; and which induced his most Serene Highness Anthony Ulrick Duke of Brunswick and Lunenburg to abjure Lutheranism. To which are added Three Valuable Papers. Antwerp: printed in the year M.DCC.XLI."

Can F. C. H. tell me whether this edition is scarce?
CARILFORD.

Cape Town, S.A.

"ON AN ALTAR ED [?]" (3rd S. vii. 352.)—Your fortunate correspondent, who fell in with upwards of fifty epigrams by Mr. Thomas Fuller, has favoured us with a very appetising, not to say tantalising, list, including most of their subjects. Among these is No. 9, "On an Altar Ed," to which your correspondent has annexed a note of interrogation. For the import of this title I would refer to Joshua xxii. 34:—

"And the children of Reuben and the children of Gad called the altar Ed: for it shall be a witness between us that the Lord is God."

Our translators have here supplied the word Ed (witness) from verses 27, 28, where it occurs in the Hebrew.
SCHIN.

"NO MAN IS A HERO TO HIS VALET-DE-CHAM-BRE" (3rd S. vii. 150, 300.)—The passage in question occurs in one of the minor treatises of Plutarch, and is perhaps worth citation as indicating the peculiar office of the servant in whose apprehension his master would fail to preserve the heroic character. The words are,—

"Ἀντίγραφος δὲ γέρας, Ἐρμοδότου τινὸς ἐν ποτήμασιν αὐτοῦ φλίσιν παῖδα, καὶ δεῖν ἀναγορεύοντος, Οὐ τοιαῦτα μοι (εἶπεν) δὲ λασσώφορος σύνουδεν."

De Iside et Oniride. Francof. 1620, p. 360.

But in no greater degree should a man be a hero to himself; and in those elevated positions in which he may feel tempted to raise himself above the level of surrounding humanity, he may be ingeniously reminded of the frailty and degeneration which he has in common with those who crawl before him, by being constituted his own valet, and publicly made to act the part, as it were, of lasciviosus, to himself. Thus Platina would interpret a ceremony which the newly appointed Pope has to go through:—

"Sedulo sedem illam ad id paratam esse, ut qui in tanto magistratu constituitur, sciat se non Deum sed hominem esse; et necessitatibus nature, utpote egerendi, subjectum esse, unde merito Stercoraria sedes vocatur."—De Vit. Pontific., ed. 1664, p. 258.

Thus much our historian says in opposition to the other theory, which Butler seems to adopt. (Hudibras, part i. cant. iii. line 1249.) For a full discussion of this vexed question, the curious reader is referred to the Histoire de la Papesse Jeanne, de Monseigneur de Spanheim, 12mo, Cologne, 1694, p. 105.

Since writing the above I have noticed the inquiry of J. M. K. The Antigonus to whom the saying is attributed, is the celebrated general, and supposed half brother of Alexander the Great. The authority, as above cited, is Plutarch.

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

HOG FEAST (3rd S. vii. 364, &c.)—

"The Romans gave the offal and harslet to their slaves, but highly esteemed those portions of the animal which we throw away, or give to the dogs. Apicius cared little for pork as meat, but invented many sauces from various parts of the pig, which were so much the better relished when it was fatted to death," p. 17.—Letter to Dr. W. King. Dublin, 1711, pp. 108.

The author cites Pliny, Strabo, and Athenæus, at the foot of the page. Can any reader of "N. & Q." save me the trouble of searching through indexes.

J. M. K.

"THE VAMPIRE" (3rd S. vii. 201.)—Is there not an error in the statement that the name of Lord Byron appears as the author on the title-page of The Vampire, 8vo, 1819? I do not find it on the title of my copy, which is verbatim as you give it, with the exception of the words "by the Right Hon. Lord Byron." The tale itself occupies 73 pages; and there is appended "Extract of a letter containing an account of Lord Byron's residence in the Island of Mitylene," increasing the book to 84 pages. This extract alludes to the poet in the third person, and the concluding sentence speaks of him in terms which would not have been employed if it had been wished to persuade the public that the tale was the work of the poet:—

"Lord Byron's character is worthy of his genius. To do good in secret, and shun the world's applause, is the surest testimony of a virtuous heart and self-approving conscience."

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

[The copy of The Vampire we consulted has not only the name of Lord Byron printed on the title-page, but on the half-title preceding it. In every other respect it agrees with our correspondent's copy.—ED.]

BISHOP LINDWOOD (3rd S. vii. 134, 286.)—I am now enabled to give the result of more close inquiry as to Bishop Lindwood's arms; and I must plead by way of excuse for any discrepancy between this and my previous letter, that I am writing without access to my own books or MSS. By the kindness of Sir F. Madden I have again examined his notes, and find my original statement to be accurate, that he had recorded Lindwood's arms as a chevron simply. His authority I am unable to give, but it is not the Bishop's Register, which only applies to the coat of Rodburn, the predecessor of Lindwood. My own note, between three leaves, is also without reference, but was made previous to the year 1858. No light is thrown upon Lindwood's arms by Browne Willis, but in his MS. collections in the Bodleian I find that the bishop in his will, dated Nov. 22, 1443, desires that he may be buried in St. Stephen's Chapel, Westminster, and leaves a legacy to his native parish of Linwood. I have been kindly furnished (by the rector) with a rubbing of the coat now remaining on the brass of John and Alice Lyndewode, at Linwood, and find it exactly in accordance with the description in the Lincoln Architectural Society's Report for 1862; i. e., a chevron between three lime tree (or linden) leaves. Will your correspondent give me a reference to the edition and page of Guillim in which he finds the "fess crenellée between three fleur-de-lys," given as arms of Lindwood. I do not find it in any ordinary earlier than Edmondson.

W. K. RILAND BEDFORD.

"ROMAN HAND" (3rd S. vii. 338.)—Without being able to answer Y. X.'s query as to the "precise meaning" of this phrase, I would refer him to the earliest work in which I have met with it, Shakspeare's Twelfth Night, Act III. Sc. 4, where Malvolio says to Olivia,—

"I think we do know the sweet Roman Hand."

WM. DOBSON.

Preston.

DEMOSTHENES (2nd S. vi. 114.)—Thanking you for the reference you have been so kind as to give me, I would beg further to inquire whether the saying of Demosthenes, in which he is supposed to have spoken of action as the one thing necessary to make an orator, is to be found in the works of any Greek author who wrote before the time of Cicero. P. S. C.

CHARGES AGAINST HUBERT DE BURGH (3rd S. vi. 415; vii. 385.)—Many thanks to MELETES for his kind information. I had already discovered the passage in the Additaments, and should have written to say so, had not press of business prevented me. A comparison of this passage with the testimony of the Chronicle of Dunstaple leaves, I think, no doubt that Isabel was married to Hubert. HERMENTRUDE.

HERBERT KNOWLES (2nd S. viii. 28, 55, 79, 116, 153; ix. 94; x. 417.)—We find that he was admitted a sizar of St. John's College, Cambridge, Jan. 31, 1817. As he died on Feb. 17 following, he of course never resided in college.

C. H. & THOMPSON COOPER.

Cambridge.

LUDOWICK BRYSKETT (2nd S. xii. 3.)—Some of your readers may be interested by being informed that this able writer was matriculated as a pensioner of Trinity College, Cambridge, May 27, 1559. He was living in 1611, and we propose to notice him in the third volume of Athenæ Cantabrigienses. C. H. & THOMPSON COOPER.

Cambridge.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

The Superstitions of Witchcraft. By Howard Williams, M.A. (Longman.)

The object of the present volume is "to exhibit a consecutive review of the characteristic forms and facts of a creed which (if at present apparently dead, or at least harmless in Christendom,) in the seventeenth century was a living and lively faith, and caused thousands of victims to be sent to the torture-chamber, to the stake, and to the scaffold." The sketch—for it is a sketch only—is pleasantly written, and will furnish the thoughtful reader with matter for reflection and thankfulness. In these dull matter-of-fact days (in which the so-called Spiritualism forms the sole exception to the practical realistic tendency of all thought and action), it is difficult to conceive the influence which the belief in witchcraft formerly exercised over all classes of society. Those who desire to know how powerful this influence really was, will be pleasantly instructed by Mr. Williams's little volume.

Murray & Co.'s Book of Information for Railway Travelers and Railway Officials. Illustrated with Anecdotes, &c. By R. Bond. (Murray & Co.)

A little book full of practical and useful hints, which all intending railway travellers would do well to read at least; if not, to make the companion of their Bradshaw.

The History and Antiquities of the Parish of Wimbledon, Surrey; with Sketches of the Earlier Inhabitants. By William A. Bartlett, M.A., Senior Curate of Wimbledon. With Map and Illustrations. (Simpkin & Marshall.)

A pleasant little volume full of gossip of one of the prettiest spots in the neighbourhood of London. The inhabitants of Wimbledon owe their Senior Curate their best thanks for this judicious employment of his small leisure.

The Autographic Mirror. Parts XXIX., XXX., XXXI., and XXXII.

This cheap and instructive Collection of inedited Autographs of Illustrious and Distinguished Personages maintains its popularity and interest. The last two Parts (double Parts) contain facsimiles of some seventy Autographs of Sovereigns, Statesmen, Literati, Artists, Theatrical Celebrities, &c.

We see that Messrs. Sotheby announce for sale on Monday next and five following days, the curious Library of our late valued friend and Correspondent MR. MARKLAND. Many of the books are enriched with critical, bibliographical, and biographical notes by MR. MARKLAND. The same firm will also sell, in the course of the month of June, the Library of another gentleman, to whom the readers of "N. & Q." have been frequently indebted for much curious and valuable information—MR. GEORGE OFFOR. His Library is peculiarly rich in early editions of the Scriptures, the writings of the Reformers, and works of a similar character.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

STORIA DELLA GUERRA DELL' INDEPENDENZA NEGLI STATI UNITI D' AMERICA, by Carlo Botta, 4 vols, 8vo. Milano, 1819. In good condition.

 Letters stating particulars and lowest price, carriage free, to be sent to Mr. W. G. SMITH, Publisher of "NOTES & QUERIES," 25, Wellington Street, Strand, W.C.

Notices to Correspondents.

Among many other Papers of interest which are in type, and will appear in our next or the following number, are—

A Moral Satire by Daniel Defoe; A General Literary Index; Inedited Letter of Randle Cotgrave; Epitaphs Abroad; Notes from the Issue Rolls; The Search for the Lapis in 1863; Napoleon I. as Author and Student; Cotton's Editions of the English Bible; and many curious Shakespeare articles and Folk Lore Illustrations.

T. W. The correct quotation from Rosce's Fair Penitent is—"Is this that gallant gay Lothario?"

K. (Conservative Club) is probably referring to the case of Courvoisier, for whom Mr. Charles Phillips was counsel.

TOWNIGHT FURNAL.—S. R. RAYMOND and C. F. S. WARRER are thanked, but the query referred to a torchlight funeral in Westminster Abbey.

P. Q. (Cowbridge) is too political.

ACHARD. The Illegit is unsuited for our columns. Thanks for it. A. C. C. Where did the coat come from? The arms are—Three bendlets sinister surmounted by a bend, not any known English coat. It purports to be the coat of Stuart; but the general coat for Brewer is "gules, two bendlets issuant, or."

J. G. C. (London). Thomas Maynard was the last person executed for forgery, which took place at the Old Bailey on Dec. 31, 1852.

E. L. (Haywater). For a list of works on the Greecian Oracles consult the article "Oracle" in Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica, Index of Subjects, Rosce's Cyclopædia, and the Penny Cyclopædia, and the works cited in the latter. See also "N. & Q." 3rd S. ii. 419.

H. L. (Buckfield). The inscription on the Legh family of Lyme is printed in Ormerod's Cheshire, iii. 367.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 8d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STAMPED COPIES FOR SIX MONTHS forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 11s. 4d., which may be paid by Post Office Order payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. SMITH, 25, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all CORRESPONDENTS FOR THE EDITOR should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 179.

NOTES:—A Moral Satire, by Daniel Defoe, 431—Cotton's Editions of the English Bible, 432—Folk Lore: A Modern Ballad—Spitting—The Wise Tree—Proverbs—Easter Rhyme—Recipe for the Cure and Prevention of Toothache, 16.—S. T. Coleridge, 433—Mr. D'Alton's MS. Collections, 434—"Who killed Cock Robin?" 16.—Mis-information for the People—A Relic of 1745—Waller the Poet—Musæus's "Hero and Leander"—Lines from the Prestwold Register—Verses by Roger North—Dryden's "Sir Martin Mar-All," 435.

QUERIES:—Heraldic Queries, 436—From Thence &c. from There, 437—American Dramatists—Anonymous Hymns—Author Wanted—Cold Kitchen: Great Doods—Eudoxia Commena—General de Malet—Donne's Poems—"Fray Gerundio"—Gallows Inscription—Genealogical Queries—Capt. Haviland's "Cavalry"—The Rev. George Itchenor—Jubilees of the Roman Catholic Church—New Style—The Ostrich Feather Badge—The Romance of "Florice and Blanchefleur," &c., 438.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Market Harborough—Duchess of Queensberry—Salt's Sale—Toison d'Or—Hingham Boxes—Latin Bible, 441.

REPLIES:—Epitaphs Abroad, 442—Hudibrastic Couplet, 444—King's Lynn—Chained Libraries in Parish Vestries—Noël—Irish Poor Law—Surgeon executed for Murder—Episcopal Blazon—Horses frightened at the Sight of a Camel—Tattoo—Spur Money in Belfries—Descendant of Sarsfield—Le Poor Queries—Caraboo—Your Soul—The Court, 1730—"The Christian Breadbasket"—The Carters of Holyrood, &c., 445.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

A MORAL SATIRE, BY DANIEL DEFOE.

I duly placed to the credit of Defoe the compliments I received on account of his letter last published in "N. & Q." My manuscript of his hitherto unknown writings now fills many hundred pages of foolscap paper, and is increasing daily. I have no doubt the following Introductory Article, from Applebee's Original Weekly Journal of the 28th October, 1721, will be equally acceptable; and, if desired, I will afterwards send one or two articles containing my author's views on the Assassination of Rulers,—mournfully appropriate to the present time.*

"Mr. Applebee,—It is a long while ago that I wrote to you anything about Religion. I pray you, if it be in the Power of any of the Members of your Oracle, tell me what Religion are you Journal Writers of?"

"I have heard it related, how true I know not, that when the Dutch Ships came to Japan, and the Merchants heard that the King of the Country had resolv'd to admit no Christians to Trade there, no not on pain of Death; they resolv'd, when the Question was ask'd them, not to say they were Christians, but to say they were Hollanders.

"Now, I think, when any Man asks, as above, what Religion you are of, that is, you of the Brotherhood, you should answer, not that you are Christians or Protestants, but that you are Printers.

"As St. James says, that out of the same Mouth comes Blessing and Cursing; so out of the same Printing House comes Prayers and Play Books, Bibles and Ballads; the same Types, or Letters, compose the Companion for the

* Any communications illustrative of the life of Defoe will be acceptable.—Ed.]

Altar, and a Companion for the Halter: One Day you print for King George, and another Day Treason against King George; one Day you print Devotion, and the next Day Blasphemy; one Day for the King, another for the Pretender; one Day for God, and the next Day for the Devil; and all is one to the Printer; he is a Printer still.

"Well, the Letters may be Tories, but the Press is always a Whig; for it lives by Liberty, and often times (like some Whigs too) it turns that Liberty into Licentiousness: Liberty of the Press may be the most needful Liberty, but it is the most abus'd Liberty in the World; and therefore it is that I argue, that you ought not to say you are of any Religion, but that you are Printers.

"And yet, after all, you may plead in your own Defence, that you have as much Religion as your Neighbours; for pray, if we come to argue upon the Square, let them tell us:—

"1. What Religion is a Bookseller? that sells you all you print, and puts the Money which he gets by Religious Books, or Blasphemous Books, Modest and Bawdy, Adorable and Horrible, all into one Pocket, and all the Men alive can't know the Shillings asunder.

"2. What Religion is a South Sea Director? who gives one Account in upon Oath, and swears 'tis true, so help him God; but when his Neck is ty'd to it, and he is to say, May I be hang'd if it is not! then gives another Oath, and another Account, perhaps double to the former?

"3. What Religion is a Statesman? who to-day serves one Prince, and to-morrow serves his Enemy; to-day swears to him, to-morrow fights against him; to-day wears his Badge, to-morrow affronts him: of such this Nation has had many. I do not say there have been any in this Age; and if there were, I am not talking about them!

"4. What Religion pray is a Modern Arian of? who prays to Christ Jesus, and denies him; worships him, and yet disowns his being a God; stands up at the Prayers, and sits down at the Doxology; stays in the church at the Psalm, but goes out at the Gloria Patri!

"Certainly these are Hereticks, they must not be call'd Christians: I could name you abundance of double-minded Christians of this kind, besides these; but, for the present, let these few serve, and when I can be inform'd what to call these People I may talk with you again.

"In a Word, Religion is so much lost among these Sorts of People, that if I were of their Council, they should be advis'd to talk no more of it in the World, or to separate it, at least, from all the rest of their Management, as a Thing they can as well do without; and thus, I think, I have made your Printers amends for enquiring after your Religion.

"There are some Exchange-Alley Men whose Religion it would be hard to determine; but as they belong to another Country, where that may be Honesty which is not Honesty in our Country; and where that may be Religion which is not Religion in our Church, I therefore leave them to be try'd by a Jury of Foreigners like themselves, and shall talk next Time to you of the Religion of another sort of Folks, who pretend to more Religion than other People, but really have as little as any Body: 'Tis a strange thing to say, but it is too evident, there are Hypocrites in Politicks as well as in Religion; and we see some of your Profession practising the Art of Daubing as well as other Painters; but of this more hereafter.

"I am, Sir, your Humble Servant,
"SINCERITY."

I did not remark upon the beauties of the last letter forwarded. It is equally unnecessary to do so with the present, especially to the readers of "N. & Q."

W. LAW.

COTTON'S EDITIONS OF THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

May I be allowed to say a few words, though upon a subject which almost entirely concerns myself?

For some years past, many booksellers, when announcing in their sale-catalogues editions of the English Bible, Testament, or Psalms, have thought proper to add by way of recommendation, "unnoticed by Dr. Cotton," "unknown to Dr. Cotton." I am grateful for the compliment which these words convey; as implying that, if such a book is unknown to me, it must of necessity be rare. But I think that, in many cases, they are introduced in a way which is not quite fair either to me or to the public.

Within the last week I have received a catalogue, in which no fewer than three instances of this kind occur. One is, in the announcement of two editions of Sternhold's Psalms of the years 1735 and 1736, "neither mentioned by Dr. Cotton." The second, two other editions of the same, dated 1758 and 1763, "neither mentioned by Dr. Cotton." Now, to avoid the almost endless repetition of editions differing from each other in nothing except their dates, I gave the following notice under the year 1700 (English Bibles, p. 199):—

"From this time no notice is taken of editions of Sternhold's version; which, soon after the appearance of that by Brady and Tate, became altered into the form and language in which it is printed to this day."

In vain, therefore, will anybody look in my work for notices of any edition of Sternhold printed in the eighteenth or nineteenth centuries.

The third case mentioned in that catalogue is a still more glaring instance of the compiler's misconception of my book, and consequent unintentional misleading of the public:—

"The Holy Bible [Authorised Version], &c., 4to, Cambridge, 1678. An edition of extreme rarity, not in Lea Wilson's Catalogue, nor is it described in any Bibliographical work. Dr. Cotton states that there was no edition in 1678," &c., &c.

But I had warned my readers [English Bibles, p. 60] at the year 1611:—

"N.B. From this period, no editions of the Authorised Version are here noticed, except for some peculiarity attached to any particular one."

So that when I say at the year 1673, "no edition," I do not mean to assert that no edition of the Authorised Version was printed in that year; but merely that, in 1852, when my book was published, I knew of no Bible, or part of the Bible, or any other translation, which might fairly find its place among those described by me.

I feel that this explanation is called for at my hands; and trust that it may be of service, both to booksellers and book-buyers. H. COTTON.

Thurles.

FOLK LORE.

A MODERN BALLAD.—The following modern "folk" ballad is the production of some Rosendale rhymester, whose name I am unable to furnish. The piece has peculiar significance in these days of Surat and short staples; and though little can be said in commendation of its language and rhythm, for it is rough and ready, yet I doubt not that it will come home to the heart of many a "Surat Weyvur." The composition is a great favourite amongst the old "Deyghn" Layrocks,* who sing it to one of their easy going psalm-tunes with much gusto.

If the piece affords half the amusement to the readers of "N. & Q." that it has to me, the space it will require might be less profitably occupied. It has been named—

"SURAT WARPS."

"Come all ye Weyvurs old and young,
It is to you I'll sing a song;
And if I tell you my desire,
You cannot say that I'm a liar.

"I wish I had these Warpers, and
All Sallywinders in a band,
I'd make the whole of them to groan—
I'd cudgel every one their bones.

"Their knots when they come up to th' yealds,
They sweep them down just like bumabells—
They fly across the shed and breyk;
They sweep down all within their reyk.

"I look at th' yealds, and there they stick,
I ne'er seed th' like sin' I wur wick!
What pity could befall a heart,
To think about these hard sized warps.

"'Twill make the Master for to stare
To see his cloth so rough and bare,
He turns it over, every plait,
He turns it up, and cracks to bate.

"So I mon at his table ston,
And dare not stir one foot or hon;
To see him rip the piece to rags,
Or give me the eternal bag!

"Thus Weyvurs are brought in for all,
Both cops, and hobbins, grease, and all;
Both Warpers, Winders, Spinners too,
For all their faults they are put through.

"Ah! what a spot for Weyvurs here,
It makes me shiver and go queer;
Yet for all this, I connot help:
It makes me fit to hang myself!"

T. N.

Bacup, Rosendale.

SPITTING.—A passage from Shakspeare's Henry IV. induces me to send this note. The commentators are quite at sea on the subject. In the Second Part of the play, Falstaff remarks to the Lord Chief Justice:—

"An' I brandish anything but a bottle, would I might never spit white again!"

* Dean, in the forest of Rosendale.

Now in certain districts in the north, especially in the dales, not being able to spit white is looked upon as a sure sign of death: so that Falstaff, in effect says, "would I might never breathe more." Another curious tradition is, that every time one meets a white horse one must spit out in order to be lucky. This good old custom was well illustrated at a bazaar held recently in this neighbourhood; in which a young man, who happened to be very fortunate, attributed all his success to the rigid observance of it. A third, and I believe more widely practised superstition, is that all first receipts from your customers, when in business, must be turned over in the hand and spit upon, in order that the recipient may be fortunate.

J. WETHERELL.

THE WISE TREE. — I was talking to-day (April 29) with a Huntingdonshire cottager, and was saying how cold the day had been after our previous hot weather. "Yes," said my friend, "you musn't expect the summer to come all at once. The wise tree would have told you better than that. I was up agen the hall this morning, and saw those two wise trees that grow nigh to the fish-stews, and they hadnt put out a mossel o' shew." "And what tree may the wise tree be?" I asked. "It's what some folks call the mulberry," was the reply; "but the wise tree is the same as I've always known it by ever since I was a child." "And why do you call it the wise tree?" "Why, because it isn't silly like some trees as puts out their leaves early, and then gets clipped; but the wise tree, on the contrary, always waits till the frosses has gone right away, and aint to be deceived by a stroke o' fine weather coming early in the season. But when it's sartin sure that it be fine weather and well settled, then it puts out its leaves. O yes, sir, you may rest content on the wise tree telling you when you may be safe against frosses." CUTHBERT BEDE.

PROVERBS. — I send the two following for insertion, if you think proper: —

1. The marriage of first-cousins is said to prove "healthless, wealthless, or childless."
2. "Wine is the milk of old age." M. D.

EASTER RHYME. — On Good Friday morning, when a light shower seemed likely to usher in a wet Easter-tide, I heard a peasant girl repeat the following rhyme, with which I was not previously acquainted: —

"If it rains on Good Friday and Easter Day, There'll be plenty of grass, and a little good hay."

H. W. T.

RECIPE FOR THE CURE AND PREVENTION OF TOOTHACHE. — Pare your finger- and toe-nails, wrap the pieces carefully up in a small piece of paper.
Make a slit in the of an ash tree; loosen the the small paper

parcel under the bark, press the opening together again as closely as possible, and you will no more be troubled with tooth-ache!

The above is the recipe of an old Rossendale dame; who declares that, when a girl, being much troubled with the disease, she tried the experiment with the happiest effect—never since having known what it is to suffer a pang from this cause.

T. N.

Bacup, Rossendale.

S. T. COLERIDGE.

I possess a small volume of Coleridge's MSS., formerly belonging to Mr. Cottle. It contains the printed sheets of "Religious Musings," and the "Ode to the Departing Year" (two copies), of the edition of 1796; and there are interleaves of plain paper, on which the poet has written voluminous notes and additions. A rather lengthy advertisement, prefixed I suppose to the edition of 1797, is here in MS.; and the first twenty-three lines of "Religious Musings" are also in MS. There is no title-page to the book, but there is an MS. index; and the only other contents, besides the two poems above mentioned, are two series of printed notes, occupying forty-nine pages. Some of the leaves have been on the printer's file, which leads to the supposition that the book consists of corrected proofs bound together by Cottle for his own use; but it is equally probable that the printed leaves, with the plain interleaves, were bound for the greater convenience of correction by Coleridge.

The fifth line of "Religious Musings" reads thus in the collected edition: —

"Yet thou more bright than all the angel Maze."

In my MS. original, the word "blaze" has been struck out, and "Host," which seems a much better image, introduced.

Another line, altered for the worse, is the twenty-first of the same poem; which, in the MS. of 1796, reads thus: —

"Imaged the unimaginable God."

And in the collected edition has been frittered down to: —

"Imaged the supreme Beauty uncreate."

The paradox in the first reading forms, as in Ephesians 3rd and 19th, half its sublimity. A friend of mine humorously describes the last line as a sort of poetical crab-catching. This however, with all deference.

The lines, —

"While as the Thousand Years Lead up their mystic dance," &c., — are accompanied by the following interesting note in MS. The note was probably included in the 1797 edition, but I will venture to transcribe it: —

"The Millennium: in which I suppose that man will continue to enjoy the highest glory of which his human nature is capable. That all who in past ages have endeavoured to ameliorate the state of man, will rise and enjoy the fruits and flowers, the imperceptible seeds of which they had sown in their former life: and that the wicked will during the same period be suffering the remedies adapted to their several bad habits. And I suppose that this period will be followed by the passing away of this earth, and by an entering on the state of pure intellect; when all creation shall rest from its labours."

The four lines in the collected edition, commencing—

"Ye sweep athwart my gaze, so heavenly bright,"— read as follows in an MS. correction of the 1796 edition:—

"Ye sweep before me in as lovely hues
As stream reflected from the veiling plumes
Of them, that aye before the jasper Throne
Adoring bend. 'Blest years! ye too depart.'"

The correction was afterwards erased by a stroke of the pen.

In his directions to the printer, Coleridge seems to have shown considerable humour. For instance, in one place he has written: "Begin the page here; it is absolutely cheating, to give such open print." And three times over on one page occurs this exclamation: "Good heavens! what a gap!" On the blank page, in front of the Ode, he has written: "The motto! where is the motto? I would not have lost the motto for a kingdom; 'twas the best part of the Ode." And again, in front of the second copy: "Motto; I beseech you let the motto be printed, and printed accurately." The word "illumines," in the second strophe of the Ode, had been printed with an apostrophe, and the following note appears in the margin:—

"That villainous apostrophe belongs to the genitive case of substantives only. O that printers were wise! O that they would read Bishop Lowth!"

In the last paragraph of the second epode (first copy), the line—

"Flap their lank pennons," &c.,— was printed—

"Flap their dark pennons."

And Coleridge wrote beneath:—

"I suspect, almost suspect, that word 'dark' was intentionally substituted for 'lank.' If so, 'twas the most tasteless thing thou ever didst, dear Joseph!"

In a note to the second copy, Cottle replied:—

"I cannot but think now, that you gave me direction to alter this, or I am unaccountably mistaken; because I like 'lank' so much better than 'dark' myself."

G. COTTERELL.

Walsall.

MR. D'ALTON'S MS. COLLECTIONS.

Many years have now elapsed since I had the pleasure of seeing myself in print on the pages of your valuable periodical, but those years have so sensibly pressed upon me, that I have arrived at a resolution to break up my collection of MSS. Historical, Topographical, and Genealogical. They comprise—

Three volumes, Indexes, detailing references and trustworthy authorities for illustrating upwards of 2500 surnames of the British Empire.

Nine volumes, Indexes, furnishing similar references in aid of the history of all Irish Localities, Counties, Parishes, Cities, Castles, &c. &c.

One volume, thick octavo, affording directions to facilitate searches for Family Pedigrees, with a classification of the materials and authorities for the display of such through the various reigns of the English sovereigns, and during the Commonwealth. In it are likewise distinct classifications for the provincial pedigrees of Leinster, Ulster, Munster, and Connaught, as well as those of Scotland and Wales; and, lastly, those of English descent through each respective county of England.

Nine volumes of Notes and Extracts from MSS. of rare access in England and Ireland.

Seventy volumes, Compilations of Annals, Records, &c., furnishing references to trustworthy authorities, chronologically set down for distinct histories of the several counties of Ireland.

One volume, octavo, Syllabus of selected pedigrees (160) wherein the origin of each of these families, their habitats, the periods when, and the places where, they severally existed are detailed.

Thirty-eight volumes, Notices of Families of Ireland, as well of the Native Septs as those of English Introduction.

One volume, folio, a full list of those outlawed for High Treason in Ireland, from 1640 to 1698, alphabetically arranged, and under four columnar subdivisions, headed respectively—1. Parties' Names; 2. Residences; 3. Dates of Outlawry; 4. Places of ditto.

Twenty volumes, Miscellaneous Essays, Excursions in England, Wales, and Ireland.

Two volumes, Copies of Charters, Patents, &c. &c.

All the above manuscripts are open for inspection here, with a view to their immediate disposal.

JOHN D'ALTON.

48, Summer Hill, Dublin.

"WHO KILLED COCK ROBIN?"

In the recent debate on Mr. Baines's Borough Franchise Bill, Mr. Disraeli alluded to Mr. Massey as the person who "killed Cock Robin" (the Reform Bill). This doubtless had reference to some impromptu lines written, it was understood, by an occasional correspondent of "N. & Q." From a copy which was immediately circulated in the body of the House, I made another copy, which I send you; and perhaps you may think it worth a corner in "N. & Q."

"WHO KILLED THE REFORM BILL?"

A New Song to the tune of 'Cock Robin.'

"Who killed the Reform Bill?"

'I,' said Will Massey,

'For reform's now quite passed,
And I killed the Reform Bill.'

- "Who helped to kill it?
'I,' said Mackinnon,
'That boroughs may sin on;
And I helped to kill it.'
- "Who saw it die?
'I,' said Charles Wood;
'It did my heart good,
And I saw it die.'
- "Who'll be chief mourner?
'I,' said Lord Pam,
'Though my grief's all a flam;
And I'll be chief mourner.'
- "Who'll ring the bell?
'I,' said John Bright,
'While I cry out of spite,
And I'll ring the bell.'
- "Who'll nail the coffin?
'I,' said Scotch Black,
'Mon, I'll do't in a crack,
And I'll nail the coffin.'
- "Who'll count the mourners?
'I,' said Hal Brand,
'Just to keep in my hand,
And I'll count the mourners.'
- "Who'll dig the grave?
'I,' said John Russell,
'Though I'll have a hard tussle,
And I'll dig the grave.'
- "Who'll write the epitaph?
'We,' say the members,
'Peace to its embers,"
This be its epitaph.'
- "Who'll draw a new bill?
Up spoke Edwin James,
'The next my clerk frames,
And he'll draw a new bill.'"

A.

MIS-INFORMATION FOR THE PEOPLE.—An illustrated Almanac has just been published containing a number of such pieces of useful or useless knowledge as the following:—

"STABILITY OF THINGS IN ENGLAND.

"In one of his lectures, Mr. Emerson tells a story to exemplify the stability of things in England. He says that William of Wykeham, about the year 1050, endowed a house in the neighbourhood of Winchester, to provide a measure of beer and a sufficiency of bread to every one who asked it, for ever; and when Mr. Emerson was in England, he was curious to test this good man's credit; and he knocked on the door, preferred his request, received his measure of beer and quantum of bread, though its owner had been dead 800 years."

"LEAP-YEAR.

"The ladies' leap-year privilege took its origin in the following manner: By an ancient act of the Scottish Parliament, passed about the year 1228, it was 'ordonit that during ye reign of her maist blessit Majestie Margaret, ilka maiden ladee, of baith high and low estait, shall hae liberty to speak ye man she likes. Gif he refuses to take her to be his wife, he shall be mulct in the sum of an hundred pundis or less, as his estait may be, except and always gif he can make it appear that he is betrothit to anither woman, than he shall be free."

Now St. Cross, to which no doubt the writer alludes, was not founded by Wykeham, but by Henry de Blois, and that nearly 100 years later than the date cited. Wykeham has not been dead 800 years, but about 450. Margaret of Scotland reigned 1286-1290: and the first Scottish Parliament was called at Scone by John Balliol, 1292. I say nothing about the absurdity of supposing such an act could be passed under any circumstances, but it certainly is to be regretted that such statements should go forth to the world, especially as a reference to books of very easy access would enable the author to verify or disprove them. A. A.

Poets' Corner.

A RELIC OF 1745.—Mr. Thomas Parker, an attorney of this town, has in his possession a cane sword that belonged to his grandfather who was a staunch royalist in 1745, and who used the weapon in some skirmishes that took place about Preston, in which locality Mr. Parker held considerable landed property. He was a Roman Catholic, and, contrary to the general proceedings of a numerous body of his co-religionists in the neighbourhood, he joined the royalist ranks, but was most ungratefully treated subsequently. He lived to be upwards of ninety years of age.

S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

WALLER THE POET.—None of the biographers of Waller, I believe, has explained who the poet intended to address in the letter which is found prefixed to Mr. Robert Bell's edition. But in a MS. of Waller's Poems, probably anterior to any printed edition, I find this very letter with a superscription: "To my Lady Sophia Bertie [Bertie];" to which, in a different but cotemporary hand, is added: "Ye earle of Linsey's daughter." The text of the composition itself is much more antiquated as to orthography than Mr. Bell's. The subscription is—"Yo' La^{ty} most humble seruant. E. W."

But the most remarkable feature about the present MS. is, that it contains an inedited Dedication to Queen Henrietta Maria at the commencement, before the Poems; and at the conclusion of the said Dedication, there is the ensuing memorandum:—

"Thus I intended long since to have presented to hir Ma^{ty} those things which I had writtin of the King. But besids that I held thame not worthie of hir, the Tymes alsoe hath made this epistle vnseasonable."

The volume, which is a thin folio in the original calf binding, excellently preserved, contains forty-nine pieces, exclusively of the two dedications, and of the translation of "Hero and Leander" alluded to elsewhere. W. CAREW HAZLITT.

MUSEUS'S "HERO AND LEANDER."—It does not appear to be known that the version of "Hero and Leander" (from the Greek of Musæus, the grammarian), which has come down to us from the pens of Marlowe and Chapman, is only one of two which happen to have been preserved. In a MS., containing an early copy of Edmund Waller's Poems, supposed to be in his own handwriting, with important variations, &c., from the printed editions, I find (but in a different hand) "A Translation out of the Greeke of Musæus by way of Paraphrase, by Mr. J. Jones." This gentleman was perhaps the same John Jones, of Hereford, a schoolmaster, who rendered into English Ovid's Invective against This, 1658, 1687. Mr. Dyce, in his edition of Marlowe, 1850, was not aware, it may seem, that that writer and Chapman had a follower. It was one, I fear, of whom they had no great cause to be jealous. I give, however, the opening:—

"Divine Calliope, doe mee that right,
As but to giue the Taper light;
Let that immortal fire never fade
Which was Leanders sun and shade;
Show how the water did obey
The louely youth, and did convey
Him to his hidden Lones that ne'er saw day.
Tell Sistus, and Abidus tell,
Where the faire Hero once did dwell,
And where Leander and the torch I still doe heare."

W. CAREW HAZLITT.

LINES FROM THE PRESTWOLD REGISTER. — SIR THOMAS E. WINNINGTON'S extract from the Droitwich parish register on p. 322, reminded me of some curious entries in the registers of Prestwold, Leicestershire, e. g.:—

"Matrimonee: a matter of money now-a-days."
"Deliberandum est diu quod statuendum est semel."
"Nescio quid sit amor, nec amo, nec amor, nec amavi, Sed scio quisquis amat tangitur igne gravi."
"Nascitur indignè per quem non nascitur alter; Indignè et vivit, per quem non vivit et alter."
"Quod sibi quisque serit præsentis tempore vita, Hoc sibi messis erit, cum dicitur, Ite—Venite."

S. S. S.

VERSES BY ROGER NORTH. — In the Ellesmere copy of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, which formerly belonged to Roger North, are the following verses, signed with his initials:—

"DVRVM PATI.

"From Joue aboute a spendyng breath
Ys lent to vs to leade oure lyfe,
To lyue, to dye whan hatefull death
Shall rydd vs hense, and stynt oure stryfe.
My yward mane to heauenly thyngs wold trade me,
And styl thys fleash doth euermore dysuade me.

"R. NORTH."

"Retaine, refuse, no frend, no foe
Condeme, alowe, no chance, no choice
Your fame, your life, shall end, shall growe
No badd, no good, shall pine, reioice
So helpe so hate, mistrust your frend
As blisfull daies your life may end.—R. N."

"Thes worldly ioies, that faier in sight apearas
Arr lyving baits, whereto oure minds we cast;
Thrise blessed they that have repenting yeares
To hate their sinns, and leue their follies past;
My inward mane, to heuenly things wold trade me
But aye this flesh, doth still and still dissuade me.

"R. N."

"In triflieng tales, by poets told,
Whoe spends their time, and beats their braine,
And leues good bookes y^t vertewes hold,
Doth spare the strawe, and spoile the graine.
Sotch folke build vpp their howses in the sand
And leues godds trewth, by wh. we owght to stand.

"R. N."

F. J. FURNIVALL.

DRYDEN'S "SIR MARTIN MAR-ALL" (Act V. Sc. 1.):—

"Warner. There's nothing more distant than Wit and Folly; yet, like East and West, they may meet in a point, and produce actions that are but a hair's breadth from one another."

How much was the author of the "sublime to the ridiculous," if a modern, indebted to Sir Martin's serving man? J. A. G.

Queries.

HERALDIC QUERIES.

The monumental chantry of Sir John Speke (died A.D. 1518), near the eastern end of the north choir-aisle of Exeter Cathedral, is richly adorned with shields of arms and other heraldic insignia executed in relief. In their artistic character and treatment, these interesting examples are remarkable for their close resemblance to the armorial accessories and adornments of the chantry of Abbot Thomas Ramryge at St. Alban's. One of the shields in the Speke chantry bears, boldly carved: Three bars, between ten church-bells, four, three, two, and one. This shield is in excellent preservation, but it does not exhibit any traces of colour. Will any reader of "N. & Q." kindly inform me what are the tinctures of this shield, together with the name of the family or the individual whose arms it displays?

The arms of Sir John Speke himself (an ancestor I believe of the Nile explorer) appear repeatedly in his chantry. They are: Argent, two bars azure, over all an eagle displayed with two heads gules. The bars in this shield are represented coupèd at their extremities, like the St. Alban's saltire of Abbot Ramryge. The shield of Sir John Speke is supported by two porcupines. A porcupine also appears at the feet of the good knight's effigy, and he bears the same animal passant as his crest.

In Burke's Armory, the arms of Speke, or Le Espek, of Devon and Somerset, are given as: "Barry of eight az. and arg., over all an eagle displayed with two heads gules." And for Speke of Cornwall: "Arg., three bars az., over all an eagle with two heads gules, armed or."

In the singularly beautiful and interesting heraldic chimney-piece of Bishop Courtenay (A.D. 1478—1487), now in the hall of the episcopal palace at Exeter, several badges are introduced with the shield of arms. The sickles and garbs of Hungerford and Peverel are there; and with them are associated the tau-cross, and this same tau-cross having depending from it a church-bell. By whom were these devices borne as badges?

In Exeter Cathedral, beneath the heads of two boldly carved crossed-legged effigies are large helmets; and surmounting each of these helmets is a ring erect, through which a flowing contoise is represented as having been drawn. Have any other examples of this early chivalrous distinction for the knightly helm been observed in monumental effigies in England?

Edmund Stafford, Bishop of Exeter (A.D. 1394—1419), bore the arms of his brother, the first Earl of Stafford, differenced by a bordure charged with mitres; and this shield appears repeatedly upon the fine monument to the bishop, and also elsewhere in his cathedral.

Henry le Despencer, Bishop of Norwich (A.D. 1370—1406), in like manner differenced the arms of Le Despencer with a bordure charged with mitres; and William Courtenay, Archbishop of Canterbury (A.D. 1381—1396), charged mitres upon his label. Some few other prelates, about the same period, introduced the mitre in other ways into the blazonry of their shields of arms. I beg to ask if any other examples of this episcopal bordure and label are known? Also, I shall be glad to hear of the existence of early examples of the arms of prelates, which bear the mitre as a charge.

The arms of the See of Exeter, as now borne by the Bishops of that see, are: Gules, a sword in pale proper, the hilt or, surmounting two keys in saltire gold. In Mr. King's Handbook to the English Cathedrals, published by Murray, it is stated (p. 198 of the notice of Exeter Cathedral) that "the arms of the see, as borne at present, were settled by Bishop Hugh Oldham," whose episcopate commenced in 1504, and ended in 1519. My query is, What evidence exists to show at what time, under what circumstances, and upon what heraldic principles, the arms of the See of Exeter were actually "settled"? I should also be thankful for information relative to the corresponding "settling" of the armorial insignia of other sees.

Mr. King adds, referring still to the arms of Exeter as he records them to have been "settled" by Bishop Oldham, that "earlier examples (of the arms of the same see) vary the position of the keys and sword." The keys in these arms, doubtless, are the ensigns which might have been expected to appear upon the shield of the see of St. Peter of Exeter. I am anxious to learn what led to the introduction of the sword into this same shield. In various parts of the cathedral, the arms appear with the sword in pale interposed between the two keys, which are in saltire; or, the keys are addorsed and in bend, and the sword is interposed between them in bend sinister; or, the sword, surmounting a single key in bend sinister, forms a saltire; or, the two keys are in saltire, without any sword. In the early glass of the window at the easternmost end of the north aisle, the two keys appear addorsed and erect, their bows being interlaced. In like manner, two keys of precisely the same character are represented upon the right shoulder of the chesuble of Bishop Walter de Stapleton (A.D. 1306—1329), in his effigy. Upon the monument to Bishop Walter Bronscomb (A.D. 1258—1281), which was evidently constructed early in the fifteenth century, his effigy being of the period of his own decease, the arms of that prelate are blazoned as: Or, on a chevron sable, three quatrefoils gold, between two keys in chief and a sword in base all erect and of the second. Did Bishop Bronscomb take the keys and sword from his see, or did the see derive the sword from this bishop? In Bishop Oldham's own Chantry, the arms appear with the keys in saltire, and with the sword both in pale and in fesse.

CHARLES BOUTELL.

FROM THENCE versus FROM THERE.

Dr. Johnson says, that "from thence is a barbarous expression, implying the same as thence, yet wants not good authorities."

"There plant eyes, all mist from thence Purge and disperse."—Milton.

He might, I think, have said, "all good authorities." It is an expression constantly made use of in the best written books of our language, as well as in our authorised version of the Bible, which is the work of different hands, and is acknowledged by all to be singularly free from grammatical error. Dr. Johnson also says: From hence is a vicious expression which crept into use even among good authorities, as the original force of the word hence was gradually forgotten." He here impliedly admits that the simple word hence wants force. Much more, then, does the word thence want it. It was doubtless for this reason that the proposition from is so constantly added to it for the sake of clearness as well as force.

With all due deference to so great an authority as Dr. J. is, there does not appear any reason why this word from may not be added in the present instance, as other words are oftentimes added for this sole purpose. Thus in John iii. 13, it is said: "No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven." Will any one presume to say, that the word up is a barbarous addition because the simple word ascended implies the same thing? What rule of grammar is infringed by the addition of the word up, by way of giving force to the contrast between ascending up, and coming down? In Ephes. iv. 8—10 also, the word up, though not necessary to the sense, appears to be quite lawfully and most properly introduced. Unless, therefore, some other and better reason can be assigned for calling from thence a barbarous expression, than that the word from is not necessary, I do not see that any case is made out against it. At all events, the expression is so embedded in the whole English literature, and so universally used in colloquial talk, that like many other expressions which can hardly be explained upon the strict principles of grammar, it may justly be considered equally with them to be part and parcel of the English idiom. An attempt, however, has been made of late years to supersede this supposed barbarism by the new expression from there, for which the same excuses cannot be made, for it is neither idiomatic, nor is it analogous to our idiom, nor is the preposition from added to the adverb there to give force to it; but it is prefixed to it precisely in the same way as it is prefixed to a noun as an auxiliary to it, to denote its case. This, I believe, to be contrary to all the rules of general grammar, and that there is nothing like it in our own or in any other language. When a preposition is joined to a relative adverb, as in the case of to where or from where, the preposition does not govern it, for the expression is elliptical, and in full it would be "to this or that place where." This is quite a different thing from such expressions as to there or from there. There is a pretty large number of compound words, in which the words there and here are compounded with one or other of the whole complement of prepositions, as for instance, thereabout, thereafter, thereat, thereby, therefore, therefrom, &c. These are quite justifiable, for each of them is in reality one word, although it is compounded of two. Those persons, then, who fancy that they have invented a legitimate expression in the one, from there, which they think may supersede what they assume to be a barbarous one, should be prepared to maintain on the same grounds that a whole circle of expressions of a like kind are perfectly legitimate; and instead of the old expressions above named, if they will consistently carry out their own theories of language, they should be prepared to maintain that such expressions as about there, after there, at there, by there, for there, were as perfectly legitimate; and the genuine productions of the English language as that to which they have given birth—from there.

Man is a rational animal, who very soon acquires distinct ideas of the relative position of things, as well as in the course of time of other things, and hence arises his power of speech. There are no two ideas which a child sooner acquires, perhaps, than those of here and there. A very little child who can just run about says to his mother, I have lost my plaything, where is it? She answers, There it is at the other end of the room, and she points to the spot, or she says Here it is on my lap, or close by my feet. The child thus instinctively learns that there means at a distance from the speaker, and here close by him. There is always some particular point at a distance from the person to whom it refers, and here is always some particular spot near him. There seems, therefore, to be almost as much confusion of thought as there is of impropriety of speech in such expressions as from there to there, from here to here. What a strange jargon also would our language become if we could imagine such expressions to come into general use! Mr. A. came from Oxford to Torrington. Mr. B. meets him and says, "I did not know you were come to here. When did you go from there? I did not stop at Exeter, but went through there and came straight to here," &c. &c.

I have said that the expression from thence is constantly used in our Bible. Let me conclude this trivial discussion with one very serious quotation from thence:—

"And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulph fixed: so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence."—Luke xvi. 26.

Would this language, think you, be improved by simply saying hence and thence? or will the time ever come when our language will have undergone such a radical change, that in a new translation yet to be, our posterity will read it from here—from there? C. E. P.

AMERICAN DRAMATISTS.—I would be obliged if any of your American readers could give me any account of two American dramatists, viz.:—

1. Robert W. Ewing, author of several dramas, published about forty years since: such as The Highland Seer; Quentin Durward, &c. In Mr. Rees's Dramatic Authors of America, it is stated that "this gentleman is better known to the reading community as a theatrical critic, having established a reputation as a severe censor of the stage under the signature of 'Jacques' during the years 1825 and '26."

2. Manly B. Fowler, author of three plays: The Prophecy; Orlando; Female Revenge. Neither the date nor place of publication is given, but they were in existence before 1834. R. I.

ANONYMOUS HYMNS.—I shall be very much indebted to any of your correspondents who will kindly inform me who are the authors or translators of the following hymns:—

1. All is o'er, the pain, the sorrow.
 2. Before the ending of the day.
 3. Christ will gather in His own.
 [See Lyra Germanica, Second Series, 1858, p. 120, translated by Catherine Winkworth.]

4. For man the Saviour shed.
 5. Forty days and forty nights.
 6. In the hour of trial.
 7. Jesu meek and gentle.
 8. Jesu meek and lowly.
 9. Let every heart exulting beat.
 10. O come and mourn with me awhile.
 [By Frederick Wm. Faber, D.D. See his Hymns, edit.
 1842, p. 81.]

CPL.

Who are authors of the following hymns, in Hymns Ancient and Modern?—

1. Hymn 114. (Easter) Alleluia! Alleluia! Alleluia!
 The strife is o'er, the battle done.
 2. Hymn 132. (Trinity Sunday.) All hail, adored Trinity.
 3. Hymn 152. Jesu, meek and lowly.
 4. Hymn 189. Jesu, meek and gentle.
 5. Hymn 258. Disposer Supreme, and Judge of the earth.
 6. Hymn 273. For thy dear saint, O Lord.
 [By Isaac Williams, a translation.]

R. I.

AUTHOR WANTED.—Who was the compiler of "A New Complete English Dictionary, containing a brief and clear Explication of most words in the English Language," Edinburgh, printed by David Paterson, 2nd edition, 1770? It seems to contain an answer to Col. George Greenwood's question, in the Athenæum of the 11th of March last: "Can any dictionary be shown, where 'to shed' means 'to divide'?" Here we have "To shed, to separate."

ST. TH.

COLD KITCHEN: GREAT DOODS.—On recently looking over the map of Surrey, I was struck by the name of a place I never heard of before,
 "Cold Kitchen," and which is situated near Leith Hill. Has this name any connection with that of "Cold Harbour," about which so much has been said in "N. & Q."? I see there is also a "Cold Harbour" not far off. Another query I would put is as to the meaning of "Great Doods," the name of an estate at Reigate. The residence, apparently of the time of Anne, is close to the old church, the grounds containing some exceedingly fine trees, among others a tulip tree of very large growth.

PHILIP S. KING.

EUDOSIA COMNENA.—May I ask RHODOCANAKIS
 whether there is any authority for giving Theodore Palmatologus, buried at Landulph, a first wife, Eudokia Comnena? and how is it to be accounted for that this marriage and its offspring are not mentioned on the tombstone, when the second
 English marriage and offspring are so mentioned?

CHARLES F. S. WARREN.

Census C. College, Cambridge.

GENERAL DE MALET. Wanted, the name and volume of a periodical containing a portrait of General de Malet, who conspired against the first Napoleon. I remember that, in the same volume, there is a portrait of Vice-Chancellor Wigram.

C. M. Q.

DONNE'S POEMS.—Several of these are addressed to his friends, whose initials only are given. Of these, doubtless, "C. B." and "S. B." are Christopher and Samuel Brook; and "R. W." Rowland Woodward, "M. H." Magdalen Herbert.
 But can any of your readers identify "I. W.,"
 "T. W.," "B. B.," "I. L.," and "I. P." (Donne's Poems, pp. 175—186, ed. 1635)?

CPL.

"FRAY GERUNDIO."—In the English translation of Padre Isla's Fray Gerundio, published in the year 1772, the translator in the advertisement says, that—

"The Council of Castile suppressed the first volume," and that "the Father had a second volume ready, but the prohibition of the first put a stop to the publication of the second."—"The father presented his only copy of the second volume, partly written by an amanuensis and partly with his own hand, to the gentleman who gives this account, and who was pleased very obligingly to lend it to the translator."

It would thus appear that the MS. of the second volume was in the hands of some one in England about the year 1772.

When in Spain lately, I by chance at an obscure shop purchased a volume in MS. called Historia del famoso Predicador Fray Gerundio de Campasas, &c., and one from which most probably the Spanish edition of the first volume was printed, as the dedicatory and complimentary epistles are dated in October, 1757 (the first Spanish edition was published in 1758). I am anxious to compare my MS. copy of the first volume with that second above alluded to—the more so, as the description of the second volume tallies with that of the first in my possession, mine being written partly in the clerkly hand of an amanuensis, but the greater portion in another hand, most probably that of Padre Isla; but a comparison would settle that point. I therefore reluctantly ask for space for this communication, hoping that the owner of the
 MS. of volume the second may see it. F. W. C.

Clapham Park.

GALLOWES INSCRIPTION.—

"Cresce diu, felix arbor, semperque viroto Frondibus, ut nobis talia poma ferat."

The above couplet is said to have been inscribed upon a gallows in Scotland, on the occasion of the execution of some remarkable criminal. I should be glad to know the name of the executed person;
 also in what part of Scotland this occurrence took place?

H. A. KENNEDY.

GENEALOGICAL QUERIES.—Wanted information respecting the families of Swan, living at Great

Coxwell, Berks, 1778; families of Morgan, Powell, Popkin, and Howell, living in Glamorganshire a few years anterior to the date. Also, particulars of the family of Wicks, living at Farringdon in 1800. Information to be addressed to "H. A. B., Mr. Roberts's, Stationer, Seymour Street, Saint Pancras, N.W."

CAPT. HAVILAND'S "CAVALRY."—I am anxious to find a work on "Cavalry," by Capt. Haviland, late Queen's Bays, 2nd Dragoon Guards. I believe it to have been published from fifteen to twenty years since. I cannot find it in the British Museum, nor at the library of the Royal United Service Institution. Can any of your correspondents inform me if, or where, a copy can be seen for reference, or purchased? W. R. L.

THE REV. GEORGE ITCHENER, of St. John's College, Oxford, B.C.L., Dec. 15, 1738, became vicar of Great Baddow, Essex, 1741-2, and published Elegiac Tears (a poetical translation of the Rev. J. D. Cotton's Lachrymæ Elegiacæ), Chelmsford, 4to, 1766. Information respecting him, especially the date of his decease, will oblige.

S. Y. R.

- JUBILEES OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. Where shall I find a list of the jubilees that have been held by the Roman Catholic church? The first was proclaimed by Pope Boniface VIII. in 1299, the last by the present pope in 1854. On their first institution they were ordered to be celebrated once in a century, but in more recent days they have been held at much shorter intervals.

A. O. V. P.

NEW STYLE.—The Act of Parliament, directing that the year should begin on the 1st of January, instead of on the 25th of March, was passed in 1751, and came into operation in 1752. Did any considerable section of the population anticipate the action of Parliament in this matter, &c., commence their year of account, &c., before the passing of the act in question? I have before me the diary of a Nonconformist minister, who appended to the entry for Dec. 31, 1720, the words: "Thus ended y^e year 1720," &c. He then writes, "Diary for y^e year, 1730," &c., &c.; "Begun on January the first, 1730." Wm. Dobson. Preston.

THE OSTRICH FEATHER BADGE.—In the clere-story of the choir of Exeter Cathedral, in the head of the fifth window from the east, I lately observed an early example of the group of three white ostrich feathers, now the badge of the Prince of Wales. These feathers are charged upon a shield, the field of which is tinctured per pale azure and gules. They all stand erect, and are grouped together by a scroll bearing the motto Ich Dien, but there is no coronet. The tips of these feathers bend over slightly towards the spectator, the tips of the two side feathers also inclining severally to the dexter and the sinister. I shall be very glad to see other early examples of this most interesting badge described in "N. & Q." Does any contributor remember any example of the three feathers encircled with the Garter of the Order, in addition to the one in the vaulting of the ascent to the Hall of Christchurch at Oxford? CHARLES BOUTELL.

THE ROMANCE OF "FLORICE AND BLANCHE-FOUR."—I have been looking at the copy of Florice and Blanche-four in the Cambridge University Library. There are apparently four known English texts of the poem, which all have different spellings of the two names, and none of them seem to be perfect copies. 1. The Cotton MS. Vitellius, D. III., nearly destroyed in the fire. 2. The Cambridge MS., Gg, 4, 27, 2, imperfect at the beginning. 3. The Auchinlech MS., in the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh, printed by David Laing for the Abbotsford Club, imperfect at the beginning, almost at the same point as the Cambridge University MS. 4. The Bridgewater MS. The Cambridge and Edinburgh MSS. seem to me different translations from the same original. What portion is wanting at the beginning? Where is a French original to be seen? I don't, of course, mean merely a French Romance of that name, but a copy of the French text of the story from which our English versions appear really to be derived. What portions, exactly, still remain in the Cotton MS.? What portion, exactly, remains of the Bridgewater MS.? To which version do the Cotton and Bridgewater copies bear respectively the most resemblance? Can any reader give me an answer to any of these queries? H. B.

ST. AUGUSTINE AND THE MYSTERY OF THE BLESSED TRINITY. — Where is to be found full, and where the original account of the following, which I extract from Dr. Stanley's Sermons in the East?

"He [St. Augustine] is most generally represented with a child or infant Jesus by his side, holding a shell or spoon, and sometimes filling a hole with water from it. This is an allusion to a vision which he himself relates as occurring to him. While he was walking one day on the seashore, meditating on the mystery of the Blessed Trinity, he saw a child filling a hole in the sand with water baled out of the sea in a shell. In answer to an enquiry from the Saint, the child replied, 'I wish to empty the sea into this hole;' and, as the Saint said, 'Child, it is impossible,' he answered, 'Not more impossible than to comprehend what you are now meditating upon,' and immediately vanished."

H. C.

"A SHORT HISTORY OF IRELAND." — To whom are we indebted for A Short History of Ireland, which was published anonymously in London, 1849? ABHBA.

TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.—Are the following documents printed? And if so, a reference to them will oblige.

A.D. 1591. The First Speech of Adam Loftus, Archbishop of Dublin, and Lord Chancellor to y^e Mayor of Dublin, &c., to persuade them to Grant Land whereon to erect Trinity College.—The Second Speech of Archbishop Loftus on same subject.

Warrant for the foundation of Trinity College, and for granting the Termon Lands of Monaghan to Undertakers (A^o 34 Elizabeth).

Patent of Queen Elizabeth: Pro fundando Collegium Sanctæ et Individuæ Trinitatis juxta Dublin. (R. C. H. 34 Eliz., Irrot. 37 Eliz.)

Concordatum for paying 40^{lb} a-year to the College of Dublin. (A^o 42 Eliz.)

AIKEN IRVINE.

Kilbride, Bray.

WORDSWORTH.—Can any one tell me where the following quotation from the poet is to be found? I think perhaps in some letter to the Quillinans or Southey. It is not to be found in the last edition of Wordsworth's Works:—

"A gleam of sunshine, 'mid the hills,
All islanded with shadow.
A cowslip nodding, all alone,
Upon a lake-side meadow.
These tell of solitude indeed,
But solitude and pleasant.
They bring full many a gentle thought,
To many a passing peasant."

I cannot help thinking there must be some error in the reduplication of the word "many."

WALTER THORNBURY.

JAS. WALLACE of Christ's College, Cambridge, published Shakspearian Sketches, 1795. Are these sketches poems, dramas, or literary essays? The volume appears to be somewhat scarce. I have noted the author as being the Rev. Jas. Wallace, of Christ's College (who died in 1829?). R. I.

JOHN YORKE, of the Yorke family of Erddig, co. Denbigh, was living in London in 1709. Any particulars as to his descendants would greatly oblige.

CARILFORD.

Cape Town, S. A.

Queries with Answers.

MARKET HARBOROUGH.—I shall feel obliged if you can give me some account of the early history of Market Harborough, in Leicestershire, and the origin of the name. CLARICE.

[It has been conjectured, that as this town, in the ancient record of Testa de Nevil, is called Haverburg, from Haver, a term still used in the northern counties to signify oats, and berg, a hill, that the name was afterwards converted into Haverbrowe and Harborough. That ingenious antiquary, the late John Cade, Esq., of Gainford, Durham, however, deduces the name of Harborough from a Roman road, which he calls Hare-street, on which it stands. He says, "I purposed publishing some further observations on the old Ryknild-street and Hare-street roads, whence your Harborough derives its name, but my infirmities will not permit." Harborough is a very great thoroughfare town, and as early as the time of King Edward III. 1327, obtained the liberty of holding a market twice a-week, on Wednesdays and Saturdays. For the early history of this town, our correspondent may consult Nichols's Leicestershire, vol. ii. pt. ii. pp. 486 to 508; and Harrod's History of Market Harborough, 8vo, 1808.]

DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.—I shall feel obliged to any of your readers that will tell me who was the author of the lines on the celebrated Duchess of Queensberry, the friend of Pope and Gay, descriptive of her appearance when far advanced in life, and where they are to be found? If in Scott's edition of Swift, in what volume? C. M. Q.

[One of the last and most elegant compliments which the Duchess of Queensberry received was from the amiable William Whitehead (Works, iii. 65), and which is probably the one inquired after by our correspondent. The duchess was of great age when this compliment was paid to her, which was singularly well adapted, as her Grace never changed her dress according to the fashion, but retained that which had been in vogue when she was a young beauty. The little poem thus commences:—

"Say, shall a bard in these late times
Dare to address his trivial rhymes
To her, whom Prior, Pope, and Gay,
And every bard, who breath'd a lay
Of happier vein, was fond to choose
The patroness of every Muse," &c.]

SALT'S SALE.—I shall be much obliged if any correspondent of "N. & Q.," having a priced Catalogue of Salt's sale (June, 1835), of Egyptian antiquities, will inform me to whom and at what price the following lots were sold: 296, a tablet; 81 and 82, vases; 552, a vase; 248, a lachrymatory. JOHN DAVIDSON.

[The highly interesting collection of Egyptian antiquities, the property of the late Henry Salt, Esq., consul-general in Egypt, was disposed of by Messrs. Sotheby & Son. The sale continued nine days, and produced 7,168*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* The trustees of the British Museum laudably laid out above 4,500*l.* at this sale. The Catalogue, with the prices and the articles purchased by the British Museum denoted by an asterisk, is printed at the end of Giovanni D'Athanasi's Brief Account of Researches in Egypt, 8vo, Lond. 1836. Lot 296 was purchased by Blanshard, 1*l.* 4*s.* Lot 81 by Ewbank, 2*l.* 18*s.* Lot 82 by Hay, 1*l.* 10*s.* Lot 552 by Lord Mountmorres, 2*l.* 8*s.*, and Lot 248, by Mr. Cureton, for the British Museum, 1*l.*]

TOISON D'OR.—I should be greatly obliged to any correspondent who would kindly refer to the splendid manuscript of the Chevaliers de la Toison d'Or. (Harl. MS. 6199.) I wish to know who are the first and last knights whose names, &c., are recorded in it. The last knight in my copy of Chifflet's Insignia Gentilitia Equitum Velleris Aurei (Antwerp, 1632), is No. cccxviii. Count Esterhazy-Galantha. Was any later edition, or continuation, of Chifflet ever published?

J. WOODWARD.

[The first name recorded in the Harl. MS. is Messire Guillaume de Vienne, Seigneur de St. George et de St. Croix, and the last Messire Philippe d'Austrice, Conte de Charolois. The only edition of Chifflet's Insignia is that of 1632.]

HINGHAM BOXES.—What does Oliver Wendell Holmes mean by saying:—

"I am simply an outsider you know; only it does not do very well for a nest of Hingham boxes to talk too much about outsiders and insiders."—The Professor at the Breakfast Table, p. 261.

What are Hingham boxes? Some Bostonian reader may tell.

ERINENSIS.

[Hingham is a post village of Plymouth County, Mass., on the south side of Massachusetts Bay, and on the South Shore railroad, seventeen miles S.S.W. from Boston. It is a favourite summer resort, and several packets communicate regularly with Boston, and a steam-boat daily in the summer season. The allusion is possibly to some vehicle of conveyance between Hingham and Boston.]

LATIN BIBLE.—Will you inform me the value of a Breeches Bible, in Latin, dated 1685?

SUBLIGACULUM.

[The Bible designated by our correspondent "a Breeches Bible, in Latin," is probably the version by Francis Junius and Immanuel Tremellius, the third London edition of 1585, 4to, in which the passage of Gen. iii. 7, is translated "consutisque foliis ficus fecerunt sibi subligacula." The Duke of Sussex's copy, in excellent condition, and bound in russia, fetched 14s.]

Replies.

EPITAPHS ABROAD.

(3rd S. vii. 129.)

EPITAPHS IN THE ENGLISH COLLEGE AT ROME.

The same Rawlinson MS. which contains the epitaphs at Paris, printed pp. 129-131 of the present volume, contains also transcripts of the memorial inscriptions in the English, Scotch, and Irish colleges at Rome. Those copied from the English college amount to forty-one; and that most of these no longer exist in situ may be concluded from the fact, that only four of them are printed in a "Paper of Extracts from the Records of the College," by W. C. Trevelyan, printed in vol. v. of Nichols's Collectanea Topographica, p. 87, where also these four are only stated to have been in existence in 1785; and are printed from a copy which was in the possession of Cardinal Wiseman in 1896. Probably many of the inscriptions were destroyed when the church of the college was desecrated by the French revolutionary army during their occupation of Rome in 1798.

Inscriptiones Sepulchrales in Capella Collegii Anglicani Romæ, ab ipsis Monumentis et saxis sepulchralibus erute, diebus 14 et 15 Jan., N.S., 3 et 4 V.S. M.D.CC.XXI.

On a marble in the north wall:—

"Decreto S. Congregationis visitationis Apostolicæ, edito de [die?] xxix Maii MDCLXIV. Oratorium S. Edmundi regis Angliæ, trans Tyberim olim positum, suppressum fuit, et obligatio illic celebrandi missas ad summum hujus templi altare translata, aliis omnibus in pristino suo vigore juxta mentem S. M. Gregorii XIII. permanentibus."

In the chappell of our Lady on the south side of the altar.

On a white marble bearing the effigies of a bishop, in his pontificalibus, and under his feet this inscription in capitals:—

"Joanni Gilio, Lucen. Vigornien epô, ju. utr. consul, consummatæ virtutis viro, ser. Henrici VII. Angl. Regis apud Pont. Oratori, Silvester, regia liberalitate dignitatis successor, patrueli B.M. posuit. Obiit An. Sal. mccccic, mens. Aug. ætatis vero sue lxxiii."

On a small white marble grave-stone near, in capitals, is this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
D^o Richardo Haddoco Anglo, S^o
Theologiæ doctore, qui Elisabetha Angliæ Regina Catholicos persequente, multorum annorum exilium pietatis causa sustinuit, fratrem præclaro martirio coronari vidit ac demum Romæ sancte pieque obiit, xiii Julii, anno Dñi. mdcv. Curatores posuerunt."

Under another gravestone bearing a person cutt thereon in a religious habit, in capitals, is this following inscription:—

"Ne moriari (sic) Britaniæ, precor, neve omina credas
Cum vidias (sic) civis tam procul ossa tui.
Sic ferix (sic: felix) mellorque mei pars reddita celo est,
Quod mortale fuit maxima Roma tenet.
Die xxxi. Jenuari (sic) M.DXVII.
Epitaphium D. T. Colmanii."

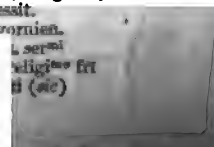

On the wall, on a small white marble tablet bearing the cutt effigies of a woman, with books and beads in her hands, on her knees, and the Virgin and our Saviour at a distance as in Heaven, and in capitals, is this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
Margaritæ Kibbi Angliæ
Depositum.
Obiit prid. April, an. MDXLVIII."

On another white marble, under a person in a priest's habit, in capitals, is this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
Religioso viro d. Jo. Weddisburi, priori de Worcester qui dum pia divi Jacobi ac Iuliani Pa. et Pauli limin, Dñcum sepulcrum visurus, attigisset, anno ætatis sue L. decessit."

R. P. Sil. ep̄s Wigornien.
Apud Leo X. 1. serm.
Regis Angliæ Of.
posuit xxxii. 1. (sic)
M.E.

On another white marble gravestone, in capitals, is this flowing inscription :—

"D. O. M.
D. Thomæ Pordage, armigero Anglo,
Cantiano.
Pie obiit xvi. Feb.
Anno M.D.CXCIX.
Requiescat in pace.
Carolus Hill amicissimus
posuit."

On a small gravestone, under a cross fleury in capitals, is this inscription :—

"Religioso
Thome Cap^o
P^rdicti P^roris."

On another white marble gravestone, in capitals, is the following inscription :—

"D. O. M.
Gulielmo Gressopo, presbytero Anglo, doctrina singulari, vita, mori-busque integerrimo octo annis ob fi-dem Catholicam patria exulanti,
Thomas Kirtonus Anglus amico amantissimo posuit.
Vixit annis xxxiii,
diebus xxi. obiit
MDLXIX."

On another white marble gravestone, in capitals, is this inscription following :—

"D. O. M.
Katharinæ Weston
Comitis Portlandiæ Magni Angliæ
Thesaurarii filia, singulari pietate, integritate, modestia prædita,
quæ fidei Catholicæ causam Angliam deserens cum viro et familia, tandem Romam venit, ac post varias triennio placidissime tolleratas ærumnas, relictis octo liberis, ad meliorem vitam abiit,
ii. Cal. Nov. anni M.DCXLV, ætatis suæ xxxiix.
Richardus White, ex Albionum Essexien.
antiqua stirpe, conjugi amantiss. posuit."

This lady was buried in the church of S. Maria ad Nives, as I find in pag. iii. of Hobbes's Lyrics.

On another white marble, under a person in a priest's habit, in capitals, is this inscription :—

"Hic jacet R. Pater Guilelm. Shirwood, decanus de Acland,
Dunelmensis diocesis,
qui obiit xi.
Octobris, anno
M.CCCC.XCVII."

On another white marble, in capitals, is this inscription :—

"Dominus Nicolaus
Saxton,
Theologie
Baccularius, (sic) Eboracensis diocesis a^o m^o ccccxlviii Octobris."

On another under a cross fleury, in capitals, is this following inscription :—

"Depositum Johannis Gam, sacerdotis Anglici, artium medicinarumque interpretis qui xxix Augusti

MDVII mundo mortuus, cum X^{ro} vivat. Amen."

On a small white marble gravestone, in capitals, is the following inscription :—

"D. O. M.
Georgio Whito, nobili
opt. spei adoles-centi, Stephani (sic) frater chariss. ponendum curavit. Obiit idibus Junii MDLV."

On another, under a person in a priest's habit in capitals, is this inscription :—

+ Hic jacet Pater
Thomas Cabold, utriusque juris doctor, Pape penitentiarii, Norvicensis diocesis, qui obiit die xx
Julii, 1502."

On another white marble gravestone, in capitals, is the following inscription :—

"D. O. M.
Thomæ Kyrtono, Anglo, hujus
Xenodochii capellano, viro in fide orthodoxa constanti, vitæ et morum integritate conspicuo, solertia et studio gratificandi parato. Patriæ hereses detestans Romam properavit.
ubi post novennium, febri occulta correptus, naturæ cessit, annum agens XL.
Obiit viii. id. Aprilis,
MDLXXI.
Hunc locum vivens sibi delegit, cujus voluntati amici curatores
ex testamento satisfecerunt,
Nicol^o Mortonus, Gul. Gibletus,
Robertus Talcarnus."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscription :—

"Thomæ Knyght, monacho or.
S. Bene, et sacristæ ecclie
Cathedralis Scti Suythuni
Wynton., doctrina, moribus, et omnium (sic) virtute prædito, ejusdem Or. et Ecclie Prior bene merenti
posuit
qui innocentissime de se posteris suis desiderio
relicto, nemini molestus,
obiit M.CCCC.XC."

On a small white marble monument fixed to a pillar, in capitals, is this inscription :—

"D. O. M.
D. Rogero Bainesio, nobili Anglo, qui, anno MDXLVI. natus, patriam, regnante cum Elizabetha
hæresi, deserens, Romam venit, ubi a morte ill. Card. Alani cui
a secretis fuerat, privatam vitam Deo, sibi et communi calamitosæ patriæ bono agens,
cum XLIV in urbe explesset annos,
obdormivit in Domino,

VII. id. Octobris, An. Sal. MDCXXXIII.
 Etatis sue LXXVII, mens. VI.
 Ex testamento centum montium loca in pios usus reliquit, prout ex actis D. Michaelis Angeli Cesii, notarii, constat."

On a white marble gravestone, in capitals, is this inscription:—

"Hoc tumulo corpus ven-nalis viri magri Thomæ Purveour,* Sacre Theologie
 Professoris, ac Londonien.
 Wellen. eccarum canonici et minoris in basilica Principis Apolorum de urbe S. D. N. PPe.

Obiit die v Octobris An. D. MCCCCLXVIII, Roma."

On a white marble gravestone, under a person in a priest's habit, in capitals, is this inscription:—

"Hic jacet Thomas
 Metcale, sacre pagine doctor, Ebor. dioc. qui obiit 26 Novemb. 1503."

On another small white marble gravestone, in capitals, is this following inscription:—

"Hic jacet frater Guliel-
 m. Bachelier Anglicus, Prior domus Charnelitarum, Londini, vir singularis probitatis et modestie, qui obiit in hoc Hospit^{alis} die xxx mensis Julii, A.D. MDXV, cujus animæ propicietur Deus."

On a small marble gravestone, in capitals:—

"D. O. M.
 D. Rogerio Bainesio, diocesis Covent.^{ensis}
 M.D.CXXIII."

On another, above a cross fleury in the body, in capitals, is this following inscription:—

"D. O. M.
 D. Henrico Story, Anglico Pbro, hujus Hospitalis sacristano, qui obiit anno MDXVIII.
 xxii. Julii, etatis sue anno LVIII."

"On another white marble gravestone, in capitals, is this inscription following:—

"D. O. M.
 Hic jacet
 Joannes Wilfridus,
 Anglus, Collegii Gregoriani
 de Urbe
 Ordinis S. Benedicti abbas.
 Obiit pridie Kal. Junii,
 A.S. MDCLIX. etatis sue LX."

(To be continued.)

W. D. MACRAY.

* Proctor at Oxford in 1460.

HUDIBRASTIC COUPLET.

(3rd S. iv. p. 61.)

The famed couplet—

"For he who fights and runs away,
 May live to fight another day,"— which caused the wits of Brooks's Club, in 1784, to wrangle over their wine and to bet about its authorship, in consequence dooming Dodsley to a night's vain search through Hudibras, where, when called upon as arbiter, he had incautiously asserted that "every fool" knew it to be; and since that time, has given rise to the spending of much ink and paper in various magazines, as well as in many numbers of "N. & Q."—was by Mr. YEOWELL, in the article referred to, confidently fathered upon Oliver Goldsmith; who is therein said to have "unwittingly penned these celebrated lines—the authorship of which, for eighty long years, has baffled the researches and puzzled the ingenuity of the whole literary brotherhood." The book in which they are stated to have first appeared being The Art of Poetry on a New Plan, published by Newbery in 1762. By that article of July, 1863, doubtless, many searchers have considered the question as finally settled; just as the writer there states that, since the publication of Lowndes' Bibliographer's Manual in 1834, "our literary antiquaries had comfortably consoled themselves with the idea that the lines appear in the Musarum Deliciæ, and that Sir John Dennis was the author of them." A statement repeated in the new edition of Lowndes. But that certainty of first appearance, or of authorship, was not arrived at in that article, is proved by the following accidental discovery made by me in a bookseller's shop, when turning over the leaves of Ray's History of the Rebellion, printed at Bristol in 1752; at p. 48, occur these lines:—

"He that fights and runs away,
 May turn and fight another day:
 But he that is in battle slain,
 Will never rise to fight again."

Here then, ten years earlier than the first edition of Newbery's publication, we find the sentiment (itself as old as Demosthenes) expressed in four lines almost, but not quite, identical with those given in Newbery's book, which are:

"For he who fights and runs away,
 May live to fight another day:
 But he who is in battle slain,
 Can never rise and fight again."

I do not pretend to decide upon their authorship; but it may be well to remark that, as Goldsmith did not arrive in London until 1756—four years after the date of Ray's book—the improbability of his having been the author is very great.

Whether Ray, quoting the sentiment from Hudibras, unconsciously or purposely altered the words—or whether these words, or others nearly the same, occupy four lines in any unknown edition of Hudibras, or exist in some forgotten book—yet remains a query. Thinking this note may be interesting to your readers, as showing an earlier occurrence of the lines than any recorded in your pages, I add the full title of the book:—

“A Compleat History of the Rebellion, from its rise in 1745, to its total suppression at the Glorious Battle of Culloden in April 1746. By James Ray of Whitehaven. Volunteer under his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland. Bristol: Printed by S. Farley & Comp., 1752.”

A. B. MIDDLETON.

The Close, Salisbury.

KING'S LYNN (3rd S. vii. 399.)—I am sorry I cannot give your correspondent Q. a satisfactory answer respecting the “old book” or a Description of King's Lynn in Norfolk, &c., by Ben Adam, consisting, it is said, of 214 MS. pages in verse.

Both the present obliging Curator of the Norwich Museum, and the respected librarian of the Literary Institute assure me that no such MS. ever existed in the museum. The Catalogue of Seals presented to the Norwich Museum by Richard Taylor, Esq., in which “extracts” from the “old book” are given, is not now in the museum. It is not known what became of this catalogue, which your correspondent seems to have confounded with another distinct catalogue, entitled A Catalogue of the Seals and Ancient Deeds in the Norfolk and Norwich Museum, arranged by Captain J. C. Woollnough, R.N., 1830. This catalogue I have examined, but it contains not a single allusion to the MS. inquired after by Q.

Mr. John Chambers, the author of the work, A General History of the County of Norfolk (8vo, Norwich, 1826), mentions, in vol. i. p. 465, that only thirty pages of the MS. refer to Lynn in particular. Judging from the extract in this work taken from the “old book,” the verses are far from being poetic; but whether the MS. itself is worth any further inquiries being made is very doubtful.

J. DALTON.

Norwich.

Your correspondent Q. states (3rd S. vii. 399), that when he visited Norwich about two years ago, there was then in the Museum A Catalogue of Seals presented to the Norwich Museum by Richard Taylor, Esq., which is referred to by the Editor of A General History of the County of Norfolk, 8vo, Norwich, 1826, vol. i. p. 465, as containing a long extract from an old book, entitled, Lexmæ Rediviva; or, A Description of King's Lynn in Norfolk, &c., by Ben Adam. I beg to say that in this he is in error. The book he saw is “A Catalogue of the Seals and Ancient Deeds in the Norfolk and Norwich Museum, arranged by Capt. J. C. Woollnough, R. N. 1830.” This Catalogue was compiled after the publication of the History of Norfolk, therefore cannot possibly be the one therein referred to. I regret to say that the original Catalogue of the Seals given by Richard Taylor, and which contains the extract in question, is not now in existence in the Norwich Museum, and no person now connected therewith has any knowledge of it—it has not been there during the last twenty years. The “old book” itself, that is the MS. of 214 pages by Ben Adam, was certainly never in the possession of the Museum at any time, and I regret I cannot render any information respecting it, but shall be very glad to learn that it has been heard of from some other source.

J. QUINTON, Assistant Secretary.

Norwich.

CHAINED LIBRARIES IN PARISH VESTRIES (3rd S. vii. 355.)—The vestry of Wimborne minster contains a chained library which now consists of two hundred and forty volumes. Its chains have not saved it from the spoiler, for twenty-five volumes are missing of those which were catalogued in 1765, and many of those which remain have fallen from want of care into a state of decay. From a catalogue prepared in 1863, by “W. G. W.,” it appears that the titles of several of the missing books are such as depredators would be attracted by:—Markham's Way to get Wealth, Period of Human Life; Venner's Via Recta ad Vitam Longam, Way to Health and Long Life, &c. The principal donors to the library are the Rev. T. Ansty (1697), and the Rev. Sam. Conant. Nearly all the books were printed between 1520 and 1710, and there is a MS. dated 1343. Two of the books are in black letter. On the flyleaf of Chamberlayne's State of England (1670) is written in a very neat hand,— “Anglica gens est optima flens et pessima ridens.”

JOB J. B. WORKARD.

NOËL (2nd S. xii. 503.)—Reading again the notice of this word quoted above, it occurs to me to ask whether the explanation given in the editorial note is not fairly susceptible of being carried a step further. If “Noël” was really a cry “used on festive and on solemn occasions as a cry of joy,” may it not be a form of “Nouvelles, Nouvelles,” equivalent to the heralds' cry of “Tidings, Tidings,” by which they were wont to announce their advent? If so, the use of the word at, and its eventual application to, the season when the “herald angels” brought “good tidings of great joy,” would be peculiarly appropriate. E. C. B.

IRISH POOR LAW (3rd S. vii. 10.)—I rather think that in the passage referred to by LORD LYTELTON, Swift is to be understood, not as laying down what the law of Ireland was, but as stating, for the edification of his hearers, what the law of England was. I must admit that, if this was his meaning, it is not very clearly expressed. But it must be borne in mind that it is in a sermon that the passage occurs; and in a more business-like composition of his, The Proposal for giving Badges to Beggars, written in April, 1737, the Dean expresses himself in such a manner as to leave little doubt upon the point:—

"I never heard," he writes, "more than one objection against this expedient of badging the poor, and confining their walks to their several parishes. The objection was this: What shall we do with the foreign beggars? Must they be left to starve? No: but they must be driven or whipped out of town; and let the next country parish do as they please, or rather, after the practice in England, send them from one parish to another, until they reach their own homes. By the old Laws of England still in force, every parish is bound to maintain its own poor."

What makes this quotation the more to the purpose is, that on examination it will be found that the Proposal evidently constituted the basis of the sermon. STAFFORD CAREY.

SURGEON EXECUTED FOR MURDER (3rd S. vii. 112, 170.)—T. B. may be glad to have the following extract from Dr. Trusler's Tablet of Memory, or, Historian's Guide, Dublin, 1782 (p. 10):—

"Andouin, surgeon, executed in Dublin for a murder; of which it appeared, some time after, he was innocent, 1728."

ABHBA.

EPISCOPAL BLAZON (3rd S. vii. 376.)—On the secretum of Henry de Spenser, Bishop of Norwich, the escutcheon is timbred with a helmet, surmounted by a mitre, out of which rises the crest of his house. (He was surnamed "The Warlike," and held the see from 1370 to 1406.)

The shield of the Bishops of Durham was ornamented by a coroneted and plumed mitre, which was sometimes placed upon a helmet.

In Germany crested helmets are very frequently used by archbishops and bishops, especially by those who are temporal seigneurs. The crests of bishoprics and of the seigneuries are thus used, as well as those belonging to the personal arms of their possessor. Indeed the mitre itself is frequently treated as a crest, and is placed on a helmet above the arms.

These facts have probably escaped the notice of those writers who dispute the right of ecclesiastics to use a crest, on the ground that they could not use a helmet to support it. J. WOODWARD.

New-Shoreham.

HORSES FRIGHTENED AT THE SIGHT OF A CAMEL (2nd S. viii. 354, 406; 3rd S. i. 459, 496; v. 387.) I make no doubt the hump-backed culprit of the following is the same that frightened my father-in-law's horse, as described in the last above-quoted page of "N. & Q.":

"DEATH FROM FRIGHT.—The death of a horse from fright has taken place near Bingham, Notts. Edmunds's menagerie left that town at an early hour, en route to Newark, where the annual 'May Fair' is about to be held. One of the caravans is drawn by a camel. This was met by a cart which was coming in the opposite direction, drawn by a horse belonging to Mr. Smith, farmer, of Flintham. The horse caught a sudden view of the strange beast of burden, gave a sort of smothering scream, plunged violently, and dropped down dead."

I have cut the above from the Sheffield Daily Telegraph of the 18th May, 1865. W. LEE.

TATTOO (3rd S. vii. 374.)—The sound of the drum is represented among the Latin races by combinations of the syllables rap, tap, tar, tan. Thus we have, French rat-a-plan; Piedmontese, tan-tan, tar-a-pat-a-pan, ta-rap-a-tan; Ital. para-pata-pan, pata-pata-pan (Zalli, Vocab. Piedm.); Spanish, tap-a-rap-a-tan, tap-a-tán; Ital. tap-pa-tá (Vocab. Milanese). The last of which is manifestly identical with Dutch taptoe, the origin of our tattoo. H. W.

SPUR MONEY IN BELFRIES (3rd S. vii. 324.)—The following lines, in the church of All Saints, Hastings, may prove interesting to Mr. H. FISHWICK and others; showing that, in addition to a fine for ringing the church bells in spurs, a like penalty was imposed for wearing a hat whilst so engaged:—

"This is a belfry that is free,
For all those that civil be;
And if you please to chime or ring,
It is a very pleasant thing.

"There is no musick, played or sung,
Like unto bells when they're well rung.
Then ring your bells well, if you can;
Silence is best for every man.

"But if you ring in spur or hat,
Sixpence you pay, be sure of that:
And if a bell you overthrow,
Pray pay a groat before you go.
1756."

R. H. HILLS.

28, Chancery Lane.

DESCENDANT OF SARSFIELD (3rd S. vii. 378, 409.)—MR. PINKERTON, always courteous and interesting, is right in his surmise. It was General Patrick Sarsfield to whom I alluded. The gentleman of whom I speak, however, claims from a daughter of the general, and not through a niece or grandniece. Had the general a daughter? If so, to whom was she married? S. REDMOND.
Liverpool.

LE POER QUERIES (3rd S. vii. 377.)—An ancient branch of the Le Poer family was settled at an early period at a place called Poer Hayes, afterwards Duke's Hayes, an heiress of the first family, having carried it to the second, and now known as Haye's Farm, in the parish of Budleigh, co. Devon. It is here that Sir Walter Rawley was born. It now belongs, by purchase, to the representatives of the late Lord Rolle. In his Memoricon of the Diocese of Exeter, p. 248, the late Dr. Oliver remarks:—

"This family was of Breton origin, assuming the name of a place in Cornouaille, which became a Vicomte. The name was formally spelt (according to Maurice, Bretagne, Preuves, vol. i. passim) Poukaer, Pochaer, &c., probably a slight variation from Polcaer, in which form we should have no difficulty in discerning a Celtic origin."

According to a pedigree furnished me by the eldest representative of this family, the descent ran thus:—Sir Bartolemy Le Poer, Sir Roger, Sir Roger, Sir John, Sir Roger, Cecilia, d. and co-heiress, who carried Poer Hayes to her husband John Duke, of the adjoining parish of Otterton, circa, 1380. From them succeeded Richard Duke, Richard, Richard, (sheriff 1562), Henry (nephew of Richard), John, Richard, (see brass in Otterton Church), Richard (sheriff 1678), Robert (other brass), Thomas, George, of whom only two children, daughters, left issue, namely, Elizabeth, who m. Yonge, of Puslinch, near Yealmton, co. Dev., and Frances, who m. Taylor, whose d. married Coleridge of Ottery.

Sir William Pole, in his Collections, p. 153, speaks of Poer Hayes, and gives the descent, as thus:—

"Poerhayes (now Dukeshayes). This hath always continued in the name of Poer and Duke. Bartholemew Le Poer held it in King Henry 2^d tyme, whom have succeeded lineally Roger, Roger, John, John, and Roger Poer, whose daughter Cicely was married unto Richard Duke [my version says John], a citizen of Exeter, and continued in his line unto George Duke, who sold it unto his kinsman, Mr. Richard Duke of Otterton, about the latter end of King Henry 8th, who Richard was sonne of Henry Duke, sonne of Richard Duke; and also father of the said George. It is now [circa 1630] the inheritance of Richard Duke, of Otterton, Esquier, sonne of Richard, nephew of Richard the purchaser."

I may remark that these statements of Sir William relative to the Duke family, are a mass of confusion. My version of the Le Poers tallies with his, except that where I give one John, he gives two. I have seen several charters in the Cartulary of Otterton Priory in which the name occurs. It is there spelt Poher. With respect to coat armour, Le Poer bore — Party per pale wavy, or and azure. There is a shield on the front of the house immediately on the north side of Otterton church, on which appear the arms of Duke and Le Poer, quartered, thus—for Duke 1 and 4, per fess, argent and azure, 3 chaplets counterchanged; 2 and 3, for Le Poer, per pale wavy, or and azure.

P. HUTCHINSON.

CARABOO (3rd S. vii. 408.)—This lady seems to keep up her interest, so I send a squib which was handed about in Somersetshire after her detection. It is well enough for a local and temporary satire, written while the points were fresh. I know it to be by H. C. S., whose initials will be enough for many. The best claim to publication is its preserving what I well remember was a very common impression at the time, namely, that when the woman walked into a house saying nothing but "Caraboo," she did not know what she was to do next, and acted on the hints which, she pretending not to know English, were plentifully thrown in her way. Some part of it would have been much better done but for the attempt at parallel which parody requires; but Lochinvar was then in every one's mouth.

"CARABOO (1815).

"Oh! young Caraboo is come out of the West,
In Frenchified tatters the damsel is drest;
And, save one pair of worsted, she stockings had none,
She tramped half unshod, and she walked all alone:
But how to bamboozle the doxy well knew;
You ne'er heard of gypsey like young Caraboo.

"She staid not for river, she stopt not for stone,
She swam in the Avon where ford there was none;
But when she alighted at W—— gate,
The dame and the doctor received her in state.
No longer a gypsey, the club of bas-bleu
To a princess converted the young Caraboo.

"So boldly she entered the W—— hall,
Amongst linguists, skull-feelers, bluestockings and all;
Then spake the sage doctor, profoundly absurd,
While the sly Caraboo answered never a word:
'Art thou sprung from the Moon, or from far Javassoo,
Or a mermaid just landed, thou bright Caraboo?'

"To these questions sagacious she answer denied,
Though hard was the struggle her laughter to hide:
'But since they decree me these titles so fine,
I'll be silent, eat curry, and taste not their wine;
With this imposition I've nothing to do,
These are fools ready made,' said the young Caraboo.

"She looked at a pigeon—the dame caught it up;
Caraboo had a mind on a pigeon to sup:
She looked down to titter—she looked up so sly—
With the bird in her hand, and the spit in her eye:
She dressed it—she ate it—she called it Rampoo,
'This proves,' swore the doctor, 'she's Queen Caraboo.

"When she fenced with the doctor, so queer her grimace,
Sure never a hall such a galliard did grace:
But her host seemed to fret—though the Doctor did fume,

Should any to question her titles presume.
And 'twas currently whispered the best they could do,
Was to send up to London the young Caraboo.

"The hint was enough;—as it dropt on her ear,
It ruined her hopes; it awakened her fear:
So swift to the quay the fair damsel she ran,
'Oh! take me, dear Captain, away if you can,
She's aboard—they are off; 'Farewell Doctor Rampoo!
They'll have swift ships that follow,' quoth young Caraboo.

"There was bustling 'mong dames of the W—— clan,
The blue stocking unto they rode and they ran,
There was racing and chasing from Bath to the sea,
But the bright Queen of Javassoo ne'er could they see.
What a hoax on the doctor and club of bas-bleu,
Did you e'er hear of gypsey like young Caraboo?"

M.

YOUR SOUL (3rd S. v. 378.)—The quotation is from A Churchman's Second Epistle, by the author of Religio Clerici, London, 1819, 8vo, pp. 85. From the reply to a query of mine (1st S. v. 29, 161), I much wished to read Religio Clerici, but failed in my attempt to buy or borrow a copy, and could not find one in the British Museum. I lately had the good luck to come upon a volume of pamphlets containing both "Epistles," with which I have been much pleased. They are not exactly poetry, but good sense and good taste in very fair verse. As nearly fifty years have passed since the publication of the first epistle, I do not think it intrusive to ask for the author's name if known.* Pamphlets, even when they have gone through several editions, are very difficult to procure when a few years out of print, so perhaps the description of a popular preacher of 1819 may be worth insertion:—

"Lo! now the Preacher, first with due grimace,
A long-protracted reverence hides his face;
Deep on the cushion sinks his buried chin,
His cheeks are lost, a handkerchief within.
Next draws he forth a strange impromptu prayer,
Conned well at home, and writ with special care:
Some now and then may use a book or note,
More Evangelic he who learns by rote.
Then comes the text in two divisions cleft,
This edifies his right hand, that his left:
His doctrines so by turns suit every state,
And catch the little vulgar, or the great.
Here he propounds the wounded spirit's stytic,
In terms obscure and phrase apocalyptic:
Huge, burly language, words too big for rhyme,
And windy mouthings of the false sublime;
Where in the dark his misty meaning gropes,
Half smothered by a tympany of tropes.
Soon as this works his tone is changed again,
And slides adroitly to another strain;
A pert, familiar, brisk, and easy chat,
Mere Gospel gossip about this and that;
As if instead of 'How d'ye do?' he'd say,
'Sweet Sir, or Madam, how's your soul to-day?'
If fitting action could our ears engage
No squirrel bustles blither in his cage;
When he quotes Scripture, loose the cambric flies,
His arms expanded, lifted are his eyes;
One long forefinger, like an index shews
Some fine-spun argument is near its close;
And two, when struck upon the cushion tell,
The word that follows must be Heaven or Hell."

(Li. 204, 235, p. 25-29.)

H. B. C.

U. U. Club.

THE COURT, 1730 (3rd S. vii. 356).—I, like your correspondent P., have had in hand the investigation of a case of propinquity, wherein the discovery of the evidence of the birth of a child, at about the same date as that he mentions, was desirable. In my case, the Gentleman's Magazine supplied the "missing link," the parish register being then unknown. In the reign of the first two Georges, "contraband" and runaway marriages were frequent, and probably the registration of births was irregular; and hence the perplexity experienced in the pursuit of genealogical enquiries relating to that period. In the instance to which I refer, the daughter of a nobleman is stated to have "died young," when the truth was, she lived to be the mother of a large family. She was, however, suppressed in the Peerages. From my examination of such works, I have come to the conclusion that they are, as a class, characterised by the suppressio veri and the suggestio falsi to a very large extent. They insert what is convenient, not what is true.

[* These pamphlets are by the Rev. Edward Smedley, M.A., an able scholar and learned divine. He was admitted at Westminster school 1800; graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge; elected Fellow of Sidney; gained four of the Seatonian prizes for English poems, made prebendary of Lincoln 1829; and died June 29, 1836. He was editor of the Encyclopædia Metropolitana. A Memoir of him, prefixed to his Poems and Correspondence, was published in 1837, 8vo. Both the pamphlets noticed above are in the British Museum, entered in the new Catalogue under "Churchman."—Ed.]

If your correspondent thinks I can be of service to him, I forward my address for private communication.

GENEALOGIOUS.

"THE CHRISTIAN BREADBASKET" (3rd S. vii. 350, 359).—MR. WILLEY does not seem to be aware that the monthly of this name was incorporated with The Rays of Light, the property of Messrs. Adams & Gee, and published by Stephenson, I think. The Rays was originally a monthly sheet, after the manner of the Band of Hope Review, with these differences, that it was smaller and not illustrated. When the much-abused Breadbasket was declining, it was purchased by the proprietors of the Rays of Light, and the two together assumed the latter name and the shape and characteristics of the former. But a no better fate befell the incorporation. Its circulation, influence, and literary claim grew small by degrees, so that at the immature age of sixteen months it suddenly collapsed.

T. P. SKINNER.

Islington.

THE CHARTERS OF HOLYROOD (3rd S. vii. 375.) As the quotations given by T. G. S. seem still to leave it a little doubtful whether Herbergare is the infinitive of a verb, or the proper name of the Canongate, I quote as follows from the Cartulary of Coldingham as referred to by Sir David Dalrymple (Lord Hailes) in his Annals, vol. i. 97:—

"The true sense of the word is to be seen in a Grant by Malcolm IV. to the Prior and Monks of Coldingham: 'Ut secundum voluntatem suam adducant suos proprios homines ubicunque maneat in terra sua ad herbergandum Villam de Coldingham.'"

This, it is presumed, must put an end to further question.

G.

Edinburgh.

WHO WAS PHILALETHES (3rd S. vii. 220, 328.) MR. J. COLEMAN does not claim the above pseudonym as the exclusive designation of the Rev. Thomas Stackhouse; but as the matter now stands, it might be inferred, that to him there is some speciality in the appropriation. It is for the credit of "N. & Q." to say, that the same signature was used in newspapers by Dr. Edward Young, 1718-20; Gabriel Gerberon, On the Jesuits, 1680; Chas. Lealie, View of the Times, 1708; Arthur Ashley Sykes, Moral Philosophy, 1715; T. Morgan on the same, 1738; R. Bentley, On Mathematics, 1735; A Gentleman in the Navy, On Gibraltar, 1725; Nathl. Lardner, Biblical Criticism; Sir R. Hill, 1770; C. Fleming, On Church Establishment, 1767; Wm. Goode, On the Church, 1834; Sir R. J. W. Horton, On Colonies, 1839; and appears in some hundred works altogether, on almost all subjects, during the last two hundred years. W. LEE.

SASH WINDOWS (2nd S. vi. * 147, 175.)—Your esteemed correspondent A. A. proves the use of this word as apparently rare in May, 1710. A reply to his note, suggested that the term was derived from the Old English word sasse, a sluice; and sas, the Dutch, also for a sluice; the common French term for such a window being à la guillotine. The following note is, I venture to suggest, a very little, if at all known, assertion of the introduction of the window into France from England, and opens the question whether the invention was a Dutch or German one, and brought over with paint for house work, and sundry other building inventions, by the Dutch with William III.:—

"De Lorge: We had the good fortune here to find the Marshal himself. He showed us his great Sash Windows; how easily they might be lifted up and down, and stood at any height; which contrivance, he said, he had out of England, by a small model brought on purpose from thence; there being nothing of this poise in windows in France before; the house was but building" and was situate near Montmartre.—Lister, Journey to Paris, 8vo, London, 1699.

WYATT PAPWORTH.

BISHOP BEDELL: HOUSES IN PILL LANE, DUBLIN (3rd S. vii. 398.)—Will the following be of any use to the REV. MR. IRVINE in reference to the above? On the east side of Pill Lane, near the back entrance to the Four Courts, Dublin, there were some houses occupied as warehouses by Mr. S. Gatehill, an extensive hardware merchant and ironmonger, and these houses were there as late as 1845 (I know not if they have since been pulled down). These buildings were evidently old, and on a stone near the top of the front wall of four of these buildings was cut a monogram, in relief, which consisted of G. B., and the dates 1691 and 1712; two houses having the first date, and two others the latter. The houses may be standing still. S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

MAY-DAY SONGS (3rd S. vii. 373, 425.)—Being lately on a visit near the town of Bourton-on-the-Hill, co. Gloucester, I remarked how extensively the observance of May-day is still carried on in that neighbourhood. The children, dressed out with flowers and ribbons, go from house to house, each party carrying a doll, seated in a sort of cage composed of flowers. Their song is in the following words:—

"Round the May-pole,
Trit trit trot,
See what a May-pole
We have got.
Fine and gay,
Trip away,
Happy is our new May-day.
"Gentlemen and ladies,
I wish you happy May,
We come to show the garland,
For 't is the first of May."

G.

WILLIAM PENNOCK (3rd S. vii. 419.)—A complete pedigree of the Pinnock (not Pennock) family will appear in a forthcoming volume on the Monumental Inscriptions of Jamaica. SPAL.

DRAGON IN HERALDRY (3rd S. vii. 418.)—The dragon is, I believe, supposed to be emblematical of wisdom or astuteness in heraldry; but this is probably an invention for want of something better to say on the subject. It is very likely that the dragon's head was simply a convenient finish for a seal, and so became a crest, and that his wonderful attributes were found in his trail by the more modern possessors of such relics. SPAL.

SAMUEL HARTLIB (3rd S. vii. 398.)—The name of Mr. Hartlib appears occasionally in the State Papers, and DR. RIMBAULT may like to have the following references to the Calendars in which it occurs.

In Mr. Bruce's volume for 1633-1634 he is mentioned five times (pp. 2, 17, 31, 68, 149); the first four in letters from John Durie to Sir Thomas Roe, and the last from Sir Thomas to the Archbishop of Canterbury, on which there is a marginal note—"Mr. Hartlib, a Prussian." They are all dated between April 2 and July 20, 1633, and have reference to negotiations with Chancellor Oxenstiern in Sweden regarding the Reformed churches.

In Mr. Bruce's volume for 1634-1635 Mr. Durie refers to him in two letters dated June 22 and 28 (pp. 89, 96) on the same subject.

In Mrs. Green's volume for 1661-1662 there is a letter from Sam. Hartlib to [Sec. Nicholas] in p. 336, relative to a warrant for 1000*l.* to Robert Shaw for special services; and a memorandum in p. 602 that he had received a letter to Sir Humphrey Hooke about destroying tobacco in Gloucestershire, and apprehending the rioters there. They are severally dated April 9 and Dec. 24, 1662. In Mrs. Green's next volume, under date 1663, there is a note (p. 412) as to Mr. Hartlib's desiring some warrants for French wines to be retained. D. S.

* Not v. as in the General Index.

THE LINCOLNSHIRE CHURCH-NOTES OF GERVASE HOLLES (3rd S. vii. 350, 380, 407.)—Many of these notes, not hitherto published, have appeared since January, 1864, in the Stamford Mercury from MSS. (copied from the original in the British Museum) in the possession of Mr. G. A. Hansard, 33, Kenton Street, Brunswick Square, London. STAMFORDIENSIS.

COSHERING (3rd S. vii. 391.)—MR. O'CAVANAGH, I think, has answered his own note and query both learnedly and elaborately. "Coshering" is universally known in the country parts of Ireland to apply to little tea-parties amongst farmers' wives, from which men are rigidly excluded. Such parties are most frequent about the close of harvest time, and any one who has lived in a rural district of Ireland, about the time mentioned, must have heard of "coshering parties."

S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

Annales Monastici. Vol. II. Annales Monasterii de Wintonia (A.D. 519—1277). Annales Monasterii de Waverleia (A.D. 1—1291). Edited by Henry Richard Luard, M.A. (Longman.)

Mr. Luard is carrying on the good work entrusted him by the Master of the Rolls in a most satisfactory manner. The present volume contains the Annals written in the Monasteries of Winchester and Waverley: portions of which have indeed been previously published, but which now appear for the first time in their integrity. The Annals of Winchester, which are carried down to the year 1277, are printed from the Cotton MS., Domit. A. XIII.; and, as relating the events which chiefly concern Winchester, the city and the cathedral, and the changes in the cathedral and monasteries, it is especially valuable. The Annalist, by-the-bye, mentions a remarkable prophecy of the death of Richard I., said to have been current among the Norman girls some time previous to that event:—

"In Limozin sagitta fabricatur, Qua tyrannus mortis dabitur."

The Annals of Waverley, here reprinted from the only known MS. (Cotton Vespasian, A. XVI.), are carried down to the year 1291; and the editor shows that, well as these Annals have been known through Gale's edition, and frequent as are the references to them, the full amount of historical information to be found in them has by no means been drawn out. It will not be the fault of the present learned editor, if this can much longer be urged with justice against this valuable document.

The Herald and Genealogist. Edited by J. Gough Nichols, F.S.A. Part XII. (Nichols.)

This new Part—full of interest to heraldic and genealogical inquirers—contains two papers which are of especial interest just now: "Anglo-American Genealogy—North and South," and "Popular Genealogists, or the Art of Pedigree Making."

Messrs. Longman's MONTHLY LIST furnishes strong evidence of the approach of the Holiday Season in the announcement of a new Map of the Chain of Mont Blanc, a new Map of Switzerland, on a scale of four miles to an inch, and A Guide to Spain, by Mr. O'Shea. The same publishers announce also, a third edition of Earl Russell's Essay on the History of the English Government and Constitution; of a second edition, with the omission of the controversial part, of Dr. Newman's History of my Religious Opinions; and also, of what we are very glad to see, a People's Edition of Mr. Maguire's Life of Father Mathew.

MESSRS. GROOMBRIDGE announce also a seasonable book, Sea Fishing as a Sport; being an account of the various kinds of Sea Fish; How, When, and Where to Catch them in their Seasons and Localities. By Lambton J. H. Young.

EXHIBITION OF PORTRAIT MINIATURES AT SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.—All lovers of Art, students of History, and admirers of the Beautiful—will be delighted with the matchless collection of Portrait Miniatures now assembled at South Kensington, and which will be opened to the public this day. Those who remember what a striking feature the Miniatures formed, in the Loan Exhibition of last Year, will readily imagine what a treat is in store for them, when we tell them that the present Collection amounts to upwards of three thousand Miniatures from the time of Holbein to our own day, and will judge of the value as well as the extent of the Collection, when we add that among them will be found upwards of one hundred undoubtedly genuine specimens of Petitot's matchless skill. Horace Walpole would have been beside himself with delight at such a sight as may now be seen at South Kensington, where, by-the-bye, almost all the fine Strawberry Hill Miniatures may now be seen once more assembled together.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Particulars of price, &c., of the following book to be sent direct to the gentlemen by whom it is required, and whose names and address are given for that purpose:—

COLLEBROOK'S DICTIONARY OF HINDOO LAW. 8vo. Vol. I.

Wanted by Messrs. Willis & Sotherton, 125, Strand.

Notices to Correspondents.

11. A. B. 1. The charade has already appeared without eliciting any satisfactory reply. 2. We are not aware that any peculiar facilities are to be obtained at the Legacy Office, Somerset House, for literary researches. 3. Advertisements 6d. per line, two guineas a column. 4. The genealogical queries shall be inserted.

L. F. H. Thomas Harley was the ancestor of Harley, Earl of Oxford. See Collins's Peerage (by Bridges), vol. iii. pp. 55, et seq.

SCOTTON'S query is our next, with any information we can obtain.

M. M. The Royal Academy generally closes at the end of June.

GRONOVIIUS. For the special edition of synopses or didones, see

"N. & Q." 2nd S. v. 34, 65, 81, 163.

J. G. (Ipewich.) For the origin of the term Roundhead, see our 2nd S. ii. 450.

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 6d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for SEVEN YEARS for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 11s. 4d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. BROWN, 25, WELLINGTON SQUARE, STRAND, W.C., where also all Communications for this Edition should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

DR. LOCOCK'S EXCELSIOR WAFERS are the most safe and certain remedy for all bilious affections, heartburn, sick headache, flatulency, pains in the stomach, flatulency or wind, constipation, and all those complaints which arise from indigestion or biliousness. It acts promptly, tastes delightfully, and requires no restraint in diet or habits. Price 1s. 12d., 6s. 6d., and 4s. 6d. per box. Sold by all Medicine Vendors, of whom also may be had DR. LOCOCK'S PULMONARY WAFERS, for asthma, consumption, coughs, and all disorders of the lungs.—BROWN & CO., 25, WELLINGTON SQUARE.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 180.

NOTES :—Restoration of Monuments, 451—Shakspeariana: New Shakspeare Emendation—Passage from "Macbeth"—Passage in "Othello," 452—Degeneration of Words, 453—Napoleon I. as an Author and a Student, 454—The Search for the Lepis in 1865, ib.—A General Literary Index: Index of Authors, 455—Dante and Heraldry—Origin of Godfrey's Cordial—Sir Henry Baeburn—A Coincidence—The Great Bell of Westminster—Shoeing the Goose—The French and Scottish Languages—Justices' Grammar, 457.

QUERIES :—Exhibition of Portrait Miniatures, South Kensington Museum, 458—Abraham's Conversion—Beest—"Bibliophobia"—Bunyan Dramatised—Cock's Feather—The Rev. John Daniel Cotton—Episcopal Rings—Family Names lost—Rev. Edward Ford, F.T.C.D.—Infant-mortality, or Infantile Mortality?—Influenza—In two Places at once like a Bird—William Itchener, D.D.—"Liber Pamelicus"—Milton—Nettles Proofs of Habitation—Oath of the Romans, &c., 458.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS :—George Chapman—Electric Telegraph foreshadowed—Frisians—Nursery Rhyme, 461.

REPLIES :—Savannah, 462—Shelves in Wiltshire, 463—The Origin of Smithfield Market, ib.—The Exodus of the Israelites, 464—"Bonnie Dundee"—"That's the Cheese"—St. Agnes and her Lamb—Scarlett Family—Bear's Den Hall—Travelling Scotchmen—Bishop Lindwood—Toasts—Meaning of Arbery—"Complaynt" of Sir David Lindsay—Dragon—Cary Family: Bishopric of Killaloe—Hag's Prayer—Roman Hand—Theodolite—The Duke of Brunswick's "Fifty Reasons," &c., 465.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

RESTORATION OF MONUMENTS.

I wish to record in the pages of "N. & Q." the "restoration" (1) of an early monument, as such a process is conducted in the year 1865, the subject being a work of not quite five centuries earlier—of the year 1377, that is, or of the year following.

In Murray's Hand-Book of Exeter Cathedral (p. 158), the author writes as follows:—

"On the south side of the nave, (beneath the sixth pier-arch from the west end,) is the high tomb, with much mutilated effigies of Hugh Courtenay (died 1377), second Earl of Devon of the house of Courtenay, and of his Countess Margaret (died 1391), daughter of Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford and Essex, by Elizabeth, daughter of Edward I. On the pavement beside this monument is the brass, still interesting, and once very fine, of their son Sir Peter Courtenay (died 1406), standard-bearer to Edward III., and distinguished in the French and Spanish wars under the Black Prince. These tombs were formerly inclosed within a chantry."

The chantry in question has totally disappeared. The brass (since the foregoing passage was written about five years ago) now lies in the pavement of the south aisle of the choir, where certainly it is more out of harm's way. The "high tomb" also has been removed; that is, the original tomb of the Earl of Devon, whose countess was a granddaughter of Edward I., has been taken away from its original site; and, as it was indeed "much mutilated," a new structure is to represent it in the south transept. Upon this new structure, which I suppose will claim to be considered a "restoration" of the original monument, rest the "restored" effigies of the earl and countess. No traces do they now exhibit of their "much mutilated" condition in 1861. Both effigies are as fresh as if they had been ordered within the last six months at the most enterprising establishment in the New Road. Still these are not to be considered new effigies, for they have been formed from the original stone. Skilful chisels have cut away every vestige of the mutilations, and a judicious process of cutting down has brought out fresh effigies from beneath the dishonouring ravages of time and barbarism. To be sure, not a vestige remains of what the widowed countess placed within a chantry to the memory of her lord: so thoroughly are the effigies "restored," that the "chiselmanship" of to-day has superseded every touch of the sculptor of that dark period, the thirteenth century.

Without a doubt, this "restored" memorial will claim the date of the original monument itself, A.D. 1377, and not 1865. This is indeed quite a typical achievement of a thorough "restorer." What the originals perhaps might have been, has been reproduced with most pains-taking fidelity, while whatever lingering traces of the actual originals yet remained have been no less faithfully obliterated. Centuries will leave their marks on the hardest stones, and their capacity for mischief no one will refuse to concede to Puritans et id genus omne: all their doings, however, sink into insignificance when compared with the cool and ruthless destructiveness of a genuine "restorer."

By all means let faithfully studied copies of fine old monumental memorials be executed by able hands, at the cost of the living inheritors of the noble names of long past ages, or by whoever may please to commission them, whether to amateur or to professional sculptors. But I must plead for the jealous preservation of the original memorials themselves. They are chisel-written chronicles of the England of our ancestors, which we received from them in trust that they may be transmitted by us to our successors. We have no right to tamper with early historical monuments; we have no right to destroy them; least of all have we any right to work our destructive will upon them under the plea and pretence of "restoration."

However grievous the mutilation of the original Courtenay monument with its effigies, those relics were valuable in themselves, and possessed the strongest claims for respectful care. This "restoration" has destroyed them; and, in their stead, Exeter Cathedral has to submit to the degradation of containing a sham monument, and two effigial parodies.

I would conclude with the queries, How was it possible that such a thing as this could have been perpetrated? and why is this "restoration" permitted to remain in one of our cathedrals?—did I not prefer to express the hope that the existence of such a warning as this in such a position as the centre of the south transept at Exeter, may be effectually instrumental in saving our other "much mutilated" memorials from sharing in the destructive "restoration," which has fallen upon the once noble monument of Hugh Courtenay, Earl of Devon, and Margaret de Bohun his Countess.

CHARLES BOUTELL.

Shakspeariana.

NEW SHAKSPEARE EMENDATION.

(3rd S. vii. 315, 360.)

A word or two in reply to MR. HERAUD. The question as to the value of his new reading of the line (Julius Cæsar, Act II. Sc. 1):—

"For if thou pall thy native semblance o'er,"— seems to narrow itself into this: To what does the phrase "native semblance" apply? MR. HERAUD says it is to the conspirators, and he regards both Coleridge and myself as "mistaking the meaning" of the poet in declining to recognise the prosopopeia, which to his mind is so self-evident.

Now I am not prepared to deny that, by MR. HERAUD's genetic process, we get sense. His view of "native semblance" paves the way for his emendation, and the two in conjunction render the passage intelligible. But it is one of the first canons of Shakspearean criticism as regards amendments that, where we have a meaning, it is not permissible to alter the text so as to get the meaning we fancy we ought to have. This rule is most wholesome in practice; and, I think, applies to the case before us.

The text as it stands yields a meaning, and could one sanction the use of "path" as an adjective, there would be no occasion to disturb it. All that is wanted then is, either a precedent for this special use of "path," or an equivalent for it if so used. But MR. HERAUD asks us to take a bolder course. We are to admit two new words into the text; and to do so with a view of giving a special reading, not only to one line, but to the whole passage in which it occurs. I think I do not go too far in stating this.

Let us see. The poet means to say, we are told:—

"That the true mode of concealment is to let their (the conspirators') naked faces (their 'native semblance') be seen, and only to 'hide' the monstrous visage of conspiracy in 'smiles and affability.'"

Now, here is clearly a meaning, and a very ingenious one; but was it Shakspeare's? To induce us to believe that it was, we are asked to accept the poetic idealisation in which Brutus indulges, "as a slight elevation of the style and not intended for a perfect figure." But why? There is no necessity for us to take this view of the matter—except in order to meet MR. HERAUD's theory. In the text as it stands, the figure is perfect. Apostrophising the abstract Conspiracy, as idealised in his own mind, Brutus follows out a train of ideas (suggested by the words just addressed to him it is true), to a natural and perfect conclusion.

Of this soliloquy, which is in perfect keeping throughout, I have given a paraphrase; but a somewhat ampler one will bring out its proportions more clearly:—

"O Conspiracy! Dost thou fear to show thy brow by night? O then, by day, where wilt thou find a cavern dark enough to hide its monstrosity in? Seek none, but hide it in smiles and affability: for failing to do this, no cavern—not even Erebus itself—were dim enough to hide thee."

Surely here is a "perfect figure," as perfect as it is possible for it to be. And what are we asked to do with it, in order to afford scope for the new reading? Why, we are to suppose that Brutus first addresses the abstract Conspiracy; but that after "monstrous visage," though he still uses the word "conspiracy," he means "conspirators;" and clumsily deserts to the prosopopeia in the middle of his soliloquy without the slightest possible reason for so doing.

I cannot myself consent to believe that the poet intended to do this; and, therefore, cannot yield assent to MR. HERAUD's new reading, nor to his position that it does not materially alter the sense of the passage in which the line in dispute occurs.

WILLIAM SAWYER.

Clements' Inn.

PASSAGE FROM "MACBETH" (3rd S. vii. 51, 176, 266, 316.)—The statement that blonket means directly a thunder-cloud must be admitted to be probably an error, as, after much search, no confirmation of that sense can at present be found.

Blonket, blonquet, or blunket, adj. (obsolete) meaning grey or pale blue, appears in many dictionaries, the earliest notice of the word being in 1617. It is spelt blunket in Phillips's Dictionary, 1696; blonket is in Bailey, 1735, but not in subsequent editions. It is in the first edition of Johnson, and is continued through a number of more recent dictionaries.

In Spenser's Shepherd's Kal. May, v. 5, is—

"Our blonquet livery's been all too sad
For thilke same season."

"I have not met the word elsewhere than in Spenser." Nares's Glossary.

If it be taken as an emendation of the text, it will become a substantive.

"Cibber, in his Lives of the Poets (that of Davenant), reminds us that in Shakspeare's time blanket was a good and local image in the theatre. There being then no painted scenery, a blanket was used as the curtain."—Nares.

In old fashioned theatres there was a slit-hole in the curtain for the manager to peep through, to watch the entrance of the audience. In former times similar images were not unusual. There is an analogous expression in Drayton —

"The sullen night in misty rug is wrapt."

The checked blanket on the table of the Court of Exchequer has always been considered a stately appliance. B. T.

New Club, Edinburgh.

PASSAGE IN "OTHELLO," ACT I. SC. 1.—

"For-sooth, a great Arithmatician,
One Michael Cassio, a Florentine
(A Fellow almost damn'd in a faire Wife),
That neuer set a Squadron in the Field,
Nor the denision of a Battaille knows
More then a Spinster"

Tyrwhitt, "faire life;" Dyce (few remarks), and Grant White, "fair wise;" Sidney Walker, as Tyrwhitt, "life." "Wise" in the sense of "way" occurs only once in Shakspeare (Pericles, Act V. Sc. 2); but if it were used twenty times I should not understand what it could mean here. It is nearly as unintelligible as "a fair life"—the life of a man, "of whom all men speak well!"

What has the "fair life" to do with the Arithmetician, with the Florentine, and with the man, who never set squadron in the field?

Iago intends to say that Othello has made a very bad choice in making a man his lieutenant, who is no man, who has only to do with theories, who never has met with a shower of bullets, who knows the division of a battle just so as a spinster does; in short—

"A fellow, almost damn'd in a faint wife."

F. A. LEO.

Berlin.

DEGENERATION OF WORDS.

It is in the nature of things that words should degenerate. Words, like any other implements, wear off their edges by much using. The more popular the word the oftener it passes the lips and the quill-tips of common-place talkers and writers; and therefore the more quickly it vulgarises itself down to its lowest and most limited representative value. The scruples about calling a spade a spade, and the delicacies of allusive euphemism are mere offshoots from this radical tendency in words to blunt themselves by coarse application. Reek and stench have gone to the bad mainly, if not only, because they have been more used than odour and perfume, of which they are originally synonyms. A smell has rather the disadvantage than the benefit of a doubt whether it be sweet or unsavory. Scent is pretty fairly balanced between sport and perfumery.

"Pretty" "fair"! Here are two words still in a transition state, though they have been rather slow travellers on the downward slant. Fair once meant beautiful: it now means tolerable, average, impartial. Pretty is not near so ancient a word in our language, but it has seen changes, and is visibly declining in value. Peart (probably a corruption of peritus, accomplished), is still provincially used in its original sense; a "peart" workman implies none of the bumptious self-sufficiency which attaches to the degenerate "pert."

"I am peartly" means I am in thoroughly ship-shape condition as to my corporeal vessel. Pretty is said to be the corruption of peartly, and probably meant very much the same thing. A "pretty fellow," before the phrase became ironical, no doubt implied an accomplished member of society.

A pretty woman does not mean so much as it did. The word "pretty" expresses the minor and more insignificant grades of good looks in woman, as the word "clever" does of ability in men. It is a bad compliment to a really beautiful woman to call her pretty, just as it is derogatory to a really able statesman to call him clever. In America the word clever had degenerated to mean merely good humoured. For our clever they use "smart," and for our able, "talented."

It is very difficult to invent new words, and their tendency to sink implies a power in words, so sinking, to displace material from the lower levels of language; and this naturally accounts for the rise of slang and obsolete terms. "Swell" and "prig" from meaning respectively a shabby and gorgeously attired thief have come colloquially to signify, without any imputation of dishonesty, persons distinguished by education and fashion from more ignorant and vulgar specimens of a low intellectual grade.

Political and theological denomination rise rapidly, and cannot be expected to wear well. A Puseyite is nearly as obsolete as a Lollard; Whig and Tory are but little less palaeontological than Cavalier and Roundhead; Liberal and Conservative have run their hues and cries into a neutral tint and a var ambigua. The head of the subtle race of Gladstone a few weeks back wished to give over even the perennially brazen word "Reformer" to a reprobate mind. But surely his substitute "Improver" was both weaker and more pretentious. Considering the proclivity of institutions as well as terms to warp themselves, by corrupt uses, out of their original shapes and intentions, Reform (in the sense of restoration to original meaning and purpose) is not inconsistent with the true spirit of intelligent Conservatism. What should we think of a surgeon, however his patients might be encumbered with wens and undermined with ulcers, who should style himself "an improver of the human body"?

A CONSERVATIVE REFORMER.

NAPOLEON I. AS AN AUTHOR AND A STUDENT.

The present Emperor Napoleon III. is the author of several works. Can you inform me, if there be extant any list of works composed by Napoleon I.? I have somewhere read that, as early as 1791, Napoleon published a pamphlet entitled Lettre à Matteo Buttafuoco. It was written in Corsica, but printed at Dôle. I believe he also wrote a brief History of Corsica, published about the year 1790. There are two French writers whose works I have seen quoted on this subject, viz.: (1) Nasica, Mémoires sur la Jeunesse de Napoléon; (2) M. Libri, Souvenirs de la Jeunesse de Napoléon.

Napoleon, before he left France for Egypt, drew up with his own hand a plan for a Travelling Library. It consisted of about three hundred and sixty volumes; more than half of which are historical, and nearly all in French. The ancient historians, comprised in the list, are: Thucydides, Plutarch, Polybius, Arrian, Tacitus, Livy, and Justinian. The poets are: Homer, Virgil, Tasso, Ariosto, Fenelon's Télémaque, Voltaire's Henriade, Ossian, and La Fontaine. Amongst the works of prose fiction are, English Novelists in Forty Volumes. These were, of course, translations. The list includes likewise the Bible, together with the Koran and the Vedas! (Correspondance de Napoléon I^{er}, iv. 37—38. See also Edwards' Libraries and Founders of Libraries, p. 130, London, 1864.)

A literary anecdote connected with Napoleon, while he resided in the island of Elba, is mentioned by Mr. Edward Edwards in the work mentioned above (p. 136). The story is worth quoting. It is this:—On one occasion, when Napoleon was speaking to Colonel Campbell about the battle of Austerlitz, he said "that a particular disposition of his artillery, which had a decisive effect in winning the battle, was suggested to his mind by the recollection of these lines in Milton's Paradise Lost (book vi.):—

In hollow cube
Training his devilish engin'ry, impal'd
On every side with shadowing squadrons deep
To hide the fraud."

It may be as well to mention, that Mr. Edwards tells us he has no better authority for the story than a MS. note on the fly-leaf of a copy of Symon's Life of Milton, signed by some unknown "J. Brown."^{*}
Norwich. J. DALTON.

^{*} Mr. Edwards has quoted this anecdote from "N. & Q." 1st S. xii. 361, where will be found some detailed particulars of the volume containing the MS. note.—ED.]

THE SEARCH FOR THE LAPIS IN 1865.

Let those who believe that the hope of transmuting the baser metals into gold expired with the last century, shrinking from the glare of light which in this boasted age dispels all idle dreams, read the following advertisement which appeared in the Times of April 4th, 1865:—

"TO STUDENTS IN ALCHEMY.—Any gentleman who may require an Assistant can be recommended to an industrious foreigner, who has studied the books of the Alchymists for the last 15 years, and is a good experimentalist. He is now in Transylvania, but every information will be given by applying to Chas. F. Zimpel, M.D. 182, Marylebone-road."

Nor is the search now-a-days confined to laboratory experiments. Rumour asserts that an extraordinary rise in the price of bismuth which occurred last year was caused by the purchases of a Joint Stock Company, established for the purpose of carrying out on a large scale the discoveries of a gentleman who, it was understood, had succeeded in perfecting the preparation of the "Stomach of Anthion," or the "Sharpness of the Eagle," or whatever may be the name of the needful Alkahest. Had these modern patrons followed the example of the shrewd Medici, who sent Augurellus of Rimini an empty purse, they had contented themselves with the purchase of an iron safe. They did more. Their "Subtle" did not profess to turn all metals into gold; their spits and pans and andirons were not available; no use to strip the churches of their coverings. They bought bismuth. Did their imagination, I wonder, like Sir Epicure's in the play, run riot among pictures such "as Tiberius took from Elephantis," among mistresses "with great smooth marbly limbs," among mists of perfume, and baths "from whence we will come forth and roll us dry in gossamer and roses;" did they surround themselves with poets and flatterers, "the pure and gravest of divines," dream of Apician dainties served "in Indian shells, and dishes of agate set in gold," and of raiment "such as might provoke the Persian"?

"This day . . . ingots, and to-morrow Give lords th' affront."

To-morrow came and with it:—

"Is all lost, Lungs? will nothing be preserved
Of all our cost?"—"Faith, very little, Sir;
A peck of coals or so!"

In this instance, however, the result was not quite so lachrymose. Still—even counting the "cure for the itch" off "the scraped shards"—a fiasco.

There is time enough yet, however, in this nineteenth century for the fulfilment of the prophecy made by the eminent Göttingen professor, Dr. Christopher Girtanner, in his memoir on Azote in the Annales de Chimie, No. 100, that this century will assuredly give birth to the transmutation of metals, when every chemist and every artist will make gold; when kitchen utensils will be made of silver, and even of gold, which will contribute more than anything else to prolong life, poisoned at present by the oxides of copper, lead, and iron that we daily swallow with our food. (Pettigrew.) This is a prosaic, but eminently practical way of looking at the rejuvenescent power of the wonderful Elixir, and one likely to prove more efficacious, I take it, in retarding the advances of old age, than that method to which is attached the name of the unknown Hermippus—puellarum anhelitu.

A. CHALLISTETH.

A GENERAL LITERARY INDEX: INDEX OF AUTHORS.*

The Victoria et Triumphus de impia et multiplici Eræcrabilium Massalianorum Secta, referred to by your correspondent H. B. C. (3rd S. iv. 458), is a kind of appendix to the Panoplia of Euthymius, the contents of which are here given. The former I propose to notice in a separate article on Manichæism and the Origin of Evil (1st S. iv. 340; 2nd S. iv. 189).

Euthymius Zigabenus (or Zygaenus), a Greek monk of the Order of St. Basil, flourished in the beginning of the twelfth century under the Emperor Alexius Comnenus; by whom he was highly esteemed for his learning and piety, and by whose command he compiled the Panoplia, as we learn from the Aleriad of the Princess Anna Comnena, p. 490.

Dupin never saw the Greek text of this work. The various editions of the Latin Version by Petrus Franciscus Zinus are given by him in his History of Ecclesiastical Writers, by Oudin and Fabricius. MSS. of his works are enumerated by Lambecius and Possevinus. In the edition of 1714, the Patriarch Chrysanthus being apprehensive of the same cruelty from the Turks which they had exercised against Cyril Lucaris (see Smith's Account of the Greek Church, &c., 1680; Aymon, Monumens Authentiques de la Religion des Grecs, 4to, 1708; and Mosheim's Institutes, cent. xvi. sect. 3, and cent. xvii. sect. 2, ch. ii., omitted the chapter against the Saracens, and what relates to the doctrine of the Trinity; neither is the Latin Version complete, e. g. the extract from Photius concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit is omitted (tit. xiii. in the Greek MSS.). The separate treatise on this subject differs but little, according to Dupin, from this portion of the Panoplia; but of Dupin's account of Euthymius's works, Simon (Critique de la Bibliothèque, p. 318) remarks: "Quot verba, tot errata." This, no doubt, arose from his not having seen the Greek text:—

"Though Euthymius Zigabenus is a writer well known to scholars, his Panoplia Dogmatica, in many respects the most valuable of his works, is I believe an exceedingly rare book. The only printed edition of the original text appeared at Tergovist, in Wallachia, in the year 1710 . . . and very few copies seem to have found their way to the west of Europe. The copy which was used by Fabricius (Bibl. Græca, vol. vii. p. 461) had been given to his friend Michael Eneman in the East by the Patriarch of Jerusalem. It is not in the Bodleian, nor in the British Museum;* and the only copy I ever saw was in the King's library at Paris, till a few months ago I purchased one from a bookseller in London. My good fortune in meeting with so rare a work would be more interesting to the members of certain clubs, which have now passed their hey-day, than to the readers of the British Magazine."—Vol. xiv. p. 287.

The Elenchus Sententiarum, or Contents, are as follow:—Contra Epicureos. On Epicurean Atheism, or Democritic Fate, the reader may consult Boyle's Works (Index, s. v. Epicureans, Epicurus). Cudworth's Intellectual System. H. More's Letters to Des Cartes. Stillingfleet's Origines Sæcræ. Bentley's Boyle Sermons against Atheism. Dutens' Origin of Discoveries. Tit. i. De Deo uno, Filium, et Spiritum S. habente. Tit. ii. De Patre et Filio et Spiritu Sancto; see S. Maximi Dialogi de Trinitate, vol. ii.; and Photii Dissert. 4 (Canisii Thesaur. Monum., t. ii. part 2). Tit. iii. De Deo communiter; tres hypostases declarantur, cf. Maximus, vol. ii. cap. 20, 22, and Petavii Theologia Dogmatica, vol. i. pp. 170—5, 261, 293, 301, 368, 372, in all which passages are references to Maximus and Euthymius. Tit. iv. Divinam naturam comprehendi non posse. Compare Mansel's Bampton Lectures, l. vi.; Cudworth's Intellectual System, 1845, vol. ii. p. 343. Tit. v. De Divina appellatione. On the works of Dionysius Areopagita, see Possevinus, Appar. Sacer., pp. 469-74. Tit. vi. De officio Dei, cf. Petavii Theol. Dogmat., lib. vi. c. v.; De origine mali, Cudworth's Treatise of Free-will. Tit. vii. De divina humanæ carnis assumptione; cf. Radcliffe on the Athanasian Creed. Tit. viii. p. 49 seq. Contra Hebræos; cf. Canisii Thesaur. Monum., t. iv. pp. 256-7; Smith's Scripture Testimony to the Messiah. Tit. ix. 57. Adversus Simonem Samarensem et Marcionem Ponticum et Manetem Persicum et Manicheos, see Tit. xxi. infra. Tit. x. Adversus Sabellium, see Mosheim's Inst.; Clinton's Epitome of Chronology of Rome, &c., p. 385. Tit. xi. p. 61. In Arrianos et Eunomianos, see Clinton's Fasti Romani, vol. ii. pp. 434, 435. Tit. xii. De Spiritu Sancto, see Fabricii Bibl. Gr., lib. v. c. ii. Tit. xiii. Adversus Apollinarium, see Clinton's Epitome of the Chronology of Rome, &c., p. 395; Bayle's Dictionary. Tit. xiv. Adversus Nestorianos, see Clinton's Chronology, pp. 174, 175; and Fasti Romani,

[* A copy of the Panoplia Dogmatica is now in the British Museum.—ED.]

* Continued from 3rd S. vii. 373.

vol. i. p. 611.; also Theodoret, Hæret. Fab. xii. Tit. xv. Adversus Eutychianos et Monophysitas, see Mosheim's Institutes. Tit. xvi. Adversus Aphtharodocitas, see Mosheim, cent. vi. part ii. ch. 5; and Clinton, s. v. Julianus Halicarn. Ep. Tit. xvii. Adversus Theopaschitas, see Mosheim, cent. v. part ii. ch. 5. Tit. xviii. Adversus Monotheletas, see Encyclop. Metropol., vol. xi. p. 425. A copious account of the Monothelite Heresy is contained in the works of Johannes Damascenus in a Treatise on the Two Wills, and in his books on the Orthodox Faith (in Euthym., pp. 181—184). Tit. xix. Adversus imaginum oppugnatores. On the three famous orations of Damascenus, see Milman's Latin Christianity. Tit. xx. Adversus Armenios. Aphtharodocitarum simul et Theopaschitarum morbo insaniunt; see Vincentii Bellovac., lib. xxx. c. 98; Centurie Magdeburg., cent. 13. p. 532; Combefis, Nov. Auctar., t. ii. p. 287. On the claims of the Armenian Church to orthodoxy, see Neale's Hist. of the H. Eastern Church. The Agnoetæ (see Lambecius, lib. iii. p. 168, who mentions them as the subject of one of the MSS. of Euthymius,) maintained the Monophysite or Eutychian doctrine: their heresy is refuted by Forbes in his elaborate work, Instructiones Historico-Theologicae, lib. iii. c. 19. (The principle of equivocation is here discussed and exhausted.) Cf. the Treatise of Athanasius Against Arianism, Disc. iii. p. 470 (Libr. of the Fathers), and the editor's note; Theodoret, Anath., t. v. p. 23, edit. Schutze, edit. Sirmondii, 1642, vol. iv. 712—714. Tit. xxi. Adversus Paulicianos, ex scriptis Photii Patriarchæ Constantinopolitani. Tit. xxii. Adversus Massalianos. Tit. xxiii. Adversus Bogomilos. An account of these heretics, by Euthymius and others, will be given under the art. "Manicheism and the Origin of Evil." Tit. xxiv. Contra Saracenos. This, which is wanting in the Greek edition, was published in Greek and Latin by Sylburgius, 1595, 8vo, and inserted in the Biblioth. Græco-Latina, Paris, 1624, vol. ii. pp. 202—312, and other collections: the translation [Bibl. Patr., vol. xix.] was by J. J. Beurer. Lambecius (lib. iv. p. 206) describes a MS., entitled Euth. Zig. Monachi Græci Disputatio cum Saraceno quodam Philosopho de Fide, &c.:—

"It is a calumny that the Mahometans believe God to be corporeal. And yet Pope Pius the Second wrote so in a Letter to Morbisanus (or Mahomet II.), tho' he is reckoned very honest and candid by those of his own party; but this is a matter of fact. . . . Euthymius Zigabenus, in Panoplia Dogmatica, hath fall'n into the same mistake, when writing of Mahomet, he says (p. 229): 'That God is spherical. Now this is the figure of a Body, and signifies Body, as much as thick and compact. Since, therefore, according to him God is a corporeal Sphere, it will follow that he can neither hear nor see.' . . . This mistake hath sprung from the ambiguous signification of a word we translate Sphere, which also signifies Eternal; and in this sense it is rightly affirmed of God."—Reland, Of the Mahometan Religion (in Four Treatises concerning the Doctrine, Discipline, and Worship of the Mahometans), 1712.

"The Mahometans believe God to be the Author of Evil, if we trust Cedrenus. . . . Euthymius Zigabenus, in Panoplia Dogmat., insisting upon the same calumny, endeavours to demonstrate what he advances upon this head, out of the Alcoran. . . . The Mahometans are unjustly charged with this opinion; with which all who maintain the absolute Providence of God, and his independent Right in all things, are wont to be charged."—Reland, pp. 55, 56.

Bibl. ibid. Cf. Petavii Theolog. Dogm., vol. i.; "N. & Q.," 2nd S. i. 301. With reference to Mahomet's Manicheism, see Wolfius, p. 248.

"Euthym. Zigabenus, in Panoplia, writes that the Arabs were given to the worship of Venus; and he is cited by Selden De Dis Syris, p. 216. I wish this great man had bestow'd some strokes of his pen upon the words of Euthymius as being contrary to manifest truth; but Selden passes them over without any judgment upon them, and seems to be of the same mind with Euthymius, &c. . . . Damascenus says more justly of the Arabians: 'They indeed worship'd the Images of the Star Lucifer, and of Venus, which in their own tongue they call Chabar, till the time of Heraclius. For when Mahomet arose he banished all worship of Idols.'"

Thus far Reland, who has himself made a great mistake, for Euthymius himself writes: "Saraceni usque ad tempora Heraclii Imperatoris colebant Idola, Luciferumque et Venerem . . . Tunc autem surrexit Moameth," &c.—P. 228.

Euthym. Zigab., in Panoplia, affirms the same thing (that the Mahometans worship all created beings), and endeavours to demonstrate it in these words (Bibl. Patr., p. 230 E.): "Mahomet swears by the Sun, Moon, Stars, &c. . . . He that sweareth, uses to swear by that which is greater than himself." As if the Jews, who swear by the Temple, by Jerusalem, by their head, should therefore be said to worship their head and the Holy City as gods (p. 59).

"Till the time," says Euthymius, "of the Emperor Heraclius, the Saracens served idols and worshipped the Morning Star and Venus; by them called Chabar in their tongue, a word that signifies Great. Those are the words of Euthymius, in which he distinguishes Venus from the Morning Star; nor is it to be wondered at that the Jews, being neighbours to the Arabians, borrow'd of 'em this Idolatry."—Jurieu's Critical History of the Doctrines and Worship of the Church, p. 206.

Cf. Kircheri Edipus Aegyptiacus, tom. i. p. 352, and "N. & Q.," 1st S. x. 190.

Appendix: Photii Patriarchæ Constantinopolitani ex epistola ad Michaellem Bulgariae Principem de septem Conciliis Œcumenicis. The original "Opusculum," &c., is printed in Greek and Latin in Justelli Bibl. Juris Can., tom. ii. p. 1141; and in Canisii Theaurus Monumentorum, tom. ii. part ii. p. 382. See Lambecius, lib. iii. p. 161 app., and Mich. Le Quien, Contra Schisma Græcorum, p. 174.

His other works are Commentarii in Psalmos, pp. 235—461: for other editions, see Bibliotheca Bodleiana, Cantica et Orationes, pp. 461-74. Commentarii in quatuor Evangelia, pp. 475-728: for other editions, Bibl. Bodl. Walchii Bibl. Theologica; Fabricii Bibl. Græca, vol. viii. p. 328, &c. (or vol. vii. p. 474); Cave, Hist. Lit., vol. i. p. 646. BIBLIOTHECAR. CHETHAM.

DANTE AND HERALDRY.—In the various discussions on the early use of coat armour which have recently come before the public, reference has been freely made to rolls of arms, seals, &c. But I have nowhere noticed the interesting fact that, not only are heraldic insignia familiarly blazoned in Dante's great poem, but in certain passages of his work, the personages whom he commemorates are defined by these insignia alone. Hence an acquaintance with the distinctive devices which characterised Italian families in the thirteenth century must have been very general at the time when Dante wrote to insure such a result, as that the mere blazoning of their armorial ensigns in a poem should be sufficient to identify the historic personages so depicted.

The subjoined passage from the 17th canto of the Inferno may suffice as an example:—

“ io mi accorsi
Che dal collo a ciascun pendea una tasca,
Che avea certo colore, e certo segno.
In una borsa gialla vidi azzurro
Che di un lione avea faccia e contegno.
Poi procedendo di mio sguardo il curro,
Vidine un' altra, come sangue rossa,
Mostrare una oca bianca più che burro.
Ed un, che di una scrofa azzurra e grossa
Segnato avea lo suo sacchetto bianco
Mi disse: ‘Che fai tu in questa fossa?’
vegnà il cavalier sovrano,
Che recherà la tasca coi tre becchi.”

Here we have in succession the arms of the Gianfigliacci (or Gianfigliuzzi) of Florence, of the Ubbriachi of the same city, and of the Scrovigni of Padua. While the last, “tre becchi,” three goats (not three birds' beaks, as it is explained in an edition now before me, published by Fleischer of Leipzig in 1826, and edited by Adolph Wagner), was the bearing of the notorious usurer Giovanni Bujamonte of Florence. H. W. T.

ORIGIN OF GODFREY'S CORDIAL.—The following advertisement is in Read's Weekly Journal or British Gazetteer, Feb. 17, 1722:—

“To all Retailers and others. The General Cordial formerly Sold by Mr. THO. GODFREY, of Hunsdon in Hertfordshire, deceased, is now Prepar'd according to a Receipt written by his own Hand, and by him given to my Wife, his Relation; is now Sold by me THO. HUMPHREYS of Ware, in the said county, Surgeon, or at John Humphreys at the Hand and Sheers in Jewin Street, near Cripplegate, London: Also may be furnished with Arcanuma, or Vomits, &c. and will be allow'd the same for selling as formerly.

“THO. HUMPHREYS, Surgeon.”

Let the world know through “N. & Q.” to whom it is indebted for a mixture which all who have paid attention to Vital Statistics know to be, at this time, the cause of probably one-fourth of the infantile mortality in the manufacturing counties of York, Lancaster, and Chester; and in all England upwards of one-tenth. W. LEE.

SIR HENRY RAE BURN.—In a work on Scottish Worthies, published some time since, this well-known artist is described as having met the charming young daughter of Mr. Peter Edgar, during one of his woodland walks, and then, after a short and pleasant courtship, married the young lady, and so acquired an ample fortune. The absurdity of this will be apparent when it is remembered that Miss Edgar was the eldest of a large family, and acquired her property by her first marriage with James Leslie, Esq., of Deanhaugh, whose only daughter, Jacobina, was the first wife of the last Vere of Stonebyres. JHLA.

A COINCIDENCE.—The second volume of the Monthly Review for 1795 contains in its Index the following item:—

“Little, Captain; see Moore”—

reminding us of the same conjunction of names in the case of a certain wild and witty Irish writer, whose brochure, under the pseudonyme of Little, was published a very few years afterwards, gaining its author More notoriety than credit.

HIBERNUS.

THE GREAT BELL OF WESTMINSTER.—

Claus. 35 Hen. III. Memb. 19.—“Mandatum est Edwardo de Westmon. sicut Rex alias mandavit, quod fieri faciat unam campanam quæ respondeat magnæ Campanæ Westmon., et quæ non sit ejusdem magnitudinis dum tamen convenienter ei per consilium magistri in sono respondeat. Magnam etiam Crucem collocari faciat in navi ecclesiæ Westmon., et ornet duos angelos in modum Cherubyn, utraque parte illius crucis collocandos. T.R. apud Westm. 4 die Febr.”—Ashmole MS. (Bodl. Libr.) 860, pp. 86-7.

Warrants were also issued to the same Edward of Westminster to make standards, a crown to be offered to St. Edward, a stole with sapphires and pearls of the value of fifteen or twenty marks, and other ornaments. W. D. MACRAY.

SHOEING THE GOOSE.—At p. 90 of Mr. Wright's charming work, entitled a History of Caricature and Grotesque in Literature and Art, I find that he alludes to the Shoeing of the Goose in the following words. (N.B. The italics are my own):—

“In a cleverly sculptured ornament in Beverley Minster, represented in our cut, No. 57, the goose herself is represented in a grotesque situation, which might almost give her a place in ‘the World turned upside down,’ although it is a mere burlesque without any apparent satirical meaning.”

It may be interesting to some of your readers to know that there is another example of this strange shoeing in the parish church of Whalley in Lancashire. It occurs there under the seat of one of the stalls in the chancel, supposed to have been the Abbott's Stall, in the old Abbey of Whalley. There is an inscription beneath it, as follows:—

"Whoso melles of wat men dos, Let hym cum hier and shoe the ghos."

A writer whose name I cannot remember, rendered the inscription thus, keeping, as he thought, the spirit of the original:—

"That fool to shoe a goose should try,
Who pokes his nose in each man's pie."

Is is right, therefore, to say that the carving in question has no satirical meaning? and are there any other examples known? L. H. M.

THE FRENCH AND SCOTTISH LANGUAGES.—Some of your readers may care to have another philological relic of our ancient connection with France.

The ordinary Scotch word for a draughtboard is dambrod. In Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, Hone's edition, p. 316, I find the following:—"The draughtman is called in French, dame." It would be interesting were some of your contributors to make a list of the words which have found their way into the Scottish language from the French. Here are three as a beginning:—Ashet for assiette. Bonnet in both languages is used for a man's cap. The birretta for ecclesiastics was in the French church called bonnet. Design for picture evidently has something to do with dessain.

WM. HUMPHREY.

Cove, near Aberdeen.

JUSTICES' GRAMMAR.—On the sands at Scultercoats, near Tynemouth, a board has been fixed on which is inscribed the following notice:—

"Any persons passing beyond this point will be drowned, by order of the magistrates."

The old Northumbrian barons claimed the power of execution "fossa et furca." I suppose, however, the present threat to be a slip of the pen.

J. F.

Clapham.

Queries.

EXHIBITION OF PORTRAIT MINIATURES, SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

I shall be glad if any of your readers can enlighten me on the following points:—

1. Minatures on Ivory.—When did miniature painting on ivory first come into use? Can any one adduce a well authenticated instance before 1670?

2. Mourning Costume.—There are two curious portraits in Lord Spencer's collection, numbered 937, 939 in the catalogue. The gentleman is dressed in a white linen habit, with a black cloak thrown over the left shoulder and under the right arm; the lady is in a tight-fitting white habit, with long hair hanging loose down her back. Is this the mourning-dress of the period? The two portraits I refer to are evidently in the costume of the end of the sixteenth century or the commencement of the seventeenth. A similarly costumed portrait, but fifty years later, is No. 349 in Mr. John Berners's collection. Can any of your readers enlighten me on this point?

3. Sally of Salisbury.—Who was Sally of Salisbury? There are two enamels of her and her daughter exhibited by Mr. William Meyer, case G. Nos. 663–664, apparently of the first half of the seventeenth century.

JAMES BECK, M.A.

The Cottage, Storrington, Sussex.

ABRAHAM'S CONVERSION.—Where is to be found the first account of the following, which I extract from Dr. A. P. Stanley's Sermons in the East (London, Murray, 1863), p. 124:—

"There is an ancient tradition that Abraham, as he stood on the hills above Damascus, was converted to the true faith in one God, from the worship of the heavenly bodies, by observing that the stars, the moon, and the sun, however bright and glorious, at last sank and were succeeded by others. 'I like not,' he said, 'those that set;' and so turned to the one unchangeable Lord and Maker of all."

H. C.

BEEST.—The milk given by a cow, for a few days after calving, is of a rich quality; and, in Lancashire, is called "beest" or "beast." Whence the name? PRESTONIENSIS.

"BIBLIOPHOBIA."—In a book written in 1832 by Mercurius Rusticus, there are several pseudonyms denoting celebrated Roxburghers. Can any venerable Roxburgher give me the real names of them? First, the author, Mercurius Rusticus; who was he?

Some of the others I know, but with the following I am at fault:—Licinius†, Philadelphus, Crassus, Decius, Philander, Portius, Marcus and M. R. the annotator. The book was printed by Henry Bohn, 4, York Street. SCRUTATOR.

BUNYAN DRAMATISED.—In The Critic (London literary journal) of June 1, 1855, there is a short paragraph stating that Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress has found its way on to the boards of the Chesnut Theatre, Philadelphia. Who was the adapter of this dramatic version of Bunyan, and was it printed? Is there any notice of it in F. C. Wemyss's History of the American Stage, published in 1852 or 1853? R. L.

[* The Rev. Dr. Dibdin. † Sir Francis Freeling.—Ed.]

COCK'S FEATHER.—I am curious to know why Mephistopheles and other stage representatives of evil incarnate wear a cock's feather?

ST. SWITHIN.

THE REV. JOHN DANIEL COTTON.—This gentleman, who was vicar of Good Easter, Essex, published Lachrymæ Elegiacæ sive Querelæ Epistolares, 1765. When did he die?

S. Y. R.

EPISCOPAL RINGS.—In the effigy of Bishop Oldham (died A.D. 1519), in Exeter Cathedral, the uplifted hands of the recumbent figure, which are pressed together, are adorned with no less than seven large rings worn on the fingers: three being on the right, and four on the left hand. And, in addition to these, a single signet-ring of extraordinary size is represented as worn over both the thumbs. Can any reader of "N. & Q." kindly refer me to another example of an episcopal thumb-ring worn upon both the thumbs at the same time?

CHARLES BOUTELL.

FAMILY NAMES LOST.—Have any of our English family names ever become entirely extinct? In an assessment of the ward of Walbrook, made in 1636, I find the following names:—"Steven Wanspeire, Thomas Totty, Arthur Mousse, Henry Pitchforke, Richard Doelittel." Do these names still exist among us? I know, of course, that the race of the Dolittles is not extinct; but what about the name?

BENJ. CHR. OU.

REV. EDWARD FORD, F.T.C.D.—In Dr. Trusler's Tablet of Memory; or, Historian's Guide, Dublin, 1782, p. 176, there is the following entry:

"1734, Feb. 7. Mr. Ford, one of the fellows of Trinity College, Dublin, was shot by one of the scholars."

In the Dublin University Calendar, 1865, p. 276, Mr. Ford is said to have been "killed by a shot fired from the College Park, March 8, 1734." A few years ago I read a very interesting article in a leading periodical, founded on the sad occurrence. I am desirous of reading it again; but I do not know what periodical to consult. Will you kindly aid me in the matter?

ABEBA.

INFANT-MORTALITY, OR INFANTILE MORTALITY? I shall be glad of an opinion as to which of the above is the more correct expression. I always use the first as I prefer it. These are my reasons for doing so: the compound word "infant-mortality" seems to express the sense intended—namely, the deaths of infants; that is to say, a positive unalterable fact is understood by the term "mortality" irrespective of the word going before. But when the adjective "infantile" precedes the noun, it implies something peculiar to infancy, as for instance, "infantile play," "infantile talk," "infantile disorders," &c.; but "infantile mortality" seems to me nonsense, because death is the same in young and old; while "infant-mortality" means death at an early age. This is my idea of the matter. I shall, however, be greatly obliged if any of your readers will afford some information on the subject, as I find the majority of educated writers adopt the other term, of which the daily press and other publications afford ample proof.

M. A. B.

INFLUENZA.—Is this word of modern origin? I mean within the last fifty years or less. What is it derived from? I have almost answered my own query, for opening the first volume of the European Magazine for June, 1782, I came upon the following piece of poetry:—

"Influenza: a Glee.

"SET BY MR. BARTHELEMON.

"Influenza! haste away!
Cease thy baneful empire here!
Boast no longer of thy sway!
Cease dominion o'er the year.
Radiant Sun, exert thy pow'r,
On the wings of Zephyr come,
Dart thy beams and rule the hour!
Health and Beauty then shall bloom!"

The word influenza is, however, not in the folio edition, 1765, of Johnson's Dictionary. W. P.

IN TWO PLACES AT ONCE LIKE A BIRD.—At page 126 of a little book called The Book-Hunter, by Mr. Burton, published in 1862, I find the following foot-note:—

"I have doubts whether the saying attributed to Sir Boyle Roche, about being in two places at once like a bird, is the genuine article. I happened to discover that it is of earlier date than Sir Boyle's day, having found when rummaging in an old house among some Jacobite manuscripts; one from Robertson of Strowan, the warrior poet, in which he says about two contradictory military instructions, 'It seems a difficult point for me to put both orders in execution, unless, as the man said, I can be in two places at once, like a bird.' A few copies of these letters were printed for the use of the Abbotsford Club. This letter of Strowan's occurs in page 92."

Can any one throw any more light on the origin or antiquity of this expression? I have been unable to find Robertson's letter. WORKWORTH.

WILLIAM ITCHENER, D.D., was of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, B.A., Feb. 13, 1695; M.A. July 8, 1698; D.D. by diploma, May 6, 1729. He published A Defence of the Canon of the Old Testament, Lond. 8vo, 1723, being then rector of Christian Malford, in Wilts. I am desirous of knowing when he died.

S. Y. R.

"LIBER FAMELICUS."—I was looking the other day through the publications of the Camden Society, and among others of that valuable series, I was attracted by a book with the curious title of Liber Famelicus. It is an interesting Diary kept by Sir James Whitelocke, the Judge of the King's Bench in the reigns of James I. and Charles I.; and the father of the more renowned Bulstrode Whitelocke, Cromwell's chancellor, whose Memoirs of the Rebellion are oftener quoted than any work on the subject, and still retain their popularity.

I am puzzled about the meaning of the title; for the judge, who was a well-educated and very learned person, and withal thirty-nine years of age when he began the book, must have had some reason for so christening it. The word "Famelicus" is used by Pliny, Seneca, and Plautus, in the sense of hungry and famished, which would not be appropriate to Sir James, who was by no means a half-starved lawyer at the time, but rejoiced in a flourishing practice. Was it a hasty and mistaken idea of the judge, that the word was derived from "Familia"? I cannot otherwise account for its use. Perhaps some of your ingenious correspondents may suggest another interpretation.

PHILOLOGUS.

MILTON.—What crest and motto did the poet Milton bear?

CARILFORD.

Cape Town, S. A.

NETTLES PROOFS OF HABITATION.—The British camp of Worlebury, on the hill above Weston-super-Mare, contains within its area many circular pits, from five to six feet in depth. These are the foundations of ancient dwellings, and human remains have been found in some of them. In many of these pits nettles are growing. None are to be found outside them, even where the area of the camp is covered with brushwood and coppice. It has been said more than once that nettles are a sure indication of ancient habitation. I have found them (although rarely) among the granite of hut circles on Dartmoor; and last autumn I saw them growing thickly about the pits of an ancient settlement on the side of Roseberry Topping in Yorkshire. They are found, also, I believe, on the sites of British villages which have lately been discovered on the Cheviots. I wish to ask whether there is sufficient proof that the presence of nettles is in such cases, a result of the former presence of man? and if so, what reason can be given for it? R. J. KING.

OATH OF THE ROMANS.—

"A Highlander, when sworn on the gospels or the cross, cares little for his oath, but will keep it if sworn on the point of his dirk. The degenerate Romans of the Lower Empire avowed, that it was better to break an oath to God than one by the head of the Emperor, for the mercy of God might forgive offences to himself, but not those to the Emperor: but when the Emperor changed his views, their casuistry argued that false swearing was not perjury," p. 15.—A Plea against the needless Multiplication of Oaths, by John Owen, Minister of Salem Chapel, Deptford, 8vo, London, 1789, pp. 32.

The pamphlet is an exposure of the oaths-of-course administered at the Custom House, and on affidavits before magistrates. The casuistry of the Romans is strange, but I have no doubt there is some authority for the statement, though I cannot find, and shall be glad to be, referred to one.

J. M. K.

QUOTATION.—The following is in an old common-place book. Can any of your readers tell me whence it was taken?—

Mollis
Qualis anas, quam pura beat piscinula, præcep
Conditur, accipiter rapidis ubi desillit alis:
Qui superas indigna ferent, se tollit in auras."*

P. H.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.—Is the following scrap of old Scotch ballad, met with in some stray letter of Sir Walter's, still current in Fifeshire?—

"There's as mony fish in Anster Bay
As there are lairds in Fife.
O! in that bonny kingdom
Lives mony a fisher-wife."

WALTER THORNBURY.

"THE SYNAGOGUE OF THE LIBERTINES."—In the Acts of the Apostles (chap. vi. 9) occur the following words:—

Ἀνέστησαν δὲ τινες τῶν ἐκ τῆς συναγωγῆς τῆς λεγομένης Λυβερτίνων, κ.τ.λ.

My query is, what particular synagogue is meant by the expression "the synagogue of the Libertines"? I am aware that several explanations are given; but those which I have seen do not appear to be satisfactory. Schleusner (sub voce Λυβερτῖνοι) mentions, that some writers suppose there was a town in Africa Proper named Libertus, or Libertina, whence a certain class of Jews came to Jerusalem and there established a synagogue. There is a monthly Bulletin published in Rome by the celebrated Cavaliere de Rossi, entitled Bullettino di Archeologia Cristiana. I understand that the discovery, on the walls of a house in Pompeii, of an electioneering appeal in favour of one Cuspius Pansa, who is recommended to the office of ædile by Fabius Eupor, Princeps Libertinorum, gives occasion to the learned archæologist for a valuable historical investigation into the meaning of this title. His remarks, I believe, throw great light on the expression under consideration, viz., "the synagogue of the Libertines." The article appeared in one of the late numbers of the Bulletin. Can any of your correspondents or readers refer me to the particular number? J. DALTON.

St. John's, Norwich.

THE TRINE BENEDICTION.—I have always understood the Roman Catholic sign of benediction, perpetually pictured in the old masters, of three fingers held up, to signify blessing in the name of the Holy Trinity; but to-day I meet with a reference to Lavater as an authority for that interpretation, and something more. My author says:—

"Three fingers [men] do oft lift up, and hold down two, to signify, saith Lavater, that God, who is Three in One, hath prepared a place in heaven for such as swear rightly; but will thrust down to hell those that forswear themselves."

[* Sic in the copy.—Ed.]

Where does Lavater thus interpret the sign?

QUERE.

ZINC SPIRES.—While recently on a visit to my old friend the rector of Ilford, in Essex, I was struck with the alterations already commenced on the very unsightly church, erected there early in the present century. It is sufficient to state that the designs are the work of that distinguished architect Mr. Ashpitel, without calling attention to their merits; but the admirable effect of the zinc spire and its comparative cheapness leads me to inquire whether such structures have stood the test of time, or are quite novel in this country. Are any medieval examples known? In Bohemia and the Tyrol I believe they are common.

THOMAS E. WINNINGTON.

Queries with Answers.

GEORGE CHAPMAN.—Can any of your correspondents obligingly inform me of any particulars of the life of George Chapman, the translator of Homer? The place of his birth seems unknown, and the account given in the Athenæ refers almost entirely to his works. Warton says, upon the authority of Francis Wise, that he passed two years in Trinity College, Oxford. The authority is a good one; but unfortunately, owing to both the university and college registers being incomplete or lost about that period, there is no opportunity of confirming it. Of his latter days in London we cannot expect to hear much. W.

[In Kippis's Biographia Britannica, iii. 486, will be found an excellent account of George Chapman. Consult also Edward Phillips's Theatrum Poetarum, by Brydges, edit. 1800, p. 250—258, and Dodsley's Old Plays, edit. 1825, iv. 101—106. In Nichols's Select Poets, i. 271, as well as in Collier's History of Dramatic Poetry, iii. 257, it is stated that Chapman was born about 1557, and that his family seems to have been respectably settled at Hitchin, in Hertfordshire. One member of it, Thomas Chapman, in 1619, petitioned Prince Charles for the Bailiwick of Hitchin, which the petitioner had formerly possessed under the Exchequer Seal, but of which the Earl of Salisbury had deprived him; and, on the 30th of November of that year, the claim was referred to the commissioners of the revenue of the Prince of Wales (Vide Harl. MS. 781). It would also seem, from an early portion of his poem Enthymia Raptus: or the Teares of Peace, 4to, 1609, that Chapman had been occupied in his Homeric labour near Hitchin, in Herts. The shade of Homer is supposed to answer the poet's inquiry, "What may I reckon thee, whose heavenly look shewes not, nor voice sounds, man?"

"I am (may be) that spirit Elysian,
That in thy native ayre, and on the Hill
Next Hitchin's left hand, did thy bosome fill

With such a flood of soule, that thou wert faine
(With acclamations of her rapture then)
To vent it to the echoes of the vale;
When meditating of me, a sweet gale
Brought me upon thee; and thou didst inherit
My true sense (for the time then) in my spirit:
And I, invisible, went prompting thee
To those fayre greenes, where thou didst English me."

That Hertfordshire has a better claim to the honour of Chapman's birth than Stone Castle in Kent (as conjectured by Wood) is further confirmed by his friend and contemporary William Browne in his Britannia's Pastorals (book i. song 1), where he styles him—"The learned shepherd on fair Hitching Hill."

Inigo Jones, at his own expense, erected an altar-tomb to the memory of George Chapman in the old church of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, London. It was repaired in 1827 by the Rev. James Endell Tyler, the rector, and is now fixed against the south wall of the church on the outside. The monument part alone is old; the inscription is a copy of all that remained visible.]

ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH FORESHADOWED. —

"They who spread positive and confident aspersions . . . are great advancers of defamatory designs than the very first contrivers. . . . What the others are fain to whisper, they proclame: like our new Engine, which pretends to convey a whisper many miles off. So that as in the case of Stealing, 'tis proverbially said, that if there were no receivers there would be no thieves: so in this of slander, if there were fewer spreaders, there would be fewer forgers of Libels; the manufacture would be discouraged, if it had not these retailers to put off the wares."—The Government of the Tongue, by the author of The Whole Duty of Man, Oxford, 1675, p. 53.

What was the engine here referred to? Has any light been lately thrown on the authorship of The Whole Duty of Man? Is any particular person now generally admitted to have been the author? And if so, on what evidence does the conclusion rest? D.

[When the above passage was written the author may have been thinking either of Lord Bacon's "engine houses, where we prepare engines and instruments for all sorts of motions" (New Atlantis, p. 308, Bohn's edition), or to Glanville's remarkable prediction of the discovery and general adoption of the electric telegraph, in his Scep sis Scientifica, 1665, 4to, p. 134, where he writes: "I doubt not but posterity will find many things that are now but rumours, verified into practical realities, and to confer at the distance of the Indies by sympathetick conveyances, may be as usual to future times as to us in a literary correspondence."—No additional light has been thrown on the authorship of The Whole Duty of Man since the Rev. W. B. Hawkins wrote his valuable Preface in 1842. See the articles in our present volume, pp. 9, 57, 106, 124, 290, and 328.]

FRISIANS.—In a magazine, entitled The Monthly Literary and Scientific Lecturer for June, 1851, there is a report of a "Course of Lectures on 'The Ethnology of the British Colonies and Dependencies,' by Dr. R. G. Latham, F.R.S." Lect. 1 says:

"As early as the time of Archbishop Ussher, the probability, and something more, of Frisians making part and parcel of the Anglo-Saxon invasion was indicated."

Where is the statement referred to by Dr. Latham to be found? I have looked in Chalmers's Biographical Dictionary, and I do not find that Archbishop Ussher wrote any book on ethnology.

E. A.

[In the lecture as published by Dr. Latham in his Ethnology of the British Colonies, 1851, p. 15, the passage reads as follows: "The opinion, first, I believe, indicated by Archbishop Ussher, and recommended to further consideration by Mr. Kemble, that the Frisians took an important part in the Anglo-Saxon invasion of Great Britain, is gaining ground." The work most likely to contain a notice of the Frisians, is that great treasury of historical research, Ussher's Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates, which comes down to the close of the seventh century.]

NURSERY RHYME.—I remember an amusing nursery rhyme commencing with the following words. Can the whole of the song be recovered?—

"The Queen of Hearts
She made some tarts," &c.

W. P.

[We give the version printed in Halliwell's Nursery Rhymes, edit. 1846, p. 39:—

"The Queen of Hearts
She made some tarts,
All on a summer's day:
The Knave of Hearts
He stole the tarts,
And took them clean away.

"The King of Hearts
Call'd for the tarts,
And beat the Knave full sore:
The Knave of Hearts
Brought back the tarts,
And vow'd he'd steal no more."

Consult also "N. & Q.," 3rd S. i. 423.]

Replies.

SAVANNAH.

(3rd S. vii. 128.)

Allow me to sacrifice uniformity of reference, by altering your correspondent's spelling; which, being certainly wrong, it seems a pity to preserve. Common usage has settled the orthography as given above; and if worth while, any number of proofs might be offered, as the maps of James Cook in 1771, and of Henry Mouzon in 1775, and every official act relating to the city since, and indeed for a long time before—but this is of small moment. The query put is very hard to answer: Who gave name to Hutchinson's Island, opposite the town? I find it so called in 1733. Francis Moore writes in 1735:—

"I took a view of the town of Savannah . . . eastward you see the river increased by the northern branch which runs round Hutchinson's Island, and the Carolina shore beyond it, and the woody islands at the sea which close the prospect at ten or twelve miles' distance: over against it is Hutchinson's Island, great part of which is open ground, where they mow hay for the Trust's horses and cattle. The rest is woods, in which there are many bay trees eighty foot high" (Georgia Hist. Collect., p. 94)— which agrees well enough with your correspondent's account of his print, taken at about the same period. In 1787 its northern side was declared a part of the line of navigation, thereafter to be equally free to Carolinians and Georgians; but it has figured but little in history, saving the honour of causing the grounding of the ship Hinchinbroke in 1776, during the first battle in Georgia in the revolutionary war; in which vessel, says Dr. Stevens (now Assistant-Bishop of Pennsylvania) in his History of Georgia, vol. ii. p. 133, Lords Nelson and Collingwood were made post-captains. As to the nomenclator, we must look for him between the years 1660 and 1733, unless an earlier occurrence of the name than the latter date can be found. Between 1660 and 1670, some few English went from Virginia to Carolina, previous to which time perhaps no Europeans had visited it, at least the south-western part (now Georgia), for nearly one hundred years; that is, since the French and Spanish expeditions. If, as seems most likely, the island took its name from some person of consideration, would it not be worth while to look over the names of those gentlemen in Barbadoes who made proposals to settle in Carolina in 1663; and some of whom, I think, did actually go over shortly thereafter? These proposals are in the State Paper Office. Amongst the emigrants from the Barbadoes and St. Christopher's in 1635, who had "taken the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacie, as also being conformable to the order and discipline of the Church of England and no Subsedey men," was one Clement Hutchinson; but of what rank in life, I have no means of knowing. (New England Genealog. Reg., vol. xiv. p. 351.) In the same year two Jo. Hutchinsons, aged respectively twenty-two and forty-seven, and a Michell Hutchinson, were passengers from Gravesend to Virginia (Id. vol. ii. p. 113; vol. xv. pp. 144, 145). But the records of Georgia proper are very imperfect, even more so than those of the Carolinas. It was emphatically, as Mr. Whitmore remarks in a late essay, a pauper settlement. And as to Carolina itself, Governor Glen, in 1751, reports to the Lords Commissioners of Trade, in reply to their Lordships' letter, requesting an account of the boundaries of Carolina, &c., that—

"in a general way, the settlers of a new county are agriculturists, mechanics, or artificers; but as among the settlers of this province there existed many gentlemen, it was probable many interesting facts and observations might have been committed to writing, which would have enabled the writer to answer their Lordships' expectations; had not an unlucky fire, which took place about forty or fifty years ago, consumed one of the public offices, wherein were many papers."

It is very unlikely that the island was named from any one of the distinguished New England family; from which, I presume, your correspondent is descended. The migration from New England to Georgia did not take place until about 1762; and there is no historical event within my knowledge, previous to 1733 (when we know the island to have had its present name), which would have induced the colonists to have looked to distant Massachusetts for a local name. I do not infer from your correspondent's note, that there was any relationship between the family of Col. Hutchinson the Regicide and that of the celebrated Governor of Massachusetts Bay. The latter expressly denies it in a letter to the Hon. J. H. Hutchinson, in 1772, preserved in the New England Register, before referred to, at p. 302 of vol. i. It appears to have been a grandson, and not a son of Col. Hutchinson, who was said to have "emigrated to the West Indies or America." See the Preface to Bohn's edition, 1848, of Memoirs of Col. Hutchinson.

There was a Mr. Hutchinson living at Savannah before the late Southern rebellion; and if this should meet his eye, or that of some member of the Historical Society of Georgia, an answer may be obtained.

Who was Archibald Hutchison, who had a good deal to say about the government of Carolina in 1730, or thereabout? Let me add another query: Is Savannah really an Indian name?—

"On this hill they marked out a town, and from the Indian name of the river which ran past it, called it Savannah."—Hist. Col. of South Carolina, New York, 1836, vol. i. p. 290.

ST. TH.

SHELVES IN WILTSHIRE.

(3rd S. vii. 241, 308, 330, 362, 422.)

MR. WILLIAM PINKERTON has accused me of "riding off" from the question. Had he a full knowledge of what is required in the scientific investigation of earthworks, he would know that it is only by comparing similar types in different localities that one can arrive at even an approximate idea of their period or purpose. If I have erred in comparing the shelves of Wiltshire with the terraces of Scotland, I have done so in good company. In the first volume of the Proceedings of the Antiquaries of Scotland, p. 127, MR. PINKERTON will find an article by Robert Chambers, in which, as illustrating our Scottish terraces, reference is most properly made to similar works in England, France, Germany, Hungary, Peru, and Palestine.

MR. PINKERTON's expectation that I will be careering over the roads of Glenroy shows a very imperfect acquaintance with the subject on which he is writing. The very word parallel which he uses should have shown him the difference between such geological features and terraces, which are not parallel to the horizon, but sweep round the hill at varying angles.

MR. PINKERTON has, in his concluding observations, totally mistaken my meaning. I in no way connected the plough with the terraces, but only referred to the height at which it had been used on our hills at a remote period. In many cases the terraces, which are always formed on the most fertile land, have been obscured by its action. So far from giving up the plough, I have no doubt that many of those terraces were worked, where the breadth admitted, by the rude ploughs of the period.

"Lazy beds," although in modern times confined to potatoes, were formerly a means for cultivation of many other crops.

As to MR. PINKERTON's question, "How long natural manure has been employed in Scottish agricultural operations?" I would simply remind him that south of the Firths of Forth and Clyde the Romans occupied the country, and refer him to the Georgics for their knowledge of the use of manure.

GEORGE VERE IRVING.

Culter Mains, May 31st, 1865.

THE ORIGIN OF SMITHFIELD MARKET.

(3rd S. vii. 411.)

Your correspondent G. A. draws important conclusions from small evidence when he asserts, that the cattle market was not held in Smithfield until the year 1631. If he had continued his researches he would have been convinced that this market was established from "time immemorial."

1253. In this year, it was enacted by the community, that no one of the franchise of the city should in future pay scavage for his beasts sold on the field of Smethefeld, as before they had been wont.

1260. 50 Henry III. The Customs of Smythfelde.—For every cow or ox sold that is full grown, one penny. For every dozen of sheep, one penny. If foreign dealers bring oxen, cows, sheep, or swine between the feast of St. Martin and Christmas, they shall give unto the bailiff the third best beast after the first two best.

1408. 8 Edward IV., April 9, a proclamation was made for Butchers Freemen to begin the market in Smithfield, concerning the buying of beasts and cattle, from seven o'clock in the morning till eleven, at which hour the bell shall be rung, then all foreigners shall begin their market, and so continue for one hour and no longer.

In 1576, 18 Elizabeth, Sep. 28, an order was passed to facilitate the trade of the market. He will also find in the first edition of Stow's London, 1798, allusions to the pens or sheepe foldes used on market days as well as to the cattle market.

1613, 10 James I., Dec. 17, a proclamation was made for the market to be held on every Monday instead of Wednesday and Friday:—

"In consequence of the confluence of People from all parts of this Kingdome to this City of London as of strangers from partes beyond the seas repairing and exercising in this City; and the number of Citizens and Inhabitants also are farr more and greater than have been in former ages, and therefore the like proportions of provisions of victuals cannot nowe suffice to supply a place growne soe greate and so populous as the same City now is; besides the places adjoyning, which be not of the liberties nor within the Government of the same, be it therefore enacted that in future the Market be held on a Monday, the bell to be rung at the opening of the same at 9 o'clock, and that it shall remain open until one."

Your correspondent will also find that by the charter granted to the city (1 Edw. III. sect. 12, March 6, 1327,) it is declared that no market shall be granted by the crown to be holden within seven miles all round about the city. This was confirmed by charter 14, Charles I., sect. 14, Oct. 14, 1638. I would also recommend him to read the several Parliamentary Papers referring to this subject before writing the history of the market, from which he will obtain much valuable information.

W. H. OVERALL.

THE EXODUS OF THE ISRAELITES.

(3rd S. vii. 419, 428.)

A date given in terms of "the year of the world," does not convey a distinct meaning, unless it be stated what mode of computation is used. The first year of the Christian era is the 3761st year of the world according to the modern Jewish calendar, and the 6310th according to Panvinus. There are ten intermediate systems of this early chronology, supported by great names, besides many theories of less note.

I am in possession of a restoration of the sacred reckoning, which has stood every test that I have yet been able to apply, and which has appeared to me to solve many chronological difficulties. According to this scheme, the Exodus took place in the year 3269 of the era of Adam, being the year 1541 before Christ.

According to the corrected Egyptian chronology of Brugsch, Amenophis III., the ninth king of the eighteenth dynasty, acceded in the year 1546 B.C.; and would thus be the reigning monarch at the time of the Exodus. Josephus accuses Manetho of citing a fictitious King Ameno-phis as then on the throne; but modern discovery tends to confirm the testimony of the Egyptian historian in this particular.

In the Armenian Chronicle of Eusebius it is stated, under the ninth king of the eighteenth dynasty: "hujus ætate Magus Judæorum ex Egypto egressus dux fuit."

The Exodus has been referred by Sir J. G. Wilkinson to the reign of Thothmes III.—the predecessor by three reigns of Amenophis III. More bricks bear the name of this king than that of any other monarch; and it is in a monument of his that "the curious process of brick-making is represented, which tallies so exactly with that described in the Exodus." Sir Gardner, in his note on Egyptian history, in Rawlinson's Herodotus, inclines indeed to a later date; but he says:—

"The sending of the leprous persons to the sulphur springs on the east bank of the Nile, is also a misrepresentation of some real event; and that it was not a mere fable, is proved by the recent discovery of these springs at Helwân."

The name of Ramses is characteristic of the nineteenth and twentieth dynasties; and the sixty-six years of the reign of the famous Ramses Miamoun, to which the Exodus has by some writers been referred, closed exactly 200 years later than the date above cited for the Exodus.

It may be added that the passage of Josephus, as to the employment of Moses in the Ethiopian war before his flight from Egypt, is perfectly consistent with what is known of the history of the eighteenth dynasty. And the disturbance and decadence of this great dynasty, on the death of Amenophis III., might be explained by the death of the first-born of the Pharaoh that sat on the throne.

F. R. CONDER.

The Rev. Joseph Reeve, in his beautiful and instructive History of the Holy Bible, places the passage of the Red Sea A.M. 2513 and A.C. 1487. He does not quote any authority; but, if I might venture an assertion, I believe he is borne out by ancient chronologists as regards the time. Who was the King of Egypt at that period, may probably be traced from the sacred text itself.

S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

Mr. Osburn, in his Monumental History of Egypt, makes the Exodus of the Israelites to have taken place under Sethos II. of the nineteenth dynasty. The whole account, both of the Exodus and of the antecedent events, is very interesting. It is contained in the 2nd volume, pp. 572—609.

CANON DALTON will find Manetho's story given at length at pp. 606—608.

Osburn (vol. i. p. 181) confesses his inability to join in the "unbounded eulogy" heaped upon Manetho's personal character by Bunsen and Lepsius. Bunsen's praise was founded on the favourable opinion entertained of Manetho by Syncellus, who lived a thousand years after Manetho.

JOHN WOODWARD.

New-Shoreham.

"BONNIE DUNDEE" (3rd S. vii. 418.)—The words Gay has assigned to Captain Macheath are not sung to the tune to which Scott's song is allied. In the latter case it is the song, and not the tune which bears the title of "Bonnie Dundee." "Bonnie Dundee" is a fine air of slow time, and very appropriate to the sentiment expressed by Macheath; which would not be the case with the other tune, it being one of a sprightly character, ill suited to express the feelings excited by the "terrible show" which Macheath is about to confront. Macneil's beautiful ballad—"Saw ye my wee thing?"—is sung to the tune introduced into the Beggar's Opera. C. ROSS.

The tune of "Bonnie Dundee" in the Beggar's Opera is not the same to which Sir Walter Scott's words are sung. Scott writes of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, but the old ballad refers to the town, "Jockey's escape from Dundee," &c. The words of this will be found in the three volumes of Old Ballads, 8vo, published in the first quarter of the last century. They are not such as could be reprinted in the present day.

W. CHAPPELL.

"THAT'S THE CHEESE" (3rd S. vii. 307.)—The late David Rees, an eminent comedian, well known in London and Dublin, was celebrated for original bon mots on the stage. The above phrase was first introduced into Dublin by him, in a piece called The Evil Eye, the scene of which was laid in the Morea. The phrase became very popular, and was used when a person wanted to impress on another that something very important had been said or done in reference to something in hand. I have a clear recollection of having asked Mr. Rees what was the origin of the term, and he replied it arose in consequence of a half-witted boy having eaten a piece of soap and then told his grandmother what a nice piece of cheese he had devoured. "It was soap," cried the old lady. "Oh, no," shouted the boy, "that was the cheese." Such is the story as it was told to me.

S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

In reference to the note by MR. TRENCH as to the origin of the phrase "That's the cheese," I may say that an old friend of mine, now dead, who was very fond of tracing the history of slang phrases, told me a very simple story as to how "That's the cheese" originated. The story was as follows:—In the north of Ireland there lived an old woman with a grandson of some eight years of age, and the youth had an appetite that was considered voracious. This was a subject of remark amongst the neighbours; and the old woman on one occasion, when speaking to one of the neighbours, gave the following illustration of her grandson's readiness to eat anything without regard to taste or smell. She had purchased a piece of brown soap, and placed it in the bottom of the window. Some hours afterward, when she was about to commence washing, she said, "Paddy, where's the soap?" "What soap?" said Paddy. "Why," replied the old woman, "the soap that was in the window." "Oh! granny," says he, "that was the cheese!" Paddy had eaten the soap believing it to be cheese.

The story was made a standing joke against Paddy ever afterwards; and by degrees it got circulation, and came to be applied to anything that suited the taste of the party making use of the expression. It is easy to understand in these days, when people are anxious to appear witty, how this should come to be generally used amongst those who use slang for wit; and those who wish to appear more witty than their neighbours use instead, "That's the Stilton," "That's the Cheshire," &c. J. S. GLASS.

Liverpool.

ST. AGNES AND HER LAMB (3rd S. vii. 402.)—The account, of which H. C. enquires, is found in most old books of Lives of Saints. I translate it as given in the old German work, Passional efte dat levent der hyllighen to dude uth dem Latina mit velen nyen hystorien unde leren. Lubeck, 1507:—

"Now the friends of St. Agnes were much oppressed with grief for her; and they bewailed her for eight days with great affliction; and watched all night, and wept by her sepulchre. On the eighth night, they saw several beautiful virgins near the sepulchre, who were clothed in rich attire. And on the right hand stood one virgin with a beautiful white lamb. At this sight they were very glad; and Saint Agnes comforted her friends who bewailed her, and spoke thus to them: 'You must not bewail me as among the dead, for I am with these virgins in everlasting bliss: there we have joy infinite and eternal.'"

This vision is inserted in the Roman Breviary on January 28, on which a second feast is kept, or rather a commemoration made of St. Agnes.

F. C. H.

SCARLETT FAMILY (3rd S. vii. 43.)—I am informed by GAMMA that I am "mistaken in regard to Christiana Scarlett's marriage into the family of the Gordons of Earlston." If he will turn to the genealogy of the Gordons of Earlston in Burke's Peerage and Baronetage, he will see that James Gordon of Jamaica, the son of Sir Thomas (of Earlston), third baronet, married in 1770, Christiana, daughter of James Scarlett, Esq., and died in 1794, having had issue by her, Sir John, fifth baronet, &c.

The James Scarlett above mentioned, a landed proprietor in Jamaica, was the grandfather of the first Lord Abinger, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and of Sir William Anglin Scarlett his brother, who was Chief Justice of Jamaica.

A GENEALOGIST.

BEAR'S DEN HALL (3rd S. vii. 402.)—This house was situated on Putney Heath, and was the residence of Charles Christiern Reisen, seal engraver and painter, and — Skelton, upholsterer. It was kept at their joint expense! I cannot learn any particulars of these eccentrics, but from the print it would appear that they pigged together in filth and wretchedness. Their armorials are a crab-tree and a tent; the supporters, a crutch and a walking-stick, intimate infirmity. The very small amount of "Smoak, by Chance," indicates poverty or parsimony. The bear and the crab-tree intimate that their discomforts were not alleviated by cheerfulness and good temper. A kite pouncing upon small birds is called "Crab-tree transmigrated," not indicative of amiability. (See Walpole's Painters.)

E. H.

TRAVELLING SCOTCHMEN (3rd S. vii. 420.)—In this town there are a vast number of these persons engaged in the drapery business. The trade is carried on with dock-labourers, mechanics, and very humble people; yet it is most extensive, as the "Scotchmen" supply goods almost to anyone, and to any amount, taking weekly payments at one shilling in the pound. And when the bargain is faithfully kept by the purchaser, the profits, as any one acquainted with figures and interest tables can determine, become truly enormous. There is a special day set apart in the monthly sittings of the Liverpool County Court, which is devoted solely to hearing claims of these travelling drapers against defaulting debtors. The people of this town (particularly drapers) look on these "Scotchmen" as an extensive nuisance. With the needy and the honest customer they are well spoken of; for they supply goods not at an extravagant price, and those persons, whose income is weekly, and who are punctual in their engagements, find them a convenient and desirable sort of shopkeepers.

S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

BISHOP LINDWOOD (3rd S. vii. 429.)—I have to thank MR. BEDFORD for the trouble he has taken to assist in the investigation as to the true arms of Bishop Lindwood. As Sir F. Madden's notes were not based upon the Bishop's Register, it is possible that, while the armorial bearings on the brass at Linwood were those of the Bishop's family, previous to his elevation to the offices of Dean of Arches, Keeper of the Privy Seal, and Bishop of St. David's, the coat which appears in the title-page of the Provinciale may be arms assigned to him for special distinction. Can anything be learned from the Records of the Heralds' College on this point? I exceedingly regret that I cannot furnish MR. BEDFORD with a reference to Guillim, as I have no note of it. My memorandum was made many years ago, before the importance of such minutiae had been so strongly impressed upon readers, as it has been since the publication of "N. & Q."

H. W. T.

TOASTS (3rd S. vii. 397.)—The toast attributed by CYRIL to Dr. Enfield, has been given to the celebrated Tom Sheridan when he contested the shoemaking borough of Stafford: "May the trade of Stafford be trampled under foot by all the world." The story adds, that it was misunderstood by the electors, and the wit was obliged to explain.

C. T.

MEANING OF ARBERY (3rd S. vii. 345, 407.)—MR. DIXON omits half of my quotation from Mandeville, which is important in fixing the meaning of the word "arbery": for, after mentioning the scarcity of "arbery, in that contree," he says: "thei brennen the dong of bestes for defaute of wood." Clearly showing that wood for fuel was included in his term arbery. It was a general term, which included "trees that beren fruite," as well as "othere," which were devoted to the fire.

C. T.

"COMPLAINT" OF SIR DAVID LINDSAY (3rd S. vii. 78.)—L. will find that his explanation of the words "Pa Da Lyn" is considered by Lord Lindsay to be the correct one, by referring to the Lives of the Lindsays, in the chapter treating of Sir David Lindsay's Works. Not having the work by me, I cannot give the number of the volume and page. The work was published in 1849.

SCOTUS.

DRAGON (3rd S. vii. 418.)—If BLAZON will refer to Mr. Lower's amusing Curiosities of Heraldry (London, 1845,) he will find in chapter iv., on the chimerical figures (pp. 92—97), an account of the dragon which will, I think, interest him.

J. WOODWARD.

CARY FAMILY: BISHOPRIC OF KILLALOE (3rd S. vii. 117, 170, 424.)—I regret that the typographical error of a letter on p. 157 of the Letters of Sir Robert Cecil, which I edited for the Camden Society, and which error escaped notice in revising the proofs, should have given so much trouble. The prelate intended to be referred to, was William Casey not Carey.

William Casey was Rector of Kilcornan, in the diocese of Limerick, and was advanced to the see of Killaloe by King Edward VI., by a mandate dated Oct. 23. Among the Pat.-Rolls, 4th Edward VI., is a letter of the Lord Protector and Council in behalf of the Earl of Desmond for conferring the bishopric, when it shall be void, to "such a man as shall for his literature and life be meet for the same." In pursuance of the terms of this letter, the bishopric was granted to William Casey, anno 5^o.

He was consecrated at Dublin on Oct. 23 (Pat.-Rolls) by the Archbishop of Dublin, assisted by the Bishops of Kildare, Leighlin and Ferns. Queen Mary deprived him by a Commission, issued in 1556; but in 1571, he was restored by Queen Elizabeth. When he became aged and infirm, Dennis Campbell, Dean of Limerick, was appointed his coadjutor in 1588; and in 1591 he died, having been a bishop forty years.

JOHN MACLEAN.

Hammer-smith.

I can explain how MELETES has fallen into the error of supposing that there was a Cary, Bishop of Killaloe. The authority quoted states that Dennis Campbell, Dean of Limerick and Rector of Drumcliffe, in the diocese of Killaloe, was, in 1588, appointed "coadjutor to his diocesan, Bishop Carey." MELETES overlooked the fact that Campbell had two dioceses, and, on referring to Archdeacon Cotton's Fasti Ecclesie Hibernicæ, it will be found that the bishop to whom he was appointed coadjutor was William Casey, Bishop of Limerick; not Carey, as misprinted in the passage cited from Sir Robert Cecil's Letters.

Your correspondent will find a valuable contribution to the history of the Cary family in Part XIII. of the Herald and Genealogist.

JOHN RIBTON GARSTIN, M.R.I.A.

Dublin.

HAG'S PRAYER (3rd S. vii. 114, 427.)—The Hag's Prayer is well known in Lancashire, and is still repeated by boys and girls "in country places" after the Lord's Prayer on retiring to rest. Its terms, however, are somewhat different from those given by A. A. In a series of papers which I read before the Lancashire and Cheshire Historic Society, during the years 1859, 1860, and 1861, which are printed in vols. xi., xii., and xiii. of their Transactions, I have entered at length into our local superstitions, and have given the Hag's Prayer as follows:—

"Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
Bless the bed which I lie on;
There are four corners to my bed,
Which four angels overspread,
Two at the feet, two at the head.

"If any ill thing me betide,
Beneath your wings my body hide.
Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
Bless the bed that I lie on. Amen."

The Rev. William Thornber notices the same custom in his History of Blackpool, p. 99, as still existing in the Fylde district; and my friend, the late Rev. James Dugan, M.A., T.C.D., informed me that the Irish midwives in Ulster use a similar formula when visiting their patients. He said that they first mark each corner of the house with the sign of the cross, and on entering the house repeat the following words:—

"Here are four corners to her bed,
Four angels at her head.
Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
God bless the bed that she lies on.
New moon, new moon, God bless me,
God bless this house and family."

The whole prayer appears to me to be simply a Christianised relic of the old Scandinavian faith. This is more particularly the case with the Ulster form, which exhibits the formula in its transition state. A Westmoreland friend of mine used to repeat the Lancashire form every night until some one persuaded his mother that it was a Popish invocation, and then he was ordered to discontinue it as something too impious to be uttered by a Protestant!

T. T. WILKINSON, F.R.A.S., &c.

Burnley, Lancashire.

ROMAN HAND (3rd S. vii. 338, 429.)—The saying, "Roman hand," no doubt, is derived from the passage cited from Twelfth Night, in which place, doubtless, it refers to the style of handwriting which Maria had learnt to imitate so well (Act V. Sc. 1, towards the end),—

"Alas! Malvolio, this is not my writing,
Though I confess much like the character;
But out of question 'tis Maria's hand."

The fair Roman hand in fashion at the time (and beautiful it was) may be seen in examples at the British Museum. The term now generally refers rather to a bold style of composition, by which the writer can easily be detected, though he does not write under his own name. J. C. J.

THEODOLITE (3rd S. iv. 51, 135, 217.)—You now have had as etymological explanations of the word Theodolite, — θεο-δολις — θεοδωμαι ειδωλον — θεω-δωλος-ιτρος, and θεοδωμαι εδωδς. The only one worth a moment's consideration is the last, and that is entitled to notice simply because more generally received, especially by professional men. Your valued correspondent, A. A., to whose opinion on a point simply professional one would have great hesitation in offering an objection, says that θε is "the ordinary abbreviation of the Greek θεοδωμαι." This is not so. There is not a single word in English with this abbreviation, nor is there either in Greek or Latin. I will go further, and say that there could be no such word. For the verbal would come last, as in telegraph, semaphore, monogram, viaduct, &c.; and the verb † could not have been simple, but of a verbal form, and so that θε could be no abbreviation of it. A. A.'s objection as to date also falls to the ground, for the word Theodolite, i. e. "Theodelite, or a topographical glasse," occurs, as has already been shown as early as 1611 in a book printed by A. Hopton, and in the same also occurs the word "circumferentor." So that neither of these words are modern as is set down by the "tradition among surveyors." This early date (1611) makes it also all but impossible that the word Theodolite was taken from the name of the person to whom the book I mentioned in my last was dedicated; but nearly certain that the name was borrowed from one of his family. J. C. J.

* There is no such word.

† Greek verbs are never compounded except with prepositions.

THE DUKE OF BRUNSWICK'S "FIFTY REASONS" (3rd S. vii. 68, 121, 428.)—The title given by CARLFORD of the copy of the above work in his possession, is the original title under which it was published in English; and which it bore, I believe, till the new edition was published by Keating & Brown in 1822, of which copies used to be very common; but the work has now quite disappeared from our catalogues. The first edition must have been published towards the end of the seventeenth century, or early in the eighteenth. For I find it in the—"Catalogue of Books sold by Tho. Meighan, Bookseller, in Drury Lane, where gentlemen may be furnished with all sorts of new books that come out; and have ready money for any library, in what language soever."

This Catalogue is appended to a very scarce book, The Primer, or Office of the B. Virgin Mary, printed in the year 1717.

CARLFORD enquires if his edition of 1741 is scarce. Certainly it is; and I fear that the same is to be said now of the edition even of 1822, the last with which I am acquainted. In the Catalogue of J. P. Coghlan for 1793, the work appears with its full title, thus:—

"Fifty reasons or motives why the Roman Catholic Apostolic religion ought to be preferred to all the sects this day in Christendom, and which induced his most serene Highness Anthony Ulrick, Duke of Brunswick and Lunenburgh, to abjure Lutheranism. To which is (sic) added, three valuable papers. I. The decision of the Protestant university of Helmstadt in favour of the Roman Catholic religion. II. Copies of two papers written by the late Charles II. King of Great Britain. III. And of a paper written by the late Duchess of York, spouse of James, afterwards the second king of that name. Price 1s. stitched in blue."

All these are included in the edition of 1822, but the title has been abbreviated. F. C. H.

IRISH BOOKS AND MSS. (3rd S. vii. 414.)—MR. EUGENE O'CAVANAGH'S enumeration of Irish publications will be serviceable in directing attention to the yet extant literature of the most ancient of European languages and races. If the catalogue was extended to MSS. likewise, it would assuredly lead to the discovery of many, especially those in possession of private persons, which have been jealously withheld from public ken, lest a loan might become an appropriation, or lest the prized documents should be marred, or remodelled, in course of transcribing. Within the last fifty years, many such MSS. have been irrevocably lost; but numbers still are to be found, even among humble families (of ancient lineage, however), in the S. and W. of Ireland. These chiefly relate to genealogical and personal annals, and are dashed with a colouring of romance; but a vein of authentic history is traceable through them all.

In enumerating Irish versions of the Scriptures, I venture to call the attention of collectors to the Irish New Testament (Munster dialect) by Robert Keane, of Eccles Street, Dublin—or, as he subscribes on the title-page, adopting his ancient tribal surname O'Catáin. Only a few score copies of this uncommonly beautiful edition were printed, the expense being considerable, and no encouragement manifest for sale of a large issue. It is a small 4to on good paper of even quality, substantially bound, and printed by Gill of Trinity College, Dublin, in Irish type, the clearest and easiest to the eye I have ever seen. The soundest guarantee for the correctness of this version is the reputation of the translator, whose unobtrusive disposition cannot altogether conceal from a large circle of friends his accurate and comprehensive acquaintance with the classical and Celtic languages. J. L.

Dublin.

"PISCIS FLOTANS" (3rd S. vii. 55, 124, 288, 384.)—The query—"What was piscis flotans?"—has elicited an answer from MR. BINGHAM, a reply from the original querist P. S. C., and a rejoinder by the former which is evidently very far from the mark: inasmuch as the holibut (the fish suggested by him) is an inhabitant of the northern seas, rarely met with in the British Channel, and quite unknown in the island of Guernsey. Five minutes conversation with an intelligent and experienced fisherman of that island, Pierre le Noury (well known to the readers of The Field), has I believe put me in the way of giving a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. He tells me that the fishermen here make a distinction between "poisson du fond" and "poisson du flot." Among the former are included all sorts of flat fish, as well as congers; which last, it will be remembered, was the staple fishery of the island. These are never taken except in deep water, and close to the bottom. The "poisson du flot" includes mackerel, pilchards, gar-fish, whiting, mullets, bream, and all other sorts of fish which swim near the surface of the water. "Piscis flotans" we may, therefore, conclude to be synonymous with "poisson du flot." I must however remark that, in a copy of the document referred to by P. S. C., to be found among the MSS. of the Harleian Collection (No. 1617), the sentence stands thus: "Omne batellum portans piscem flotans in Normanniam." This reading makes

"flotans" refer to the boat, not to the fish carried in it; but as the copy appears to be inaccurate in other particulars, no great stress can be laid on this variation.

E. M'C.

Guernsey.

ASSUMPTION OF ARMS (3rd S. vii. 427.)—I have read with much pleasure the observations of your correspondents upon this subject. None of them have, however, suggested any practical remedy, such as would render it impossible for seal engravers and heraldic swindlers to practise on the vanity and credulity of would-be bearers of coats of arms. A catalogue of persons whose arms or pedigrees are registered in the College of Arms would do very much to mitigate the evil. It should be formed by one of the members of the College. A work of this kind was published for the Heralds' Office, Ireland, by William Skey, A.M., F.S.A., St. Patrick Pursuivant and Registrar of the Heralds' Office, in Ireland, under the following title:—

"The Heraldic Calendar, a List of the Nobility and Gentry whose Arms are registered and Pedigrees recorded in the Heralds' Office, Ireland. Dublin: 1846. 8vo."

Such a book would be the best means of informing us who the British gentry really are, would be of infinite use to the genealogist, and would no doubt prove remunerative to the compiler.

GEORGE W. MARSHALL.

KEY TO THE CHALDEE MANUSCRIPT (3rd S. v. 314-317.)—Looking over some old papers lately, I found among them the accompanying "Key," which I send as supplementary to MR. BATES's communication. I may add that the paper from which I copy is dated "Glasgow, 12th Nov. 1818," and was written by myself at that time.

Chapter I. verse 3. Blackwood; 4. Pringle and Cleg-horn; 16. Constable; 17. Edinburgh Review; 39. Henry Mackenzie (Author of The Man of Feeling); 44. Walter Scott; 49. Professor Jameson; 53. Dr. Brewster; 55. P. H. Tytler; 56. A. Henderson (General Post Office); 57. R. P. Gillies; 58. C. Mackenzie; 62. Shairp of Hod-dam. Chapter II. verse 2, Editor; 10. J. Wilson, J. of P.; 11. Author of The White Cottage; 12. Rev. A. Thomson; 13. James Hogg; 14. Dr. M^r Rie; 17. Mr. Riddell; 18. McCulloch and Galloway (ny. of Galloway?); 22. Dr. Gordon. Chapter III. v. 14. Mr. Jeffrey; 21. Prof. Leslie; 22. Prof. Playfair; 35. J. G. Dalzell; 45. Hugh Murray. Chapter IV. v. 1. Macvey Napier; 6. Jamieson, Register Office; 8. Neill, the printer; 18. Gray, High School; 19. S. McCormick; 20. John Ballantyne; 21. James Graham; 23. Principal Baird; 24. D. Bridges; 25. Dr. Duncan; 26. Ja. Baxter; 27. P. Gibson; 28. S. Anderson, Master of St. Luke's Hospital.

J. MACRAY.

Oxford.

PETRUS DE ALVA ET ASTORGA (3rd S. vii. 400.) The British Museum printed Catalogue contains two works by this author:—

"Armamentarium seraphicum, et regestum universale tenendo titulo immaculatæ conceptionis."—Matritii, 1649, fol.

"Sol veritatis, cum ventilabro seraphico, pro candida Aurora Maria, &c."—Matritii, 1660, fol.

His name does not appear in the Bodleian Catalogue, nor in Reading's Catalogue of Sion College. Grasse, in his Trésor de Livres rares et précieux, says that all the works of this Franciscan are rare and curious. In one of them he gives 4000 coincidences between St. Francis and Jesus Christ. No. 78 of these tells us that "the Saviour was nine months in his mother's womb, and so was St. Francis."

R. B. PROSSER.

25, Southampton Buildings, W.C.

THE WORD "MON" (3rd S. vii. 435.)—In the impromptu lines here given, the word "mon" is put into the mouth of a Scotch M.P. as meaning the English "man."

This is a very common supposition, made by Englishmen as to the Scotch mode of pronouncing the word, but it is a total mistake; and I use the freedom to quote as follows from the Preface to the abridged edition of Dr. Jamieson's Dictionary:

"A in Man, &c. has nearly the same sound in Scotch as in English. Vulgar English writers who use 'mon' for 'man,' 'hond' for 'hand,' &c., believing that this is pure Scottish, show that they have studied the works of Ramsay and Burns to little purpose. The rhymes to such words occurring in Scottish poems will at once point out the true pronunciation, as for example:—

'Then gently scan your brother man.'

Address to the unco Guid.

'Untie these bands from off my hands.'

Macpherson's Farewell."

G.

Edinburgh.

KONX OMPAX (3rd S. vi. 263; vii. 424.)—Can these mystical words have any connexion with the temple of Kom Ombos in Egypt? We know most of the mysterious rites originated in that country. The temple bears the cartouche of Thothmes III., B.C. 1600. See Roberts's Egypt, vol. i. 18.

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

TO OBJECT (3rd S. vi. 367.)—To object is now commonly used as a verb neuter, but if your correspondent will refer to the Dictionary of the English Language by Dr. Samuel Johnson, he will find that it there appears only as a verb active, and in one of the passages quoted from Pope, it is used nearly in the same manner as in the extract given from Farindon's Sermons:—

"... Pallas to their eyes
The mist objected."

MELETES.

TOADS IN STONE (3rd S. vii. 388, 428.)—The two halves of a block of stone in which a living toad had been found, were shown in Hyde Park at the Exhibition of 1851—"the stone without fissure, chink, or vein." The toad was alive during the earlier part of the Exhibition, but died before its close.

W. CHAPPELL.

TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN (3rd S. vii. 441.)—A speech of Archbishop Loftus made publicly in the Tholsell soon after the Quarter Sessions of St. John the Baptist to the Mayor and Aldermen of Dublin, proposing to them the making of a grant to be made from the city of Dublin of the lands of Allhallows for the building of Trinity College in Dublin, is printed in Camdeni Annales, ed. Hearne, p. lvii. (See Athen. Cantab. ii. 405.)

C. H. & THOMPSON COOPER.

Cambridge.

WORDS USED IN DIFFERENT SENSES: KICK (3rd S. vii. 278, 367, 425.)—In many parts of Lancashire the word kick is used to signify ask or beg. Its use in this sense is limited to the operatives, and generally forms part of a request for beer. A man who having (if I may use the expression) "wet one eye," and not having money enough to continue the process to his own satisfaction, seeing a gentleman coming along the road, would say, "Here comes Mr. —; I'll kick him for a pint."

H. FISHWICK.

COUPLETS (3rd S. vii. 398.)—It should not be overlooked that the Greek couplet quoted by MR. TRENCH is an epigram of Plato on Aristophanes, transferred to Sir William Jones by the change of name.

C. G. PROWETT.

CHAP (3rd S. vii. 380.)—In the instances quoted, the word "chap" is used in its proper and not its slang meaning. It denotes a buyer or seller, and is still used in the same way by old-fashioned marketers. The slang use transfers it from this special relation to a general purpose; so with the word "party," which in slang means anybody, but in legitimate English is restricted to the parties to a legal contract.

C. G. P.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

Pre-Historic Times, as illustrated by ancient Remains and the Manners and Customs of Modern Savages. By John Lubbock, F.R.S. (Williams & Norgate.)

It requires little acumen to discover the great value of the present contribution to ethnological science. When a gentleman of Mr. Lubbock's attainments devotes years to the study of such a subject, and not content with visiting all the great national museums in which collections of primeval remains are to be found, examines for himself on the spot, and in the company of those who have made these objects their especial study, the localities where they were deposited, the result could not fail to be a work rich in facts and in legitimate deductions from those facts. The book may therefore be considered as a repertory of all that has yet been ascertained with regard to Tumuli or Burial Mounds, Peat Bogs, Shell Mounds, Lake Inhabitations, Bone Caves, Riverdrift, Gravels, and in short as a most valuable text-book for the study of Pre-historic Times. We ought to add that it contains upwards of one hundred and fifty illustrations.

The New Testament for English Readers: containing the Authorised Version; with a revised English Text, Marginal References, and a Critical and Explanatory Commentary. By Henry Alford, D.D., Dean of Canterbury. In Two Volumes. Vol. II. Part I. The Epistles of St. Paul. (Rivingtons.)

The readers of the first volume of Dean Alford's valuable edition of the New Testament will not be surprised to find that the Epistles receive a somewhat different form of illustration from that with which the learned editor accompanied the Four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles; and that the number of corrections necessary to bring out the readings and renderings is so great, that, instead of confining himself to noting these below the text, the editor has found it unavoidable that a Revised Text should be published; which is here accordingly printed side by side with the Authorised Version. The rendering in the subjoined notes is not always identical with that in the Revised Text; but is usually rougher and more literal, thus affording additional illustration of the meaning. The Dean's valuable and learned Introductions to the several Epistles, in which he examines their authorship and authenticity—the objects for which, and the time when, and places where they were written—occupies nearly one hundred and fifty pages; and abounds with information calculated to make still more intelligible to mere English readers, this important division of the Holy Scriptures.

Moxon's Miniature Poets. A Selection from the Works of Frederick Locker. With Illustrations by Richard Doyle. (Moxon & Co.)

The second volume of Mr. Moxon's dainty series of Miniature Poets is occupied with the effusions of Mr. Locker, who obviously asks with Horace—

"... ridentem dicere verum Quid vetat?"

and who masks many a deep thought and much true poetic feeling under the quips and cranks and wreathed smiles of a wearer of motley. Many of Mr. Locker's graceful and touching little poems are as gracefully illustrated by Richard Doyle.

The Anti-Teapot Review. Nos. I. to V. (Houlston & Wright.)

These are the literary effusions of a Club (mostly of young Oxford men) which rejoices in the name of "Ye Red Club"—a Club which when it meets, as we guess—

"May sometimes counsel take—but never tea."

If our readers would fain know what "Anti-Teapotism" is, against which the Review declares war, we must refer them to the Review itself.

Notices to Correspondents.

B. J. For some account of the last wolf in Scotland see "N. & Q." 2nd S. viii. 396, 402.

WM. BLOOD. "The Stars and the Angels" was published in 1859, by Hamilton, Adams & Co., London; Menzies, Edinburgh; and M^r Gluckman & Gill, Dublin.

FRANKS. Will "H. F.," who wishes to exchange franks, furnish us with his address.

Answers to other Correspondents in our next.

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 3d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STRAIGHT COURSE for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly INDEX) is 11s. 4d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. BAKER, 28, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all COMMUNICATIONS FOR THE EDITOR should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1865.

CONTENTS.—N° 181.

NOTES—Notes from the Issue Rolls, 471—Longevity, 472—Bagman, 473—A Chichester Epigram—Duffer—The last Member of the Irish Parliament—Passage in Plautus—Nankoon—A Fourth Parallel Proverb—Objective, 473.

QUERIES:—"Lillibullero," 475—J. L. Armstrong—Cawnpore Queries—Edward Croke—Exchequer Records—Foster of Leicester Grange, Warwickshire, and co. Leicester—Fun—Sir Richard Hardres, Bart.—Kilpeck—Local Names—Marcolphus—Marriage Customs—"The Metropolitan Magazine"—Miniature—An old Prophecy from Nostradamus—Polygamy—Computations of Regnal Years—Sago and Port Wine—Stilts—William Earl of Ulster—Vomina de Theologia Gentili—Worcestershire Families, 474.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Whit-Sunday, Whitsunday, or Whitsun Day?—Five Miniatures—"Sermons to Asses"—A Jacobus Piece of Gold—Mother-in-Law—Park—Mundungus, 474.

REPLIES:—Fictitious Pedigrees: William Sidney Spence, 480—Bally Salisbury, 481—Horse: Grace, 482—Gibbon's Autobiography: Ogresses, 483—Cold or Cole Harbour, 484—Rhymes to Dickens and Thackeray, 484—Cannel Coal, 485—Chevisance—De la Tour d'Auvergne—King's Lynn—Philippe Barls of Pembroke—New Style—"Religio Clerici," &c.—Sash Windows—Adverbs improperly used—Origin of the Word Superstition—Anonymous Hymns—Hoyle Family—Hingham Boxes—Henry Marten—Abraham's Conversion—"The Anti-Teapot Review"—Spur Money in Belfries—Episcopal Bordure, Label, &c.—Quotation Wanted—Lunatic Literature—Limehouse—Spitting, &c., 486.

Notes on Books, &c.

Dates.

NOTES FROM THE ISSUE ROLLS.

In recently examining a quantity of the Issue Rolls for the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II., I met with various curious entries, of which I "made notes," thinking that they might be worth the attention of "N. & Q." They are mostly genealogical:—

"Die Martia, xiiij die Junii.—Rico de Tempest, Custodi Ville Berewyci sup Twedam, denar' sibi libat' p man' Johis Wyclif, sup eadem custodia, etc., cxxv li."—(Exitus, Pasch. 36 Ed. III.)

Can this be the great reformer or any immediate relative?

Oct. 7, 41 Ed. III. [1367.] News brought to the king by Ludovico de Colonia of the birth of a son of the empress. [Sigismund, afterwards emperor.] He is rewarded with ten pounds. (Exitus, Mich. 41 Ed. III.)

Same date. News of the birth of a daughter of the Duchess of Barre, brought by Francisco, her messenger, who receives five pounds.

Oct. 29. News of the birth of a daughter of the King of France. [This must be Jeanne, the date of whose birth is, however, given by Moreri as June 7, 1366; she died, according to the same authority, Dec. 21, 1368. The three eldest daughters of Charles V. all died in 1360, and the fifth, Marie, was not born until 1370.]

Feb. 3, 42 Ed. III. [1368.] News of the birth of a son of the Duchess of Berry. [She had three sons, Charles, Jean, and Louis.] (Exitus, Mich. 41 Ed. III.)

Oct. 18, 22 Ric. II. [1398.] News of the birth of a son of the King of France. [Jean, afterwards dauphin, born Aug. 31, 1398.] (Exitus, Mich. 22, Ric. II.)

"Thos. Swynford, militi [legitimate son of Katherine Swynford], et Johanne Crophull ux'i ejus."—Exitus, Mich. 19 Ric. II.

June 6. Payments for the burial of Thomas, late Earl of Kent [the king's half brother] in the church of the blessed Peter, Westminster, at the king's cost. (Fragment of Exitus Roll, qu. Pasch. 20 Ric. II.)

But the most remarkable entry of all is to come, and I should be glad to receive a good opinion upon its meaning. On July 7, 39 Ed. III. [1365], 604. 13s. 4d. is paid to William de Harplo, valet of the Lord Prince of Aquitaine [Edward the Black Prince] bringing letters to Philippa, Queen of England, from the said Prince, concerning the birth of a son of the said prince. This was Prince Edward born at Angoulême in the previous February. On Tuesday, Feb. 25, 40 Ed. III. [1366], 161. 13s. 4d. was paid to a valet of the Lord Prince of Wales, coming from Aquitaine with news (rumoribus), not letters, to the king of the birth of a son of the said prince. This was Richard II., born at Bordeaux, Jan. 6, 1366. But on the third of May, 41 Ed. III. [1367], occurs the following entry, which I give verbatim that no mistake may appear:—

"Stepho Rummelowe, vall'to Dñi Principis Vasconi, venienti cum l'ris directis Dño R. et Dñe Re^{ce} de natiuitate filij. Principisse Vasconi; in denar' sibi lib' vidj. de dono Dñi R. c. p'i., et de dono Dñe Re^{ce} c. mqi. p l'ra de p'ua'to sigillo de hoc P'nto."

Is there any question that "the Prince of Gascony" denotes the Black Prince? Or is there any probability that this letter was the official intimation of the birth of Richard II., then sixteen months old? If not so, and I can scarcely think either of these suppositions probable, we have here a third and hitherto unknown son of the Black Prince. According to Froissart, the prince quitted Aquitaine for his Spanish campaign in January, 1367, not returning until the early part of 1368. This extract from the Issue Rolls would seem to infer that he was in Aquitaine in April, 1367, as otherwise the valet would have been said to come from Spain bearing his letters. On Feb. 17, 1368, Geoffrey de Stynele was despatched on an embassy to the prince to Spain. Froissart, be it remembered, places the birth of Richard II. in 1367; but even if his reckoning be adopted (and the general consent of historians seems against it), who then was the prince of whose birth news was brought to King Edward on Feb. 25, 1366?

Another awkward date is that of the battle of Navaretta, which, according to Froissart, was fought on April 3, 1367. But Sir John so rarely gives a date at all, and is so frequently wrong when he does give one, that his testimony is of little weight when it comes in competition with that of the Rotuli. HERMENTRUDE.

LONGEVITY.

[The following articles have been in type for some time. Their publication has been delayed in order that they might appear in connection with a series of Papers on Longevity now preparing for these pages. As from the nature, extent, and difficulties of the inquiries connected with these Papers, some weeks may elapse before they can be ready, it has been thought advisable not to delay any longer the following communications from our correspondents. The note in which E. H. A. so candidly points out the error "of 21 years" in the instance formerly adduced, shows how necessary it is to receive with caution the statements of longevity which are so often and so readily advanced, without any evidence in support of them.—Ed. "N. & Q."]

The interesting correspondence on longevity, which was lately carried on in The Times, has come to an abrupt termination, and as the parliamentary session has now begun, we cannot expect, as A DOUBTER truly observes, that the correspondence will be renewed. The subject is, I think, exactly suited for discussion in the columns of "N. & Q.," always supposing that correspondents would avoid accumulating instances of longevity picked up by hearsay, or extracted from works devoid of all critical tone, such as the Annual Register. Every parish has its stories of centenarians, and they appear in provincial newspapers as part of the regular stock in trade, along with toads in rocks, showers of fish and frogs, singing mice, living snakes in men's stomachs, year-long fasts, the sea-serpent, &c. What we want is a series of carefully investigated cases, where the centenarian's baptismal entry and course of life have been investigated, and with complete identification at the time of death. A great number of cases are to be found in a volume by Easton,—

"Human Longevity, recording the Name, Age, Place of Residence, and Year of the Decease, of 1712 Persons, who attained a Century and upwards, from A.D. 66 to 1799."

The work, however, displays no spirit of criticism. If we dismiss as altogether absurd and incredible, the stories of the Countess of Desmond, Old Parr, and Henry Jenkins, who are said to have reached the ages of 145, 159, and 169 years, there yet remains several cases of extreme longevity, in which the dates of baptism and burial appear to have been ascertained with precision. Two remarkable instances are those of Robert Bowman and Mary Noble, both natives of Cumberland. They were personally examined by Dr. Barnes, who reported their cases in the fourth and tenth volumes of the Edinburgh Philosophical Journal. The doctor himself searched the parish register of Hayton, and found the entry of Bowman's baptism in 1705; he was still living in 1820, having completed his 115th year. In 1823 Dr. Barnes saw a copy (not the original) of Mary Noble's baptismal certificate, dated Sept. 17, 1716. She was accordingly in her 107th year at the time of his visit to her.

On Jan. 10, 1864, Mr. Robert Chapman died at Rosherville, in Kent, in his 102nd year. He was born at Whitby, Oct. 12, 1762, and, belonging to one of the oldest and most respected families of the town, his whole career was well known. A friend of mine, now far on among the eighties, dined with Mr. Chapman on the occasion of his 100th birth day. JAYDER.

Having in 1st S. v. 358 adduced as an instance of remarkable longevity Patrick Machylwian, a Scotchman, vicar of Lesbury, in Northumberland, stated to have lived to the age of 112 years, and to have died in 1659, I think myself bound to notice the fact, that the said old gentleman did, in the year 1634, when on examination as a witness in the Ecclesiastical Court at Durham, state his age to be then only threescore and six, so that supposing him to have died in 1659 he would fall short of his reputed age of 112 by 21 years. See the Proceedings in Ligh Court of Commission for Durham and Northumberland, edited by Mr. Longstaffe for the Surtees Society, case of Brandling.

E. H. A.

The paragraph below would be interesting if any of your American correspondents could authenticate the dates:—

"THE OLDEST MAN IN THE WORLD.—A Wisconsin paper says that the oldest man in the world is now living in Caledonia, in that state. His name is Joseph Crele, and his age is one hundred and thirty-nine years. He has lived in Wisconsin more than a century, and was first married in New Orleans one hundred and nine years ago. Some years afterwards he settled at Prairie du Chien, while Wisconsin was yet a province of France. Before the Revolutionary war he was employed to carry letters between Prairie du Chien and Green Bay. It is but a few years ago that he was called as a witness in the Circuit Court, in a case involving the title to certain real estates at Prairie du Chien, to give testimony in relation to events that transpired eighty years before. He now resides with a daughter by his third wife, who is over seventy years of age."

PERCY B. ST. JOHN.

Allow me to draw the attention of inquirers interested in this subject to an extract from a Diary of Dr. Thomas Raffles of Liverpool, pub-in his Life by his son (8vo, London, 1864, p. 123.) It runs as follows:—

"July 22nd, 1814. Rode with Mr. Mather to Todmorden in the centre of the beautiful vale of that name. On our way called on Mr. Marden, near Bacup, where I saw and conversed with Mary Harrison, aged 104. She had been in the family ever since she was twelve years old, and is in full possession of every faculty except that of hearing."

Perhaps some correspondent can inform you when this exemplar of "the constant service of the antique world" died, and in what manner her death was registered. L. A. B.

BAGMAN.

In the latest edition of Mr. Hotten's Slang Dictionary, "Bagman" is said to be "a commercial traveller;" but no explanation is given as to the origin or derivation of the word. I venture to suggest that it took its rise in the saddle-bags in which the commercial traveller of the past century carried his patterns and goods; which saddle-bags, being of larger dimensions than those usually carried by travellers on horseback, would designate the commercial traveller, par excellence, as the Bagman. I find from the recollections and traditionary belief of those who were acquainted with the pre-railway days of the Great North Road between Alconbury-hill and Wansford, that the commercial travellers usually dispensed with vehicles, and made their journeys on horseback—a system which permitted them to get at the remote villages, and along "droves," "bullock roads," and rough lanes whose rude state of nature would have made (and often now does make) them to be impracticable for carriages on springs. The horses of these commercial travellers were so laden with distended saddle-bags, that their riders were sometimes half hidden in them, and were hoisted into their seats with no little difficulty.

Among other tales that are told of the doings of the highwaymen near to Alconbury Hill is one in which a Bagman figures as the unheroic hero. This Bagman had turned off from the Great North Road, and was riding towards Huntingdon when he was stopped by a highwayman. By clapping spurs to his horse, however, he contrived to make his escape from the thief's clutches, though with some difficulty. He had not gone far when he overtook a decent-looking man riding in the same direction as himself. Now the Bagman was not over bold, and his saddle-bags were well filled, so he thought it prudent to ask the traveller to allow him to ride in his company; but, to his surprise, the stranger gave him no answer. He again repeated his request with a similar result, the stranger all the time watching him earnestly but suspiciously. For the third time the Bagman addressed the stranger, who thereupon turned his horse across the road and pulled up to arrest the Bagman's progress, at the same time thrusting his right hand into his coat pocket. The Bagman only paused long enough to catch sight of the gleam of a barrel, when, spurring his horse, he dashed past that of the traveller, and galloped away towards Huntingdon, expecting every moment to hear the clatter of pursuing hoofs and the report of a pistol. The Bagman reached Huntingdon in hot haste, and summoned the posse comitatus to sally back with him and make a capture of the highwayman. A strong party was formed, and, under the Bagman's guidance, started in pursuit. They had not gone very far when the Bagman cried, "There he is!" and pointed to a horseman approaching them at a sober jog-trot. "There he is! that's the highwayman; don't let him escape." "That a highwayman!" cried his companions; "why, it's our Mayor. That's the Mayor of Huntingdon!" "Impossible!" said the incredulous Bagman. "But it's true," they rejoined, as the horseman drew nearer; "you can ask him for yourself." "Mayor or no mayor," said the Bagman stoutly, "he reined up his horse, and, without saying a word, pulled out a pistol upon me; and I might have been murdered and robbed, if I had not galloped off." "What sort of a pistol was it?" said his companions with a grin. "Not one to be laughed at," said the indignant Bagman. "It was a very large pistol." "Well, we'll ask him to show it to us. Here the gentleman is. Good morning, Mr. Mayor." The horseman thus addressed reined up his steed, and thrusting his hand into his coat pocket, pulled out something without saying a word. "There's the pistol," said the Bagman, as he caught sight of the gleam of a barrel. His companions burst into a roar of derisive laughter; as well they might, for, to his great astonishment, the Bagman saw the horseman raise the weapon deliberately and place it to his own ear, where it resolved itself to a no more formidable weapon than an ear-trumpet. It is needless to add that the horseman, who was indeed the Mayor of Huntingdon, was not only very deaf, but was as honest a man as the Bagman, who now apologised to him for the mistake that he had made. CUTHBERT BEDE.

A CHICHESTER EPIGRAM.—Perceiving that you have recently, among other rich seasonings in your miscellany of what I would term, if I might coin a word, condimental literature, opened compartments for uncirculated epigrams, and for curious conjunctions of significant names (see the No. for April 22, p. 322), I beg leave to offer a notice which may perhaps be considered to combine both characters.

In the south-eastern outlet of the city of Chichester, called the Harnet, there was for many years until very lately a pawnbroker's shop, kept by Messrs. Need & Ransome. But the latter, and more eligible name for such an establishment, has, I believe, within a few years past disappeared from the front of the house. This extremely curious nominal coincidence has been thus versified rather than epigrammatised; for these having been, as I have every reason to conclude, the actual names of the two partners, constituted of themselves a prosaic and suggestive epigram:—

On Messrs. Need & Ransome's Pawnbroker's Shop, Harnet, Chichester.

"Observe beneath those three gilt balls
Implied assurance handsome;
That where the fond pledge Need enthrals,
Is always found a Ransome."

T. A. H.

DUFFER.—This word is an example of those which continue for almost an indefinite period in use, without attaining to reputable use. The Oxford Journal of Saturday, May 25, 1765, under the head of "Thursday's Post," has the following, which might have been written almost verbatim in 1865:—

"Yesterday an East India Duffer, or fellow who pretends to sell ignorant people very great bargains of smuggled goods, accosted a well-looking man in Holborn with the usual address, at the same time showing some samples of his merchandise from under his great coat, and enjoining secrecy—all which was promised; but the supposed countryman asking if he had no tea, was carried to a house in St. Giles's: where, in quality of his commission as a Custom-house officer, he seized some dozen of flimsy French silk stockings, a quantity of adulterated Dutch tea, and other goods, to the amount of sixty pounds."

H. B. C.

THE LAST MEMBER OF THE IRISH PARLIAMENT.
Your correspondent MR. H. LOFTUS TOTTENHAM having supplied a copy of a curious document relative to Irish Parliamentary Representation (3rd S. vii. 375), I am induced to send you the following cutting from the Daily Express, May 15, 1865, for preservation in "N. & Q." :—

"We regret to announce the death of Sir Thomas Staples, which took place at his residence, 11, Merriion Square, East [Dublin], shortly before seven o'clock last evening. The deceased baronet, who was the father of the Irish Bar, had nearly completed his 90th year. He was the last Member of the Irish Parliament, in which assembly he sat for the borough of Coleraine, and subsequently for Knocktopher, county Kilkenny. He was one of the independent members who voted against the Act of Union."

The late Earl of Charlemont, who died in December, 1863, had also been a Member of the Irish Parliament.

ABIDA.

PASSAGE IN PLAUTUS.—

"Dus maniculæ connexæ."

Rudens, Act IV. Sc. 4, line 125.

There is a passage in Plautus's Rudens which has given me some trouble to understand; but of which I feel sure I have hit upon the right meaning at last. In the discovery scene, Palæstra describes, among other crepusculæ:—

"Pal. Post est situla argentea et dæ connexæ maniculæ et Sucula."

The dictionaries citing this passage give, some of them, "manicula," a little hand; others, a plough handle. Both of these interpretations are utterly unsatisfactory. "Connexæ maniculæ" would be a ridiculous way of expressing a toy-plough: and two little hands, joined together, would be no better. The real meaning of the passage is explained by poor Gripius's exclamation in the next line, when he wishes Palæstra may go and hang herself with her "situla et porculis," making no mention of the "maniculæ." "Maniculæ" means handles, not only of a plough. If we grant this, all is easy. The articles in question are a child's pail, with two ears rivetted or soldered separately; and they were "connexæ" by the handle, which worked in them—just as is the case in all old examples of the "situla." Any one who collects Roman or Greek curiosities from London, and other excavations, must know how frequently these ears ("maniculæ"), and the handle which binds them together, are found still connected, though the pail itself has perished. Gripius, then, only mentions the pail and piggies; because the "maniculæ connexæ" were part of the former.

J. C. J.

NANKEN.—The following note may be useful to some of your readers:—

"Yellow Cotton.—A new species of cotton, called Nanken, of a bright yellow color, and fine texture, is now raised in the United States. The seed was furnished by Mr. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury, and procured from Sicily." 1828.

W. P.

A FOURTH PARALLEL PROVERB.—To the three proverbs in different languages, lately published in "N. & Q." cautioning against the too early adoption of a summer dress, I can now add another:—

"*Hasta el cuarenta de Mayo,
No te quites el sayo.*"

Literally, Till the fortieth of May do not strip yourself of the wrap. This proverb, I am told, is common in the north of Spain, but, as might be inferred from so late a day as the 9th of June, is unknown in the Centre and South. The odd way of negating any change in May, puts one in mind of Greek Kalends. The word sayo is, I believe, of Oriental origin, and is identical with sash.

K.

OBJECTIVE.—It is generally supposed that what may be termed the German meaning of the words objective and subjective, is quite modern; dating no further back, so far as we are concerned, than

Coleridge, who was much given to the use of the words in his philosophical monologues. But is this really the case? Does not the following extract from an old author go to prove the contrary; at least, so far as "objective" is concerned? —

"The last chapter having designed that idol-worship (as the Devil is therein proposed objectively to be adored) is not only a great countenance, but leads vastly to the promotion of diabolical confederacies." — Pandemonium, or the Devil's Choyster, by Richard Bovey, Gent., London, 1684.

Sir Walter Scott has used this book in his work on Demonology. W. S.

Queries.

"LILLIBULLERO."

Can any of your correspondents state the exact meaning of the burden of the well-known song of "Lillibullero," which had such an effect that, as Bishop Burnet says —

"It made an impression on the King's army that cannot be imagined by those that saw it not. The whole army, and at last the people, both of city and country, were singing it perpetually."

The bishop suggests that the burden was said to be Irish words. Given at length these apparently absurd words are —

"Lillibullero, Bullen-a-lah!
Lero, lero, lillibullero, lero, lero,
Bullen a lah!"

It is true that the word "lero" is to be found in the burdens of some Irish songs, as for example, in one common in the county of Clare, where a popular air is known by the title of "Lura, lura, no da lura;" but in another version the burden given is — Mallo lero, is im bo ban, rendered in English, "Mallo, lero, audeembo bawn."

In looking over a manuscript volume of music of the time of Queen Elizabeth, in lute tablature, I happened to find the word "lero" or "leerow" repeated more than once, seemingly as a direction for the mode in which an air was to be played; as, for example, "a paven, leerow way;" and sometimes spelled "lerrow." On another page occur the words "for the leero," and "for the leeroe."

This book contains a variety of airs, to which the title, "a galliard, a taranto, a pavin, an allemand," &c., are prefixed; and the names of a few composers of the day, Edward Persé (Percy), John Johnson, Daniel Batcheler, and Dowland occur in it.

I have, further, some faint recollection of having met elsewhere, but have lost the reference, some ancient airs "set for the leerow viol." If I am accurate in this, we have here the name of some species of instrument, different, doubtless, in some degree from the viol de gamba, and others of the same class.

I should expect that some of your correspondents, who have engaged in studies similar to those of DR. RIMBAULT, MR. CHAPPELL, or MR. ROLFE, may be familiar with the word, and so readily supply the required information. If I am correct in my supposition, the word will be found to be of English or foreign origin, not Irish. Although Bishop Percy states that "Lillibullero" and "Bullen a lah!" were said to have been the words of distinction used among the Irish Papists in their massacre of the Protestants in 1641.

Hume thought the popularity of the song was rather due to Purcell, the original composer of it, than to Lord Wharton, who is stated in a pamphlet of 1712, to have been the author of the words. A modern writer on musical composition, Mr. J. Curwen, in 1852, seeking for the source of the power of ridicule in the tune, seems to give it as his opinion that "FA, the fourth on the scale, recurring, with cold sarcasm, here lies the power."

J. HUBAND SMITH, M.R.I.A.

Dublin.

J. L. ARMSTRONG. — I have a copy of a little book, entitled —

"Heart Pearles; or, Buds of Early Promise. A pleasant Fire-side or Home Companion. Forming a suitable Christmas or New Year's Present for young Readers of both Sexes. By their friend, the Editor, James Leslie Armstrong. London: Printed by William Jones, Duke Street, 1852."

This small volume contains many short poems, sonnets, ballads, &c., and also a drama, "John of Gischala." I believe that the "editor" and the author are one and the same person. Can any reader of "N. & Q." give me any information regarding the author? There was a book called Scenes from Craven, published at York in 1835, by Mr. J. L. Armstrong. R. I.

LORD ASTON OF FORFAR. — The casual mention of this nobleman's name, in a recent number of "N. & Q.," reminded me that I wished to put some queries concerning him to your readers.

It appears that, on the death of James, fifth baron, in 1751, without male issue, the title devolved upon Philip Aston — a very distant relation: that he died unmarried in 1755, and was succeeded by his brother Walter, who also died without male issue in 1763; when the honours descended to (the son of his uncle Edward) Walter Aston, father of the late Right Hon. and Rev. Lord Aston, Vicar of Tardebigge, in Worcestershire.

One of these noblemen was a cook in the employ of Sir — Mordaunt, Bart., and another was a watchmaker. May I ask which was the cook, and which the watchmaker?

As the family is now extinct, or presumed to be so, there can be no impropriety in my putting these questions:—

It appears, from the Gentleman's Magazine (1839, April, p. 377), that—

"The Rev. Walter Hutchinson Aston, Clerk, presented a petition claiming to be Baron Aston of Forfar, but no case was printed."—

Was his right to so style himself ever allowed?

There is a pedigree of the family in Berry's Hertfordshire Pedigrees, deducing the descent of the late reverend peer from Wm. Aston of Milwich, in remainder to whose posterity the original patent was framed; but it does not show the extinction of the male descendants of an elder son, some generations before the late lord's line branched off.

H. S. G.

CAWNPORE QUERIES.—I have just risen from the perusal of "Cawnpore," by G. O. Trevelyan," and wish to ask through your columns the following questions:—

1. Where did the author learn that a Ghazee was a "member of a class of religious enthusiasts," "probably hostile to our religion?"—P. 100.

2. Whence did he manage to procure the exclusive information that the infamous Nana Sahib, a Brahmin, was the adopted son of the Rajah of Sattarah, a Mahratta?—P. 57.

3. How came it to pass that Sir Henry Havelock, who did not enter the army till some years after the battle of Waterloo, was in a position to show to our Spanish allies in 1813 that an English steed could clear a French breastwork?—P. 339.

By way of Notes, I take the liberty of mentioning—

1. That a Ghazee is not a Mahomedan Brother Ignatius, but a martial and bloodthirsty fanatic, armed to the teeth, and vowed to wage war to the knife against all infidels, which, in the Indian Mutiny, meant English women and children.

2. That Nana Sahib was as much related to the Rajah of Sattarah as Richard Cromwell to Charles Stuart. The Rajah was the lineal descendant of Seevajee, the founder of the Mahratta Empire, and Nana Sahib, the representative of the Peishwas or Brahmin Mayors of the Palace, who had supplanted their masters upon the throne.

3. El Chico Blanco, immortalised by Napier in his Peninsular War, was not Henry Havelock, but his elder brother William Havelock, who fell at the head of the Fourteenth Light Dragoons in the first battle of the last Sikh war.

CHITTLEDROOG.

EDWARD CROKE.—Any information respecting Mr. Edward Croke, who was governor of Fort St. David's on the Coromandel Coast, and died in February, 1769, will be acceptable. M. P.

EXCHEQUER RECORDS.—The following transcript, which I have made from one of the mutilated Exchequer documents, appears to me well worth preserving in "N. & Q." Perhaps some of your readers may be able to tell us something of the parties who were so heavily fined:—

"Elias Best, fined 1000*l.* for drinkinge a health to the pious memmory of Stephen Collidg.

"Thomas Swaden, a Collectour of Chimny mony, fined 1000*l.* for not returneing 3 chimnys.

"David Bennables, a gold Smith, fined 500*l.* for selling little bawbleing things at faires that was not sterling.

"Isack Simbell fined 1000*l.* for barratry."

W. H. D.

FOSTER OF LEICESTER GRANGE, WARWICKSHIRE, AND OF CO. LEICESTER.—What were the arms of this family. The pedigree is given in Nichols's Leicestershire, but the arms are not given.

H. S. G.

FUN.—In the ballad of the "Battle of Harlaw" (3rd S. vii. 394), this word occurs twice. It is not in the dictionaries of Skinner, Junius, Minshull, nor even so late as that of Elisha Cole, 1724. The earliest mention I can find is in Nathan Bailey. What is the derivation of "fun," and its earliest use? How could it have got into the ballad, or is the latter of recent date?

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

SIR RICHARD HARDRES, BART.—This gentleman, who was the eldest son of Sir Thomas Hardres, Knight, of Upper Hardres, in Kent, by Eleanor, daughter of Henry Thoresby, Esq., Master in Chancery, was created a baronet, June 3, 1642. About Oct. 1660, he presented to Charles II. a petition, of which the following is an abstract:—

"Sir Rich. Hardres, Bart. of Great Hardres, co. Kent, servant to his late Majesty. Set on foot the Kentish petition in 1648, for preservation of the late King; led 2800 horse in Kent, reduced Sandwich, and seized the mock prince set up to represent His Majesty's person; suffered three long imprisonments, and high sequestration, to the loss of 7000*l.*; spent 500*l.* for plate, bedding, &c., for His Majesty, and though permitted to reclaim them, allowed them to remain on Prince Rupert's complaining of the injury to the service that their withdrawal would cause; hazarded his life by conveying information to His Majesty when in the Downs," &c.—Green's Cal. Dom. State Papers, Charles II. i. 332.

I desire to know when this loyal baronet died.

S. Y. R.

KILPECK.—Can you refer me to any historical account of Kilpeck Castle?

P. S. C.

LOCAL NAMES.—The other day being in the north of London, I was much struck with the names of the following places:—Ball's Pond, Ponder's End, Potter's Bar.

Now my queries are—Who was Ball, and where was his Pond? * Who was Ponder, and what was his End? Where did Potter reside, and by what right did he put up a Bar?

IGNORANTIA LOCI.

MARCOLPHUS.—

"Marcolphus will not lightly find a fit tree to hang himself on."—Jewel, iv. 124.

Who was Marcolphus, and what does Jewel refer to? I cannot find any explanatory note elucidating the allusion. F. C.

MARRIAGE CUSTOMS.—In the year 1476, a certificate was made by the clergy and six parishioners of Ufford, in the county of Suffolk, to the effect that:—

"Robert Hatchet, late a neighbour and parishioner of the said town of Huford, buried his wife Anne Hatchet in the said parish, the next day after Saint Mark the Evangelist, A.D. 1476; and we aforesaid testify and bear true witness that we nor none of our neighbours never knew unto this day that since the said Anne's decease, that the said Robert was 'trowhplyht' to any woman by the tityl of matrimony, but that the said Robert may take him a lawful woman unto wife in any town of Yngland."

Can any of your readers inform me whether such certificates were common, or was this a special case?

In one of the old register books of the seventeenth century belonging to this parish of Clare, Suffolk, is the following singular memorandum:—

"Memorandum, that I, Susan Ward of Clare, doe resigne all my right in John Manson to Susan frost, so that they proceed to marriage, in witness of the truth herof I the said Susan Ward have set my hand this the 5 of Januarie.

"The Mark of "Witness,
"JOHN PRENTICE"

SUSAN + WARD.

Do you know of the existence of any similar memorandums, and can you give an explanation of such a singular entry? J. G.

"THE METROPOLITAN MAGAZINE."—Can any one inform me who was editor of a periodical called The Metropolitan [Quarterly] Magazine, 1826? The magazine only existed for about a year. Are the names of any of the contributors known? R. I.

MINIATURE.—Mr. Fairholt, in his Dictionary of Terms of Art, supposes this term to be derived from the practice of writing the rubrics and initial letters of manuscripts with red-lead, or minium—the name given to vermillion by the ancients.

[* Ball's-pond, in the parish of Islington, derives its name from one John Ball, who kept a house of entertainment here about the middle of the seventeenth century, having for its sign "The Salutation." A large pond, which remained till the commencement of the present century, was probably in his day frequented by duck-hunters, and by them coupled with the name of their host. A token issued by him bears the inscription, "John Ball, at the Boarded House neere Newington Green."—Lewis's Islington, p. 360.—ED.]

This is indeed the derivation which etymologists follow each other in assigning to the term: Blount (1670), Coles (1700), Gloss. Angl. Nova (1707), &c. Kersey (1715), simply defines it "a drawing of pictures in little." I do not find the word in Cotgrave (1650), or remember meeting with it in French treatises on painting earlier than this; but his successor Guy Miegé, in his Great French Dictionary (folio, 1688), has it immediately following, as if derived from the words "Mignardise," "Mignardes," "Mignard," spelling it "Mignature;" and explaining it—"Miniature, a sort of painting in small, and in water-colours." I rather fancy this derivation; but do not know how it will fit in with the Italian "miniatori caligrafi," or rubric penmen; whose labours, together with those of the "illuminatori," produced the manuscripts and missals which have descended to us from the pre-typographic ages.

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

AN OLD PROPHECY FROM NOSTRADAMUS.—I cut the following from the New York Times, of April 4, 1865. You may consider it of sufficient interest to give to your readers.

"AN OLD PROPHECY. From the Richmond Whig, March 30. By request, we publish the following extracts from the Prophéties et Vaticinations of Nostradamus, vol. ii. of 1609:—

"About that time (1861), a great quarrel and contest will arise in a country beyond the seas—America. Many poor devils will be hung, and many poor devils will be killed by a punishment other than a cord. Upon my faith you may believe me. The war will not cease for four years, at which none should be surprised, for there will be no want of hatred and obstinacy in it. At the end of that time, prostrate and almost ruined, the people will re-embrace each other in great joy and love."

G. W.

POLYGAMY.—The late eminent prelate, Archbishop Whately, would have permitted polygamy in the case of polygamous converts, rather than have the wives in excess of one dismissed to their great injury; the youngest probably being retained by the convert, if he were obliged to select one; and the only true wife—the oldest and first—being as probably amongst the rejected. This I report meipso teste. It was said to me long before Dr. Colenso came to the same conclusion, in presence of the same missionary difficulty.

Bishops Burnet and Berkeley are said to have viewed favourably the principle of polygamy. Is it so? Give chapter and verse—so to speak.*

Sir William Capell Brooke, in his Sketches in Spain and Morocco, 1831, is further said to have recommended the practice which even unchristian nations are gradually coming to renounce.

I have not seen his book; nor Madan's extraordinary one of the last century. A CLERGYMAN.

[* Bishop Burnet's work on Polygamy is noticed in "N. & Q.," 2nd S. ii. 181.—ED.]

COMPUTATIONS OF REGNAL YEARS.—Edward I. (as any History of England will inform its reader), began to reign Jan. 25, 1272, and died on June 21, 1307. I am but a poor arithmetician, but I think I shall not commit any great error in holding that this reign thereby extended over fifty years and five months, minus a few days. How, then, comes King Edward to possess an issue roll for the Michaelmas term of his fifty-first year, tending to the following Easter?

Moreover, Edward the Black Prince died June 1376. What then mean the following entries in the Michaelmas Issue Roll for his father's fifty-third year?—

"Dec. 22. To Edward Prince of Wales, by the hands of William de Fulborne, his clerk, &c. 400*l*."

"To Edward Prince of Wales, by the hands of John my, mercer, of London, 240*l*."

"Mar. 8. To Edward Prince of Wales, &c. 266*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*."

Again, according to a Wardrobe Roll for 38 Edw. I., Elizabeth Duchess of Clarence was buried March 11, anno 38, the expenses for the transportation of her corpse to England commencing on the 31st of January previous. Yet the first part of these expenses are repaid only on Jan. 31, anno 39; appearing in the Michaelmas Issue Roll for 38 Edw. III.

Is it possible that the Michaelmas Roll takes its name from the year in which it closes, and could be reckoned before the Easter Roll of each year? i. e. does the Michaelmas Roll intitled anno 38 contain the Michaelmas term for anno 37, and the Hilary term for anno 38? or does it, as certainly seems more natural, contain the Michaelmas term for anno 38, and the Hilary term for anno 39?

This is an important question for the correct chronology of the reign. Will PROFESSOR DE ORGAN, who is learned in things in general, and others in particular, or some other archaeological and arithmetical authority, condescend to help me out of the Slough of Despond wherein I am underling?

HERMENTRUDE.

P.S. The dates of the Easter Rolls of Richard I., who commenced his reign in June, are in the same predicament.

SAGO AND PORT WINE.—When a boy, this aliment was fashionable with invalids. At that time sago was about four shillings a pound. I shall be obliged for information when, and by whom, it was introduced? While writing I may state, that a decoction of pearled barley, or Emden oats, with or without port wine, according to circumstances, offers the most nutritious food for invalids, more so than jellies or beef-tea: especially to those of the upper and middle classes, who, when in health, feed on animal diet.

A. P.

Canonbury.

STILTS.—In Marlowe's drama of The Jew of Malta, one of the characters is made to say:—

"Once at Jerusalem, where the pilgrims kneel'd,
I strewed powder on the marble stones,
And wherewithal their knees would rankle so,
That I have laugh'd a-good to see the cripples
Go limping home to Christendom on stilts."

By "stilts," in this passage, is evidently meant crutches. Was this its original meaning?

H. FISHWICK.

WILLIAM EARL OF ULSTER.—Can somebody kindly tell me the date of the death of this nobleman, the father of Elizabeth Duchess of Clarence? I should be glad to ascertain, if possible, the month as well as the year in which it occurred. For the date of his daughter's birth, if given by any trustworthy authority, I should also be greatly obliged.

HERMENTRUDE.

VOSSIUS DE THEOLOGIA GENTILI.—Brunet, Manuel du Libraire, t. v. p. 1373, says:—

"De Theologia Gentili et Physiologia Christiana, lib. ix. sive de origine et progressu idolatriæ, 6d. 2^a, Amstelodami 1668, 2 vol. in fol. L'édition d'Amsterdam, 1641, 8 vol. in 4^{to}, est moins complète."

I have three quarto volumes, which I supposed were odd ones, but I find that the only copy in the British Museum is exactly like mine. Attention is directed to the peculiarity in the catalogue. The title-page of the first volume says: "Editio tertia priori longæ auctioni et correctioni, Francofurti ad Moenum, 1675." The second is Amsterdam, 1675; and the third Amsterdam, 1689. In vols. i. and ii., the pagination and register are continuous. Prefixed to vol. iii. is an imperial privilege, giving John Blaeu the exclusive right of printing the last five books for six years, and a like Saxon privilege for ten years. The former dated 1668, the latter, 1689.

I cannot find any notice of this edition. Has Brunet mistaken it for a folio? Gerard Johann Voss died in 1649. His prefaces, dated 1641 and 1645, are reprinted; and there is no indication of an editor to make the third edition, "auctior et emendatior." Should any reader of "N. & Q." know more about these curious title-pages, or have an opportunity of consulting the folio edition of Vossius's complete Works, Amsterdam, 1695-1701, information thereon will oblige H. B. C. U. U. Club.

WORCESTERSHIRE FAMILIES.—Can any reader of "N. & Q." oblige me with the armorial bearings of the following Worcestershire families?

Prattinton, a family long resident at Bewdley, of which the late Worcestershire antiquary, Prattinton, was a member.

Penn of Harborough Hall. This family was of Harborough in the fifteenth century. The last of the race, who was uncle to the poet Shenstone, died issueless in 1731.

Bland of Ham Court.
 Ramell, Lord, of Great and Little Hampton.
 Purcell of Purcell Hall.
 Tristram of Moor Hall, in Belbroughton.
 Lea of the Hill; sheriff, 1816.
 Ballard of Evesham.
 Newce of Rock: co-heiress, married Cornwallis and Partinton.
 Zachary, representing Mucklow of Arley.
 Timbrell of Bradforton.
 Holberrow of Wolverley.
 Andrewes of Synton. (Arms were granted to Richard Andrewes, of Synton, in 1529.)
 Hodges of Broadway. (John Hodges, of Broadway, had his arms confirmed, and a crest granted in 1610.) H. S. G.

Queries with Answers.

WHIT-SUNDAY, WHITSUNDAY, OR WHITSUN DAY?—In the Churchman's Almanack for the present year, published by the S. P. C. K., the compiler has called June 4, "Whitsun Day." What authority is there for this? In the Prayer-book the day is called "Whit-Sunday." It is frequently, however, written "Whitsunday," as in Wheatly and the Christian Year. So that here are three ways of writing the word or words. Which is the right way? CUTHBERT BEDE.

[Whit-Sunday, Whit-Monday, and Whit-Tuesday, are ecclesiastical barbarisms. White-Sunday, or Huit-Sunday, as vulgar etymologies, are also utterly indefensible. Whitsum-day, or rather Whitson-day, from wit (mind, or understanding) is nothing more nor less than a corruption of Pentecost day, as is shown by the comparison of the corresponding names of Whitsum-day in foreign languages. (See "N. & Q." 2nd S. ii. 154.) The analogy of Easter favours this orthography. It is Easter Day, not Easter Sunday; therefore it is Whitsun Day, not Whit Sunday. Easter Eve, Easter Monday, Easter Tuesday, have in like manner their parallels in Whitsun Eve, Whitsun Monday, and Whitsun Tuesday. The Book of Common Prayer says Monday and Tuesday in "Whitsun week." Until of late years the word was printed in one—Whitsunday, not Whit-Sunday. In the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle we have—

"A.D. 1067.—On thisan Easton com se kyng to Winchester, and tha wæron Eastr on x. kl. Aprl., and sona after tham com Mathild seo hlæfdie hider to lande, and Ealdred ances' hig gehalgode to cwene on Westmystre on hwitan annan dag.

"This Easter came the King to Winchester; and Easter was then on the 10th before the calends of April. Soon after this came the lady Matilda hither to this land; and Archbishop Eldred hallowed her to queen at Westminster on Whitsunday."—Saxon Chronicle, ed. Ingram, p. 266.

The Paston Letters and Wicliffe spell it Whitsontide, the Bible of 1551 Wytsontyde, Chaucer, Whitsontide, Sir Thomas More, Whytsontyde, Sidney, Whitsontide, Wylkyn de Worde, Wytson.]

FIVE MINIATURES.—I have lately seen five miniatures, set as a group in one frame. The subjects are all men of middle age, or rather past it. Each man has a rope round his neck, with a knife plunged into the middle of the body, as if they had all suffered for treason. To four of them the names are given underneath, with the addition "passus," with the date. The names are Cooke, Heath, Ward, and Holland. The fifth has no name: he is in a dress apparently of a Roman Catholic priest, with his head shaved, and out of his mouth proceeds a legend with the inscription "Have mercy, Jesus." The dates are all from 1641 to 1646; no two in the same year. Can any of your correspondents inform me who these men can be? The mode of death seems to point distinctly to the English punishment for treason; and the names are unquestionably English, and the costume that of England at that period. But what trials for treason could have occurred during the Civil Wars? J. C. M.

[William Ward, whose true name was Webster, suffered at Tyburn on July 26, 1641: see Dodd's Church History, iii. 95, fol. and Memoirs of Missionary Priests, Part II. pp. 155-171.—Thomas Holland, alias Sanderson, also suffered at Tyburn, Dec. 12, 1642: see Memoirs of Missionary Priests, Pt. II. pp. 237-243, and Oliver's Biography of Members of the Society of Jesus, p. 117. There is a portrait of him in the Certamen Triplex.—Henry Heath, otherwise called Paulus de Sancta Magdalena, suffered at Tyburn on April 17 [or 27], 1643: see Dodd's Church History, iii. 119, and Memoirs of Missionary Priests, Pt. II. pp. 243-256. We cannot throw any light on the other two miniatures.]

"SERMONS TO ASSES."—The above is the title of a small book published in 1768 (London), and followed in a year or two by a second series. It is dedicated "To the very excellent and reverend Messrs. G. W., J. W., W. R., and M. M.,"—some of whom (the dedication tells us), "have preached for many years to the members of the congregation that these sermons are designed for." We are also informed that "These Sermons should have been dedicated to the A—b—s, B—s, and their C—y, but the author was afraid of offending their modesty." I am anxious to learn who was the author, and to whom each of the above initials respectively refers. R. C. L.

[This singular production is from the pen of James Murray, late pastor of the Scotch Presbyterian meeting-house, High Bridge, Newcastle, who died on January 28, 1782, in the fiftieth year of his age. The initials of the Dedication are intended for the following popular preachers of that time, namely, George Whitfield, John Wesley, William Romaine, and Martin Madan. Murray's Sermons to Asses was followed by New Sermons to Asses, also Sermons to Doctors in Divinity, Sermons to Ministers of State, and Lectures to Lords Spiritual. These have since been collected into an octavo volume, and published.

by William Hone in 1819, with a short biographical notice and portrait of the author. The best account, however, of this eccentric preacher, together with a list of his numerous works, will be found in Mackenzie's History of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, edit. 1827, vol. i. pp. 387-389.]

A JACOBUS PIECE OF GOLD.—In the will of a Mrs. Barbara Young, dated 27th of August, 1730, and proved at Armagh, 16th December, 1743, frequent mention is made of a Jacobus piece of gold; as, for example, in the following bequest:—"I leave and bequeath to my grandson, Latham Blacker, three hundred pounds and a Jacobus pees [sic] of gold." What may have been the meaning of leaving this piece of gold in addition to the sum of 300*l.*?

ABHBA.

[The Jacobus, or touch-piece, was hung round the neck of the individual afflicted with the Evil when the King touched for it: the latest are of James II., Anne, and the Pretenders. The sovereign power of the gold piece was distinctly admitted, as the disease is reported to have returned in some cases upon the medal being lost, and of being again subdued upon the presentation of a second piece. Vide Pettigrew's Superstitions connected with Medicine and Surgery. 8vo, 1844, p. 144.]

MOTHER-IN-LAW.—Edward Dennis in his Will (1708) leaves a legacy to his "Honoured Mother-in-law Elizabeth Dennis." Can a man's second wife be correctly called his children's mother-in-law? I should mention that Edward Dennis never married, as far as I can ascertain.

SAMUEL TUCKER.

20, Doughty Street, Mecklenburgh Square.

[Wharton in his Law Lexicon, ed. 1860, says that a Mother-in-law is the mother of one's wife or husband (p. 496), whereas a Step-mother (noverca, Lat.) is the wife of one's father, who is not one's mother, p. 697.]

PARK.—How came the word Park to be applied to artillery?

G. S. D.

[A park, as Blackstone remarks, properly signifies any enclosure; hence a "park of artillery" is surrounded with a rope. In Scotland, any enclosure of considerable extent, whether by means of stone walls or fences, used as grazing ground for domesticated animals, for corn or grass crops, is termed a park.]

MUNDUNGUS.—Can any etymologist tell me the derivation of this cacophonous synonym for bad tobacco? I cannot find the word in any book earlier than the reign of Charles II. Is it Dutch?

WALTER THORNBURY.

[Mundungus, trashy tobacco, is from the Spanish Mon-dongo, paunch, tripe, black pudding. Vide Neuman and Baret's Spanish Dictionary.]

Replies.

FACTITIOUS PEDIGREES: WILLIAM SIDNEY SPENCE.

(1st S. ix. 221, 275; 2nd S. x. 106.)

At the present moment, when attention is being so generally and so properly drawn to the many factitious pedigrees now put forth in books having the semblance of authority, the following particulars of a kind-hearted gentleman, who was ever ready to help pedigree-hunters out of their difficulties, will probably interest many readers of "N. & Q."

Good Mr. Spence having, I presume, heard that the late Mr. St. Barbe was engaged in collecting materials for a history of his family, addressed the following letter to that gentleman:—

"4 Feb. 1846.

"Having been engaged by the Widow of the late Sir John Cotgreave, of Netherleigh House, near Chester, to inspect and arrange the Title-deeds and other documents in her Ladyship's possession, I find a very ancient pedigree of the Cotgreaves de Hargrave in the co. of Chester, which family became extinct in the direct male line in the year 1724, but which was represented thro' females by the late Sir John Cotgreave. It is the work of Randle Holme, anno 1672, from the documents compiled by the learned William Camden in 1598, and contains the descents of three generations of the St. Barbes de South Brent, Somerset, and Congleton in Cheshire, with their intermarriages and armorial bearings emblazoned, commencing with Robert St. Barbe de So. Brent and Congleton, living temp. Henry I. whose grandson Sir Robert flourished in the reign of Richard Cœur de Lion, and embraced the Cross, accompanied that Monarch to the Holy Land, and fought under him at the Battle of Ascalon against Sultan Saladin; presuming that you are of the same family, I will transmit you extracts from the pedigree as far as relates to your distinguished family, conditionally that you remunerate me for the information and definition of the armorial bearings, there being 3 shields containing 12 quarterings connected with the St. Barbes, and embracing the Ensigns of Hugh Lupus, the first Norman Earl of Chester, Eustace de Montalt, Lord Hawarden, Fitzhugh, Pole, Vernon, and other ancient families. Lady Cotgreave will allow me to make the extracts and has kindly consented to attest the same. The arms of St. Barbe are given chequy of 12 ar. and sab.

"Yours, &c.

"W. S. SPENCE.

"Grange Street, Birkenhead."

Like the late Lord Monson, Mr. Evelyn Shirley, and several other correspondents to whom this worthy addressed his liberal offer of service, Mr—cause of her crime, without any intention of taking away the life of her honourable paramour. Such was the little restriction over prisoners at this period, that it was a raging fashion with the rakes of her day to dine and sup in her cell. Tom Hearne has several notices of her in his Diary: among others the following entry:—

"Oct. 12, 1724. Mr. Murray, being in Oxford, told me, that he happened once, with two or three gentlemen, to see the celebrated Sally Salisbury, while she was under confinement, being the only time he saw her. They found her with two or three others drinking a bowl of punch, of about fifteen or sixteen shillings. Mr. Murray and his companions sat at another table. But Mr. Murray being a great lover of punch, and expressing himself as if he desired to taste of it, he was very civilly accommodated. He said, she seemed to him to be about forty years of age, though she must be less, if, according to her life, she was born about 1690, or 1691. He said, she dressed plain but neat; that she had the finest hand his eyes ever beheld, and that she had been most certainly a comely beauty."

She died in Newgate, after ten months' imprisonment, on Feb. 11, 1723-4, and on the 14th of the same month was buried at St. Andrew's, Holborn. Some wag finding Sally's coffin was placed next to that of the celebrated Dr. Sacheverel in the vaults of the church, has left on record the following epigram:—

"Lo! to one grave consign'd, of rival fame,
A rev'rend Doctor, and a wanton Dame;
Well for the world they did to rest retire,
For each, while living, set mankind on fire."

The trial of Sally Salisbury is printed in the Select Trials at the Sessions-house in the Old Bailey, i. 336-343, edit. 1742. Consult also Noble's History of England, iii. 476. There are at least four separate works containing "A complete History" of this unfortunate female, and two engraved portraits of her, one by Smith, after Kneller, fol. 1724; another by Faber, 4to, 1725. It does not appear that she ever had a daughter, so that the other miniature, in the South Kensington Museum, may be that of a younger sister.

J. Y.
Barnsbury.

HORSE: GRACE.

(3rd S. vii. 419.)

Your correspondent, ALPHA BETA, referring to Max Müller's second series of Lectures on the Science of Language (p. 369), in which the myth of the horses of the sun and that of Apollo attended by the Graces, are referred to the same original, wishes to know whether "the words horse and grace (χάρις) come from the same root." Following the most searching analytical inquiry, the conclusion is that they do not. Our word horse, A. S. hors, in its earliest Teutonic form hros, is closely connected with O. G. horse, alacer, celer, volucer, from which the Ger. rasch, and Eng. rash, are derived. Bopp (Gloss. Sans., 406) derives horse from Sans. हृष, hresh, hinnire. Pictet (Origines Indo-Europ., i. 340) derives it from रसिक, rasika, one of the Sanskrit terms for a horse, from the root रस, ras, spirited, impassioned.

The derivation, after all, is very uncertain. As the Teutonic word begins with an aspirate we should look for a Sanskrit root commencing with k. The nearest approach in this direction is कर, kara, action, from कृ, kri, facio.

As the word rasika is employed both for horse and elephant, and as karaka is also used for elephant, it is possible that the latter may have been employed also as a term for the horse.

The Greek χάρις is usually connected with the Sanskrit चृ, ghri, or ghar (there is no Sanskrit root gha) which means to shine, but there is considerable doubt on the subject. The Greek χάριτες were the goddesses who conferred all favours. We are referred for the derivation to the verb χαίρω, which originally signified parting, dismissing, taking away, and then by metonymy, dismissing with favours. We must then look for a root which has this primary signification, which we find in Sansk. हृ, kri, or har, the Sanskrit aspirate corresponding with the Greek χ. It will therefore be evident that horse and charis have no connection in their etymology.

The Greek ἵππος, originally ἡῖππος, Latin equus, or equus, are equivalent to Sansk. अश्व, asva, the Sansk. s being the representative, in many cases, of the Greek and Latin gutturals. Asva for horse does not appear to be a radical, but there does not exist any root to which it can be satisfactorily referred. अश्नु, as, means to enjoy. Probably the above hints may suffice for your correspondent's inquiries, unless a better solution be afforded.

J. A. P.

Wavertree, near Liverpool.

Your correspondent ALPHA BETA may rest assured that horse and χάρις are not connected with one another. The initial h of the Low German horse, hors, hross, &c. would require a corresponding h in Greek. Χάρις, as Prof. Max Müller has pointed out, is referable to the root ghar (whence English greedy), while horse, Icelandic hross or ross, claims kinship with the Icelandic ras, English rush, ride, Swedish rida, &c. Symeon Magister (Script. post Theoph. ed. Paris, p. 490) says, of Pis of ash δρομήναι λεγόμενα, and the root is to be found in the Sanskrit śri, whence Latin currere, cursus, &c.

*ἵππος is the Latin equus, Zend aspa, Sanskrit asva, q and p being interchanged as in τρομα and sequor, σκύλον and spolia, κάλπη and poples. The radix is as, whence asus, asian, ἀκίς, akis, acer, acus, &c., containing the idea of "sharpness" or "swiftness."

As to βάρυς and ἰαχός, it is usual to connect them by assuming a change of i into y after the initial digamma, which we know from such passages as Od. iv. 454, Il. xi. 453, to have originally belonged to the simple verb. It is better, however, to regard the two words as severally derived from ἡχέω or ἄχέω and ἰάχω; the latter being merely correlative imitations of the same sound.

A. SATCE.

GIBBON'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY: OGRESSES.

(3rd S. vii. 417.)

I have not Gibbon's Autobiography at hand, but I suppose his authority for the statement in which he made so amusing a blunder was the quaint Introductio ad Latinam Blazoniam of his namesake, John Gibbon, Blue-Mantle Pursuivant. (London, 1682.) If MR. DIXON has not this curious book, he may be interested in the following extract from pp. 160, 161 of it, since it shows the real existence of the "unjust kinswomen":—

"The said author is guilty of another inadvertency (p. 296) in saying, Sir William Segar granted to this Family A LYON RAMPANT BETWEEN THREE OGRESSES. Now this was granted only to Edmond Gibbon (his Father always sealed with a LYON RAMPANT GARDANT BETWEEN THREE SCHALLOPS). But himself assumed a new Coat out of distaste against three Ladies his Kinswomen, Daughters of Gervase Gibbon of the Pump. Frances, married to Sir Robert Point, Knight of the Bath, Elianor married to Sir John Crook: and Grizeld married to Sir John Lawrence, Knight and Baronet, who lyes buried at Chelsey in MIDDLESEX, in a Chapel belonging to (and re-edified by) her-self, with a fair Mural Monumental remembrance. The falling out was about the will of Edmond Gibbon, Founder of the Free-School in Benenden, the next parish to Rotveden aforesaid. As for Edmond aforesaid, he lyes buried in the Temple Church, LONDON (in the Walks or Western part) with a fair Monument against a Pillar, with a quartered Coat, that of the SCHALLOPS being placed in prima Quadra. (Mention is made of him pag. 38 foregoing.) I will only mysteriously add, Deus sit Susceptor Meus."

Gibbon appears to have made another mistake in making the Christian name of his ancestor Edward, whereas by the foregoing extract it was Edmund.

I conclude with two queries: First, Where was "the Pump" alluded to above? Secondly, What did Gibbon mean by the sentence he so "mysteriously" added?

JOHN WOODWARD.

New Shoreham.

Your correspondent is surely in error in fancying that Gibbon, in the passage quoted, was so ignorant of heraldry as to suppose that the ogresses were actual representations of female cannibals. Heraldic writers in general give no explanation of the origin of the term ogress, synonymous with pellet, as applied to roundles sable; but it was exactly in the spirit of the heraldic conceits and puns of the seventeenth century, in which every charge had some fanciful meaning assigned to it, to fix on ogresses as appropriate emblems of the three litigious ladies. The historian's account of this matter receives a certain amount of confirmation from Guillim's Display of Heraldry, where "Sable a lyon rampant, guardant crowned or between three escallop shells argent" is given as the coat of the Gibbons of Dorchester; while it is also stated that—

"Or a lyon rampant sable between three pellets was borne by the name of Gibbon, and was confirmed to Edmund Gibbon, son and heir of Thomas Gibbon of Rotvenden, alias Rowenden, gentleman, by Sir William Segar the 6th of April, 1629, in the 5th year of the reign of King Charles the First."

G. B.

COLD OR COLE HARBOUR.

(3rd S. vii. 253, 302, 344, 407.)

In reading Miss Strickland's Lives of the Queens of England, vol. ii. p. 421, I have lighted on the following foot-note explanatory of the above designation, as applied to a dilapidated city palace, in which the Lady Margaret Douglas, Countess of Lennox, was imprisoned by Queen Elizabeth. The learned authoress would appear not to have been troubled with any doubts as to the true derivation of the name, such as have lately exercised the critical ingenuity of some of your contributors.

"There were two palaces belonging to the crown which claimed this name of Cold or Cole Harbour, both situated on little harbour creeks of the Thames, where doubtless crafts of coals put in for the supply of the metropolis and its environs. The easternmost Cole Harbour was situated on the spot where now is the West India Dock Basin. The name remains with some traditions, and that unfailing adjunct to a suburban royal domain, a Robin Hood Lane or Gateway—a remarkable place, modern corruption being grafted upon its primitive lack of civilisation. There were lately some antique mulberry trees braced with iron lingering in the adjoining gardens. It was the palace of George of Clarence, very conveniently situated across the Thames, opposite the Greenwich Palace. Margaret Duchess of Burgundy resided there on her visit to Edward IV., as Sir Harry Nicolas proves from their computus. The other Cole Harbour, likewise in possession of the crown, built by a citizen is best known. All Hallow's church, Thames Street, was, in Stowe's time, originally part of its gateway. It does not appear which Cole Harbour was occupied by the Countess of Lennox."

In your issue (No. 170) DR. HAHN speaks of the name as being given to places, farms, lanes, &c., in different parts of England, Ireland, and America. Among the numerous inlets on the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia there is one known as Cole Harbour, but why so called I have not at present the means of ascertaining. In connexion with this locality, I have heard of the following lines as current among the rough-and-ready class of the population in answer to inquiries about the news:—

"Some say the devil's dead,
And buried in Cole Harbour;
Some say he's rose again,
And prenticed to a barber."

X.

Mr. Hartshorne has given a very copious list of Cold Harbours in England; this I greatly extended, and included the Cold Harbours abroad, and also gave a list of Harbours, Bowers, and Windy Harbours. The Kalterherberg of DR. HAHN, four German miles south of Aix-la-Chapelle, I believe to be one recorded by me as near Treves, but the Kalterherberg in Baden and near Lörrach, are extensions of the list. I have no doubt but that the list of Cold Harbours in the Netherlands and Germany must be much more copious. The features I have remarked are, first, in confirmation of other observers, that the situation of Cold Harbours is near a Roman road. Second, that the word is Cold and not Coal, or Coluber, or any one of the meanings, Celtic or Latin, other than Cold, that have been attributed. This is proved by the various linguistic forms of the word Cold, Koude, Kalte; and by the use of synonyms, as wind and windy. How the word Cold comes to be applied to these stations I cannot satisfactorily see. Third, that Harbour is distinctly Harborough, meaning a military fort, and not a coal depot or sheepcot, as has been surmised. Fourth, that the term Cold Harbour is one of the class of terms applied by the Germanic natives in England, the Netherlands, and Western Germany to Roman establishments. As these conclusions rest upon a number of facts, and not upon theory, all that remains to be done is to find a meaning for Cold in conformity with the facts.

I may note for the guidance of those who are engaged in the investigation of the Anglo-Saxon nomenclature of the Roman establishments in Britain (that is to say the Germanic nomenclature) with that adopted by the Turks in Asia Minor. Where a Greek population was left, as on the coast, we find Greek names; where the Greek population was extirpated we find the Hissars, Kalehs, &c., answering to the Chesters, Boroughs, &c. In England, where a Celtic population remained, as in Wales, the Welsh border, and Cornwall, we find Welsh names; but in the main portion of the country we find Anglo-Saxon names.

Setting aside other evidence, we have here a strong analogous example from comparative history that the Anglo-Saxons extirpated the Celts in England, as the Turks did the Greeks in the main part of Anatolia.

HYDE CLARKE.

Smyrna, May 27, 1865.

RHYMES TO DICKENS AND THACKERAY.

(3rd S. iv. 207, 277, 318.)

When the original verses on these two great names appeared in "N. & Q.," with a proposal that other contributors should send lines, "with the same rhyme-words, addressed to the strong points of the two," I felt, as I have no doubt others did, that while the former triplet merely touched one point in the "mannerism" of Dickens, the lines on Thackeray went entirely, without a word of reservation, to blacken his social, moral, and religious character. M. stated that he had heard the words repeated, but without the name of the author. We are required to believe him ignorant of the authorship; and, therefore, nothing personal can be intended in the remark, that whatever cynicism existed in the character of Thackeray, the writer of the satire is not without the same weakness.

The challenge was taken up by C., and again by your able correspondent J. J. B. WORKARD; but neither of them alluded to the "Satyr with the poison tooth." The difficulty of constructing verses indicative of the characters of two men of remarkable genius, within so brief a compass, and fettered by given rhyme words, is undoubtedly great; and it is no discredit to O. that his lines are lame, and limp. I prefer those by MR. WORKARD.

Three months after the satire first appeared in "N. & Q.," I saw the earthly remains of Thackeray consigned to their quiet grave at Kensal Green, amidst the tears of a thousand representatives of unnumbered myriads of absent mourners; and, on my way home, composed the following reply to the challenge of M., taking only the liberty of adding an additional line:—

"Intensely human is thy soul, Charles Dickens!
Moral and social good to life it quickens!
The bond of common blood and nature thickens
In lordly halls,—and where the poor man sickens.

"Who does not mourn departed Thackeray?
And feel—though hid by clouds in black array—
His 'silver lined' genius shall ne'er lack a ray?"

This I immediately forwarded to "N. & Q." with a remark that, if the early and sudden death of Thackeray could have been anticipated, I was sure the satire would not have been sent, or if sent, inserted. My manuscript was mislaid and lost, amongst others of perhaps as little value. The draft of the lines has, however, turned up among my own papers; and, if worth printing, is at the service of your readers.

W. LEE.

by the poor as candles;" and its name in all probability arises from the mere similarity of its flame to that of a candle. Thus Kirwan (Elements of Mineralogy, 1810, vol. ii. p. 45), says: "Its proper name is candle coal, as it burns like a candle;" and again (p. 454) "It easily kindles without melting, and burns with a large bright flame, but of short duration." Professor John Phillips, in a "Treatise on Geology," reprinted from the Encyclopædia Britannica, seventh edition, says: "The cannel coal of Lancashire and Yorkshire, which blazes like a candle, contains nearly half its weight of gaseous matter."

S. H. H.

CHEVISAUNCE (3rd S. vii. 114, 189.)—In the glossary appended to Speght's Chaucer, this word is defined: "Merchandise, devise, a bargain." In that at the end of the third volume of the Roman de la Rose (Amst., 1735), we get the following meanings: "expédient pour sortir—issuë de quelque affaire," and also "pour chevance, biens, richesses." The obsolete word chevir, from which it in all probability is derived, is defined "sortir d'une affaire; vient à bout; finir."

It is likely the word afterwards became achever. If so, chevisaunce might mean an "achievement"—any thing finished, or completed; and afterwards an heroic deed: which, in fact, is the explanation of the word in the glossary to Spenser (8vo, London, 1845). In the sense of completion it might mean a bargain, as that is a contract completed; and in the sense of enterprise it would certainly have an analogy with imperatoria, a master work.

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

DE LA TOUR D'AUVERGNE (3rd S. iv. 474.)—Information and references, on the point in question, will be found in Biographie Universelle, tom. xlv. p. 349, sub voce "Tour D'Auvergne-Couet" (Théophile Malo de la).

O. W.

KING'S LYNN: CHAUCER (3rd S. vii. 399, 445.) My thanks are due to the Rev. J. DALTON and to MR. QUINTON for their obliging replies to my query, by which they have not only corrected the error I committed in confounding the "Catalogue" now in the Norwich Museum with the one referred to in the General History of Norfolk, but have at the same time confirmed the suspicion I had already entertained that the "extract from the old book" had never been between the covers of the present catalogue. I must, therefore, honestly confess that I (somewhat hastily, perhaps,) gave credit to the compiler of the History for a blunder which now turns out to be one of my own.

The "old book," it is to be observed, is not stated to have been in the museum, but only the "extract;" and, judging from MR. DALTON's concluding remark, I am inclined to think that he and I shall not differ much in our estimate of the loss the world has sustained by its disappearance. Nor should I have troubled myself about the matter but for the sole purpose of ascertaining on what authority "Ben Adam" states that "Lynn had the honour to present the world with GEOFREY CHAUCER, Capgrave," &c. This appears to me a question worth inquiring into.

F. NOBSEATH.

PHILIPS EARLS OF PEMBROKE (3rd S. vii. 378, 407.)—There were in the seventeenth century three Earls of Pembroke of the name of Philip. Those mentioned by M. P. are Philip the fourth Earl, and Philip the fifth Earl. Besides these, there was Philip the seventh Earl, who died August 29th, 1683, and he also lies buried at Salisbury. See Collins's Peerage (1812), vol. iii. p. 140. Probably all three died at Wilton. At all events, this is the first place to search in. The death of Philip the fifth Earl is stated by Collins to have occurred December 11th, 1680.

MELKTES.

NEW STYLE (3rd S. vii. 440.)—Though the statute of 24 George II. fixed the commencement of the legal year to be on the 1st of January, that commencement had been anticipated by a considerable section of the population, for a very long period. It was generally understood to be the historical commencement of the year, while from about the end of the thirteenth century the 25th of March was the commencement of the legal year. MR. DOBSON must have seen many records of facts occurring between January 1st and March 25th in any year previous to 1750 mentioned with a double date, thus: January 14th, 1648-9, thus giving both the historical and legal date, the last figure indicating the year according to our present computation. Sir Harris Nicolas, in his excellent little work, called The Chronology of History, very clearly explains the various changes in the style.

D. S.

"RELIGIO CLERICI," ETC. (3rd S. vii. 448.)—Your correspondent, who so fully appreciates the wit and learning of Mr. Smedley's tract, may be pleased to be referred to another by this gentleman, in which the same qualities will be found to exist. It is entitled—

"Lux Renata: a Protestant's Epistle, with Notes by the Author of Religio Clerici," 8vo, London, 1827, pp. 68.

This pamphlet, as the author tells us, was suggested in great measure by a perusal of Southey's Book of the Church; and he adds that, "he gladly embraces the opportunity of adding his testimony, such as it is, to the entire accuracy and fidelity of Mr. Southey's representations."

I am a little puzzled by one thing. Your correspondent speaks of "A Churchman's Second Epistle," by the author of "Religio Clerici." But these as it appears to me, form simply a double title of one and the same book. The title of my copy, which is a later edition than the one cited, is—

"Religio Clerici: Two Epistles by a Churchman, with Notes. To which is now added, by the same author, a Parson's Choice of Town or Country; an Epistle to a Young Divine." London, 8vo, 1821, pp. 149.

In the latter of these epistles occurs the passage transcribed by H. B. C., and this strengthens my belief that "Religio Clerici" is but a general or second title of the Two Epistles. Is this not the case? *

Who is the author of the following poem, somewhat similar in character to those above-named?—

"Ecclesia Dei: A Vision of the Church, with a Preface, Notes and Illustrations," 8vo. London, 1848. †

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

SASH WINDOWS (3rd S. vii. 440.)—The subject of sash windows may be trivial, but, as it is launched in your pages, it is probable any of the fast-fading anecdotes of their early locality may be acceptable. A personal acquaintance with an octogenarian, who has passed away at least thirty years, and who, I well remember, delighted in repeating anecdotes of his early life, more than once told me he well remembered being taken when a child to see the new house building at the "Deal Tree," by Mr. Seaborne, because he had put in windows never before seen in Wymondham. These were the first sash windows ever seen in that locality.

H. D'AVENEY.

ADVERBS IMPROPERLY USED (3rd S. vii. 152, 363, 406.)—Bishop Blomfield, in his preface to his brother's translation of Matthiæ's Greek Grammar, has the following passage at p. xii.:—

"Our own language furnishes us with several instances, where the predicate is expressed by an adverb, he is finely, the horse is well enough!"

If such phrases as he is finely are admitted to be proper, I should like to know how it is possible for an adverb to be used improperly? P. S. C.

ORIGIN OF THE WORD SUPERSTITION (3rd S. vii. 360.)—Notwithstanding the authority of Cicero (De Naturæ Deorum, ii. 28), a most fanciful etymologist as we all know, I cannot believe that superstitio has anything to do with superstes in the sense of "survivor." Is it not more likely to be derived from a general idea of reverence for that which stands above us, according to the notion suggested by the fine passage in Lucretius?—

[* Our correspondent is correct in his conjecture. The first part was entitled Religio Clerici, a Churchman's Epistle, 8vo, 1818; the second, A Churchman's Second Epistle, by the author of Religio Clerici, 8vo, 1819. In the edition of 1821, both parts had the general title of Religio Clerici.]

[† By the Rev. William J. Blew, M.A.—Ed.]

"*Humana ante oculos sede quom vita jaceret
In terris, obpressa gravi sub Religione:
Quæ caput à cœli regionibus ostendebat
Horribili super adpectu mortalibus instans.*"

If this be so one would expect that the oldest meaning of the word would have indicated a righteous reverence, and that it would afterwards (like religio itself) have been degraded to denote an erroneous reverence. In Cicero, I believe, the words superstitio and superstitiosus are always used in a derogatory sense. But when Plautus says in the Curculio—

"Superstitiosus hic est: vera prædicat,"

he means to say "the man has something supernatural about him." The word is used in the same way in the Budens, iv. 4, 95. Virgil probably directs us to the older use of the word when he says of the Styx (Æn. xii. 817)—

"Una superstitio superis quæ reddita Divis."

The chronicle of the changes which have from time to time passed on such words as superstitio, religio, &c., might (if we could authentically trace them) furnish a chapter for a work like Mr. Lecky's History of Rationalism.

C. G. PROWELL.

Garrick Club.

ANONYMOUS HYMNS (3rd S. vii. 438.)—A series of papers entitled "Hymns and their Authors," is now in course of publication in the Penny Post,—a most useful church organ issued by Messrs. J. H. & J. Parker. This is the source from whence I draw the following information for the use of C.P.L. and R. I. I wish it were more complete:—

"Before the ending of the day." Latin Hymn, Te lucis ante terminum, S. Ambrose, A.D. 374, translated by J. M. Neale.

"Let every heart exulting beat." Seruum Breviary, Agnoscat omne sæculum, translated by J. M. Neale.

"O come and mourn with me awhile." Latin hymn, Venite et ploremus, translated by "Disposer Supreme and Judge of the earth." Latin Hymn, Paris Breviary, Supreme quales Arbitrator, translated by I. Williams, 1839.

"For Thy dear saints, O Lord," Rt. Rev. Richard Mant, D.D. Lord Bishop of Down and Connor.

"All hail adored Trinity!" Latin Hymn.

"Christ will gather in His own," Chr. Gregor, 1778. Translated by Miss Winkworth.

"Jesus meek and lowly." From Hymns for Missions.

ST. SWITHIN.

HOYLE FAMILY (2nd S. vii. 270.)—It is a pet theory amongst some members of the Hoyle family that they are rather of British than of Flemish origin, being the descendants of the ancient dynasty of Hoel, the brightest name being that of Hoel Dha, whose descendants are said to have settled in the neighbourhood of Harrington, whence they spread over the mountain-district of north-west Yorkshire, until they finally settled in the neighbourhood of Huddersfield. Can any of your readers furnish me with the knowledge of how much truth there is in this, and, if there be any in it, does the legend in Hoel Dha's coat-of-arms give title to the name, or does the name give the legend?

I believe that there is a memorial window in Gisborough church relative to the Hoyles; what is its subject, and why was it erected? Any information will be most welcome to

WILLIAM HOYLE.

HINGHAM BOXES (3rd S. vii. 442.)—I have always understood a nest of boxes to mean a set of boxes, the one fitting inside the other, just as we speak of a nest of weights when we want to describe the old-fashioned packages of weights ranging from a quarter of an ounce to half a pound, once in common use in druggists' shops and farm house kitchens. Nests of twelve boxes of this kind used to be sent over from Germany to Hull in large quantities. The largest of the set was usually about ten inches long, the smallest about one inch.

A. O. V. P.

HENRY MARTEN (3rd S. vii. 114, 389.)—Your correspondent P. wished to know the arms of Marten the regicide, to which, as an answer, another correspondent, L. C. R., favours us with the arms of a certain Colonel Francis Martyn, on a monument in Ewelme church, Oxon, who is assumed to have been a relation of Henry Marten: why, except the similarity of the names, does not appear. The regicide wrote his name Marten, as appears by the epitaph written by himself on his tombstone, in Chepstow church, the arms on which are 2 bars. The tinctures are not shown, but among the fifty or sixty arms under the name of Marten, Martin, or Martyn, given by Burke, there appear two or three families who bear argent two bars gules, in Dorset and Exeter, to one of which the regicide probably belonged. The tombstone was originally in the chancel of Chepstow church, from whence it was removed by an over zealous royalist vicar into the middle aisle. Some few years since the church was Vandalized in the worst possible taste, and I know not what has become of the stone.

The regicide was the son of Sir Henry Martin, Doctor of Laws, Judge of the Admiralty, Dean of the Arches, and Judge of the Prerogative Court, who was buried in Longworth church in Berkshire, where he resided, and where, if his family monument still exists, no doubt the arms are shown.

T. W.

ABRAHAM'S CONVERSION (3rd S. vii. 458.)—The story of Abraham's conversion from the worship of the heavenly bodies to that of their creator, is related by Josephus (Ant. i. 6, 1); and the tradition is given in greater detail in the Koran (vi. 76),

"And when the night overshadowed him, he saw a star, and he said, This is my Lord; but when it set, he said, I like not [gods] which set"; and so on in respect of the moon and sun. The Jews have preserved a like tradition. (R. Bechai, in Midrash, Bartoloc. Bibl. Rabb., pt. i. p. 640.)

T. J. BUCKTON.

Let the inquirer for "the first account of" the tradition on this subject, which is mentioned in Dr. A. P. Stanley's Sermons in the East (p. 124), "try (as the saying is) a hair of the same dog's tail." Let him peruse the Lectures on the Jewish Church, from Abraham to Samuel, which were delivered by Dr. A. P. Stanley (now Dean of Westminster), as Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Oxford. He will find ample references on the subject of his inquiry.

J. H. A.

"THE ANTI-TEAPOT REVIEW" (3rd S. vii. 470.) In reply to your strictures, I beg to inform you that the "Anti-Teapot Society," and "Ye Red Club," are distinct Societies, and in no way connected. There is, I believe, one member of "Ye Red Club" who occasionally writes in the Anti-Teapot Review; but "Ye Red Club" is open only to members of this University, whereas the "Anti-Teapot Society" includes members of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Paris, Dublin, and Edinburgh.

THE PRESIDENT OF "YE RED CLUB."

Oxford.

SPUR MONEY IN BELFRIES (3rd S. vii. 324, 446.) The following lines in the belfry of the church at Cardington, near Church Stretton, will, perhaps, add to the proof that fines were inflicted for ringing church bells in spurs. The custom appears to bear the stamp of age, as the "laws" are described as "old," and the lines are dated upwards of a century ago:—

"If to ring you do come here,
You must Ring well with hand and ear;
And if a bell you chance to throw,
Fourpence to pay before you go.
And if you Ring with Spur or Hat
Sixpence in Ale to pay for that.
And if you either Swear or Curse,
Twelvepence to pay, pull out y^r purse.
Our laws are old, they are not new,
Y^e Clerk and Ringers claim their due.

"Febr^y 14th, 1755-6."

CHAS. P. FLECK.

EPISCOPAL BORDURE, LABEL, ETC. (3rd S. vii. 436.)—The following information, extracted chiefly from Mr. Bedford's Blazon of Episcopacy, may be of use to my friend, MR. BOUTELL, as a partial reply to the queries growing out of his interesting notes on Exeter Cathedral. First, with regard to the "Episcopal Bordure," another instance occurs among the Bishops of Exeter; for Henry Marshall (1194-1206) is said, on the authority of Harl. MS. 5837, to have borne or a lion ramp. gu., within a bord. az. entoyre of mitres of the first.

Wm. Heiworth, Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (1420-1427) bore, az., a saltire or., on a bord. gu. nine mitres of the second. Thomas de Blundeville, Bishop of Norwich (1226-1236) bore, quarterly per fess indented or and az., a bend gu., all within a bord. of the second, entoyre of mitres of the first.

William, of St. Mary's Church, Bishop of London (1199-1221), is also said to have borne, or, a lion ramp. az., armed and langued arg., a bord. of the second, entoyre of mitres of the first.

Secondly, with regard to the label, — Peter Courtenay, Bishop of Exeter (1478-1487), afterwards translated to Winchester, appears to have used a similar label to that with which William Courtenay, Archbishop of Canterbury (1381-1396), differed his arms. (See also Moule's Heraldry of Fish, p. 19.)

Thirdly, the mitre appears as a charge in the arms of nearly twenty bishops, for the most part of the fifteenth century. The arms of Simon de Apulia, Bishop of Exeter (1214-1223), are az. three mitres or. John de Keton, Bishop of Ely (1310-1316), bore, sa. three mitres or. Robert Mascall, Bishop of Hereford (1404-1416), is said to have used the same arms.

The present arms of the see of Gloucester are, az., two keys in saltire, but I am nearly certain that, in more instances than one, in Gloucester cathedral, a sword in pale appears as an additional charge. If I recollect rightly, a shield so charged is sculptured upon the north porch of the cathedral.

JOHN WOODWARD.

New-Shoreham.

QUOTATION WANTED (3rd S. vii. 241, 328, 427.) I am much obliged by the information given by several correspondents in answer to my inquiry about the maxim quoted by Christopher Love. The passages quoted by R. C. L. from the Digest seem to contain the germ of the idea. In the passage quoted by F. C. H. from the Canon Law, we can trace something of the expression. But the axiom quoted by MR. BATES from Jenkins, gives us the very phrase itself: — Favores ampliandi sunt. This would be of itself sufficient to show that if Love's quotation was made from memory, at all events it was not inaccurate. But in point of fact the phrase occurs elsewhere, and it seems to have been in the seventeenth century a commonly received maxim. But what was the origin of it? The word ampliandi is there used in a sense that, to the best of my knowledge, was never attached to it in the Latin language, at least to the time of Justinian. Where then did this use of the word come from, and how did Jenkins get it? May I hope for further assistance from MR. BATES?

MELETES.

LUNATIC LITERATURE (3rd S. vii. 120, 188.) — The most extraordinary production of this kind is said to have been by a very celebrated naturalist, who went out of his mind, and fancied he had been taken up to heaven; and on his return, was directed to write the Flora and Fauna of Paradise. I was informed by a very competent judge that this was a most curious work, everything being described in the most scientific way. Can any of your readers recall the name, and state whether any part of the MS. is yet extant? A. A.

Poets' Corner.

LIMEHOUSE (3rd S. vii. 35, 121, 190.) — It does not at all seem likely this word was originally Limehurst, as the whole tract of land has been originally under high water-mark; and, like all the vale of the Lea till we get high up into Hertfordshire, is all marsh, without any hurst or wood for many miles. A. A.

Poets' Corner.

SPITTING (3rd S. vii. 432.) — Notwithstanding MR. WETHERELL's ingenious elucidations of the fat knight's imprecation, I am inclined to think it admits of a simpler explanation. Thirst causes an inclination to spit. At such a time, the saliva is white and viscid. In the north I have heard the expression, "spitting sixpences," used as synonymous with thirst. Falstaff's exclamation I take it, therefore, means "May I never thirst again."

W. E.

Surely Falstaff's spitting white is what, in Lancashire low life, is called "spitting feathers," i. e. suffering from the effects of a debauch. The lower classes now indulge in spitting; perhaps their betters did in Shakspeare's time. A man who has been drinking is feverish, his mouth is dry, and his saliva white: hence he is sarcastically said to be "spitting feathers." Therefore, Falstaff's meaning would be not "May I die," but "May I never have a drinking bout again." So, at least, I have always understood the passage.

P. P.

BALLAD: "THE BATTLE OF HARLAW" (3rd S. vii. 393.) — This ballad is printed in Aytoun's Ballads of Scotland, 1859. MR. FERGUSON's version is almost the same as Professor Aytoun's, but not so complete. The latter has certainly been current, in the same form, for the last forty years (to my knowledge) in the district in which the field of Harlaw is situated. MR. FERGUSON's verse in which "Seggat's-land" is mentioned is incorrect. It ought to run: —

"And they buried him in Leggat's-den,
A large mile frae Harlaw."

"Leggat's-den" being a small ravine about that distance west from the battle field (in "lang Scots miles"), and crossed by the old road from Aberdeen to the north, by which line the Highland army retreated. Some years' ago a stone tomb, or cist (one of those well-known relics of the primitive inhabitants of our island), was discovered in or close to "Leggatt's-den," and was accepted by the neighbourhood as proving the truth of the tradition that "Donald of the lales" was there entombed. The tomb was certainly there many centuries before Harlaw was fought, and history tells us that "Donald" survived that bloody field for several years. C. E. D.

DR. CARABOO (3rd S. vii. 447.)—There was a learned M.D. in Bath who was so beguiled by this arch-impostor, openly avowing his conviction of her real character as assumed, that he received the universal sobriquet of Dr. Caraboo. This gentleman, now deceased, was Dr. Wilkinson, of Pulteney Street. NICKNAME.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

The Works of William Shakespeare. Edited by William George Clark, M.A., &c., and William Aldis Wright, M.A. Volume VI. (Macmillan.)

This sixth volume of the Cambridge Shakespeare contains King Henry the Eighth, which was printed for the first time in the Folio of 1623; Troilus and Cressida, first printed in 1609. The remarkable discrepancies between the Quarto and the Folio texts of this play are all pointed out: the more important at the end of the play, and all the others in the foot-notes. The next play here printed is Coriolanus, which was first published in the Folio of 1623. This is followed by the Titus Andronicus, published for the first time in the year 1600 in quarto. In the Folio, 1623, there is a whole scene (Act III. Sc. 2) not found in any of the Quartos; but agreeing too closely in style with the main portion of the play, to allow of the supposition that it is due to a different author. Romeo and Juliet, including a Reprint of the Quarto of 1597, was to have formed a portion of this volume, but it was found that it would make it too unwieldy, and that play has consequently been reserved for volume the seventh. The editors announce therefore that the work will now consist of nine volumes instead of eight. Every additional volume which we receive of this Cambridge Edition confirms our estimate of its value for all students of Shakespeare.

Romance of London: Strange Stories, Scenes, and Remarkable Persons of the Great Town. By John Timbs, F.S.A. In three Volumes. (Bentley.)

When closing the third of these chatty volumes, we felt inclined to parody the old Epigram on the word Finis, and say—

"Finis, an error or a lie my friend;
In writing Books on London there's no end."

And when we cast our eyes over the vast range of London Books—from Stow to Strype, from Pennant down to Timbs, we feel disposed to ask, What more can the most ingenious writer have to tell us new about London? "What!" replies Mr. Timbs, in the three volumes of gossip now before us, "much that you will find very amusing in Historical Sketches; Notices of Remarkable Duels; Pictures of Notorious Highwaymen; Recitals of great Crimes, Rogueries, and Punishments; Stories of Love and Marriage; Ghost and other Supernatural Stories; Descriptions of the various Sights of the Metropolis, and lastly, Anecdotes of Remarkable Persons, their strange Adventures and Catastrophes."

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.—The musical arrangements for the Great Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace may now be said to be complete; and some idea of the extent of the arrangements which have been made to give effect to the masterpieces of the great composer may be formed from the fact that in the Orchestra there will be upwards of 400 performers on stringed instruments alone, including 75 double basses.

There will be a Grand Rehearsal on Friday, the 23rd inst. This will include both solos and choruses, and the pieces selected will present great variety as well as popularity, the object being to make the Rehearsal Day an epitome of the three days of the Festival. The first day of the Festival will be Monday, the 26th, the "Messiah;" the second, on Wednesday, the 28th, will comprise a Selection from Handel's best known and most popular works; and the third, on Friday, the 30th, will be "Israel in Egypt."

Permission has been graciously accorded for the exhibition at the Crystal Palace, during the Festival, of Handel's own MS. Score of the "Messiah," from the Royal Library, at Buckingham Palace; and connected with this will be a very curious and interesting collection of the numerous printed editions of the Sacred Oratorio. It may be well to remind our readers that no more than the four days' performances can possibly be given; and that the Rehearsal on the 23rd, and the performances of "Messiah" on the 26th, the Selection on the 28th, and "Israel in Egypt" on the 30th inst., are, therefore, the only occasions on which this unparalleled assemblage of musical ability can be heard this year, probably for many years.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Particulars of Price, &c., of the following Books to be sent direct to the gentlemen by whom they are required, and whose names and addresses are given for that purpose:—

GLOSSARY OF ARCHITECTURE. Vol. I., in exchange for a volume, or to purchase.

PUMPHRY: Library of Entertaining Knowledge.

Wanted by Bell & Daldy, 186, Fleet Street.

DODLEY'S COLLECTION OF POEMS. Vol. VI. Large copy.

MESSENGER SPECIAL. Early editions.

Wanted by Rev. J. C. Jackson, 5, Chatham Place East, Hackney, N.E.

Notices to Correspondents.

Mrs MARY BILLINGHAM. We have received an interesting article on this lady, but which reached us unfortunately after the present number was made up. It shall appear in our next.

FRANKS. Mr. Waller, 58, Fleet Street, would probably do what is wished.

ALBUM GRAMCOX is described in Hooper's Medical Dictionary as the dung of dogs, which, from exposure to the air, becomes white like chalk. It consists chiefly of phosphate of lime, and was formerly applied to the inside of the throat in quinsies, being first mixed with honey. There were formerly many medicines of this kind, but they have long since justly fallen into disuse.

ERRATA.—3rd S. vii. p. 458, col. ii. line 17, for "seventeenth" read "eighteenth," p. 458, col. ii. line 15, for "surname O'Cashin" read "surname, O'Cashin."

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 8d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for SEVEN YEARS by Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 11s. 4d., which may be paid by Post (Bank Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. BENTLEY, Wellington Square, Strand, W.C., where also all COMMUNICATIONS for this Editor should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 182.

NOTES:—The late Duke of Devonshire and Sir Joseph Paxton, 491.—Gonzales de Andia: Hereditary Knights of the Garter, 492.—Notes from the Issue Rolls, ib.—The Newnham State Sword, 493.—The Fylfot—Day for Marrying—Manuscript Poem—Curious Christian Names—A Match found for a Common Saying, 493.

QUERIES:—Double Acrostic—Bastile Archives—Claret—To clear the Glass—Coutances: the Diocese of Winchester—Dumble—Funeral Plume of Feathers—Gonzagas of Mantua: Sack of Fondi—Heraldic—"Il y a fagots et fagots"—"Joseph and his Brethren"—Kaleyard Gate—N. D., a Miniature Painter—Lord Newhaven—Abbey of St. Ouen at Rouen—Quotation—Sir Joshua Reynolds's surviving Sitters—"Thoughtful Moll"—Voltaire: Diocletian, 494.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Coachmakers' Company—"Episcopacy": Henry Swinburne—Judicial—Mr. Fortescue's Elms, 495.

REPLIES:—Albini Brito: the Heraldic Puzzle, 497—Shakspear Family, 498—Milton and his Illustrator, 499—St. Augustine and the Mystery of the Blessed Trinity, ib.—Gallows Inscription, 500—Toasts, 501—In two Places at once like a Bird, ib.—The Exodus of the Israelites, 502—Zinc Spires, 503—Longevity, ib.—Milton—Rasselas: Dispartes—The Origin of Infirmaries in England—Rev. Edward Ford—The Synagogue of the Libertines—"That's the Cheese"—Hog Feast—Influenza—Clovis—Eudoxia Comnena—Significant Names—Dr. Caraboo—Clent Hills Beest—"Christian Breadbasket"—Cock's Feather—"The Dublin Letter"—Cavalier—Chartulary of Whalley Abbey—King's Lynn: Capgrave—Sash Windows, &c., 504.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

THE LATE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE AND SIR JOSEPH PAXTON.

About twenty years ago, by the direction of the late Duke of Devonshire, I copied the following from the original in his Grace's handwriting:—

"Joseph Paxton was born the 3rd of August, 1803. I made his acquaintance at the Horticultural Society's Garden at Chiswick, where he was placed in 1823. He was chiefly employed then in training the creepers and newly introduced plants on the walls there, which first excited my attention; and being in want of a gardener at Chatsworth, I asked Mr. Sabine, who was then at the head of the establishment, whether he thought that young man would do? He said, 'Young and untried,' but spoke so favourably that I had no doubt.

"The young man had made a large lake in 1822 at Sir Gregory Page Turner's place near Woburn. He came to Chatsworth in 1826. You shall have it in his own words: 'I left London by the Comet coach for Chesterfield, and arrived at Chatsworth at half-past four o'clock in the morning of the 9th of May, 1826. As no person was to be seen at that early hour I got over the greenhouse gate by the old covered way, explored the pleasure-grounds, and looked round the outside of the house. I then went down to the kitchen garden, scaled the outside wall, and saw the whole of the place, set the men to work there at six o'clock; then returned to Chatsworth, and got Thomas Weldon to play me the waterworks, and afterwards went to breakfast with poor dear Mrs. Gregory and her niece: the latter fell in love with me, and I with her, and thus completed my first morning's work, at Chatsworth before nine o'clock.'

"He married Miss Sarah Down in 1827. In a very short time a great change appeared in pleasure-ground and garden: vegetables of which there had been none, fruit in perfection, and flowers. Twelve men with brooms in their hands on the lawn began to sweep, the labourers to work with activity. The kitchen garden was so low and exposed to floods from the river, that I supposed the first wish of the new gardener would be to remove it to some other place, but he made it answer. In 1829 the management of the woods was entrusted to him, and gradually they were rescued from a prospect of destruction. Not till 1832 did I take to caring for my plants in earnest. The old greenhouse was converted into a stove, the greenhouse at the gardens was built, the Arboretum was invented and formed. Then started up Orchidaceæ, and three successive houses were built to receive the increasing numbers.

"In 1835 the intelligent gardener John Gibson was despatched to India to obtain the Amherstia nobilis, and other treasures of the East. The colossal new Conservatory was invented and begun in 1836; the following year Baron Ludwig was so charmed with its conception, that he stripped his garden at the Cape of the rarest produce of Africa. Paxton had now been employed in the superintendence and formation of my roads: he made one tour with me to the West of England, and in 1838 contrived to accompany me for an entire year abroad, in which time, having gone through Switzerland and Italy, he trod in Greece, Turkey, Asia Minor, Malta, Spain and Portugal. In absence he managed that no progress should be checked at home. A great calamity ruined the expedition he had set on foot to California; the unfortunate Wallace and Banks, young gardeners from Chatsworth, having been drowned in Columbia river. He went with me in 1840 to Lismore, and in that year the Conservatory was finished. The village of Edensor was new-modelled and rebuilt between 1839 and 1841, and the crowning works have been the fountains and the rock-garden."

After I had copied what precedes, I inquired of the Duke if he knew the amount of wages Paxton was receiving from the Horticultural Society in 1823? the answer was, "Only 18s. a-week, as I was informed by Mr. Sabine." As I knew that the Duke of Devonshire (by whom I had been most kindly aided for the last eighteen years) would not be offended by the question, I asked what wages he had himself given the "young and untried" gardener in the first instance? and his reply was, "I think 25s. a-week, and a cottage." Of course, his Grace afterwards rapidly advanced Paxton's wages; and eight or ten years subsequently, the young labourer of 18s. a-week, and the new gardener of 25s. a week, was often seen dining at the Duke's table.

J. PAYNE COLLIER.

GONZALES DE ANDIA: HEREDITARY KNIGHTS OF THE GARTER.

Finding myself for reasons of health in the Basque Provinces of Spain, I was induced to examine the documents appertaining to this town, which is in fact the old capital, although the modern governor resides at St. Sebastian. I have found an historical "Note and Query," which I think will be not uninteresting to your readers.

It is stated that a certain Gonzalez de Andia, a native of Tolosa, who lived in the reigns of John II. and Henry IV. (of Spain), commanded the military contingent of Guipuzcoa when, in the year 1471, it was sent into France to assist Edward IV. of England in a war against Louis XI. It is further stated that on account of his good services he was named a Knight of the Garter, the dignity to descend in his family from male to male in order of primogeniture, as testified by the following diploma:—

"Edward, by the Grace of God King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland, to all who the present may see health and greeting. As among the best merits of Princes there is none better than to appreciate the deeds of brave men, and to reward them according to their deserts, we make known that taking into especial consideration the nobility, valour, and prudence of our well-beloved Domingo Gonzalez de Andia, a native of Spain, from which country he has been highly recommended to us, we confer upon him the Insignia of our Collar for himself and his successors, let it be understood, for the eldest son in all legitimate descentance, that he and they may hereafter perpetually wear this order in the same way as it is worn by the Knights in this country, in testimony of which we have hereto affixed our Privy Seal. Given in our Castle of Windsor the 20th of August, in the year of our Lord 1471 in the eleventh year of our reign.—EDWARD."

It is then stated that this Gonzalez de Andia went to England in the year 1481, to frame a treaty of peace and commerce, which was signed the following year in London. He died in the year 1489. As in transcribing this document I have translated it from the Spanish, into which, of course, it must have been previously translated from the English, no weight can be attached to anything regarding its phraseology. The original diploma is said to be in the hands of the family, but the name has merged into others, and I have been unable to make any further researches. As I (perhaps ignorantly) never heard of any instance where the Order of the Garter was conferred as an hereditary honour, I take the liberty of inserting this "Note" in your periodical, with the "Query" whether there is any other example of the sort? HOWDEN.

Tolosa de Guipuzcoa, June 15, 1855.

NOTES FROM THE ISSUE ROLLS.—No. II.

Oct. 21, 49 Edw. III. To Robert de Merton, by his own hands, for the support of the children of Charles de Blois, in his custody, in the Castle of Nottingham, 183*l*. (Issue Roll, Mich. 49 Edw. III.)

Friar John Woodroue, Confessor of the King. (Ib. Mich. 50 Edw. III., and many others.)

June 3, 51 Edw. III. To Katherine, daughter of William, Duke of Bruxcella, and Henry Estor, Knt., son of the said Katherine, by the hands of the said Henry, &c., 16*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*. (Ib. Pasch. 51 Edw. III.)

June 20, 51 Edw. III. To Philippa Chaucer, by the hands of Roger de Trumpyngton, Knight, 66*s*. 8*d*. (Ib.)

Nov. 15, 51 Edw. III. To Blanche, Lady de Wake, for the support of two daughters of the late John, Lord de Moubray, in the custody of the King, and in the suite of the said Lady, 33*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*. (Ib. Mich. 51 Edw. III.)

To Philippa Chaucer, one of the damsels of the chamber of Philippa, late Queen of England, to whom the King assigned 10 marks per annum for her life, by the hands of Geoffrey Chaucer, 66*s*. 8*d*. (Ib.)

Dec. 16, 51 Edw. III. To Collardo Daubriche-côt, Armig., constable of the town and castle of Nottingham, for the support of the children of Charles de Blois, in his custody, &c., 24*l*. (Ib.)

Dec. 23. To John de Burlee, Knight, sent in secret negotiations of the King, 13*l*. 6*s*. 8*d*. (Ib.)

To Geoffrey Chaucer, Armig., sent by precept of the King in the retinue of the said John, on the same secret negotiations, 6*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*.

Jan. 21. To Walter of Leicester, and John Ashwell, serving the King at arms, sent by precept of the Council to the Castle of Nottingham, for the two sons of Charles de Blois, being in the said castle; for conducting them safely and securely to the Castle of Devises, in the custody of Reginald de Bello Campo, Knight, 6*l*. 13*s*. 4*d*. (Ib.)

For the expenses of the said sons, and the lodging of horses, from Nottingham to Dyvises, 10*l*. (Ib.)

To Philippa Pycard, damsel of the late Philippa, Queen of England, by the hands of Adam de Rumesey, valet of the Lord Prince, 100*s*.

The above entries suggest a few remarks, and one or two queries:—

NOTES AND QUERIES.

1. Who was Katherine, "daughter of William, Duke of Bruccella"?

2. Who was Blanche, Lady Wake? Blanche of Lancaster, widow of Thomas, Lord Wake, is said by Burke to have died in 1349 (Extinct Peerage, p. 551). The Princess of Wales bore the title (in right of her mother) in 1377.

3. Philippa Chaucer and Philippa Pycard are generally considered the same person. The manner of the appearance of their names on the Rolls leads me to doubt this. HERMENTRUDE.

THE NEWNHAM STATE SWORD.

After the account given in your columns of the sale of the mace of Kinsale, which I hope has at length found a permanent resting place, permit me to send you a cutting from The Standard, June 1, 1865, respecting the contemplated sale of the sword of Newnham. It will show the manner in which relics of local interest are even now disposed of on occasion. I may add, that when at that town, I have made ineffectual attempts to see it, but have reason to believe it to be of later date than the reign of King John, though an object of great interest.

"(Before Sir W. PAGE WOOD.)"

"THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. WASBROUGH.—THE NEWNHAM STATE SWORD."

"This was an information by the Attorney-General on the relation of the churchwardens of Newnham, in the county of Gloucester, and Mr. E. Owen Jones, a justice of the peace for the county of Gloucester, against the trustees of the will of the late Mr. John James, the late lord of the manor of Newnham. The information prayed for an ex-parte injunction to restrain the defendants till the hearing of the cause from selling a certain sword, which it was alleged was the town sword of Newnham.

"Mr. Rolt, Q.C., and Mr. Winterbotham were the counsel engaged.

"The facts were shortly as follows:—Newnham, in Gloucestershire, is an ancient borough, and the manor of Newnham, which is co-extensive but distinct from the borough, was anciently part of the king's demesne. The manor was granted at intervals to various persons, but it reverted from time to time to the king, by forfeiture and otherwise, and in the reign of King John it was in the king's possession, and that monarch then presented to the borough of Newnham a charter, which has been lost, and with the charter a sword of state, made of steel finely wrought, and six feet in length. The privileges of the town have long since been lost, and the election of a mayor has not taken place for some time. This being the case the town sword was deposited, first in the parish church, and then in an ancient inn at Newnham, called the Bear Inn, where, there being, till lately, no town-hall, public meetings of the inhabitants were held from time to time. In the year 1554, A.D., the manor of Newnham was granted to Lord Stafford, and from him, through descent, and finally by purchase, it came, in the year 1850, into the possession of Mr. John James, who a short time after also purchased the Bear Inn, Newnham. In July, 1852, Mr. James held a leet court, and at this court he produced the state sword in question; the sword was removed the same day to Mr. James's house at Newnham, where it still remains. In 1855, Mr. James did making a will by which he left all his property defendants in trust for sale, and in May of this year defendants advertised their intention to sell by auctions, in five lots, all the property so devised. The fifth lot was described as follows:—'The manor of ham, with the tolls, fishery, and appurtenances. The manor of Newnham will be sold the sword of state sent with the charter to Newnham by King John. The sword of state given with the charter by King John is of steel finely polished and ornamented with excellent workmanship. Its whole length is six feet, the length of the blade is four feet four inches; on the latter is this curious inscription:—

'John Morse being Maier,
This sword did repair—1584.'

See Rudder's History of Gloucestershire. Upon this advertisement appearing, a meeting of the inhabitants of Newnham was at once called, and at this meeting it was resolved 'That the trustees of the late John James, Esq., be respectfully requested to place the sword of state given with the charter to Newnham by King John, in the town hall of Newnham, in order that it may be vested in the local board of Newnham, the ancient local magistracy having ceased to exist.' The trustees having refused to act in accordance with the above resolution, the present proceedings were taken to enforce compliance.

"Mr. Rolt, Q.C., after stating the facts as above, now applied for an immediate injunction, as the sale was to take place to-morrow (this day.)

"The Vice-Chancellor granted the injunction required, on the applicants giving an undertaking to abide by any order as to damage which might accrue in consequence; the injunction was to be in force up to next Thursday week.

"Mr. Rolt, Q.C., expressed a hope that some amicable arrangement would be come to in the meantime."

W. J. BERNHARD SMITH.

Temple.

THE FYLFOT.—In the monument of Bishop Walter Bronscomb (died 1281), now standing in the westernmost bay of the south side of the Lady Chapel of Exeter Cathedral, the upper cushion that supports the head of the recumbent effigy is diapered with fylfots of a more elaborate form than is commonly seen: they are coloured quarterly or and gules, the heraldic metal and colour alternating. This diaper was, doubtless, executed when the effigy was removed and placed on the altar-tomb in its present position, probably about the year 1420. CHARLES BOUTELL.

DAY FOR MARRYING.—I have cut the following from one of our newspapers. I have frequently heard of this custom when I have been in Scotland, but never could find in what it originated. Perhaps some of your readers may be able to give us a fuller account of it:—

"There is a remarkable peculiarity in the Scottish people, says the Registrar-General—their fondness for marrying on the last day of the year. There are more marriages in Scotland on that day than in any week of the year; excepting, of course, the week in which that day occurs. The detailed returns for 1861 have just been issued, and the number of marriages in the towns would average some 25 a-day—that is to say, a work-day, for marrying is one of the things not to be done in Scotland on Sunday—but the Registrar-General states that, in fact, there are between 400 and 500 marriages in those towns on the 31st of December. By another curious usage, a large proportion of these marriages are not registered until January, making that appear a favourite month for marriage, which it is not.”

T. B.

MANUSCRIPT POEM.—The following cutting from Mr. John Salkeld's Catalogue of Second-hand Books (No. 9), is worth preserving among your fly-leaf scribblings. The verses are stated to be contained in a volume of tracts of the earlier part of the eighteenth century:—

“410. TRACTS.—Proceedings of the House of Peers on the Public Accounts, with their Address to His Majesty, &c., 1702—Proceedings of the Lords in relation to the Occasional Conformity Bill, 1702—The Bill, or Act, for preventing Occasional Conformity, with Reports of the Conference, &c., 1702—An Account of the Trials of Renbow's Cowardly Captain, 1703—Some Weighty Considerations relating to the Duke of York, with the Answer, 1680—Articles of Peace between William III. and Lewis XIV., 1697—A Collection of Addresses concerning the Conception and Birth of the pretended Prince of Wales, 1690—The Pamphleteers, a Satyr, 1703, in 1 vol., folio, calf, 6s. 6d.

“Contains the following, in MS. :—

‘ON THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE TO THE COMMONS.

‘The Queen a message to the Senate sent,
To beg her Duke a boon in Parliament.
After a warm debate the House grew bold
And bid her pay her Duke in Vigo gold,
Tho' this was thought confounded hard by some,
To give to one what t'other Duke brought home.
Bulk broke, it did appear, upon plain proof,
The gold galloon had not brought wealth enough;
At which her Grace and Majy. tooke snuffe.’”

A. O. V. P.

CURIOUS CHRISTIAN NAMES.—The famous Lord Collingwood had a brother named Winefred who commanded the Rattler. In searching the registers of Bobbington parish, I have found the very uncommon Christian name of Wylgeforde given to a daughter in two different families in 1582 and 1584. Two relatives of my own have borne the baptismal name of Polixena.

There was a Baroness Lyttleton of revered memory named Apphia, to whom a print of Malvern abbey church was inscribed.

H. W. T.

A MATCH FOUND FOR A COMMON SAYING.—It is sometimes remarked of an uneducated, or stupid man—“He does not know B from a bull's foot.” A quotation from Mrs. Everett Green's Calendar of State Papers, 1666-67, which is given in the Saturday Review, No. 500, furnishes us with a companion picture of ignorance: “Some of the captains know not to distinguish a horse's head from a Roman S in their demands.” The phrase occurs in a letter, written from Portsmouth to Samuel Pepys by Commissioner Middleton.

ST. SWITHIN.

Queries.

DOUBLE ACROSTIC.—When and by whom was this exercise of the ingenuity invented, which has now become the rage in the fashionable circles?

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

BASTILE ARCHIVES.—Can any of your readers refer me to any of the compilations from Bastile archives indicated in Carlyle's French Revolution, vol. i. p. 291, edit. 1837, or to any kindred source of information?

B. D.

CLARET.—In some accounts for the year 1729, I find a payment for a pint of claret. Was the wine, then so called, of the same kind as that we now call claret?

PRESTONIENSIS.

TO CLEAR THE GLASS.—Preparatory to starting on his third voyage, in search of a north-west passage to the east, Frobisher drew up a code of instructions to be observed by the fleet; the first article of which ran as follows:—

“Imprimis. To banishe swearing, dice, card playing, and all filthie talk, and to serve God twice adae, with the ordinarie service, usuall in the Church of Englande; and to cleare the glasse everie night, according to the oulde order of England.”

What is the meaning of “clearing the glass every night”?

W. W. W.

COUTANCES: THE DIOCESE OF WINCHESTER.—The Bishop of Winchester, speaking in Convocation a week or two ago, upon the extent of his diocese, is reported to have said that besides extending over the Channel Islands, he was not sure that it did not also include Coutances in Normandy. Is there any ground for the supposition that Coutances was ever included in the diocese of Winchester? Perhaps it was meant that the Channel Islands were formerly in the diocese of Coutances. This seems more probable, but was it the case?

J. WOODWARD.

DUMBLE.—I should be glad if any of your numerous readers could inform me what is the exact meaning and derivation of the word dumble. It is a term applied in the southern parts of Nottinghamshire to a narrow valley or small ravine, I believe, with a watercourse which is supplied only with an intermittent stream. It appears to be a word used only in a very limited district of Notts—namely, a locality of some six or eight miles diameter, between Nottingham and Southwell, on the south-east confines of old Sherwood Forest, where we have Lambley Dumble, Woodborough Dumble, Efferston Dumble, Oxtun Dumble, Halloughton Dumble, Thurgarton Dumble, &c.; but no such term, as far as I am aware, is used in any other part of the county, nor in any other place that I am acquainted with. I find no explanation of the word in any of the dictionaries, and shall be glad if any of your readers can throw any light on the subject. J. S.

FUNERAL PLUME OF FEATHERS.—Could any of your correspondents inform me the meaning of the plume of feathers attached to a board, and which are used at a funeral and carried on the head of some one in front of the hearse. Has it any reference to a banner, insignia, or armorial bearing supposed to belong to the deceased, or what? ALEX. MOULTON.

GONZAGAS OF MANTUA: SACK OF FONDI.—
1. What is the best history of the Gonzagas of Mantua?

2. Did the sack of Fondi by the pirate Horuc of Mitelene (the younger of the two brothers surnamed in turn Barbarossa) occur in the spring or autumn of the year 1535?

3. Is the event and its attendant circumstances related in detail, or related at all, by Muratori?

4. From what writers do we glean most on the subject? A STUDENT.

HERALDIC.—On visiting St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, lately, I was much astonished to find that the Prince of Wales takes his place among the Knights of St. Patrick not as Prince of Wales but as Duke of Saxony, the arms on his banner being thus blazoned: Quarterly, 1st and 4th Saxony; second and third quarterly 1st and 4th England; second Scotland; third Ireland, with a label of 3 points. Perhaps Sir B. Burke, Ulster-King-at-Arms, could inform us why they are so blazoned, instead of quarterly England, Scotland, Ireland, differenced by a label of three points and an escutcheon of pretence for Saxony, as they are blazoned in England. I had hitherto supposed that Prince of Wales was a higher title than Duke of Saxony; but perhaps it is not so in Ireland. CYWRM.

Porth yr Aur, Carnarvon.

"IL Y A FAGOTS ET FAGOTS."—Are we indebted to this discovery of Sganarelle (Le Médecin Malgré Lui, Acte I. Scène 6) for the numerous comparisons after the same pattern which abound in novels of the present day? ST. SWITHIN.

"JOSEPH AND HIS BRETHREN."—In December, 1864, a sacred drama on this subject was performed at Burslem, for the benefit (I think) of the Ragged Schools of that town. Can any of your correspondents in that town inform me if this drama was printed, and also the name of the author? R. I.

KALEYARD GATE.—I was surprised to notice the name "Kaleyard Gate" on the page of references to a plan of the fortifications of the city of Chester, an. 1643, inserted at page 26 of a reprint of King's Vale Royal of England, London, J. G.

Bell, 1852. Kale or Kailyard was, I thought, thoroughly Scotch. Is it common in England? S. M.

N. D., A MINIATURE PAINTER.—There are several miniatures in the collection at the South Kensington Museum, signed with these initials, about the latter half of the seventeenth century. Who was this artist, and is anything known of him? JAMES BECK.

LORD NEWHAVEN.—Is there any portrait in existence of William Mayne, who was created Viscount Newhaven in 1776, and who died s. p. 1794? F. M. S.

229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

ABBEY OF ST. OÜEN AT ROUEN.—Can any contributor furnish a list of the Abbesses of St. Ouen since the time of the Abbess Renée de Harlay, in 1686? There exists at Rouen, or existed in 1842, a book in an old ivory cover, called Le Livre d'Ivoire, which contains the oaths of obedience taken by the abbés and abbesses of St. Ouen to the archbishop of Rouen, and a reference to this book would give an answer to the query.

The abbey was one of the most important pieces of ecclesiastical preferment in France. Sully had a charge on its revenues, and the abbé was for a long period a member of the royal family. F. R. C.

QUOTATION.—The motto adopted in the title-page of Finlay's History of Greece is,— Ὁλβιος ὅστις τῆς ἱστορίας ἔσχε μύθησιν.

"Blest is he who possesses a knowledge of history."

From what author is this taken? F.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS' SURVIVING SITTERS.—Reading the Life and Times of Sir Joshua Reynolds, I think it worthy of a note that the Dowager Countess of Shaftesbury, whose portrait forms so beautiful a feature of Sir Joshua's noble picture of the Marlborough family, which was painted in 1777, is still living (born Nov. 5, 1773). To my note I add a query: Is any other person alive who sat to Sir Joshua? E. S. S. W.

[When the "Puck" was sold a few years since to the late Lord Fitzwilliam, who himself had been one of the sitters, it was said that the "model" from whom the "Puck" was painted, was in the auction room at the time of the sale. He was, we believe, many years ago, a gate-keeper at Elliot's brewery, at Pimlico.—ED. "N. & Q."]

"THOUGHTFUL MOLL."—The young people about me are always pressing me to tell them the story of "Thoughtful Moll," which they declare they have heard is very interesting. But both I and my "old Missus" are obliged to acknowledge our ignorance, though we too have heard it spoken of as notorious in every county. I at first thought it had appeared in one of your early volumes, but am looking at the Indexes I found myself mistaken. And yet I have no doubt you, Mr. Editor—for like all Editors you are most likely an old fogey, and have lots of little ones scrambling about your knees—must be perfectly competent to amuse your infantine mob with this sensational (I adopt the modern term) narrative; and I take it for granted will enable your antiquarian readers (I use the epithet in a double sense) to retail this little bit of Folk lore. If I give you credit for too much knowledge, perhaps some of your learned correspondents will supply your deficiency, or, at all events, tell where the veritable history is to be found. AVUNCULUS.

VOLTAIRE: DIOCLETIAN. — I have more than once in "N. & Q." asked for a verification of sayings ascribed to Voltaire. My queries are unanswered. I try one more:—

"Nearly a century ago, Voltaire wrote: 'I am sick of hearing that twelve unlettered men established Christianity. I will show that one man can destroy it.'"—Morning Advertiser, June 14, 1865.

I do not remember the passage, and shall be glad to know in which of Voltaire's works it is.

In the same article it is said:—

"Diocletian declared his intention of abolishing the Christian name. So terrible was the persecution, that its authors declared they had succeeded in their object, and pillars of remembrance were raised in various parts of the Roman world to record the fact 'that the very name of Christianity had been rooted out.'"

Gibbon narrates the persecution, but omits the pillars. Where were they erected? How long did any of them remain? By what authors are they mentioned? and what was the inscription in the original language? FITZHOPKINS.

Garriek Club.

Queries with Answers.

COACHMAKERS' COMPANY. — In Boswell's Life of Johnson (edit. 1835, vol. viii. p. 69), I find the following:—

"I mentioned a kind of religious Robin-Hood Society, which met every Sunday evening at Coachmakers' Hall for free debate," &c.

Is this Coachmakers' Hall the parent and corrupted sponsor of the existing Cogers' Hall? If not, where was Coachmakers' Hall; and was the Society of Coachmakers one of the ancient guilds?

A. F.

[The Company of Coachmakers was incorporated by Charles II. in 1671, and styled by letters-patent, "The Master, Wardens, Assistants, and Commonalty of the Company of Coach and Coach-harness Makers of London." The fraternity is governed by a Master, three Wardens, and twenty-three Assistants, their motto being "Surgit post nubila Phœbus." Coachmakers' Hall is in Noble Street, Foster Lane, and was formerly the hall of the Scriveners. The building was once famed for the meeting of societies and clubs within its walls. Here the Protestant Association assembled, and here originated the riots of the year 1780, headed by Lord George Gordon.—The Society of Cogers, founded in 1755, is nothing more nor less than a political debating club, meeting sometimes in one place, and sometimes in another. Its present Discussion Hall is at Mr. G. Walter's house of refreshment in Shoe Lane, Fleet Street.]

"EPISCOPACY": HENRY SWINBURNE. — I have an old book in my possession, entitled Episcopacy not prejudicial to Regal Power, which wants the title-page. I presume that it was published by one Robert Pawlet: inasmuch as I find at the end of the work a "Catalogue of Books, printed for and sold by Robert Pawlet, at the sign of the Bible in Chancery Lane, near Fleet Street." And from its appearance, I think it was published somewhere between 1666 and 1680. Can you favour me with the author's name, and date of publication?

Further, can any of your readers acquaint me with the date of the death of the "late famous, learned, and ingenious Mr. Henry Swinburne, author of the Treatise on Last Wills and Testaments; whose Treatise on Spousals was posthumously published by "Robert Clavell, at the Peacock in St. Paul's Churchyard, 1686."

J. R. PHILLIPS.

Cardigan.

[The work possessed by our correspondent is from the pen of that learned prelate and distinguished casuist, Dr. Sanderson, whose Life was written by Isaac Walton in the eighty-fifth year of his age—which he states was "a pleasant toil," and modestly adds, "I seriously wish, both for the reader's and Dr. Sanderson's sake, that posterity had known his great learning and virtue by a better pen; by such a pen as could have made his life as immortal as his learning and merits ought to be." The work is entitled, "Episcopacy (as Established by Law in England) not Prejudicial to Regal Power. Written in the time of the Long Parliament by the special command of the late King. By the Right Reverend Father in God Robert Sanderson, late Lord Bishop of Lincoln. London, Printed for Robert Pawlet, at the Bible in Chancery Lane, near Fleet Street, 1678." Prefixed is the "Vera Effigies Reverendi in Christe Patris Dni: Roberti Sanderson, Episcopi Lincolnienensis."

There is no record extant giving the exact date of the birth or death of Henry Swinburne, the civilian; but as his will, dated May 30, 1623 (the codicil July 15, 1623), was proved June 12, 1624, we may presume he died about that time. He was buried in the north aisle of York cathedral, where there is a monument of him in a civilian's gown kneeling before a desk. See an engraving of it in Drake's Edoracum, fol. 1786, p. 377.]

* 2nd S. ix. 306; 3rd S. vii. 211.

JUDICIAL.—What is the origin and significance of the term judicial, applied to astrology? And what is its force when prefixed to the word blindness? T.

[We are indebted to a correspondent who has read much on these matters for a solution to the first question; the second we derive from theological writers:—

"Judicial astrology is so called, because its professors deliver judgments, or opinions as to what in their judgment the events will be, which will follow certain configurations of the heavenly bodies: opinions based on the past experience of ages. Wherever the planets have been conjoined with each other in any peculiar way, either as regards general questions, or in private nativities, the results have been handed down by the professors to their successors as rules for future forecasts. The true astrologer never becomes the fortune-teller. All he says is, this: 'From the position of those bodies, which the Great Ruler of the Universe has placed for signs and for seasons, I should infer these signs will be followed by war, peace, prosperity, ill-fortune, &c., as the signifiers may be.'"

Judicial blindness is a phrase used to signify that moral blindness, or obstinate refusal to see and pursue what is right, that has been inflicted by Providence on men or on nations as a judgment. Thus, the wilful blindness of Pharaoh to the miracles of Moses, and that of the Jews to those of the Messiah, are all instances of judicial blindness."]

MR. FORTESCUE'S ELMS.—I have read, in some work on Devonshire, I believe, an account of an avenue of elms planted by a Mr. Fortescue, who directed that when grown, the trees should be cut down and given to the poor of the parish. Where is the account to be found? KAPPA.

[Near the churchyard of Brixton, co. Devon, is a fine grove of elms planted in the year 1677 by Mr. Fortescue of Spridleston and other parishioners, for the express purpose of being sold, when at a proper growth, to raise a fund for the benefit of the poor: a singular instance of prudent foresight, and well worthy of imitation, there being many parishes in which small wastes might most beneficially be thus planted. Sixteen were cut down during the winter of 1819, and produced the sum of 92*l.* 2*s.* There is a stone on the spot with the following inscription:—"This colony of elms, regularly disposed into walks, was planted in November, 1677, by Edward Fortescue, of Spridleston, Esq., churchwarden, with the approbation and contribution of the majority of estated parishioners, to the intent that, when perfect in growth and sold, lands may be purchased with the money for relief of the poor of this parish, and that posterity, reaping the advantage of our benefaction, may be encouraged to provide for more succession, by substituting others in the room of these."

As land cannot legally be purchased, the proceeds are funded for the benefit of the poor.—Lysons's Devonshire, p. 75.]

Replies.

ALBINI BRITO: THE HERALDIC PUZZLE.

(3rd S. vi. 13, 113, 174, 255.)

I suppose D. P. is satisfied that the armorial bearings of De Toden, otherwise D'Albini, of Belvoir, have been at last ascertained, since WATERBOUGET (going to original sources) has fished up out of the Exeter archives a thirteenth century seal of William Albini of Belvoir. (See Peck's Stamford, lib. viii. p. 27.) He blazons it, two chevronels within a bordure. This seems conclusive. WATERBOUGET however, I am sorry to say, seems abominably stingy. He keeps too much in his bucket for his own private drinking, instead of slaking the thirst of the readers of "N. & Q." Otherwise he would have told us that the chevrons do not stand alone in Albini's seal, but that a cross, a rose, and a sprig of broom, are emblazoned with them; not indeed within the shield, but, thirteenth century fashion, arranged around it. Now these were, and are to this day, royal national ensigns; and the same may perhaps be said of the chevrons, for they are the ancient bearings of the De Clares, who were of the royal house. Thus the whole seal displays the relationship with that house, which we otherwise know to exist. It is worthy of remark, that the lords of Stafford and of Belvoir both descended from Toden, and both used substantially the same bearings; whence D. P. may fairly infer, if he likes, that they must have been borne by the common ancestor, however remote. A like remark may be made of several other houses; and I should be glad if any of the more sceptical antiquaries would give us a note of what he conceives is a more probable hypothesis than the above to account for the facts.

Further, stingy WATERBOUGET has not told us that the above forms only the privy, or counter-seal, of W. d'Albini. His great seal—the quaintest I think I have chanced to see—has the following device:—A square tower (each of the two upper stories enriched with a row of Norman arches), surrounded by an embattled wall. On the summit a two-forked pennon; and two human heads, facing each other from the opposite sides, apparently gazing at the prospect. Clearly what we now call a "bellevue," for Belvoir. Thus we get at the territorial arms of Belvoir. They seem to be compound ones: for we learn from a Trentham deed cited by Eyton (Antiquities of Shropshire, vol. ii. p. 124), that, as early as A.D. 1210, the Trusbuts bore on their seal a human head within a treasure; and thus, also, we find the alliance with Trusbut displayed on the Belvoir seal.

The eagle within a bordure, we need have little doubt, was a fancy coat assigned to Robert de Toden by the later heralds (as they were fond of doing to the more ancient worthies); and, based perhaps upon the eagles borne by the De Tonies, another line descended from the Norman standard-bearer.

Combining this with what WATERBOUGET has pointed out, viz. that it is a mistake to look for the shield of Valoines among the quarterings under examination, MR. STAFFORD CAREY'S solution of the heraldic puzzle appears verified: for the fourth coat may be safely assumed to be meant for Trusbut's—so we have in due sequence Trusbut, Albini, Toden, and no further difficulty remains.

L. P.

SHAKESPEAR FAMILY.

(3rd S. vii. 175.)

Lieut.-Col. J. D. Shakespear, R.A., of Richmond, Surrey, claims descent from our great poet, and this interesting question was first raised by him in the Times of the 18th June, 1864.

The Shakespear tomb is in Stepney Churchyard, and records the death of Arthur Shakespear, Ropemaker, May 9, 1749, aged fifty years; Benet Shakespear, Nov. 10, 1756, aged forty-nine; Jonathan Shakespear, Feb. 16, 1768, aged fifty-eight; and Alderman John Shakespear, May 19, 1775, aged 66. These four were brothers. Also Mrs. Elizabeth Shakespear* (widow of the alderman), Feb. 15, 1807, aged eighty; Arthur Shakespear (eldest son of the alderman), M.P. for Richmond, Yorkshire, June 12, 1818, aged seventy; his wife Jane (daughter of Matthew Ridley, and sister of Sir M. W. Ridley, Bart.), January 30, 1805, aged fifty-five; John Matthew Shakespear (son of the last named Arthur), April 2, 1844, aged sixty-six, and several children who died young.

Alderman Shakespear, of Billiter Square and Mile End, was originally a member of the Broderers' Company, but was translated from that guild to the Ironmongers', Friday, Sept. 23, 1768, as agreed to by the Court of Aldermen on the Tuesday previous. He was Master of the Ironmongers' Company, 1769, and died 1775, leaving a widow and eleven children, viz. five sons and six daughters.

As Jonathan Shakespear and his son, the alderman, were both members of the Broderers' Company, I naturally applied to the Clerk of that guild, Mr. Charles E. Freeman, of 11, Bucklersbury, to kindly help me by throwing some light on this subject by aid of the company's books. It was not till I wrote a second time he deigned to give me a reply, and then briefly stated his terms were three guineas for searching prior to 1728, and

* She was Elizabeth Currie, of the family of Bush-hill, Bankers of London. Her mother was Anne Campbell, of the House of Argyll and Eglinstoun.

10s. 6d. after that period. Lieut.-Col. Shakespear did not fare so well. Far different was the answer I received from John Nicholl, Esq., F.S.A., Canonbury, author of a privately printed History of the Ironmongers' Company (of which he has been master), and whose elaborate and beautiful MS. history of the same guild was so much admired at the Society of Antiquaries' exhibition, June 21, 1860, and the Ironmongers' Hall Exhibition, May 1861. He took some trouble in the matter, and informed me the Ironmongers' book could not throw any light on the subject. I recommended a search in the Shadwell registers (which some of your correspondents may have spare time for); accounted for the alderman's coat of arms being the same as the poet's, as there is but one coat known of the name; and concluded by noticing the Shakespears of Essex, which included Thomas Shakspeare, priest, 1557; Joseph Shakspeare of Havering, 1640; Samuel Shakspeare of Hornchurch; Samuel Shakspeare of Romford, 1707; William Shakspeare, whose sons were John (of Rawreth, 1723), Joseph and William.

The Rope Factory belonging originally to the family, and which to present knowledge dates back to 1660, is in Love Lane, Shadwell (Rees & Co.), and thirty years since the firm was Rees Shakespear & Co. "Shakespear's Walk," 4 High Street, Shadwell, is named after the family and the house, 47, is a curious weather-boarded two storey building of ancient date.

In a letter to Lieut.-Col. Shakspear, MR. HALLIWELL mentions he never heard of the Shadwell Shakespears till lately. They were wealthy folk in their day.

G. R. French, Esq., writing to me says:—

"I had the pleasure of first pointing out to Lieut.-Col. Shakespear his connection with the Ironmongers' Company (to which I belong) through his great-grandfather the Alderman, whose father was Jonathan Shakespear, ob. April 1735, and he was son of John Shakespear, the Rope Walk, Shadwell, born in 1612, and died Sept. 1689. The name of his father is not known, but he would be coeval with the poet, and Lieut.-Col. Shakespear fondly hopes that his ancestor was the Poet's brother Gilbert who was living at Stratford in 1609, but nothing is known of his after history. My own impression is, that Lieut.-Col. Shakespear may be descended from a brother of the Poet's father. The Shakespears are found in Warwickshire registers in the 1st of Henry VI., and the name exists in some of the towns of that county to the present time."

Mr. Nicholl justly adds, that whether the Essex and Warwickshire families are of the same stock remains to be proved; "it is a very interesting question."

Now the real question is, who was the father of John Shakespear, of Rope Walk, born 1612, married, July 14, 1654, Martha Seeley, aged nineteen, and died Sept. 1689? He had issue, Martha, Samuel, Benjamin, Mary, John, and Jonathan (born Feb. 6, 1670, and died 1735.) These names savour strongly of Puritanism, and it is known that the poet's relations were staunch Puritans, and this probably caused all relating to him to be destroyed. But this, however (as Mr. French surmises) may have been but common at that day:—

"John, the Poet's father, had two daughters, called Joan, which was evidently a cherished name, and no doubt had been in the family for previous generations; his father was Richard, a name which John Shakespear gave to a younger son, of whom nothing is known except that he died in 1613."

T. C. N.

MILTON AND HIS ILLUSTRATOR.

(3rd S. vii. 150.)

The lines from Shakespeare—"Gives not the hawthorn bush a sweeter shade," &c., quoted by LORD LYTTELTON, partly furnishes a reply to the inquiry of another correspondent—"What propriety is there in making a shepherd count his sheep under a hawthorn rather than under any other tree?" The thorn, with its numerous and closely-placed branches, shooting out at no great distance from the ground, forms a good shelter from sun, storm, and night dews, and sheep and cattle resort to it on that account. Walking in pastures where the thorn is preserved any one may perceive unmistakeable evidence of the preference which the animals in question have for that tree.

A shepherd, if "stirring with the lark," would, in all probability, find his flock assembled under a thorn ready to be told. If those who hesitate to accept the verb to tell in the sense of counting would only pay a visit to the Commons and see Mr. Brand tell his tale, and never did rustic swain watch over his sheep with more tender solicitude than is shown by the indefatigable and amiable Parliamentary shepherd for the flock under his charge, his scepticism would vanish. Mr. Speaker's "Tellers may proceed to tell" is decisive upon the point.

The word is used in the same sense not only in the provinces but also in London, more frequently than is supposed. At landing wharves, merchandise in the form of packets, barrels, &c., is, when counted, referred to as "told off." The word was, and I doubt not still is, used in that way at billiard and cricket matches. Devout Catholics, I presume, continue to tell their beads.

Miss Edgeworth's rendering of "tale" by "tally" makes what is plain somewhat obscure. The meaning of the word is shown in the following passages:—

"And the tale of bricks, which they did make heretofore, ye shall lay upon them; ye shall not diminish ought thereof, &c."

"Go therefore now, and work; for there shall no straw be given you, yet shall ye deliver the tale of bricks," &c.
Exodus v. 8 and 18.

"Wherefore David arose and went, he and his men, and slew of the Philistines two hundred men; and David brought their foreskins, and they gave them in full tale to the king, that he might be the king's son in law."—1 Samuel xviii. 27.

Before quitting the subject allow me to observe that break of day is not the usual period of rustic courtship. At that time each person hastens to his allotted duties, as Milton in his poem has described them. The ploughman "whistles o'er the furrowed land," the milkmaid "singeth blythe," the mower "whets his scythe"—

"And every shepherd tells his tale,
Under the hawthorn in the dale."

The word which I have marked in italics seems to set all doubt at rest. It is the duty of every shepherd to count his sheep in the morning; but it is beyond the bounds of probability that every shepherd should be able to find a sweetheart to talk to at that very uncomfortable hour for love-making.

C. Ross.

That the shepherd's tale was one of sheep, not of love, is to my mind so evident, that I am surprised to find it still doubted by your correspondent D. (3rd S. vii. 210.) Milton is describing how all nature rouses up to activity with the break of day. To be sure the milkmaid is only spoken of as "singing blithe," and the ploughman as "whistling o'er the furrowed land," but no doubt they were both at their work just as much as the mower "whetting his scythe." In the midst of all this industry how inconsistent to make a single exception in favour of the shepherd, whose office demands such peculiar watchfulness and care! While all around are beginning the labours of the day, he alone is to be neglecting his flock, and making love under a bush. The word every would render this view still more absurd; all the shepherds are to be love-making in this fashion.

J. DIXON.

ST. AUGUSTINE AND THE MYSTERY OF THE BLESSED TRINITY.

(3rd S. vii. 440.)

The vision of St. Augustine, beautiful and instructive as it is, must, I fear, be ranked among the many traditional stories or legends of the olden times. Though Dr. Stanley, in the extract given, asserts that the saint himself relates it, I have never found it in his writings. It occurs, however, in all the old books of legendary lore; and the following is one of the best readings of it:—

"Once upon a time as St. Augustine was walking by the sea shore, and considering very earnestly how he should best explain the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, he saw a little child sitting on the sand, who kept lading water out of the sea with a little spoon into a small hole on the shore. Thereupon he spoke thus to the child:

'What are you trying to do?' The child answered: 'I want to lade the great sea into a small hole.' Then said he: 'My child, you cannot do that, for it is a thing impossible.' Then said the child: 'It is more easy to do than what you are thinking of.' With this the child disappeared: and St. Augustine well understood that he was our Lord himself."

The incident is said to have occurred at Centum Celle, now Civita Vecchia. F. C. H.

The passage in Dean Stanley's sermon must be a direct citation from some well known author, as I have before me some notes on the Calendar (published in 1800), in which it is given without inverted commas in precisely the same words as in Sermons in the East. In Dr. Husenbeth's edition of Butler's Lives there is an engraving of the Vision, which professes to be taken from a painting by Garofalo: it is, however, left unexplained by the text. I advise your correspondent to consult Parker's Anglican Calendar, and Jameson's Legends of the Monastic Orders. ST. SWITHIN.

Leigh, Body of Divinity (p. 252), says:—

"A studious Father meditating on the mystery of the Trinity, there appeared unto him a child with a shell lading the sea into a little hole; he demanding what the child did, 'I intend,' said the child, 'to empty the ocean into this pit.' 'It is impossible,' said the Father. 'As possible,' said the child, 'as for thee to comprehend this profound mystery in thy shallow capacity.'"

The margin has "Par. on Rom. ii. 23." The preceding reference is to "Petav. de Trin." This "Petav." may be Petavius, born 1583: a Jesuit, celebrated for chronology. With Scaliger, Salmasius, and Casaubon, he is said to have had controversies.

The foregoing is perhaps as "full" an account as may otherwise be met with. But it may be said that, as to the "original account," the extract given seems to afford it when it states: "This is in allusion to a vision, which he himself relates as occurring to him."

This appears to indicate, clearly, that St. Augustine was the original narrator. ANON.

Your correspondent H. C. is mistaken as to the origin of the legend he names. It is not told of St. Augustine; but I think it is St. Augustine who tells it of a learned convert to Christianity, who lived in the fifth or sixth century. His name was Alanus, and, from being born in an island, was surnamed De Insula. He went to Paris and studied divinity, &c., and returned to his native land (some part of Africa). He had attained so great a name from his sermons, that he at last determined upon expounding the mystery of the Trinity. And it was while walking on the sands, preparing this sermon, that an angel is said to have appeared to him in the form of a child, who told him he was trying to empty the sea with a ladle; and when Alanus replied it was not possible, gave the answer quoted by your correspondent. Not having books, or any facilities by me, I cannot give dates and authorities as I should wish; but these I know to be the main facts. It is sad to end by saying that Alanus de Insula, the most learned man perhaps of his day, returned to, and I believe died in, heathenism. A. T. T.

GALLOWES INSCRIPTION.

(3rd S. vii. 439.)

"The name of the executed person," or, properly speaking, the name of the person upon whom a sentence of death was executed, was John Hamilton, Archbishop of St. Andrews, and natural brother to James Hamilton, Regent of Scotland. The "part of Scotland" was Stirling Castle, the date about 1571. I believe Hamilton was the only bishop ever hanged in Scotland, though subsequently, in the same country, a band of base ruffians cruelly assassinated a venerable prelate in presence of his daughter.

There is a curious, though doubtful, astrological story told relating to the death of Hamilton. Some years previous the archbishop gave Jerome Cardan the princely fee of 1800 gold crowns, with other presents, for coming to Scotland and attending him as a physician. Before leaving, Cardan calculated his patron's horoscope, and declared that he would die of passio cordis; the horoscope is in Latin, and may be found in Cardan's Gemitarum Exemplar. Now passio cordis might be translated disease of the heart, or it might typify suffering by the cord, the latter actually being the disease which caused Hamilton's death.

It was the odium theologicum of the reforming party that threw such a sting into the inscription; and thus I am reminded of another not unworthy of a place here, that derives its punning satire from the same source. Lord Moore, in defiance of a cessation of hostilities, attacked Owen (Latinised Eugenius) Roe O'Neill commanding the Irish Confederate forces about the beginning of 1643. O'Neill, who had been a general officer in the Spanish service, was too old a soldier to be taken by surprise, and repulsed his enemy, Moore himself being killed by a cannon ball. Upon which, a Romanist chaplain, in the Irish camp, wrote the following epigram:—

"Contra Romanos mores, res mira, Dynasta Morus ab Eugenio cannonizatus erat."

WILLIAM PINKER — STON.

It was on the execution of Hamilton, Bishop of St. Andrews, who was captured in Duns Barton Castle in 1571 by the party of the Regent Morton, that the lines—

"Cresce diu felix arbor, semperque vireto Frondibus, ut nobis talia poma feras," were affixed to the gibbet. Queen Mary's party replied by affixing the following couplet:—

"Infelix pereas arbor! si forte virebis, Imprimis utinam carminis author eas."

Hist. of King James the Sixth. (Bannatyne Club edit.), p. 72.

G. E.

TOASTS.

(3rd S. vii. 397.)

The first toast cited by CYRIL embodies a mot in vogue in France during the latter half of the last century. I do not know who first used it; but Voltaire adopts the formula in a letter to Helvetius, of May 11, 1761:—

"Les jansénistes, les convulsionnaires, gouvernement donc Paris! C'est bien pis que le règne des jésuites: il y avait des accommodemens avec le ciel du temps qu'ils avaient du crédit; mais les jansénistes sont impitoyables. Est-ce que la proposition honnête et modeste d'étrangler le dernier jésuite avec les boyaux du dernier janséniste ne pourrait amener les choses à quelque conciliation?"

The same thought has been paraphrased by Diderot, in a distich which has been well styled "a trocément énergique":—

"Et ses mains ourdiraient les entrailles du prêtre,
A défaut d'un cordon pour étrangler les rois."

The toast attributed to Henry Erskine I have seen in an amplified form:—

"Dam the canals, sink the coal-pits, blast the minerals, consume the manufactures, disperse the commerce of Great Britain and Ireland."

and I have somewhere read that it is appropriately even at every anniversary dinner of an association of civil engineers, called the Smeatonian Club, from the illustrious engineer who founded it, and to whom is attributed the characteristic sentiment."

The substance of another of these toasts is sometimes given in a metrical form (into which, indeed, as a mnemonic aid I should recommend miners-out to convert, if they can, that which follows it):—

"Here's a health to all those that I love,
Here's a health to all those that love me;
Here's a health to all those that love those that I love,
And to those that love them that love me."

This reminds me of another doggerel toast:—

"Here's a health to me and mine,
Not forgetting thee and thine;
And when thee and thine,
Come to see me and mine;
May me and mine,
Make thee and thine,
As welcome as thee and thine,
Have ever made me and mine."

I transcribe the following, which is styled "The Climax of Toasts," from the Anecdote Library, London, 1822:—

"When Lord Stair was ambassador in Holland, he made frequent entertainments, to which the foreign ministers were constantly invited; not excepting the ambassador of France, with whose nation we were then on the point of breaking. In return, the Abbé de Ville, the French ambassador, as constantly invited the English and Austrian ambassadors, upon the like occasions. The Abbé was a man of vivacity, and fond of punning. Agreeable to this humour, he one day proposed a health in these terms: 'The rising sun, my master,' alluding to the device and motto of Louis XV.; which was pledged by the whole company. It came then to the Baron de Reisbach's turn to give a toast; and he, to countenance the Abbé, proposed the moon, in compliment to the empress queen, which was greatly applauded. The turn then came to the Earl of Stair, on whom all eyes were fastened; but that nobleman, whose presence of mind never forsook him, drank his master King William by the name of Joshua, the son of Nun, who made the sun and moon stand still."—P. 87.

The toast given by Campbell at, I think, a Literary Fund dinner, has often been cited. The poet proposed the health of Napoleon Buonaparte, connecting him with the business of the day by stating in explanation that he had "shot a publisher,"—alluding to the execution of the German bookseller Palm, for the publication of the Geist der Zeit. See "N. & Q.," July 30, 1853, p. 107.

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

CYRIL has missed the rhythm of his second toast. I have generally heard it as—

"Here's to those that love them that love us.
Here's to them that love those that love us.
Here's to those that love them, that love them that love those,

That love those that love them that love us."

It goes to a tune.

P. P.

IN TWO PLACES AT ONCE LIKE A BIRD.

(3rd S. vii. 459.)

This very often-quoted expression, attributable to the celebrated Sir Boyle Roche, has been so misquoted that it has assumed its present form, which is not the shape or form that Sir Boyle used. When I was a schoolboy in Dublin I made the acquaintance of Mr. John Ryder, a gentleman of education and great information, who resided in Upper Bagin Street, then (1829-30) a suburb of the city, and he used to take much pleasure in relating to myself and other juvenile friends stories and anecdotes of the old Irish House of Commons, where for many years he had spent his evenings during the parliamentary sessions, having an entrée to a private box near the Speaker's chair, as a friend of his was an official of the House, and procured him that favour. I have memorandums of many of his remembrances of the "Old House in College Green," and as few, if indeed any of these recollections have ever been printed, I may at some leisure time put them in after the plunder of Jerusalem. The fore-court of Karnach confirms this invasion of Judea in his reign (Bunsen's Egypt's Place, iii. 241.)

T. J. BUCKTON.

Lichfield.

ZINC SPIRES.

(3rd S. vii. 461.)

Having had perhaps more to do with the use of this metal than many architects, I beg to say that these spires are not only very common on the continent but also in America and Canada. The only one I know of in England is that at Ripple, near Walmer.

With regard to the question as to the use of zinc in mediæval times, I believe we have no testimony of the use of copper, tin, or zinc as roof coverings; though the former most probably was used in Cornwall in parts where that metal abounds, and lead is scarce. The "Italia" of Naples, as cited in the Moniteur of Feb. 15th last, describes the discovery of a large fountain at Pompeii with a handsome front decorated with shell work, and "the upper part covered with zinc." This curious discovery shows the use of this metal to be known to the ancients.

The reports of the various commissions to foreign governments, and the results of observation in this country prove—1. That sheet zinc is very durable if used of sufficient thickness; 2. That it must be laid so as to be quite free to contract and expand with change of temperature. Lead itself will not stand if too thin, and if it has not sufficient rolls and flashings. Zinc will, however, stand well at about one-fifth the thickness required for lead.

Objection has been taken as to smoky atmospheres, but this is a mistake. Liège is a great manufacturing town where nothing but coal is consumed. It is the Birmingham of the continent, and like that town its locality is called "the black land" from the abundance of smoke and soot. Here the use of zinc for house coverings is almost universal. One roof, fifty-five years old; another, covering some furnace-houses where volumes of smoke have been pouring out day and night, and which has been built about thirty years, were examined among many others and found perfect. When zinc is first put up it oxidises, and the coating thus formed is insoluble and protects the metal. Of course if it be rolled too thin, the oxide penetrates too deep, and the metal goes in holes on being walked over.

JAMES EDMESTON, Architect.

Crown Court, Old Broad Street.

Zinc, as covering for roofs, louvres, &c., if of the best quality, will last from twenty to thirty years. It is about the same in point of durability with slates of a fair quality. It is in nowise comparable to lead, in colour, durability, or capabilities of any kind. For an ordinary country spire it falls immeasurably short of the old shingle covering, now so seldom used. There is an active stir being made to extend the use of this metal. I, for one, hope that it will never be extensively used for church purposes; being very perishable under certain conditions of atmosphere, and the like. It is also hard and stubborn, and is scarcely applicable artistically; but above all its colour is, in my opinion, as bad as possible. Age has no softening or toning effect upon it. It is as neat and tasteless as a Quaker's coat. Slates are bad enough, but zinc is worse.

As to durability: The spire of St. Philip's, Dalston, which was built in 1841, had to be fresh covered about seven years ago.

J. C. J.

LONGEVITY.

(3rd S. vii. 154.)

MISS MARY BILLINGE.—I am now in a condition to furnish satisfactory information on the subject of the age of the supposed centenarian, Miss Billinge; and I will in a few words describe the process by which I have arrived at it.

On application to Mr. Newton, surgeon, I was furnished with a copy of the certificate of baptism of "Mary, daughter of William Billinge, farmer, and Lidia his wife; born 24th May, 1751, and christened the 5th of June." This was assumed to be the Mary Billinge recently deceased. The question thus became one of identity. After some inquiry, I found Miss Billinge had a brother and sister buried in Everton churchyard. I have extracted the inscriptions on their tombstones as follows:—

"William Billinge, obt. 7th May, 1817, aged 46.

"Anne Billinge, died 9th Feby., 1832, aged 59."

I have also seen a mourning ring which belonged to the late Miss Billinge, in memory of her brother, which confirms the above date of his death. It is clear, therefore, that William and Anne were the brother and sister of the late Mary Billinge.

The next point was to ascertain the parentage of William and Anne. I went over to Prescott church, and found the parish clerk—himself a relic of antiquity, ninety years of age, and still doing duty. He made a search for me, and found the registers of both:—

William in 1771, son of Charles and Margaret Billinge.

Anne in 1773, daughter of the same.

It was clear then that William and Anne, children of Charles and Margaret Billinge, could not be brother and sister of Mary, the daughter of William and Lidia Billinge.

To put the matter beyond a doubt, I persevered in the search, and found:

"Mary, daughter of Charles and Margaret Billinge, born 6th November, 1772, christened 23rd December."

The identity is here complete. The old lady was, therefore, in her ninety-first year, not in her 112th when she died. I suspect that most of the supposed instances of centenarianism will turn out to be cases of mistaken identity. J. A. P.

Sandyknowe, Wavertree, Liverpool.

[We feel sure that in thanking our valued correspondent J. A. P. for the ingenuity and perseverance he has displayed in ascertaining the precise age of Miss Mary Billinge, we are only expressing the feeling of all those who take an interest in the question of CENTENARIANISM, which is now attracting such general attention.—ED. "N. & Q."]

MILTON (3rd S. vii. 460.)—In vol. vi. p. 199, of the Journal of the Archaeological Institute, there are woodcuts of a small silver seal, the property of Mr. Disney; and of the impress of this seal, which has been—

"well authenticated as having been used by Milton. The impress is a coat of arms, a double-headed eagle displayed. The shield is surmounted by a helm, lambrequins, and crest—which appears to be a lion's gamb grasping the head of an eagle by the neck, erased. This valuable little memorial had been in the possession of Mr. John Payne, on the death of Thomas Foster; who had married Elizabeth Clarke, daughter of Deborah, Milton's youngest daughter, and wife of Abraham Clarke, a weaver in Spital Fields. Mr. Payne sold it to Mr. Thomas Hollis, in 1761: on his death, 1774, it came into the possession of Mr. Thomas Brand Hollis, and then became part of the collection, inherited in 1804 by Mr. Disney's father."

The Rev. Joseph Hunter is recorded to have made "some interesting observations in reference to this seal," and to have remarked that the armorial bearings were certainly those which were borne by the great puritan poet. Mr. Hunter is also said to have traced out a connection between Milton and Thame in Oxfordshire. In his Armory, Sir Bernard Burke gives, for "Milton, of Milton, near Thame, co. Oxford, as borne by John Milton, the poet: Arg., an eagle displayed with two heads gu., beaked and legged sa." The crest is not given; but for another Milton there is blazoned this crest: "A lion's gamb erect arg. grasping an eagle's head erased gu." I regret being unable to reply to the inquiry of CARLFORD concerning the motto of Milton.

CHARLES BOUTELL.

RASSELAS: DINARBAS (3rd S. vii. 199.)—In your number for 11th of March last, ABHBA inquires for the name of the author of Second Part of the History of Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia. I do not remember that title, but was lately favoured with the loan of a book called Dinarbas, which is perhaps the same work. At any rate it raised the identical question as to authorship. Towards the solution of that question I found nothing, except the following which was written inside the binding of the first volume of Rasselas (3rd edition, 1760)—

"An ingenious continuation of Dr. Johnson's Rasselas, entitled Dinarbas, said to be wrote by Miss Knight, the author of Marcus Flaminius.—M.R., October, 1792, pages 164-169."

The writing is that of Mr. Samuel Maude, then of this town, whose turn towards such notanda appears constantly throughout his library, and affords a good guarantee for his accuracy.

J. M. O.

Sunderland.

THE ORIGIN OF INFIRMARIES IN ENGLAND (3rd S. vii. 176.)—In the Life of the Rev. Samuel Wesley, A.M., Jun., prefixed to his Poems (Simpkin, Marshall, & Co. 1862), it is recorded that when he resided at Westminster in 1715, "with limited means, by steadily active benevolence he effected an almost incredible amount of good. The establishment and success of the first infirmary in Westminster (now St. George's Hospital, Hyde Park Corner) were in a great measure due to our poet."

Mr. William Nichols, of 46, Hoxton Square, the writer of the Life of Mr. S. Wesley, could inform MR. LEE whether the handwriting in his pamphlet is that of Mr. Wesley. The Rev. S. Wesley was the elder brother of the celebrated Rev. John Wesley. ELIJAH HOOLE, D.D.

8, Myddelton Square, Pentonville.

REV. EDWARD FORD (3rd S. vii. 459.)—I met the following memorandum amongst a large collection of family documents lately entrusted to me for historical purposes:—

"The King against W^m Crosbie, James Cotter, James Scholes, Charles Boyle.

"At a commission of Oyer and Terminer for y^e County of y^e City of Dublin, held y^e 24th day of March, 1733. The def^t Cotter was indicted for y^e murder of y^e Rev^d Edw^d Ford, one of y^e Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin, by firing, &c., whereof he died on y^e 8 day of March last, and y^e def^t Crosbie, Scholes, and Boyle as accessaries to y^e s^d murder against y^e form, &c.

"At an adjournment of y^e commission y^e 25th day of March, 1733, y^e def^t being arraigned on this indictment severally pleaded not guilty.

"At an adjournment y^e 24 April, 1734. The def^t being brought to y^e Bar then moved by their counsel to bailed alledging their ill state of health, and y^e closeness of y^e prison where they were confined, but y^e motion being opposed by y^e Attorney-General was denied by y^e Court.

"28 May, 1734. At an adjournment of y^e commission of Oyer and Terminer.

"Commissioners present:—Lord Mayor, Earl of Ross, Earl of Meath, Lord Sautry, Justice Ward, Sergeant Bettesworth, Sergeant Purdon, Mr. Le Hunt, Lord Chief Justice Reynolds.

"The Attorney-General moved to put off y^e def^t tryall y^t Tisdall and Pain, two material witnesses for y^e King, were not to be found, which aff^s were read. The def^t being called upon by y^e Court to know what they had (sic) object against putting off their tryall, and desired to be heard by their counsel, who were Mr. Malone, Sen^r,

M^r Callaghan, M^r Daly, M^r Wall, M^r Parkinson, M^r Malone, Jun^r, who urged y^e danger and ill consequence of keeping y^e prisoners in gaol till another adjournment, which perhaps might be a long time, when they were ready to take their tryal, which they therefore had a right to, for it was y^e libertie of y^e subject, and that y^e reasons now offered might hold for ever; and y^e def^s never have an opportunity to show their innocence, and to acquit themselves from so heavy an accusation.

"Lord Chief Justice Reynolds said, that this motion to put off y^e tryall, was y^e common practice of y^e circuits, from one assize to another which was longer than until y^e next adjournment of y^e sessions, therefore on the authority of that practice, he was of opinion y^e motion of M^r Attorney ought to be granted.

"M^r Justice Ward said, y^t it appearing two material witnesses could not then be had, he was of opinion y^e tryal ought to be put off."

I may mention that the family documents above-mentioned are the property of the descendants of one of the defendants.

R. C.

Royal Institution, Cork.

I remember reading a novel (called Recollections of Trinity College, Dublin, or by some similar title,) in which the incident of Mr. Ford's murder is introduced; but how far the account agrees with what actually happened I do not know.

CHAS. F. S. WARREN.

Cor. C. Col. Cambridge.

THE SYNAGOGUE OF THE LIBERTINES (3rd S. vii. 460.)—If CANON DALTON does not, as he owns, find the several explanations he has seen of the above expression satisfactory, I can hardly hope to please him. But I will mention that the opinion of those who suppose these Libertines to have come from Libya, derives considerable probability from the remarkable coincidence of expression in Acts ii. 10, where we read of men from the parts of Lybia about Cyrene. Now in the passage under consideration, Acts vi. 9, we find these two places recurring in similar juxta-position, the synagogue of the Libertines, and of the Cyrenians. It seems to me that this is almost decisive in favour of the interpretation that the Libertines came from Libya. St. Luke would probably have written Ἀπελευθέρων, or Ἐλευθέρων, instead of Λιβερτίνων, if these had been men liberated from slavery. The proper Greek derivative word from Libya would be Λιβυστίνων, but it has been surmised that this word might easily have been corrupted with Λιβερτίνων.

F. C. H.

Although Schleusner, as well as Kuinoel, gives the various interpretations, both concur in that of Chrysostom, — Λιβερτίνοι δὲ, οἱ Ῥωμαίων ἀπελευθέροι οὕτω καλοῦνται. "Ὅσπερ δὲ ὅκουν ἐκεῖ πολλοὶ ξένοι· οὗτοι καὶ συναγωγὰς εἶχον ἐνθα εἶδει τὸν νόμον ἀναγιγνώσκοντες καὶ εὐχὰς γίνεσθαι. (Acts vii.; Hom. xv., vol. ix. p. 139.)

"The emancipated slaves of the Romans are called Libertines. As many strangers lived there, they required synagogues for the reading of the law and for prayer."

The word is therefore Latin, adopted into the Greek of the New Testament, as cenus and centurio. (See Justinian's Institutes, l. v.) I know nothing of the periodical in which De Rossi has referred to this subject.

T. J. BUCKTON

"THAT'S THE CHEESE" (3rd S. vii. 397, 465.) The Hindostani word signifying thing, is pronounced cheese, and not chiz, as your correspondent supposes, and is therefore without any alteration of sound identical with the slang word in question; which, by the way, albeit a novelty in England, I remember to have heard used as a cant term in India thirty years ago. The English gipsy possesses several Hindostani words in his cant vocabulary, as for instance, choori, a knife, which is pure Oordoo, I believe. This, however, is not to be wondered at, there being gipsies in the East as well as in Europe, and as these nomads are known to have means of extensive intercommunication, the existence of Eastern words in the dialect of the English Bohemian, may be accounted for without much difficulty. There is, however, an Oriental word, the importation of which into our land has always puzzled me. I allude to the Persian noun, tawziānā, signifying stripes, from which it would seem that the word tawse, the designation for a schoolmaster's flagellum in Scotland, must be derived. Possibly, however, this may be only a curious coincidence in sound and meaning between two words of different languages, such as may perhaps exist between the Syriac word, tanfa, and the Italian word, tanfa, both of which signify impure or unclean.

H. A. KENNEDY.

Gay Street, Bath.

I think your correspondent need not travel so far as India for the origin of this phrase; surely it is more probably derived from the French "C'est la chose." Many of our popular slang phrases are mere corruptions of French words, e. g. "That's the ticket," from "C'est l'étiquette," &c.

ARTHUR SHUTE.

HOG FEAST (3rd S. vii. 420.)—

Οὐ μὴν ἀλλ' εἰ καὶ ἄδύνατον, ἢ διὰ τὴν συνήθειαν τὸ ἀμαρτήριον αἰσχυρόμενοι, τῇ ἀμαρτάνοντι χρησόμεθα διὰ τὸν λόγον, ἐδόμεθα σάρκας, ἀλλὰ πενωῦντες, οὐ τρυφῶντες· ἀναρῆσωμεν ζῶον, ἀλλ' οἰκτείροντες καὶ ἀλγούντες, οὐχ ὑβρίζοντες οὐδὲ βασανίζοντες· οἷα νῦν πολλὰ δρῶσιν, οἱ μὲν εἰς σφαγὴν ὧν ὡθόντες ὀβελοὺς διαπύρους ἵνα τῇ βαφῇ τοῦ σιδήρου περισθενρόμενον τὸ αἷμα καὶ διαχεόμενον, τὴν σάρκα θρίβῃ καὶ μαλάξῃ· οἱ δὲ οὖθωσι συνὼν ἐπιτόκων ἐναλλόμενοι καὶ λακτίζοντες, ἵνα αἷμα καὶ γάλα καὶ λύθρον ἐμερίων ὁμοῦ συμμυθάρέντων ἐν ὥδισιν ἀναδένσωτες, ὃ Ζεῦ καθάρσιε, φάγωσι τοῦ ζῴου τὸ μάλιστα φλεγμαῖνον· ἄλλοι γερῶνων ὅμματα καὶ κύνων ἀπορρόφόντες καὶ ἀποκλείσαντες ἐν σκότει· κταίνουσιν, ἀλλοκότοις μίγμασι καὶ καρυκταῖς τισὶν αὐτῶν τὴν σάρκα ὀφθοποιούντες. (Plutarchi De Esu Carnium, Or. ii. c. i. t. ix. p. 54, ed. Wytttenbach, Oxon, 1800.)

"Adhibetur et ars jecori feminarum, sicut anserum, inventum M. Apicii, fico arida saginatis ac satie, necatis repente mulsi potu dato. Neque alio ex animali numerosior materia ganeæ; quinquaginta prope sapores, cum cæteris singuli. Hinc Censoriarum legum paginæ, interdictaque cenis abdomina, glandia, testiculi, vulvæ, sincipita verrina, ut tamen Publii mimosum poetæ cæna, postquam servitutem exuerat, nulla memoretur sine abdomine etiam vocabulo suminis ab eo imposito." (Plinii Nat. Hist., lib. viii. c. 61, t. iii. p. 530, ed. Paris, 1771.)

There is much desultory conversation in Athenæus, lib. iii. c. 21, et seq., on the μήτρα δαία, and citations from the comic poets on such matters.

"Non hercule miror,
Aiebat, si qui comedunt bona, quum sit obeso
Nil melius turdo, nil vulva pulchrius ampla."

Hor., 1 Epist. xv. 89.

Smart oddly reads "ursa," and translates:—

"While they fat thrushes could prepare,
And feast upon a banging bear."

"That which smokes in the middle is a sow's stomach filled with a composition of minced pork, hog's brains, eggs, pepper, cloves, garlick, aniseed, rue, ginger, oil, wine and pickle. On the right-hand side are the teats and belly of a sow, just farrowed, fried with sweet wine, oil, lovage, and pepper."—Peregrine Pickle, c. xlv.

The pig-question is fully investigated in sec. xx. of The Heathen rejection of Christianity in the First Ages considered, by Thomas Comber. London, 1747.

Garrick Club.

INFLUENZA (3rd S. vii. 459.)—The word is in Foote's Lame Lover, acted 1770. Sir Luke Limp, who has just promised to dine with Alderman Inkle, receives an invitation from Sir Gregory Goose, and says:—

"George, give my compliments to Sir Gregory, and I'll certainly come and dine there. Order Joe to run to Alderman Inkle's in Threadneedle Street; sorry can't wait upon him, but confined to bed two days with the new influenza."—Act I. vol. ii. p. 65. Dramatic Works, London, 1797.

FITZHOPKINS.

Garrick Club.

CLOVIS (2nd S. ix. 373.)—Since stating all that I could find about the poem of Clovis and its author, I have met with a short notice in De Bachaumont's Mémoires Secrets, Londres, 1777, t. i. p. 308:—

"20 Septembre, 1763. Clovis, poëme. C'est le même plan de Desmarts, allongé de plusieurs chants: il est en vers de dix syllabes. On sent qu'il est traité d'un façon moins grave. L'Orlando Furioso paroit avoir été le modèle de l'auteur, modèle qu'il n'a pas attrapé à beaucoup près. Il a parodié Desmarts, comme Voltaire a parodié Chapelain. Il n'est pas plus heureux dans cette imitation. Il y a pourtant de la facilité et du pittoresque dans sa versification."

I ask insertion of the above less for its own importance than in the hope of reviving the question and learning something about Le Jeune.

H. B. C.

U. U. Club.

EUDOXIA COMNENA (3rd S. vii. 439.)—According to the biographical work of Ignatius Mindonius, a native of the Isle of Chios, and a monk of the order of Saint Basil, printed in Paris (sm. 4to), in the year 1690, and entitled,—Βιογραφία τῶν κατὰ τὸν 15^{ον} καὶ 17^{ον} αἰῶνα ἐν τῇ Ἑσπερίᾳ Εὐρώπῃ ἀκμασάντων λογίων εὐγενῶν. Χίων, &c., and to various original documents preserved in the archives of our family, and partly published sixty years ago in Amsterdam (4to) by my paternal grandfather, Prince Demetrius Rhodocanakis, at the end of his book,—

"Précis historique de la Maison royale des Rhodocanakis, &c., &c., le tout démontré par des preuves juridiques, accompagné d'une traduction Grecque et de plusieurs Documents très authentiques, qui servent à," &c., Eudoxia Comnena, third daughter of Alexius Comnenus and Helen Cantacuzene, was born in Constantinople, August 12, 1575, and married to Theodore Paleologus, July 3, 1593, in the Isle of Chios, where she died the same day three years later, in giving birth to her daughter, Theodora, the future wife of Prince Demetrius Rhodocanakis, and mother of Dr. Constantine.

Theodore Paleologus, in remarrying with a lady of an inferior social position to his own, and not belonging to the Greek church, displeased grievously his son-in-law and the rest of his family, who never recognised this marriage. Very probably for this reason the new English relatives of Theodore, who, doubtless, erected over his mortal remains the still extant brass tablet, did not inscribe on it either the name of his first wife or that of his daughter. RHODOCANAKIS.

SIGNIFICANT NAMES (3rd S. vii. 322.)—These may be found to be more numerous than your columns will admit of. We have Blood, Wolfe, and Co., in this town; and Blood, Fury, and Death, were seen together in a market town in Ireland. There has been a Blood a surgeon, and a Blood who led with success a forlorn hope. "Blood and Thunder," so often on the lips in the heat of a mêlée at an Irish pattern or a wake, were to be seen at one period on the plates of two hall doors adjoining each other in Gloucester Street, Dublin: Blood on one, and Thunder on the other. In this town also we have Dodge and Wynne, attorneys at law; a Sheepwash for hair dressing; and a Halfpenny who carried parcels once for one penny. In Bristol there was once a Rod that kept a school. W. B.

Liverpool.

DR. CARABOO (3rd S. vii. 490.)—Allow me to say that Dr. C. H. Wilkinson did not "receive the universal sobriquet of Dr. Caraboo." Vulgar persons, who can only see one side of anything, might have so called him. I knew him from my very childhood, and I now count threescore years: more than that, he himself took me to Bristol to see the pretended Indian lady, but something, I forget what, prevented my seeing her. He was accustomed, when I was just of an age to appreciate such things, to give very interesting and exceedingly well illustrated lectures on natural philosophy, and I hope there are many survivors of those days as well as myself who are willing to speak of him in terms of respect, affection, and esteem. He was taken in, as regarded the silly affair, hardly in itself worth remembering, from yielding to the kindness of his own character. He died at a very advanced age. T. F.

CLINT HILLS (3rd S. vii. 365).—In reference to this subject, I extract the following from a little work published at Halesowen, entitled Clentine Rambles:—

"There are four stones on the summit of Clent Hill erected by George, Lord Lyttleton, in imitation of a Druidical monument."

It would be pleasing to know that these stones have a claim to greater antiquity than this. Can any of your correspondents furnish additions to the following bibliography of this most lovely and interesting spot, besides what may be found in Plot's Staffordshire or Nash's Worcestershire, and similar works; or in the very interesting works published a very few years ago by Mr. Noake?—

Clentine Rambles. By William Harris. Halesowen, 1845.

Letters on the Beauties of Hagley, Euville, and the Leasowes, &c. By Joseph Heely. 2 vols. 12mo. London, 1777.

A Description of Hagley Park. By the Author of "Letters," &c. London, 1880.

Companion to Leasowes, Hagley, and Euville; with a Sketch of Fisherwick. 8vo. 1830.

Local and Literary Account of Leamington, Stratford, Coventry, Warwick, Hagley, and the Leasowes, &c. By Mr. Pratt. Birmingham, 1814.

Description of Hagley, Euville, and the Leasowes; wherein all the Latin Inscriptions are translated, and every particular beauty described. Birmingham, N. D.

Guide to the Clent Hills. By Mr. Limings.

History and Antiquities of St. Kenelm's. By Mr. Limings.

The two latter, which are mentioned in The Antiquities of Worcestershire, by Jabez Allies, I have not met with. A few particulars may be found in Thurstone's Works as well.

A. H. BATES.

Edgbaston.

BEEST (3rd S. vii. 458).—This word is by no means confined to Lancashire, it is an abbreviated form of beestings, or biestings. In a Latin dictionary, dated 1664, I find it defined as—"The first milk that cometh in teats after the birth of anything, be it in women or beasts." It is probably derived from the Saxon word byst. Its German equivalent is biestmilch. H. FISHWICK.

PRÆSTONIENSIS will find an explanation of the term, with reference to authorities, in v. "Beastlings," in Halliwell's Dictionary of Archaisms, &c. The derivation of the word is not from the Anglo-Saxon, but from Scandinavian; though the terminal syllable -ling or -ing denotes, in the former tongue, the young offspring. It is called beastlings in the East Riding of Yorkshire. In South Lancashire it is a custom, in country places, for the milk-venders to send to their customers a gift of beastlings, of which a light custard-like pudding is made. CRUX.

"CHRISTIAN BREADBASKET" (3rd S. vii. 356, 389, 448).—Under this head it may be well to give, for those who are not acquainted with it, the opening sentence of a sermon preached in the sixteenth century before the University of Oxford. The University pulpit was on this occasion occupied by a layman. The preacher was Sir Richard Tavernor, of Wood Eaton, sheriff of Oxfordshire. He had obtained a license to preach, under favour of the Protector Somerset. Wearing his sword and chain of office, he thus addressed the learned audience:—

"Arriving at the Mount of St. Mary's, in the stony stage where I now stand, I have brought you some fine biscuits, baked in the oven of charity, carefully conserved for the chickens of the church, the sparrows of the spirit, and the sweet swallows of salvation."

May be this sentence is the matrix of such tract-titles as The Christian Breadbasket; and, I may add, Crumbs of Comfort for Chickens of Grace. J. H. A.

COCK'S FEATHER (3rd S. vii. 459).—In reply to your correspondent's inquiry—"Why Mephistopheles, and other stage representatives of evil incarnate, wear a cock's feather?"—I would venture to suggest, so far at least as concerns the Mephistopheles of Goethe's Faust, that he wears the feather as appertaining to a youth of high degree, "edler Junker." So it is represented by Goethe himself:—

"Bin ich, als edler Junker hier, Die Hahnenfeder auf dem Hut."

["Here I am, a youth of condition . . . with a cock's feather in my hat."]

Mephistopheles, in the same speech, advises Faust to don the same costume:—

"Und rathe nun dir, kurz und gut, Dergleichen gleichfalls anzulegen."

And it will accordingly be remarked that, in Retsch's engravings, Faust as well as Mephistopheles appears wearing a feather.

If "other stage representatives of evil incarnate" wear the feather as well as Mephistopheles, may they not have adopted it from him?

Dr. Zerffi tells us that German superstition frequently made the devil appear as a dashing young man, a fop; and that he was, therefore, spoken of as "Schönhans," or "Fine Johnny."

It must not, however, be forgotten that a far more profound explanation of the cock's feather, than that now offered from Goethe himself, is suggested by a learned critic:—

"Mephistopheles calls himself the Spirit of Negation, or he that denies—and adopts for his crest the cock's feather: the allusion is to the cock that crew when Peter denied." — Faust, translated by Birch, 1839, Part I., p. 266."

By those who prefer the recondite to the obvious, this may be deemed the better explanation.

SCRIB.

"THE DUBLIN LETTER" (2nd S. vi. 230.)—I am happy to state that the Dublin Letter, which I inquired for some years since, has at last turned up; and Dr. Reeves, who found it in the Archiepiscopal Library of Armagh, describes it as follows. Its title is—

"The Popish Doctrine of Transubstantiation. Not agreeable to the Opinion of the Primitive Fathers. Shewed in a Letter to a Friend." Pp. 8. No title-page. Ad calcem, "Dublin, Printed by Jo. Ray at Colledg. green, and are to be sold by most Booksellers."

The pamphlet is bound in a volume in this library, in the department Popish Controversy, vol. xxxii. No. 7. BIBLIOTHECAR. CHETHAM.

CAVALIER (3rd S. vii. 179.)—"CAVALIER, in fortification, is a work generally raised within the body of the place, ten or twelve feet higher than the rest of the works."—Charles JAMES, 1805. "CAVALLIERE à CAVALLO, is a high mount or platform of earth, raised very high so that the artillery upon the same may shoote over the walles and bulwarkes to scoure and cleare the fields all about."—Robert BARRET, 1598. As Barret had passed much time "in the profession of armes, and that among forraigne nations" his information cannot be doubted. The famous sir Roger Williams, writing about ten years before Barret, thus maintains the necessity of using the foreign terms of war: "If I should call a Cavilere a mount, divers would aske—What to do? to place wind-mills?"

BOLTON CORNEY.

CHARTULARY OF WHALLEY ABBEY (3rd S. vii. 371.)—Your correspondent, MONASTICUS, quotes a passage in a charter in the Whalley Abbey Chouer Book, vol. i. p. 95, in which occur the words actionibus de dolo et in factum, and inquires what is the proper reading instead of in factum, which he asserts is a misreading on the part of the editor, and that it is plainly a noun in the dative case, such as infirmationi, or infractio, but that he cannot hit upon the right word. I beg, though no lawyer, to assure your correspondent that the words in factum, as given by the editor, are perfectly correct, and that the supposed mistake is merely in his own imagination; the words actio in factum being one of the ancient forms of representing the action on the case, in support of which

I need only quote the following passage from Cowell's Interpreter, 1658, folio, s. v. Actio:—

"Where you have any occasion of sute, that neither hath a fit name, nor certain form already prescribed, there the clerks of the Chancery in antient time conceived a fit form of action for the fact in question, which the civilians call actionem in factum, and our common lawyers action upon the case. In factum actiones dicuntur ideo, quia quod nomine non possunt exprimere negotium, id rei geste declarant citra formulam ac solennitatem ullam.—Cuiacius et Gothofredus ad Rubricam de præscriptis verbis."

With regard to his general charge that "this Chartulary is full of editor's blunders," although I will not pretend to assert that in four volumes, comprising 1314 pages, some errors have not crept in, yet I feel warranted in observing there are few similar publications that are more entitled to the praise of accuracy than this work. The transcript from the original (the latter is beautifully distinct, see Introduction, p. xi.), was very carefully made by the editor himself, and when it was committed to the press the proof sheets were also examined with the original volume.

BIBLIOTHECAR. CHETHAM.

KING'S LYNN: CAPGRAVE (3rd S. vii. 486.)—"Ben Adam" is quite correct in stating "that Lynn had the honour of presenting the world with Capgrave." If MR. F. NORSGATE consults The Chronicle of England, by John Capgrave, edited by Rev. F. C. Hingeston, M.A. (London: Longman & Co. 1858), he will see in Appendix III. p. 353, that Capgrave himself mentions in his metrical prologue to the Life of St. Katharine, that he was born in Lynn. These are his words:—

"If ye wil wete what that I am,

Myn cuntre is Northfolk, of the toune of Lynne," &c.

He also states in his Chronicle that he was born on the 21st of April, 1393.

With regard to Chaucer being a native of Lynn, here I think "Ben Adam" is incorrect; for though the history of Chaucer is still involved in considerable obscurity; yet I have read in one of his biographies that in his Testament of Love he calls himself a Londoner. In the inscription on his tombstone, the date of his birth is mentioned as 1328. Is this correct? I understand that the accuracy of Nicholas Brigham, who placed this date on the tomb in 1556, has been called in question.

J. DALTON.

St. John's, Norwich.

SASH WINDOW (3rd S. vii. 449.)—These windows may be called à la guillotine occasionally in France, but this could not have been their original name, that instrument only having been first used in 1792. The word chassis, in its primary use, signifies any wood frame, particularly one that is moveable. Taver's, which is I believe the best phraseological dictionary, says, lever—baissés le chassis, lift up—pull down the sash; chassis à coulisse, a sliding sash; chassis dormant, a fixed sash, &c., &c. It still appears the most probable etymology of the word sash.

Poets' Corner.

A. A.

The first sash windows made in Swalcliffe and its vicinity, Oxon, were to a stone house built for Mr. John Hopkins at Sileford-Gower, which has the date of 1728 in the dovecote, erected at the same time as the house, and tradition states attracted as much notice from their novelty as at Wymondham. The stone built dovecote has the following inscription from the eighth elegy of the first book of Ovid's Tristia:—

"Aspicis, ut veniant ad candida tecta columbæ; Accipiat nullas sordida turris aves."

D. D. H.

EDWARD KIRKE, THE COMMENTATOR ON SPENSER'S SHEPHEARD'S CALENDAR (1st S. x. 204; 2nd S. ix. 42).—We are glad to be able to furnish the following particulars respecting Edward Kirke, in addition to those contained in Athenæ Cantabrigienses, ii. 244. On 26 May, 1580, he was instituted, on the presentation of Sir Thomas Kytson, to the rectory of Risby, Suffolk, as he was on 31 August, 1587, to the rectory of the adjacent parish of Lackford on the same patron's presentation. He died 10 November, 1613, aged sixty, and was buried in the chancel at Risby, where he is commemorated by an inscription. By his will, which bears date three days before his death, he gave 30*l.* to the poor of Lackford. It is observable that his patron, Sir Thomas Kytson, in his account-book under date of April 1583, has the following entry: "For a shepard's calendar, ij".

C. H. & THOMPSON COOPER.

Cambridge.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

The Natural History, Ancient and Modern, of Precious Stones and Gems, and of the Precious Metals. By C. W. King, M.A., &c. (Bell & Daldy.)

Those who are acquainted with Mr. King's Antique Gems, and his work on The Gnostics and their Remains, will be quite prepared to believe with how much learning and curious research he has illustrated the volume before us, which may indeed be considered as the filling up of the outline sketched out in the first section of his Antique Gems. One remarkable feature of the present work is Mr. King's illustration of gems as magical and medicinal agents; perhaps the most important of their characteristics in later antiquity, as it certainly was throughout the whole of the Middle Ages, when the beauty or rarity of a stone went for infinitely less in the estimation of its value than its reputed virtue in the Pharmacopœia. This portion of Mr. King's book will be found especially interesting, and is made the more valuable by his translation of "Orpheus on Stones"—the great storehouse of Chaldaic lore upon this subject. To practical men, the work will recommend itself in this age of British gold-mining, by its details on the operations of the ancients in the same art: especially as we are now re-opening the placera anciently worked by the Roman masters of North Wales according to the very methods so fully specified by Mr. King's authorities. The ascertained weights of celebrated diamonds, and many authentic descriptions of noteworthy jewels and of celebrated gems, will also be found in this very amusing and instructive volume.

Ballads and Songs of Lancashire, chiefly older than the Nineteenth Century. Collected, compiled, and edited, with Notes, by John Harland, F.S.A. (Whittaker & Co.)

This handsomely printed little volume, containing upwards of sixty of the ballads and songs of Lancashire, will be welcome to all who take an interest in the County Palatine. Many curious snatches of family history, many interesting traces of bygone names and families, are scattered through the volume; which has been carefully and judiciously edited by Mr. Harland.

The Lady Ina, and other Poems. By R. F. H. (Virtue Brothers.)

It needs no ghost come from the grave to tell us that, the many graceful and touching little poems found in this volume, come from the pen of a lady. The strong feeling of affection for home and household which breathes through many of the smaller pieces could only spring from a wife and a mother.

Outlines of Norwegian Grammar, with Exercises; being a Help towards acquiring a Practical Knowledge of the Language. By J. Y. Sargent, M.A. (Rivingtons.)

A very useful little grammar to all intending visitors to Norway—which is so like Danish, that he who knows the one will find it only differs in dialect and pronunciation from the other.

Notices to Correspondents.

This being the last number of the present volume, We have been desirous to include in it as many Replies as possible, and have therefore to request the indulgence of some of our Querists and Note Makers for the postponement of their communications.

"N. & Q." of Saturday next, the first number of our new volume, and following numbers, will contain, among other papers of interest—

Literary Inquiries and the Court of Probate.
The Academy of Paris, by J. G. Nichols.
Purcell Papers, by J. H. R. G.
Daniel Defoe on the Assassination of Rulers.
Luis de Leon, by Canon Dalton.
Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.
Inedited Letter of Randle Cotgrave.
Bishop and Lord Chancellor Thomas Goodrich.
Shakespeare Encroachments.
General Literary Index.
Duel of Junius, &c.

AMPHITRYON. We have received a letter headed thus, and asking for the origin of the word. This is all that can be deciphered, although we have put the letter into several hands. Even the signature is wholly illegible. The word is spelt wrong. It should be Amphitryon. It is in all probability derived from ἀμφι, about, around, and τρον, to wear, harness, or distress; as a predatory warrior does. Of course a complete history of this mythical hero may be found in Dr. W. Smith's Dictionary. The origin of the word as applied to the host at a dinner is from Molière's comedy, based on the old play of Plautus. When Sonia is puzzled to decide which of the two is the true Amphitryon, he gives his opinion in favour of "L'Amphitryon chez qui l'on dîne."

TRISTIA. We do not agree with Sheridan. The correct pronunciation is "pro-plah-l-a-shun."

LOCUST'S FORM.—In the Advertisement in last week's "N. & Q." the price—"10s. 6d." was inadvertently omitted.

ERRATUM.—3rd S. vii. p. 449, col. l. line 14 from bottom, for "Gatehill" read "Gatchell."

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 8d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for SEVEN COPIES for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly INDEX) is 11s. 4d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. SMITH, 32, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all COMMUNICATIONS FOR THE EDITOR should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

Just published, fcap. 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, 2s. 6d.

SESAME AND LILIES. Two Lectures delivered at Manchester in 1861. By JOHN RUSKIN, M.A. I. Of Kings' Treasures. II. Of Queens' Gardens.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 65, Cornhill.

Just published, with coloured Frontispiece, crown 8vo, 5s.

HARDY FERNS: How I Collected and Cultivated Them. By NONA BELLAIRS.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 65, Cornhill.

Just published, crown 8vo, 6s.

THREE GREAT TEACHERS OF OUR OWN TIME: Being an Attempt to deduce the Spirit and Purpose animating Carlyle, Tennyson, and Ruskin. By ALEXANDER H. JAFFE.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 65, Cornhill.

Just published, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

PRINCIPLES OF REFORM: POLITICAL AND LEGAL. By JOHN BOYD KINNERN.

CONTENTS.

PART I.—Educational Franchise (with Draft Bill).—Foreign Policy.—Reduction of Taxation.—Military and Naval Armaments, 1863 to 1865.—Defensive Expenditure and Systems.

PART II.—Simplification of Law.—Assimilation of Law.—Judicial Reporting.—Law of Marriage in England and Scotland.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 65, Cornhill.

Just published, demy 8vo, 20s.

OUR FAITHFUL ALLY, THE NIZAM; being an Historical Sketch of Events showing the Value of the Nizam's Alliance to the British Government in India, and his Services during the Mutinies. By CAPTAIN HASTINGS FRASER, Madras Staff Corps.

SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 65, Cornhill.

Second edition. Just published, with Photographic Portrait from the Picture in the Vatican, 3 vols. crown 8vo, 24s.

LIFE OF MICHAEL ANGELO. By HERMAN GRIMM. Translated by F. E. BENNETT.

SMITH, ELDER & CO., 65, Cornhill.

Now ready, thick fcp. 4to, elegantly printed by Whittingham, extra cloth, 15s. (Twenty-five copies printed on Large Paper, 2l. 2s.)

ENGLAND as seen by FOREIGNERS in the DAYS OF ELIZABETH and JAMES I., comprising Translations of the Journals of the two Dukes of Württemberg in 1592 and 1610, both illustrative of Shakespeare; with Extracts from the Travels of Foreign Princes and others. With copious Notes, an Introduction, and Etchings. By W. B. RYE, of the British Museum.

London: J. RUSSELL SMITH, 38, Soho Square.

MILLER'S CATALOGUE of BOOKS for JULY, ready this Day, will be found to contain many curious, some uncommon, and the rest useful and entertaining, chiefly selected from the Libraries of D. Roberts, Esq., R.A., P. Thompson, Esq. of the London Institution, J. Greaves, Esq. of Manchester, and others. Gratis and Postage Free for one Penny Stamp.

JOHN MILLER, Bookseller, 5, Green Street, Leicester Square.

The Important Library of the late GEORGE OFFOR, Esq.
MESSRS.

SOTHEY, WILKINSON, & HODGE, Auctioneers of Literary Property and Works Illustrative of the Fine Arts, will SELL, by AUCTION, at their House, No. 13 (late 3), Wellington Street, Strand, W.C., on TUESDAY, June 27, and ten following days, at 1 o'clock precisely, the Important and Valuable LIBRARY of the late GEORGE OFFOR, Esq., of Grove House, Hackney; comprising rare Early Versions of the Holy Scriptures, including the most extensive Series of English Bibles, Psalters, and Testaments ever offered for Sale—numerous Editions of the Liturgies of Roman Catholic and Protestant Churches—Works of the Fathers, Medieval Writers, Reformers, Puritans, and Quakers—a remarkable Series of the Productions of John Bunyan—beautifully illuminated Horns and other Manuscripts, of considerable interest, including a very Early Copy of the Epistles and Gospels in English—Rare Productions from the Presses of Caxton, Wynken de Worde, Pynson, and other English Printers—Books written by Dissenters of all Denominations—and Standard Works in General Literature.

May be viewed two days previous; Catalogues may be had, 2s. 6d. each.

Now ready, the 36th Thousand, post 8vo, price 7s. 6d.

SOYER'S MODERN HOUSEWIFE. Comprising Receipts for the Economic and Judicious Preparation of every Meal of the Day, and for the Nursery and Sick Room. By the late ALEXIS SOYER. With Illustrations on Wood, &c.
"Should be in the hands of every keeper of a kitchen and larder in the kingdom."—Lancet.

Also, by the same Author,

SOYER'S GASTRONOMIC REGENERATOR; or, System of Cookery for the Kitchens of the Wealthy. With Plates. Ninth Edition, 8vo, 15s. cloth.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, & CO., Stationers' Hall Court.

BAGSTER'S BIBLES; small and large. Rich, elegant, durable.
At all the principal Booksellers; and at 15, Paternoster Row, London.

Just published, crown 8vo, gilt edges, price 5s., by Post for 6s. 6d. Stamps; quarto, 10s. 6d., by Post for 11s. 6d. Stamps.

THE BOOK OF PERFUMES. By EUGENE RIMMEL.
With above 250 Illustrations.

"A curious and entertaining history."—Art Journal.
"There is much that will amuse the general reader."—Athenaeum.
"A learned, elegant, and fascinating volume."—London Review.
"Full of odd out-of-the-way information."—Spectator.
"Contains much curious historical matter."—Notes and Queries.
London: CHAPMAN & HALL, 193, Piccadilly; or to be had of the Author, 96, Strand, 24, Cornhill, and 123, Regent Street.

THE CHEAPEST OLD BOOKS IN THE KINGDOM.

T. & W. BOONE have just issued a Catalogue of a selection from the choicer portion of their Extensive Stock; containing some extraordinary Manuscripts, and numerous Rare and Valuable Books in all classes of Literature, in fine condition, and at low prices.

As a further inducement to purchasers from this Catalogue, the Advertisers engage to supply an equal amount of New Books at cost price, or 2d. discount in the shilling—for cash only.

T. & W. BOONE, 25, New Bond Street, London, W.

N.B. Enclose Two Stamps with name and address.

"REMAINDERS" of VALUABLE BOOKS, all in new Condition, at greatly reduced prices, selling by WM. WESLEY, English and Foreign Bookbinder, Queen's Head Passage Paternoster Row. A Catalogue on application.

BOOKBINDING—in the MONASTIC, GROlier, MAIOLI and ILLUMINATED styles—in the most superior manner, by English and Foreign Workmen.

JOSEPH ZAEHNADORF.

BOOKBINDER TO THE KING OF HANOVER.

English and Foreign Bookbinder,

30, BRYDGES STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

BOND'S PERMANENT MARKING INK.

The original invention, established 1821, for marking CRESTS, NAMES, INITIALS, upon household linen, wearing apparel, &c.

N.B.—Owing to the great repute in which this Ink is held by families, outlets, &c., inferior imitations are often sold, which do not possess any of its celebrated qualities. Purchasers should therefore be careful to observe the address on the label, 10, BISHOPSGATE STREET WITHIN, E.C., without which the Ink is not genuine. Sold by all respectable chemists, stationers, &c., in the United Kingdom, price 1s. per bottle; no 6d. size ever made.

PARTRIDGE & COZENS,

MANUFACTURING STATIONERS,

197, FLEET STREET, corner of Chancery Lane.

Carriage paid to the Country on Orders exceeding 7s.

The LARGEST and most varied Stock in the Kingdom of Note Letter, and Fcap. Papers, Envelopes, Account and M.S. Books, Household Papers, &c.

PARTRIDGE & COZENS' celebrated GUINEA CASE of STATIONERY forwarded free to any Railway Station in England, on receipt of Post-office Order.

NO CHARGE for Plain Stamping Crest, Arms, or Address on Paper or Envelopes. Coloured Stamping (Bellet) reduced to 1s. per 100. Polished Steel Crest Dies engraved for 2s. Business or engraved for 3s.

SERMON PAPER, plain, 4s. per ream; Baled ditto, 4s. 6d. An immense variety in all sizes and qualities always in stock. Illustrated Price List of Inkstands, Despatch Boxes, Stationery Cabinets, Postage Scales, Writing Cases, &c. post free.

INDEX.

THIRD SERIES.—VOL. VII.

[For classified articles, see ANONYMOUS WORKS, BOOKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED, EPIGRAMS, EPITAPHS, FOLK LORE, PROVERBS AND PHRASES, QUOTATIONS, SHAKSPERIANA, AND SONGS AND BALLADS.]

- A.
- A. (A.) on Adverbs improperly used, 426
- Apple-pie order, 265
- Bailler aux Corneilles, 169
- Ballads, historical value of popular, 127
- Barapicklet, its etymology, 113
- Beastie pies, 113
- Chap, and chapman, 426
- Chevisaunce, 486
- Classical washerwoman, 428
- Composing-stick, 427
- Cue, its meaning, 427
- Dancing upon sippets, 74
- Double acrostic, 494
- Dreaming under triple trees, 114
- Epigram against architects, 119, 406
- Fun, its derivation, 476
- Hackney horses: Affri, 405
- "Haunch of Venison," 122
- Heraldic query, 251
- Hog's Prayer, 427
- Hotty-Toity, 417
- Incongruous sayings, 150
- Knox Ompax, 469
- Limehouse, its derivation, 489
- Lunatic literature, 489
- Martinoff and the Emperor of Russia, 92
- Misinformation for the people, 435
- Mistletoe, its derivation, 76
- Mum, a beverage, 101
- Numismatic query, 169
- Pattens, derivation, 101
- Pontifical rings, 135
- Rockets disused in war, 189
- Run the gauntlet, 428
- Sash windows, 508
- Sea-serpent, 250
- Sweeping the hearth or threshold, 180
- Theodolite, 428
- Valentines, their origin, 221
- Yew trees called palms, 96
- A. (A. S.) Cawnpore, on Thos. Sydsarf, Bishop of Brechin, 21
- Abbot (Abp. George), his seals, 179, 266
- Abgar's letter to Our Lord, 238, 307
- Abhba on anonymous works, 199
- Archdeacon, an Irish artist, 337
- Cary Family, 170
- De Beauvoir family, 288
- Du Plessis's Memoirs, 338
- Dublin (Bishop of), "Prophecy," 418
- Fitzgibbon (John), 1st Earl of Cork, 323
- Ford (Rev. Edward), D.D., 459
- "Goblins of Neapolis," 323
- "Hodegus Confuted," &c., 55
- "Ireland in Past Times," 259
- Irish parliament, its last member, 474
- "Journey through Switzerland," 419
- Jacobus, piece of gold, 480
- London book auction, 1698, 6
- Mace of Kinsale and Margate, 123
- Mercers' Hospital, Dublin, 399
- Molyneux (Wm.), monument, 417
- Osborne's Catalogues of Books, 324
- O'Connors of Kerry, 409
- "Sentimental and Masonic Magazine," 298
- "Short History of Ireland," 440
- Surgeon executed for murder, 170, 446
- Aboulhassan Kuschiar, astronomer, 11
- Abraham's conversion, 458, 488
- Achende on the Fenians, 358
- Bridge inscription, 421
- Wart stone, 357
- Aconbury Priory noticed, 76
- Acrostic, inventor of the double, 494
- Actors, English, in France, temp. Henry IV., 335
- Addison family, 260
- Addison (Joseph), his legend "Hilpa and Shallum," 37
- Adlard (G.) on Leicester's Progress in Holland, 102
- Winthrop family, 160, 269
- Woodward family, 299
- Adolphus (John), barrister, his works, 261
- Adverbs improperly used, 152, 225, 406, 426, 487
- A. (E. H.) on baptismal names, 309
- Classical washerwoman, 250
- Clerk of the Closet, 202
- Disclaiming of arms, 43

- A. (E. H.) on inscription in Chillingham Castle, 286
 Longevity, 472
 Order of the Lion and Sun, 25
 Percy (Bp. Thomas), ancestry, 287
 Sedes stercoraria, 271
 Tailor by trade, 25
 Words used in different senses, 278
 Affri, its meaning, 55, 124, 405
 A. (G.) Barnsbury, on the Bluecoat School, 8, 99,
 Bishops' oath of office, 355
 Smithfield cattle market, 411
 A. (H.) on Grosley's "Londres," 299
 A. (J. H.) on Abraham's conversion, 488
 Christian Breadbasket, 507
 May-day songs, 425
 "Alceste and Eliza," a tragedy, 322
 Ale made of meat and malt, 73
 Alexander (Wm.), American poet, 163
 'Αλκυός on Philip van Macheren, 268
 Allbutt (Rev. John) and "The Vicar of Moses," 125, 189, 383
 Allbutt (T. C.) on the "Vicar and Moses," 125, 383
 Allestree (Dr. Richard), his works, 124, 328
 Alley (Wm.), Bp. of Exeter, oath of office, 355
 Allibone (John), "Rustica Descriptio," 222
 Almack (Richard) on R. Sackville, Earl of Dorset, 7
 Almanac by Gasper Laet, 55
 Almoche (John and Richard), wills, 92
 Alva (Petrus de) et Astorga, works, 400, 469
 America, origin of money post office orders, 132
 American bibliography, 192
 American depreciation of currency, 6
 American presidency and March 4th, 197
 American revolutionary veterans, 219
 American steamboat, the first, 151
 Amphitryon, origin of the word, 509
 Anderson (Sir James Caleb), 153
 Anderson (John), founder of Fermoy, 153
 Anderson (John) of Dumbarton, 97
 Anderson (Patrick), comptroller of stamps, 202, 369
 Anderton (Francis), Bart., epitaph, 130
 Andrewes (Dr. Gerrard), refuses a bishopric, 42
 Angus and the Mearns, 231
- Anonymous Works:—
 Albania, a poem, 401
 Amalie (Princess), "Six Dramas," 199, 270
 Bibliophobia, 458
 Biographical Anecdotes of the Founders of the French Republic, 260
 Boyle (Capt. Robert), "Voyages," 97
 Churchman's Second Epistle, 447, 486
 Collection of Political Tracts, 156
 Confessions of a Methodist, 223, 289
 Dictionary, a New and Complete English, 439
 English Life, Social and Domestic, 199
 From Oxford to Rome, 339, 369
 Goblins of Neapolis, 323
 Heraldic Anomalies, 292
 Hodegus Confuted, &c., 55
 Ireland, a Short History of, 440
 Ireland in Past Times, 259
 Irish Tutor, 99, 165
 Jonas Redux, by Jonas Anglicus, 95
 Journey through Switzerland, 419
 Journey to London, 1698, 6, 198
- Anonymous Works:—
 Junius: "Another Guess at Junius," 133
 Lovat (Simon, Lord), Memoirs, 35, 121
 Majestas Intemerata, 323
 Meditations of a Divine Soul, 199, 270
 Money Masters all Things, 191
 My Pocket Book, 98
 Philalethes, pseud., 220, 328, 448
 Plain Sermons by Contributors to Tracts for the Times, 56, 124
 Rasselas, the Second Part, 199, 504
 Reformed Monastery, 37
 Religio Clerici, 447, 486
 Reverses, or Memoirs of the Fairfax Family, 199
 Robber's Grave, 66
 Sermons to Asses, 479
 The Tickler, &c., 44
 Three Discourses delivered at Chichester, 74, 143
 Vitulus Aureus, by Philander, 156
 Whole Duty of Man, 9, 57, 106, 124, 290, 328, 461
 Ansareys, a people of Syria, 358, 426
 Anstruther Library, 289
 "Anti-Teapot Review," 470, 488
 Apocryphal works honoured by the Institute, 94
 Apparitions of Reculver and Rochester, 239
 "Apple-pie order," origin of the phrase, 133, 209, 265
 "Arabian Nights," literary history, 68
 A. (R.) on a passage in "Pericles," 316
 Arbery, its meaning, 345, 407
 Archbishops' wives, their precedence, 274, 294
 Archdeacon, an Irish artist, 337
 Architects, epigram against, 97, 119, 148
 Architectural Dictionary, its compilers, 36
 Argyle (Anne, Countess of), date of her death, 258
 Armistead (Edwin) on price of a Bible in 1660, 132
 Spenser and the daisy, 33
 Arms, assumption of, 317, 380, 427, 469
 Arms, confirmation of, 65, 124, 249
 Arms, heraldic, disclaiming, 43
 Armstrong (J. L.), inquired after, 475
 A. (R. S.) on Angus McDiarmid, 43
 Arthurian Literature, 105
 Artistic sketches of places without names, 133
 Arundell family of Lanherne, 167, 249
 A. (S.) on St. Dunat's Castle, 35
 Ass, slang words for it, 53, 66, 165, 212
 Assignats, forged, 270
 Aston (Lori) of Forfar, 475
 Athenian Misogynist, 47
 Athos, Mount, Catalogues of the MSS., 199, 290
 Atlas of History, 325
 Atlas publishers, hint to, 375
 "August the 12th," a public-house sign, 150
 Ausonius, epigrams, 147, 208, 264, 347
 Australia, art in, 278
 Australian aborigines, their extinction, 110
 Australian topographical nomenclature, 132
 Autographs in old books, 111
 Auvergne poetry, works on, 133, 231
 Aziza: Azazel, inquired after, 54
- B.
- B. on bishops' widows, 347
 Malaquet battle, 348

- B. on Rhodocanakis (Prince Francis), 348
Valentines, their continuance, 347
- B. (A.) on Aziza: Azazel, 54
Paramata, a woollen fabric, 157
- Babylon, works on, 61; the king of, noticed in Isa. xiv., 61
- Bacon (Francis) Baron Verulam, not the author of the "Christian Paradoxes," 111
- Badges, regimental, 4, 168, 251
- Bagman, origin of the word, 473
- Bailey (Wm.) on Goodrich family, 286
- "Bailler aux Corneilles," meaning of the phrase, 94, 169
- Baily (Johnson) on Rev. John Brabant, 77
Calamy's Abridgment, chap. ix. 153, 223
Hoods of St. Begh's men, 85
- Baines (Roger), epitaph, 443
- Ballads, historical value of popular, 127, 261. See Songs.
- Ball's Pond, origin of the name, 476
- Bankers and goldsmiths, 94
- Baptism for the dead illustrated, 33
- Baptism of a blackamoor, 198
- Baptismal names, curious, 178, 309
- Bar, as used in boys' games, 162, 229
- Barapicklet, its etymology, 113, 169
- Barcroft (John), of Balitore, 328
- Bardolph's countenance, a literary blunder, 336
- Barkley (C. W.) on the Mickleton hooter, 289
- Barley, an exclamation, 84, 162, 227, 285
- Barnet, its market for cattle, 411
- Baronetess, its legal designation, 33
- Bartleman (J.), vocalist, 30
- Barton (Thomas), D.D., of Eynesbury, 46, 104
- Baskett (Rev. Mr.), supposed author of "The Whole Duty of Man," 9
- Bastile archives, 494
- Batchelor (J. W.) on Truffles, 265
- Bates (A. H.) on Principio Fabricii, 137
Clent Hills, 507
- Bates (Wm.) on an anonymous work, 74
Caraboo, the quondam Princess, 196
"Journey to London," its author, 98
Miniature, its derivation, 477
"No man a hero to his valet-de-chambre," 439
"Perfervidum," &c., 102
Quotation, 426
Recipe symbol, 168
"Religio Clerici," &c., 486
"The Vainpyre," 429
Toasts, 501
Uriconian, or Wroxeter, 427
- Batler, a kind of mangle, 397
- Baxter (W. E.) on Comets, 102
- Bazubend, its meaning and etymology, 113, 211
- B. (C.) on Charles Lamb's Works, 46
- Beag-bheul, or Little-mouth, 46, 385
- Beards, change of fashion, 151
- Bearley on Garrick and Dr. Hill, 55
- Bear's Den Hall, co. Surrey, burlesque on, 402, 466
- Beatille pies, meaning of the saying, 113
- Beaulieu (Luke), supposed author of "The Reformed Monastery," 37
- B. (E. C.) on Konx Ompan, 424
Noël, a cry of joy, 445
- Beccaria, his monument, 178
- Beck (J.) on miniatures at South Kensington, 458
- Beck (J.) on N. D., a miniature painter, 495
- Bede (Cuthbert) on Bagman, 473
Beag-bheul, 46
Brownie, modern belief in, 385
Caraboo, pretended Princess, 386
Cuddy: man, bird, and beast, 53
Fagg: a remnant, 110
Glibby=slippery, 239
Hog feast in Huntingdonshire, 295
May-Day song, 373
Poem, "In the Times," 269
Ship ver. Sheep, 257
Whitsun-day, its correct spelling, 479
Wound prevented from leaving a scar, 275
- Bede (the Venerable), 187
- Bedell (Bishop), grant of houses in Dublin, 398, 449
- Bedford (W. K. R.) on Bp. Lyndewoode's arms, 266, 429
- Bedstead superstition, 9.
- Beest, a provincialism, 458, 507
- Beethoven (Ludwig van), Life, 26
- Belfast, printing first practised at, 194, 247
- Bell Inn, Warwick Lane, 33
- Bell inscription at Puncknowle, 137; "Lemoismay," 219
- Bell of St. Ceneu, or St. Keyna, 297, 365; of Westminster, 457
- Bell-ringing, fines for its omission, 74
- Bells cracked, 89, 169, 271
- Bell & Daldy on Keightley's "Shakspeare Expositor," 207
- Bell (Edmund) on Bazubend, 210
- Bell (Dr. Wm.) on derivation of Mistletoe, 226, 363
Passage in "Pericles," 236
Stale Mate in chess, 221
- Belshazzar, King of Babylon, 61
- B. (E. M.) on Courtenay quarterings, 199
- Bentley (Richard), "Wishes, or Harlequin's Mouth Opened," 37
- Berkeley family arms, 337, 388
- Berlin Society of Modern Languages, prizes, 48
- Bernardino Baldi, his works, 9, 309
- Berners Street, inhabited by artists, 243
- B. (F.) on Thomas Sanden, M.D., 269
- B. (F. C.) on Jussieu's Cedar, 121
Kar, Ker, Cor, 336
Meat and malt, 331
Ugrians in Britain, 414
- B. (G.) on Coote Molesworth, M.D., 378
Gibbon's Autobiography: ogresses, 483
- B. (H.) on "Florice and Blanchefleur," 440
Stormstead, its orthography, 156
Traditions of an antecedent world, 95
- Bible, price of one in 1660, 132
- Bible chronologically arranged, 67
- Bible supposed to have been printed at Belfast, 194
- "Bibliophobia," its pseudonyms, 458
- Bibliothecar. Chetham on Cold Harbour, 344
Chartulary of Whalley Abbey, 508
Dublin Letter, 508
Fires how anciently extinguished, 508
Greek Church, 203, 321
Homer and his translators, 174
Index, General Literary, 373, 455
Superstition, origin of the word, 360
"Bibliotheca Hibernica" announced, 52, 120
- Bidding prayer, 152, 291

Bilbie (Thomas), bellfounder, 240, 311, 364
 Bill of lading of a slave cargo, 72, 162
 Billings (Miss Mary), longevity, 154, 207, 227, 503
 Bingham (C. W.) on "Battler aux Corneilles," 94
 Bell Inn and Broadhurst, 104
 Hackney horses : Affri, 124
 Kellaway, co. Dorset, 285
 Piscis Botans, 124, 384
 Recipes in old manuscripts, 353
 Birmingham, anachronism in a memorial window, 73
 Birr (Rev. Brandon), "The Bishop of Dublin's Prophecy," 418
 Bishops, paintings of the Sevan, 400
 Bishops' baronies, 387
 Bishops' oath of office, 355
 Bishops' rings, 459
 Bishops' wives, their precedence, 273, 294, 347
 Bismuth, demand for, 200, 454
 Bisset (Mr.), "Omitted Chapters in the History of England," censured, 3
 Bisset (Dr. Wm.), Bp. of Raphoe, offered the Archbishopric of Dublin, 256
 B. (J.), Bombay, on Omar Cheyam, &c., 11
 B. (J. L.) on pedigree of the Dwight family, 34
 B. (J. R.) on Henry Erskine's witty remark, 41
 Precedence of bishops' wives, 347
 Protestant, origin of the word, 93
 Smith (Adam) and Mandeville, 352
 Blackamoor, baptism of one, 198
 Blackfriars broken bridge, 177
 Bladen and Hawke families, 258, 326
 Blair (D.), Melbourne, on Rev. Joseph Charles, 79
 Australian topographical nomenclature, 132
 Extinction of native races, 110
 Female franchise at Victoria, 93
 Lobeck's "Aglaophamus," 259
 Tucker's "Light of Nature," 278
 "Blanket of the dark," explained, 51, 176, 266, 316, 452
 Blow (James), Bible said to have been printed by him, 194
 Blue Coat School, its foundation, 8, 99
 Boase (G. C.) on inahogany, a beverage, 280
 Boccaccio's Decameron, Earl Spencer's copy, 301, 355
 Bockett (Julia R.) on St. Anne's chapel on Caversham Bridge, 257
 Boleyn (Queen Anne), materials for her use, 73
 Bolingbroke (Henry St. John, Lord), "Collection of Political Tracts," 156
 Bolton (Wm.), prior of St. Bartholomew, 57, 140
 Bonaparte (Napoleon), and the Iron Crown, 223; an author and a student, 454; "History of his Cabinet," 136, 223, 328; invasion of England, 198
 Bonar (Dr. Horatius) on locality of Zion, 306
 Bone (J. W.) on Englishmen buried abroad, 263
 Stale mate, 285
 Bonifatio (Natal), engraver, 137
 "Bonnie Dundee," the air, 418, 465
 Book auction in 1689, 6, 98
 Bookbinding, works relating to, 138, 329, 365
 Book swindler, 48
 Books, universal Catalogue of English, 334
 Books first bound in boards and cloth, 138

Books recently published :—

Aide's Romance of the Scarlet Leaf, 390
 Annual Register, 1864, 390

Books recently published :—

Anti-Teapot Review, 470
 Arrowsmith's Shakespeare's Editors, 332
 Artemus Ward, his Book, 252
 Arthur : Le Morte Arthur, 105
 Autograph Mirror, 292, 430
 Autograph Souvenir, 252
 Bartlett's History of Wimbledon, 430
 Bibliotheca Americana, 192
 Blackader's Chronological Bible, 67
 Book of Golden Deeds, 126
 Boutell's Heraldry, Historical and Popular, 26
 Brande's Dictionary of Science, 291, 370
 Burn's High Commission Court, 172
 Burnet's History of the Reformation, 252
 Calendar of State Papers, Domestic Series, Reign of Elizabeth, A.D. 1581—1590, 410
 Camden Society : Letters from Sir Robert Cecil to Sir George Carew, 48
 Charnock's Spanish Bradshaw, 370
 Chatelain's Poems and Translations, 370
 Chetham Society : Catalogue of Tracts for and against Popery, 212
 Christian Soldier's Penny Bible, 212
 Chronicles and Memorials of Great Britain and Ireland : Itinerarium of Richard Cœur de Lion, by Wm. Stubbs ; Collection of Chronicles, by John de Waurin, edited by Wm. Hardy ; Leechdoms, Wortcunning, and Starcraft of Early England, by T. Oswald Cockayne, 171 ; Higden's Polychronicon, by G. Babington, 271 ; Annals of the Monasteries of Winchester and Waverley, by H. R. Luard, 450
 Clergy List for 1865, 126
 Cox's Hymns from the German, 26
 Craik's Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties, 410
 Cronelly's Irish Family History, 146
 Cowper (Mary, Countess), Diary, 172
 Debrett's Peerage and Baronetage, 172
 Devotions before and after Communion, 410
 Dircks's Memoir of Samuel Hartlib, 232
 Early English Text Society : Lawder's Tractate—Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight, 105
 Edward VI., Historical Narrative of his Death, 272
 Edwards on Libraries and their Founders, 145
 Engel on the Music of Ancient Nations, 47
 Ferguson on the Holy Sepulchre, &c., 390
 Fitzgerald's Story of Dr. Dodd, 192
 Fortnightly Review, 410
 Forster's Israel in the Wilderness, 311
 Foss's Tabulæ Curiales, 125
 Friswell's Familiar Words, 26
 Fuller on the Court of Final Appeal, 332
 Furioso, the Life of Beethoven, 26
 Governing Families of England, 231
 Harland's Ballads and Songs of Lancashire, 509
 Hassard's London Diocese Book, 272
 Herald and Genealogist, 68, 272, 450
 Hume's Orthographie of the Britan Tongue, 232
 Hunt's Stammering and Stuttering, 272
 Jervise's Memorials of Angus and the Mearns, 231
 Jewitt on the Wedgwoods, 390
 Kempt's American Joe Miller, 126
 Kenrick's Papers on Archaeology, 146
 King's History of Precious Stones, 509

Books recently published:—

- Kübler's Lyra Germanica, 311
 Lady Ina, and other Poems, 509
 Lanarkshire Upper Ward Described, 86
 London: The Old City and its Highways and Byways, 105
 Lubbock's Pre-Historic Times, 470
 Merivale's Historical Studies, 212
 Mitchell's Biographies of Eminent Soldiers, 370
 Moffat's Secrets of Angling, 332
 Monkhouse's Dream of Idleness, 272
 Mornings of the Recess, 1861-4, 67
 Moxon's Miniature Poets, 470
 Murray & Co.'s Book for Railway Travellers, 430
 Napoleon's Life of Caesar, 68
 New Testament, by Churton and Jones, 311
 New Testament, by Dean Alford, 470
 Payne's Family of Millais, 292
 Philobiblion, a Monthly Journal, 86
 Pictou's Notes on South Lancashire Dialect, 272
 Playing Cards, their History, 26
 Public Schools Calendar, 1865, 48
 Ramsay's Moralists and Politician, 26
 Reynolds (Sir Joshua), Life and Times, 291
 Rimbault's Early English Organ Builders, 390
 Rimmel's Book of Perfumes, 86
 Russell's History of Defence of Sebastopol, 86
 Sargent's Norwegian Grammar, 509
 Shakespeare's Works, by Booth, 86; Keightley, 86; Dyce, 126; Clarke and Wright, 490
 Smith's Practical Dietary for Families, 145
 Soldier's Pocket Bible, 212
 Spanish Notes and Queries, 370
 Strickland's Queens of England, 292
 Sweden, Ten Years in, 369
 Swinburne's Atalanta in Calydon, 272
 Taylor's Ballads and Songs of Brittany, 47
 Tennyson—Selections from his Works, 47
 Thimm's Shakespeareana, 332
 Thornbury's Haunted London, 192
 Timbs's Romance of London, 490
 Timbs's Walks and Talks about London, 105
 Todd's Books of the Vaudois, 311
 Trench's Notes on the Greek of the New Testament, 105
 Trotter's Studies in Biography, 68
 Tulloch (Dr.), The Christ of the Gospels, &c., 67
 Tytler's History of Scotland, 86
 Voices of the Year, or Poet's Kalendar, 106
 Webster's Dictionary enlarged, 85, 146, 292
 Williams' Superstitions of Witchcraft, 430
 Wright's History of Caricature, 105
- Booksellers Satirised, 191
 Booth (John), jun., "Register of Noblemen since the Conquest," 115
 Borwens, i. e. farms, its derivation, 418
 Bospiger on Dighton's caricatures, 119
 Boston House, Brentford, 82
 Boswell (James), his family, 197
 Botrie (John), of Lincoln's Inn, 356
 Botta (Carlo Giuseppe), biography, 359
 Bottle conjurer in 1749, 84
 Boutell (Charles) on episcopal rings, 459
 Fylfot, in heraldry, 493
 Heraldic queries, 436
- Boutell (Charles) on John Milton's arms, 504
 Ostrich feather badge, 440
 Royal standard and Union flag, 208
 Sepulchral monuments, their restoration, 451
 Bowyer (Rev. Mr.), inquired after, 177
 Brabant (Rev. John), epitaph, 77, 145
 Brabener, an officer at Dundee, 113
 Bracton (Hen.) MS., "De Legibus Angliæ," 35, 103
 Bradshaw's Railway Guide, the earliest, 261, 329
 Braham (Sir Richard), day of his death, 9, 82
 Brandon (Richard), supposed executioner of Charles I., 220
 Braun (Geo. Christian), German author, 418
 Breakneck Steps, Old Bailey, 233
 Breeches Bible in Latin, 442
 Bremen, its condition from 1731-1757, 323; coin, 388
 Brent (Algernon) on bankers and goldsmiths, 94
 Breton music, 298
 Brevis on the "Christian Breadbasket," 356
 Fortescue (Gen. Richard), 341
 Brickdusts, or 53rd regiment, 71, 120
 Bridewell Hospital founded, 8, 9
 Bridge inscription near Dublin, 421
 Bridges (Wm.), his family, 120
 Brightling on epigrams, 148
 Brittany, its ballads and songs, 47
 Brito (Albini), his arms, 497
 Britons, early, and the prehensile thumb, 323
 Britton (Thomas), books on magic, 421
 Broadhurst, Sussex, mansion, 33, 104
 Brocar (John), printer at Alcalá, 12, 72
 Bromley (John) of Bromley Chapel, 308
 Bronscomb (Bp. Walter), arms, 437
 Brooke (Samuel), performers of "Melanthe," 401, 425
 Brown (Hannah), longevity, 180
 Brown (Robert), the separatist, 67
 Browne (Sir Thomas), "Religio Medici," new edition, 113
 Browne (Sir Valentine) and family, 340, 386
 Brownie, modern belief in the, 46, 385
 Bruce (John) on Herbert Palmer's burial, 11
 Bruce (Robert), his claim to the crown of Scotland, 319
 Bruce (Syr Mitchil), a caricature, 34, 122
 Brunswick (Duke of), "Fifty Reasons for abjuring Lutheranism," 68, 121, 428, 468
 Brunswick (Princess Charlotte of), "Life," 9, 102
 Brute creation, immortality of, 339, 385, 410
 Bryskett (Lodowick), noticed, 430
 B. (T.) on the early use of cannon, 242
 Capital punishments in Russia, 351
 Circumstantial evidence, 217
 Leeds dialect, 277
 Marrying day in Scotland, 493
 "Secret History of the Cabinet of Bonaparte," 136
 Surgeon executed for murder, 112
 "Tentamen Medicinale," 223
 B. (T. J.) on Neger, an Irish word, 85
 Buckton (T. J.) on Abraham's conversion, 488
 American depreciation of currency, 6
 Baptism for the dead, 33
 Egypt, its third plague, 408
 Exodus of the Israelites, 502
 Foxes or sheaves, 389
 Louis XVI., his pretended son, 39
 Manetho, 389

- Buckton (T. J.) on Mastmaker, its meaning, 25
 Synagogue of the Libertines, 505
 Buckingham (Geo. Villiers, 1st Duke of), his assassination, 135, 185; portraits, 94, 249
 Budd (Thomas), Quaker, 168
 Bufts, the Young and Old, 70
 Bull of Clement VI., 418; of John XXII. against mendicant friars, 402
 Bull Inn, Bishopsgate, 240
 Bunhill Fields registers, 146
 Bunyan (John), "Pilgrim's Progress" dramatised, 458
 Burgh (Barons), noticed, 260, 387
 Burgh (Hubert de), Earl of Kent, 385
 Burial in coffins, origin of, 113, 266
 Burn (J. S.) on S. Decharmes, 248
 Bug, a remnant, 268
 Burton (E. F.) on Mount Athos, 290
 Burton (John) on Romney's portrait of Wesley, 103
 Butcher's patent for a corporation, 412
 Bute (John, 3rd Earl of), burial-place, 181
 Butler (Charles), "Principles of Musick," 65
 Butler (Sir James) of Ormond, his seal, 149
 Buttery (Albert) on Duke of Buckingham, 249
 Botrie (John) of Lincoln's Inn, 356
 Franklin (Benjamin), 409
 Butresses, flying, 377
 B. (W.) on medical sign, R., 94
 Significant names, 506
 B. (W. J.) on great seal of South Carolina, 279
 Names, curious coincidence of, 298
 "Oh, oh, ray, oh Amborah," 155
 Old house at Hastings, 199
 Town Clerk's signature, 136
 Translations of Virgil, 56
 Byng (Adm. John), execution, 300
 Byron (Lord), not the author of "The Vampyre," 201, 421; continuation of "Don Juan," 42
- C.
- Cæsar (Julius) and Britain, 322; the Delphic oracle, 182; a grammarian, 257; his Life by the Emperor Napoleon, 68
 Caistor gad, or whip, sold, 354, 388
 Calais, St. Mary's church, 300
 Calamy (Dr. Edmund), annotated copies of his "Abridgment," 223; his Lists of the ejected Clergy, 153
 "Caledonia," a packet ship, 94
 Calvin, derivation of the name, 151
 Camden Society, Marquess Camden elected President, 68; general meeting, 370
 Camelford (Lord), inscription on his monument, 131
 Campbell (Col. James), of Laweris, 3
 Campbell (J. D.) on words in Dalryell's Poems, 254
 Canadian clergy, their longevity, 32
 Cannel coal, its derivation, 418, 485
 Canning (Hon. George), anecdote of the Red Lion, 183
 Cannon, its early use, 242
 Canonbury tower, Islington, 57
 Caraboo, a quondam princess, 196, 269, 310, 386, 408, 418, 447
 Caraboo (Dr.), alias Dr. Wilkinson, 490, 506
 Carew (Sir George), letters to him from Sir Robert Cecil, 48
 Carew (Sir Thomas), noticed, 205
 Carey, a local name, its derivation, 142
 Carey (Stafford) on Chateaux in France, 144
 Irish poor law, 445
 Willoughby (Lord), 348
 Carey (Valentine), Bishop of Exeter, 117, 170, 205
 Carfax at Horsham, 396
 Caricature, history of, 105
 Caricature of Our Lord, 243, 329, 406; "Syr Mitchil Bruce," 34, 122
 Carilford on Caryll family, 9
 Duke of Brunswick's "Fifty Reasons," 423
 Milton (John), crest and motto, 460
 Witches and brooms, 420
 Yorke (John), of Denbighshire, 441
 Carolina, South, its great seal, 279
 Carpenter (John), monumental inscription, 126
 Carro (Jean de), letter on Louis XVII., 79
 Cary family, 117, 170, 203-206, 310, 424, 466
 Caryll family of Harting, 9
 Casey (Wm.), Bishop of Limerick, 466
 Cat in foreign languages, 151
 Catwater at Plymouth, its original name, 74
 Cavalier, in military warfare, 179, 508
 Caversham Bridge, St. Anne's chapel, 257
 C. (B. H.) on Cat in foreign languages, 151
 Cureton (Dr.), and "Quarterly Review," 185
 Epistle to the Laodiceans, 397
 Foxes or sheaves, 426
 Hymn to the Virgin, 85
 Inscription on the Cross, 189
 King (Bishop), and Dr. John Rainolds, 73
 Limehouse, its derivation, 190
 Manual of Palæography, 256
 Milton, Shakspeare, Raleigh, &c., 376
 St. Matthew's Gospel written by Barnabas, 278
 Sea-serpent again, 178
 Sedes stercoraria, 102
 C. (C. B.) on Hercules in Dante's Divine Comedy, 254, 362
 Cecil (Sir Robert), letters to Sir Geo. Carew, 48
 Cecil (Sir William), two letters to him, 8
 Cedrenus (Geo.), a Grecian monk, his work, 97
 Censoriousness, annual sermon on, 399
 Cervantes and Lope de Vega, 413; his grave, 112
 C. (F. R.) on Garrick's book-plate, 359
 C. (H.) on Abraham's conversion, 458
 St. Agnes and her Lamb, 402
 St. Augustine and Holy Trinity, 440
 Chaldee manuscript, its key, 469
 Challsteth (A.) on bibliography, 116
 Books on Magic, 421
 Local ghosts, 366
 Milton and his illustrator, 209
 Prior and the expected deluge, 140
 Satan, works on, 220
 Search for the Lapis in 1865, 454
 Snail-eating, 349
 Tithe barns, 249
 Chalmers family of Cultra, 34
 Chap, slang word, early notice of, 380, 426, 470
 Chapel Royal choristers, 173
 Chaplin (Dr.) and "The Whole Duty of Man," 57, 12
 Chapman (George), poet, 461
 Chappell (Wm.) on "Bonnie Dundee," 465
 "Oh, oh, ray, oh Amborah," 306
 Toads in stone, 469

- Charles I. and Dr. Donne's Sermons, 77; his executioner, 220; golden rules attributed to him, 370
 Charles (Rev. Joseph), works, 79
 Charlett (Dr. Arthur), noticed, 122
 Charlton (W. J.) on Jews as artisans, 200
 Charter House, London, early owners, 8, 99
 Chatelherault (Duc de), disputed title, 416
 Chatterton (Thomas), his venality, 152
 Chaworth (Viscount), death of the last, 279, 349, 369
 Circumstantial evidence, 44, 112; remarkable case, 217
 Civil War MS. sermons, 152
 C. (J.) on Davison's case, 189
 C. (J. B.) on derivation of Mungo, 190
 C. (J. E.) on arms of Earl Enniskillen, 123
 Clairvoyance and mesmerism as sciences, 74
 Clare (John Fitzgibbon, 1st Earl of), birth-place, 323
 Claret in 1729, 494
 Clarke (Hyde) on case of longevity, 150
 Cold Harbours, 484
 Spanish Jews, 180
 Turkish folk lore, 275
 Claudius (Mr.), a chemist, 398
 C. (L. B.) on a bell inscription, 137
 "Clearing the glass," its meaning, 494
 Clement VI., bull on the marriage of Sir Thomas Holland, 418
 Clent hills and Druidism, 323, 365, 389, 507
 Clergymen, longevity of, 32
 Clerk of the Closet, his duties, 202
 Cling, as used by Shakspeare, 175
 "Clovia," a poem, 506
 Clulow (W. B.), his unacknowledged republication, 346
 C. (M.) on Ode to Shakspeare, 357
 C. (H. B.) on the Athenian misogynist, 47
 Clovia, 506
 Curiosities of history, 124
 Diogenes' lantern, 368
 Duffer kidnapped, 474
 Dutch epitaph: the learned pig, 141
 "Il Fortunato Infortunato," 206
 Lope de Vega, 246
 Old saying, 290
 Pagan caricature, 329
 Satirical engraving, 290
 Smedley's "Churchman's Second Epistle," 447
 Vossius de Theologia Gentili, 478
 C. (H. C.) on chronograms, 145
 Coshering, its etymology, 257
 Gunpowder, its inventor, 34
 Cheers, early use of the word, 41
 Cheese: "That's the cheese," 397, 465, 505
 Chevisaunce, a flower, 114, 189, 486
 Chichester epigram, 473
 Chitteldroog on Cawnpore queries, 476
 Chivers (Wm.), murdered by his gardener, 341
 Cholmeley (Mary), anagrams, 396
 Chorister actors, 173
 Christ's Hospital, its foundation, 8, 99
 "Christian Breadbasket," a periodical, 356, 389, 448, 507
 Christian names, singular, 152, 308, 494
 Christmas carols, 20
 Christmas waits, 23, 63
 Chronograms, 77, 145
 Church of England, its union with that of Ireland, 36, 122, 160, 249
 Church with wine vaults, 153 307
 Churches, mediæval, in Roman camps, 288
 Churchmen, high and low, 301
 Clifton and Wyvil families, 257
 Coachmakers' Company, the hall, 496
 Cobbett (Wm.), anecdotes, 41
 "Cobbler of Aggawam," notes on, 298, 299, 342
 Cock Lane ghost imposition, 371
 Cockades, their history, 54
 Cock's feather, origin of its use on the stage, 459, 507
 Cogers' Society, 496
 Coinage of gold and silver, 34, 125
 Colchester black dog, 366
 Cold Harbour, remarks on its origin, 253, 302, 344, 407, 483
 Cold Kitchen, in Surrey, 439
 Coleridge (S. T.), emendations in his "Religious Musings," 433
 Collier (J. P.) on Sir Joseph Paxton, 491
 Collier's Confession of Faith, 288
 Cologne Cathedral, stained glass, 281
 Coltheart (P.), "The Quacks Unmask'd," 57
 Colwell (Richard), of Faversham, epitaph, 300
 Comets, Chinese opinions on, 10, 102
 Common Prayer Books, hymns at the end, 357
 Comnena (Eudokia), wife of Theodore Palæologus, 439, 506
 Complutensian Polyglott, 12, 72
 Conder (F. R.) on Exodus of the Israelites, 464
 Congleton borough accounts, 109
 Coningsby family, 219
 Constable (Amey), monument in St. Pancras churchyard, 235
 Constance (Queen), at Kenilworth priory, 400
 "Constitutional Guardian," its contributors, 133
 Contarini (Alvise), doge of Venice, 220, 309, 330
 Conventual discipline in the Middle Ages, 151
 Cooke (Matthew) on Cold Harbour, 302
 Cookery: "Au Bleu," 202, 289
 Cooper, a beverage, origin of the name, 6
 Cooper (C. H. & Thompson) on Thomas Barton, 104
 Braham (Sir Richard), 82
 Bryskett (Lodowick), 430
 Cary family, 203
 Charlett (Dr. Arthur), 122
 Kirke (Edward), commentator on Spenser, 509
 Knowles (Herbert), 430
 Loftus (Abp.), speech, 470
 Morrell (Hugh), 270
 Tempest (Lady), her jury, 287
 Virginia Company, history of, 44
 Cooper (W. D.) on old house at Hastings, 270
 Whitbread family, 271
 Corney (Bolton) on Cavalier, 508
 Cue, as used by Shakspeare, 317
 Henrietta Maria, her letter, 129
 Pembroke College, Oxford, 5
 Shaksperiana of Mr. Isaac Reed, 317
 Sanden (Thos.), M.D., "Three Discourses," 143
 Cornish proverbs, Welsh parallels, 304
 Cornwallis (Marchioness of), temp. Henry VIII., 240
 Coronets, when first adopted, 54, 427
 Coryat (Thomas), Donne's lines on him, 84, 145
 Coshering, its derivation, 257, 391, 450
 Cotterell (G.) on Coleridge's "Religious Musings," 438

- Cotton (Ven. Dr. H.) on editions of the English Bible, 432
 Court of England, 1730, 356
 Courtenay family quarterings, 199
 Courtenay (Bp.), heraldic chimney-piece, 437; monument in Exeter Cathedral, 451
 Courtoys, or Curtis family arms, 283
 Cousin, its style by the crown, 83
 Countances in the diocese of Winchester, 494
 Coward (Thos.) on apple-pie order, 133, 209
 Derivation of Horkey, 166
 Cowper (Lady M.), letter to her husband, 87
 Cowper (Mary, Countess), "Diary," 172
 Cpl. on Thomas Bilbie, bell-founder, 364
 Bear's-den Hall, 402
 Charles I. and Donne's Sermons, 77
 Chivers (Wm.), date of his murder, 341
 Donne's Poems, 439
 Donne's verses on Coryate, 84
 Dissolution of religious houses, 364
 Hospitals for the sick, 12
 Hymns, anonymous, 439
 Latin puzzle, 84
 Lewis, for raising stones, 421
 Old wall painting, 357
 C. (P. S.) on adverbs improperly used, 363, 487
 American regiment, 279
 Demosthenes, 430
 Kilpeck Castle, 476
 Matfelon, alias Whitechapel, 208
 Piscis flotans, 55, 288
 Sterne (Laurence), biography, 53
 Wellesley family manor, 182
 Weston (Sir Richard), 347
 C. (R.) Cork, on the Rev. Edward Ford, 504
 Crache, or stable, 21, 82
 Cranmer (Robert), noticed, 376, 425
 Crashawe (Wm.), father of the poet, 111
 Crawley (C. G.) on Taynton parish registers, 78
 Crinean war, Russian deserters to the English, 115
 Crinoline in Italy, 191
 Crochley (Rev. Richard John), 114
 Crocodiles shown as dragons, 75, 158
 Croke (Edward), governor of Fort St. David's, 476
 Cromarty (George Mackenzie, Earl of), 78
 Crowther (Mrs.), poetess, 133, 231
 Cromwell (Oliver), Goodwood portrait, 44; cuirasses worn by his Ironsides, 74, 120; head fixed on Westminster Hall, 156
 Cross : "To take up one's cross," 83
 Cross of Christ, the inscription, 75, 143, 189
 Cross stamped on bread, prohibited, 108
 Crossley (James) on epigram on architects, 148
 James (Richard), 185
 Latin puzzle, 84
 Crusades, a map or chart of the time, 323
 Cruz on Beest, 507
 Waits at York, 380
 C. (S.) on medal of Society of Industry, 35
 C. (T.) on Cooper, a drink, 6
 Dragon in Herefordshire, 133
 Mistletoe, its derivation, 158
 Welsh triads, 138
 Cuddy, a provincialism, 53, 165
 Cue, as used by Shakespeare, its meaning, 317, 427
 Cunliffe (Emma) on heraldic queries, 95
 Cussha : Cuisheag, their botanical names, 338, 409
 C. (W. B.) on Cromwell's Ironsides, 74
 C. (W. H.) on Sir John Fenwick, 309
 Jacobite bank notes, 216
 Louis XIV. author of a "Vie de César," 238
 Paschal Lamb and arms of Portugal, 303
 Reflowering Queen Mary's garden, 69
 Cyril on Chap. a slang word, 380
 Eugene, was he a Deist ? 377
 Hool-cheese, 377
 Tip, a slang word, 420
 Tip me the traveller, 400
 Toasts of former days, 397
 Cywrm on the banner of the Prince of Wales, 495
 Jackey-legs knife, 306
 Yew trees called palms, 167, 306
- D.
- D. on Lord Bacon and the "Christian Paradoxes," 111
 "Bonnie Dundee," the air, 418
 Big-nosed men, 421
 Electric telegraph foreshadowed, 461
 Jackey-legs knife, 306
 Lloyd (Rev. Dr. Charles), 123
 Mother of the Wesleys, 148
 Milton and his illustrator, 210
 Recipe R., 168
 D., Florence, on "The Battle of La Planta," 107
 D. on Christmas waits, 63
 D'Abriehcourt family, 229, 388
 Dallas, adopted children by priests, 338
 Dalton (John) on Bazubend, its meaning, 113
 Belshazzar, King of Babylon, 61
 Cedrenus (George), his work, 97
 Cervantes, his grave, 112
 Cervantes and Lope de Vega, 413
 Complutensian Polyglott, 72
 "Don Quixote," passage in, 25
 Egypt, the third plague, 297
 Exodus of the Israelites, 419
 Hamensis (Bp. Gilbert), 301
 "Lenne Rediviva," manuscript, 445, 508
 Manetho, his history, 356, 428
 Manuscript collections, 434
 Napoleon I. an author and a student, 454
 Spencer (Earl), his Boccaccio, 1471, 301
 Dalzell (J. G.), "Scottish Poems," obsolete words, 254, 364, 407
 Daniel (Samuel) and Shakespeare, parallel passages, 337
 Dante and heraldry, 457
 Dante's "Divine Comedy," and Hercules, 254, 305
 D'Aveney (H.) on Valentine Browne, 386
 Matys (Quentin), his works, 40
 Sash windows, 487
 Davidson (John) on Alvoise Contarini, 220, 309
 "Dragon of Wantley," &c., 181
 Fleur-de-lys in the old arms of France, 338
 Flying buttresses, 377
 Hays of Errol, 191
 Heraldic queries, 200, 339
 Hog feast, 364
 Igele Säule, 344
 King of Jerusalem, 266
 Latin names of towns, 156

- Davidson (John) on Netherlands, their separation, 155
 Numismatic query, 259
 Paschal Lamb in the arms of Portugal, 251
 Ragusa, governor in 1773, 180, 310
 St. Nersès, primate of Armenia, 301
 "Vitulus Aureus," its author, 156
- Davies (E. C.) on lion of Northumberland House, 239
- Davies (J.) on Herefordshire queries, 45
 Walker (Henry), minstrel, 180
- Davies (J. B.) on translations of Virgil, 123
- Davis (A. W.) on Romney's portraits of Wesley and Mrs. Tighe, 166
- Davis (J. E.) on Rev. R. Mostyn Pryce, 66
- Davis (W.) on Goodwyn of Blackheath, 55
 Laet (Gaspar), "Almynack," 55
 Tacquet (Andrew), "Arithmetic," 53
- Davison's case, 80, 124, 189
- D. (A. W.) on superstition or sympathy, 45
- D. (C.) on "The Time of Day," 136
- D. (C. E.) on ballad "The Battle of Harlaw," 489
- Δδ. on Flemish stained glass in England, 165
- Death caused by drinking cold water, 236, 307
- De Beauvoir family, 288
- Decharmes (S.), watchmaker, 133, 190, 248
- De Foe (Daniel), and the "London Review," 58; his political writings, 59, 244, 343; his moral satire, 431
- De la Tour (Theophilus) d'Auvergne, 486
- Delima, a Christian name, 151
- Deluge expected in 1524, 57, 141
- Demosthenes' advice: Action, 430
- Denton (Wm.) on the Greek Church, 202
- De Queiros family arms, 258
- Derby (Lord), Goethe, and Manzoni, 353; translation of Homer, 32, 88
- "Description of Love," dates of its various editions, 338
- Despencer (Bp. Henry le), arms, 437
- De Vaudin, or Vauldin family, 180
- Devil's handwriting in Queen's College, Oxford, 27
- Devil's Own, Connaught Boys, 71
- De Witt (John), letters, 255
- Dibdin (Dr. T. F.), "Bibliophobia," 458
- Dickens (Charles) and Thackeray, rhymes to, 484
- Dickens (Francis), arms and crest, 258
- "Die Spitzæ" in German blazon, 310, 369
- Dietary for families, schools, &c., 145
- Dighton (Mr.), caricatures, 119, 188
- Diogenes' lantern and honest man, 298, 368
- Disciple, its orthography, 279, 327
- Dissenters' Colleges or public schools, 157
- Ditchfield on violon: lock-up, 65
- Dixon (J.) on the meaning of Arbery, 407
- Donkey, a provincialism, 66
 Gas, origin of the word, 111
 Gibbon's Autobiography, 417
 "Hamlet," passage in, 52
 Milton and his illustrator, 499
- D. (J.) on the Rev. R. Mostyn Pryce, 66
- D. (N.) [Nathan Downer?] a miniature painter, 495
- Dobson (Wm.) on a person wasting his substance, 346
 New Style anticipated, 440
 Roman hand, 429
- Dodd (Dr. Wm.), story of his life, 192
- Doddridge (Dr. Philip), manuscripts, 85
- Dodralis potio, 148, 208, 264, 347
- "Dog and the Shadow," a poem, 66, 122
- Donkey, a provincialism, 66, 165, 212, 309
- Donne (Dr. John), lines on Coryat, 84, 145; initials in his Poems, 439; royal grant for the publication of his Sermons, 77
- "Don Quixote," the word "mil," 25, 101, 168; sentence omitted, 73
- Doran (Dr. J.) on Tyrone Power and the drama, 165
- Dorset (Richard Sackville, Earl of), binding of his books, 7
- D. (O. T.) on Breton music, 298
 Church of England and Ireland, 122, 160, 249
 Derivation of Calvin, 151
 St. George and the Dragon, 75
- Douglas (James), Cumberland poet, 133
- Douglas (Sir Robert), Bart., his death, 223, 284
- Dragon in heraldry, 418, 449, 466
- Dragon in Herefordshire, 133, 211, 276
- "Dragon of Wantley," its music, 181
- Dragons shown as crocodiles, 75, 158, 230
- Drake (Eliz.), mother of the Duke of Marlborough, 168
- Drake (Sir Francis) ancestry, 338
- Dramatic bibliography, foreign, 399
- Dreaming under trees, 114
- Droitwich register, quoted, 322
- Drummond (John), M.D., 280
- Dryden (Sir Henry), drawings, 280
- Dryden (John), "Sir Martin Mar-All," 436
- Dublin, provincial synod of, in 1862, 420
- Dublin Comet newspaper, 399
- Dublin sheriffs excommunicated, 400
- Dudley family, 309
- Dudley (Robert), papal dispensation for his marriage, 377
- Duffer kidnapped, 474
- Dumble, its meaning, 494
- Duncanson family of Cantire, 96, 184
- Duncombe (Sir Saunders), 133
- Dundee (John Graham, Viscount), portraits, 8, 103
- Dunkin (A. J.) on Carey, a local name, 142
- Apparitions of Reculver and Rochester, 239
- Fiennes family: Saye and Sele, 288
- Forged assignats, 270
- Mediæval churches in Roman camps, 288
- Metrical Sermon, 308
- Parry (Lady Anne) and the manor of Charlton, 390
- Petrified man, 125
- Rampers, its derivation, 288
- Robber's grave, 125
- St. Mary Rouncevall, 252
- Sam Sharpset, 155
- Satan and his dwelling-place, 144
- Durotrix on burial in coffins, 113
- Dutch epitaph, translated by Major Clark, 141
- D. (W.) on Queen of Querumania, 268
- Dwight family pedigree, 34
- D. (W. L.) on New Version of the Psalms, 357
- D. (W. T. T.) on practices of the Roman Church, 155
 Marlborough (Duke of), his mother, 168
- Dyason (William), American poet, 79
- Dyer (Edward), of Brent, co. Somerset, 399
- Dyer (T. T.) on "Anecdotes of the French Republic," 260
 Hoyle (Edmund), noticed, 227

E.

- E. on the Kings of Jerusalem, 202, 266
- Eassie (W.) on Gaelic grammar, 308

Easter rhyme, 433
 Ecclesiological desecration, 419
 "Ecole des Chartes," in France, 214
 Edward VI., circumstances of his death, 272, 401
 Edwin (John), comedian, his metrical sermon, 76, 143
 Effingham (Thomas, Earl of), speech, &c., 222
 Egypt, the third plague, 297, 365, 408
 E. (H.) on Kirby hooks, 375
 E. (H. T.) on yew trees called palms, 365
 Eirionnach on the Anstruther library, 289
 Bell Inn and Broadhurst, 33
 Charlotte (Princess) of Brunswick, 9
 Collier's Confession of Faith, 288
 Freemason, early use of the word, 329
 Grotto of the Nativity, &c., 19
 E. (K. P. D.) on Abgar's letter, 307
 Temse = a sieve, 306
 Toad in stone, 339
 Electric telegraph anticipated, 461
 Elfrida (Queen), scene of her tragedy, 74
 Elliot (Edward Lord), noticed, 280
 Ellacombe (H. T.) on churchwardens' accounts, 169
 Lemosmary, a bell inscription, 219
 Shelves in Gloucestershire, 330
 Spur money in belfries, 366
 Ellis (A. S.) on Fitzwaryn of Wilts and Dorset, 54
 Elma, a female Christian name, 152
 Elridge (Richard and Wm.), bell-founders, 83
 Elsdale (Rev. Samuel), his death, 240
 English court in 1729, 116
 English law and government, MSS. on, 35, 103
 Englishmen buried abroad, 129, 268, 442
 Enniskillen (Cole, Earl of), arms, 123

Epigrams:—

An epigram should, like a pin, conjoint, 92
 Ante reformatum radicali arte senatum, 147
 A pedant, when a wedding guest, 147
 Artes discere vult pecuniosas, 97, 119, 229, 406
 Balnea, vina, Venus, corrumpunt corpora nostra, 91
 Bos meus, invitatus fateor, laceravit in agro, 147
 Cauta nimis mater puero: Noli, nisi postquam, 147
 Cur patimur stulti? namque hæc recordia nostra, 148
 Chichester pawnbrokers, 473
 Cum sitis similes, paresque vita, 264
 Dodra vocor: Quæ causa? Novem species gero, 148
 Dodralis potio (Ansonius), 148, 208, 264, 347
 Here Rogers sat, and here for ever dwell, 92
 If evils come not, then our fears are vain, 148
 If of weak parts the stripling you suspect, 97, 119
 If the man who turnips cries, 264
 Incipe: dimidium facti est, cœpisse, 148, 265
 Landor (W. S.), epigrams, 419
 Longe longorum longissime, Longe, virorum, 322
 Ne vendas lepores alienos, prome leporem, 322
 Nix Glacies, et Aqua; tria Nomina, Res tamen una, 264
 Nulla fides fronti. Ergo aversâ fronte sacerdos, 147
 One day in Christ Church meadows walking, 264
 Only begin: the half is done, 148
 Peace, brother, be not over exquisite, 148

Epigrams:—

Per nemus omne notis inscripta tabella legendis, 147
 Quas dederis solas semper habebis opes, 91
 Quis ferat hos, inquit piscis, martaginis æstus? 147
 Rufus vocatus rhetor ad nuptias, 147
 Sawney so fat in prison grows, 147
 Says Chloe, "Though tears it may cost," 92
 Si bene quid facias, facias cito; nam cito factum, 148
 Though dull my wit, my verses heavy stuff, 147
 Two pretty girls, 265
 When I meet Tom, the purse-proud and impudent blockhead, 264
 Episcopal blazon, 376, 446
 Episcopal bordure, label, &c., 436, 488

Epitaphs:—

Anderton (Francis), Bart., 130
 Baines (Roger), 443
 Camelford (Lord), at Holland House, 131
 Colwell (Richard), of Faversham, 300
 Dutch, translated by Major Clark, 141
 Fraser family, 34
 Frere (John Hookham), lines on a tombstone, 199
 Gifford (Henry), of Burstal, 129
 Gifford (Mary Anne), 268
 Hic situs est Nullus, 375
 James II. at Scots College, Paris, 130
 Knight (Thomas), 443
 Kyrton (Thomas), 443
 Mary Beatrice, wife of James II., 130
 Perth (James Drummond, Lord), 131
 Pordage (Thomas), 443
 Purveour (Thomas), 444
 Stuart (Louisa Maria), daughter of James II., 130
 Talbot (Caroline Maria), 268
 Tyrconnel (Frances Jennings, Countess of), 321
 Weston (Katherine), 443
 Eric on longevity of clergymen, 32
 Poem having only one vowel, 43
 Erskine (Henry), witty remark, 41
 Esk, its meaning, 296, 368
 Este on continuation of Byron's "Don Juan," 42
 Eton College founded by Henry VI., 146
 Eugene, was he a Deist? 377
 "European," a periodical, 134
 Eusebius, Dr. Cureton's remarks on a passage, 110, 185
 Euthymius Zigabenus and the Manichæans, 373, 455
 Evans (Lewis) on fleurs-de-lys, 386
 E. (W.) on Patrick Anderson, 369
 Ignition of wood by friction, 423
 Massymor: Mazmorras, 66
 Spitting white, 489
 Type mnemonics, 52
 Ewing (Robert W.), American dramatist, 438
 Exchequer records quoted, 476
 Exeter, arms of the see, 437
 Exodus of the Israelites, 419, 464, 502
 Ezechiel's "Exagoge," Greek drama, 14

F.

Fabricii (Principio), "Delle Allusioni," 137
 Facardin (Emir), noticed, 146

- Fagg, that is, a remnant, 110, 268, 368
 Fairfax (Henry), fly-leaf jottings, 396
 Fairful (David Andrew), Jesuit, 22
 Fall as used for autumn, 179
 Families, the governing, of England, 231
 Family names lost, 459
 Farmer (Hugh), "Essay on Demoniacs," 116
 F. (E.) on Lope de Vega, 114
 Satirical engraving, 124
 Feathers, origin of the funeral plume, 495
 Felton (John), Richard James's panegyric upon him for assassinating the Duke of Buckingham, 135, 185
 Female franchise, 93
 Fenians, their origin, 358
 Fenwick (Sir John), noticed, 309
 Ferguson (A.) on the ballad of Harlaw battle, 393
 Ferne (Bp. Henry) and Lord Capel, 261
 Ferrey (Benj.) on marriage rings, 350
 Puritan pews, 155
 F. (H.) on Henry Goodwyn, 167
 Fiennes family: Saye and Sele, 288
 Finch (Hon. John) and Sally Salisbury, 481
 Finlay's History of Greece, motto, 495
 Fires, how anciently enkindled, 82, 423
 Fisher's Garlands, their publication, 17
 Fishwick (H.) on Beest, 507
 Censoriousness, Sermons on, 399
 Goosnargh twenty-four sworn men, 75, 211
 Gulling, its meaning, 10
 Lancashire timber halls, 144
 Mum, a beverage, 101
 Nossells, 339
 Spinning-Jenny, 349
 Spur money in belfries, 324
 Stilts = crutches, 478
 "Stung like a tench," 51
 Sun-dials, 291
 Waking time, 144
 Fitch's Grenadiers, 71
 Fitzgerald (Mr.), poems, 18
 Fitzgerald (Rev. Mr.), "Another Guess at Junius," 133
 Fitzgerald (P.), "Life of Laurence Sterne," 53
 Fitzhoppkins on docking horses, 369
 Influenza, 506
 Hog feast, 505
 Newton and Voltaire, 211
 Sam Sharpset, 211
 Theodosius, his clemency, 218
 Voltaire: Diocletian, 496
 Fitzwarryn families of Wilts and Dorset, 34
 F. (J.) on justices' grammar, 458
 Fleck (C. P.) on spur money in belfries, 488
 Fleet Ditch and its locality, 233
 Fleur-de-lys in the old arms of France, 338, 384, 386
 Florence, lamentable accident in 1835, 110
 "Florice and Blanchefleur," a romance, 440
 Folk Lore : —
 Easter rhyme, 433
 Hair of the dog that bit you, 276
 Jewish folk lore, 276
 Spitting for luck, &c., 432
 Toothache recipe, 433
 Turkish folk lore, 275
 Wise tree weather wise, 433
 Wound prevented from leaving a scar, 275
 Fondi, sack of, its history, 495
 Forbes (Adm. John) refused to sign Adm. Byng's warrant, 300
 Ford, a local affix, 74
 Ford (Rev. Edward), his death, 459, 504
 Fortescue (Edward), elms at Brixton, 497
 Fortescue (Gen. Richard), noticed, 258, 341, 387
 Fortescue (Sir Thomas), knt., notices wanted, 94, 211
 Foss (Edward) on Lady Tempest's jury, 224
 Foster family, co. Warwick and Leicester, arms, 476
 Foster (P. le Neve) on pyramid of gold, 125
 Fowerman, its meaning, 240
 Fowler (Manly B.), American dramatist, 438
 Foxes or sheaves in Judges xv. 4, 338, 389, 426
 France, chateaux in, 144
 Franchise exercised by females, 93
 Francis (John) on Bippin's Oratorio, 100
 Franking, its legal power, 279, 350, 385, 407
 Franklin (Benj.), London residences, 356, 409
 Fraser family epitaphs, 34
 Free (Rev. John), D.D., his works, 420
 Freeman (S. C.) on Bernardino Baldi, 309
 Freemason, early use of the word, 329
 French and Scottish languages, 458
 French coinage, 259
 Frere (G. E.) on Lancashire timber halls, 248
 Frere (John Hookham), epitaph by him, 199
 Fretwell of Hellaby, family arms, 221, 386
 Frisians and the invasion of England, 461
 From thence versus From there, 437
 F. (R. W.) on the Crusaders, 323
 Parsons's lines on Moore's Poema, 239
 F. (T.) on Dr. Caraboo, 506
 Fuller (Thomas), unpublished epigrams, 352, 428
 Fun, its derivation, 476
 Furnivall (F. J.) on an early metrical version of the Psalms, 357
 North (Roger), his verses, 436
 Fustian in Naples, its meaning, 280
 Fylfot, in heraldry, 493

 G.
 G. (Edinburgh) on baptism of a blackamoor, 198
 Capital punishments, 402
 Charters of Holyrood, 448
 Cold Harbour: herbergh, 303
 Hymnology, 250
 Mary, Queen of Scots, four Maries, 166
 Mon and man, 469
 Ramsay (Sir Andrew), 171
 Sobriquets of regiments, 251
 G. (A.) on Charles Povey's will, 313
 "The Tickler," &c., 44
 Gaelic Grammar required, 75, 144, 308, 345
 Gallows inscription in Scotland, 439, 500
 Game cocks, writers on, 386
 Gamma on English soldiers at the battle of Leipzig, 43
 "Plain Sermons," their authors, 56
 Scarlett family, 43
 Gantlope: "To run the Gantlope," derivation, 374, 428
 Garbett (E. L.) on shelves in Wiltshire, 330
 Garrick (David) and Dr. Hill, 55; book-plate, 359; opera, "The Fairies," 173; song, "Hearts of Oak," 42
 Garstin (J. R.) on Bishop Casey, 467

- Garter, hereditary knights of the, 492
 Garter, Ladies of the Order of the, 11, 105
 Gas, origin of the word, 111
 Gaspey (Wm.) on poem, "In the Times," 153
 Gatty (Dr. Alfred) on an old rapier, 265
 Gatty (Margaret) on Manzoni's Ode and Lord Derby, 353
 Gavalkind in Kent, 324
 G. (C. H.) on Upcott's revision of Shakspeare, 139
 Gems and precious stones, 509
 German drama, 419
 German hymnologists, 311
 Gerundio (Fray), MS. of his "Historia," 439
 G. (G.) on the "European," 134
 Greek church, 134
 Mungo, origin of the name, 135
 Ghazee described, 476
 Ghost stories, 366, 371
 G. (H. S.) on Lord Aston of Forfar, 475
 Confirmation of arms, 124
 Foster family arms, 476
 Worcestershire families, 478
 Gibbon (Edward), heraldic error in his "Autobiography," 417, 483
 Gibbons (Grinling), his carving, 220
 Gibson (Liverpool) on cannel coal, 485
 Words used in different senses, 425
 Gibson (James) on Jacobite song, 161
 "The Tartan Plaidie," 54
 Gifford (Henry) of Burstal, epitaph, 129
 G. (J.) on marriage customs, 477
 G. (J. A.) on Dryden's "Sir Martin Mar-All," 436
 "Take my cap," 44
 G. (J. B.) on curiosities of the coinage, 34
 Church desecration, 153
 Scott (Sir Walter) at Melrose Abbey, 156
 Gladys, Gwladys, its meaning, 100, 170
 Glass, Flemish stained, in England, 165, 291
 Glass (J. S.) on "That's the cheese," 465
 Glibby = slippery, 239, 308
 Glover (Sir Thomas), noticed, 75
 Glwysig on the bell of St. Ceneu, 297
 Price (Mary), 259
 Uriconium, or Wroxeter, 349
 Williams family, 281
 Godfrey's cordial, its origin, 457
 Godson (Antoine), "Psalms," 67
 Goldsmith (Lewis), "Secret History of the Cabinet of Bonaparte," 136
 Goldsmith (Oliver), residence on Breakneck Steps, 234; pamphlet on the Cock Lane Ghost, 371
 Goldsmiths' Hall, solicitor at, 189
 Goldthorp (A.) on hog feast, 364
 Golgotha, its site, 293
 Gonzagas of Mantua, best history, 495
 Gonzales de Andia, a Knight of the Garter, 492
 Goodrich families in Lincolnshire, 134, 209, 346
 Goodwyn (Henry), arithmetician, 55, 114, 167, 289
 Gooch (Col.), regiment "The Americans," 279
 Goose, shoeing the, 457
 Goosenargh, its twenty-four sworn men, 75, 211
 Gordon (Dr. J. F. S.) on a Scotch Monasticon, 298
 Gordon-Jerningham (R. W. Arthur) on cockades, 54
 Goulard (Le Sieur), Apothegms, 376
 Great Doods at Reigate, 439
 Greek church, its relation with the Roman and English, 134, 190, 202, 247, 321
 Greek drama: Ezechiel's "Exagoge," 14
 Greek epigram, 398, 470
 Greenhow (Mr.), noticed, 396
 Grosley (Peter John), "Londres," 299
 Grosvenor (John), M.D., anecdote, 119
 Grotesque, early use of the term, 132
 Grotto of the Nativity, 19
 G. (T.) on Grace Macaulay, 46
 Guildford family, 65
 Guiling, a provincialism, 10
 Gunn (C. H.) on letters of John De Witt, 255
 Gunpowder, its inventor, 34
- ## H.
- H. (A.) on cracche, or stable, 82
 Haberdashers' Hall, composition at, 42, 189
 Hackney horses, early notice, 55, 405
 Hæver, Aever, or Eaver, its etymology, 258, 310
 Hagbush Lane, Islington, 13, 81
 Hahn (Dr. J. C.) on the origin of Cold Harbour, 253
 Hailstone (Edward) on sobriquets of regiments, 120
 Hale (Sir Matthew), biographical notices, 88
 Hall (Bp. Joseph), "Balm of Gilead," 340
 Hall (Mr.) of the Swan Brewery, Oxford, 119
 Hall (Spencer) on the Caistor whip, 354
 Hamilton (James) on unpublished epigrams, 147
 Hamilton (Abp. John), gallows inscription, 439, 500
 Hamilton (Walter), his biography, 55
 Hammensis (Bishop Gilbert), 301
 Handel festival, 370, 490
 Harborough, Market, origin of the name, 441
 Hard tack, or French bread, 134
 Hardres (Sir Richard), bart., his death, 476
 Harlaw battle, a ballad, 393, 489
 Harman (Adm. Sir John) and his wife, 298
 Harold II., King of England, posterity, 406
 Harvey (Gabriel) and Spenser, 354; his Common-Place Book, 355
 Harris (Miss), "From Oxford to Rome," 339, 369
 Harrison family, 34
 Harrison (Fred.) on Harrison family, 34
 Harrison (Mr.), his trial, 46
 Hart (Wm. Henry) on Southwark old inns, 41
 Hartlib (Nan) and Clodius, 398, 449
 Hartlib (Samuel), biography, 232
 Hastings, old house at, 199, 270
 Hatton (Lady Cecilia), noticed, 7
 "Haunch of Venison," a poem, 66, 122
 Havelock (Wm.) of the 14th Light Dragoons, 476
 Havercake lads, the 33rd regiment, 120, 183
 Haviland (Capt.), work on "Cavalry," 440
 Hawke and Bladen families, 258, 326
 Hay family of Errol, 84, 191
 Hay (Father Richard Augustine), 58
 Hazlitt (W. C.) on "Alceste and Eliza," 322
 "Description of Love," 338
 Fly-leaf notes, 396
 Fuller (Thomas), unpublished epigrams, 352
 Harvey (Gabriel) and Spenser, 354
 Harvey (Gabriel) Common-Place Book, 355
 Heydon (Sir Christopher), inedited work, 416
 "Maestas Intemerata," 323
 Maywood (R. C.), letter, 396
 Mussus's "Hero and Leander," 435

- Hazlitt (W. C.) on Ramsay (Allen), inscription to Dr. Robinson, 355
 Rankins (Wm.), "Conceits of Hell," 400
 Tabourot and Le Sieur Goulard, 376
 Taylor (John), the water-poet, 375
 Waller (Edmund), the poet, 435
 Whetstone's "Censure of a Loyall Subject," 417
 H. (E.) on Bear's Den Hall, 466
 Satirist periodical, 289
 Heath (Fred.), engraver of the postage stamps, 257
 Heath (Henry), a Roman Catholic priest, 479
 "Heavy friends," an old saying, 112
 Heber (Bp.), lines sent to Lord Ebrington, 278
 Hengist and Horsa, their historical existence, 10, 64
 Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I., letter, 129
 Heraud (J. A.) on a new Shakspeare emendation, 360
 Heraldry an accessory to history, 199; accessory to eminence, 339
 Heraldry, Historical and Popular, 26
 Heraldry, symbolization of colours in, 64, 102, 159, 191, 250
 Herbergare, its meaning, 375, 448
 Herbergh, its meaning, 303
 Hercules on Dante's "Divine Comedy," 254, 305, 362
 Hereford, chained library of All Saints, 355
 Herefordshire local names, 45, 101, 163
 Hermentrude on Bull of Clement VI., 418
 Charges against Hubert de Burgh, 430
 Computations of regnal years, 478
 Hog's Prayer, 114
 Isabel of Gloucester and Hubert de Burgh, 104
 Notes from the Issue Rolls, 471, 492
 Philippines, 104
 Tyler's Life of Henry of Monmouth, 400
 William, son of King Stephen, 201
 William, Earl of Ulster, 478
 Heron (Richard), works, 133
 Hesperia, its derivation, 131
 H. (E. V.), Derby, on comets, 10
 Hewer (Wm.), letter on the naval victory of 1665, 336, 427
 Hewitt (J. A.) on coronets, 427
 Jack stones, 426
 Mistletoe, 426
 Posterity of King Harold, 406
 Heydon (Sir Christopher), inedited work, 416
 H. (F. C.) on adverbs improperly used, 406
 Babylon, Belshazzar, its king, 61
 Bar. in boy's games, 229
 Bell inscription, 290
 "Bis dat qui cito dat," 310
 Caraboo (the Princess), 269
 Chevisaunce, 189
 Davison's case, 80
 Death caused by drinking cold water, 307
 Dickey, Donkey, Neddy, 66
 Duke of Brunswick's "Fifty Reasons," 121, 468
 "From Oxford to Rome," 369
 Gleanings from Ausonius, 208, 347
 Goodrich families, 209
 Greek church, 190, 247
 Greek drama: Ezzechiell's Exagoge, 14
 Haver, Aevec, or Eaver, 310
 Inscription on the cross, 143
 Irish song, 84
 Jacobite song, 121
 H. (F. C.) on Judas overturning the salt-cellar, 348
 Maismore in Gloucestershire, 67
 Maxim in canon law, 328
 Nosles to a bearsse, 369
 Pontifical rings, 210
 Proverbs, three parallel, 369
 Quotations wanted, 348
 Recipe sign, 229
 St. Agnes and her lamb, 465
 St. Augustine and the Blessed Trinity, 499
 St. Sarik, 103
 Schorne (Master John), 413
 Scott (Sir Walter) and Melrose Abbey, 211
 Seal of the Provost of St. Quiricus, 150
 Street melody: "Young lambs to sell," 186
 Supersedeas, 308
 Synagogue of the Libertines, 505
 Tempest (Lady), her jury 224
 Traditions of an antecedent world, 211
 Umbrellas: Pattens, 66
 Valentinea, their origin, 290
 "Vicar and Moses," 189
 Voltaire's last moments, 284
 Yew trees called palms, 211
 H. (G.) of S. on "Cling," as used by Shakspeare, 175
 "Still waters run deep," 156
 Weasley (John), original portraits, 256
 Hibernicus on Sir Andrew Ramsay, 123
 Hiffernan (Paul) and "The Tickler," 44
 Higden (Ranulph), "Polychronicon," 271
 High Commission Court, 172
 Hill (Miss Elizabeth), her family, 50
 Hill (Sir John), M.D., and David Garrick, 55
 Hill (Lawrence), noticed, 50
 Hills (R. H.) on spur money in belfries, 446
 Hilpa and Shallum, a legend, 37
 Hingham boxes, meaning of the saying, 442, 488
 Historicus on origin of Coronets, 54
 Majesty, as applied to English kings, 37
 Historiographer Royal, 323
 History, curiosities of, 124
 H. (J. H.) on James Mabbie's Sermons, 379
 H. (J. O.) on registers of St. Andrew, Woodthorpe, 95
 H. (L.) on knights bachelors, 76
 Hoare (E. N.) on Uriconium, or Wroxeter, 349
 Hodgkin (J. E.) on batler, a mangle, 397
 Mum, a beverage, 163
 Hog feast in Huntingdonshire, 295, 364, 429, 505
 Hog's prayer used by Kentish boys, 114, 427, 467
 Hogarth (Wm.), etchings, 53
 Hoity-toity, origin of the phrase, 417
 Hold-forth, origin of the phrase, 239
 Holland (Thomas), a Roman Catholic priest, 479
 Hollands, a beverage, 41
 Holles (Gervase), genealogical collections, 356, 389, 407, 450
 Holroyd (Abraham) on Mrs. Crowther, 231
 Holyrood, the charters of, 375, 448
 Holy-water sprinkle, a weapon, 200, 265
 Homer, translations of, 32, 174
 Hoods at St. Bees, 85
 Hool-cheese described, 377
 Hoole (Elijah), D.D., on origin of infirmaries, 504
 Hopkins (Matthew), the witch-finder, 242
 Horkey, its derivation, 166
 Horology, works on, 421

- Horse: Grace, their derivation, 419, 482
 Horses, docking, 185, 289, 369
 Horses frightened at the sight of a camel, 446
 Horsley (T. W.) on phonetic headtones, 180
 Horsleydown, St. John's, tombstone inscriptions, 11
 Horton (W. I. S.) on "Joannes ad oppositum," 114
 Morocco, a beverage, 288
 Hospitals for the sick, their antiquity, 12
 Howard (J. J.) on Abp. Abbot's seals, 179
 Howden (Lord) on hereditary Knights of the Garter, 492
 Howell (James), "Familiar Letters," 116, 179
 Howlett (W. E.) on Waterhouse of Kirtou, 268
 Hoyle family, 270, 487
 Hoyle (Edmund), writer on whist, 153, 277, 270
 H. (S. H.) on cannel coal, 485
 Hubert de Burgh and Isabel of Gloucester, 104
 Hudibrastic couplet, 444
 Hughes (John) on adulation of Buonaparte, 228
 Cookery: "Au Bleu," 289
 Maesmore, maismore, 122
 Viel-Liebchen, or Philippine, 24
 Hughes (P. S.) on letters of Angelica Kauffman, 109
 Stick = stick, a piece, 290
 Willoughby (Lord), 165
 Hume (David), his family, 197
 Humiliati, a suppressed religious order, 150
 Humphrey (Wm.) on French and Scottish languages, 458
 "Hundred Merry Tales," an early edition discovered, 48, 51
 Hunger, ancient specifics against, 178
 Hunt (Leigh), "Description of a Classical Washerwoman," 34, 250, 428
 Hunterian Society, blunder respecting, 296
 Huntingdon sturgeon, 325
 Huntington (Wm.), S. S., satire on, 223, 289
 Husk (W. H.) on curious anachronism, 73
 Chorister actors, 173
 "Irish Tutor," and Tyrone Power, 99
 "Malbrough," a ballad, 261
 Saxon typography, 65
 Scott's "Ivanhoe," 329
 Hutchinson (P.) on assumption of arms, 380
 Bell of St. Ceneu, 365
 Carey family, 310
 Le Poer family, 446
 March (Mortimer, Earl of), 95
 Roman tesserae, 231
 St. Magnus, Orkney, 280
 Savanah, old engraving of the city, 128
 Tyler's Life of Henry of Monmouth, 400
 Hymnology, 179, 180, 250
 Hymns, anonymous, 439, 487
 Hymns, early metrical version, 357
 Hymns in the Book of Common Prayer, 357
 Hypocaust at Slack, 396
- I.
- "I give you joy!" a civic etiquette, 135
 Igeler Säule, sculptures, 220, 344
 Inchmacrome Priory, 69
 Index, a general literary, 373, 455
 Infant mortality, or infantile mortality, 459
- Infantry in line, originator, 154, 228
 Infirmarys, origin in England, 176, 504
 Influenza, origin of the word, 459, 506
 Ingledew (C. J. D.) on Bed Lion inns in Yorkshire, 306
 Song, "Young Johnson," 154
 Inns, old, of Holborn, Aldgate, and Bishopsgate, 240
 "In the Times," a poem, 153, 269
 Invoice of a slave cargo, 1803, 72, 162
 Iona on restoration of ancient buildings, 47
 I. (R.) on American dramatists, 438.
 Bibliographical queries, 133, 179, 219
 Braun (George Christian), 418
 Bunyan dramatised, 458
 Dyason (Wm.), American poet, 79
 Foreign dramatic bibliography, 399
 German drama, 419
 Hymns, anonymous, 439
 "Joseph and his Brethren," a drama, 495
 "Melanthe," its performers, 401
 "Metropolitan Quarterly Magazine," 477
 Ritchie (John), 420
 Schwab (Gustavus), Memoir, 400
 Swedish authors, 56
 Wallace (J.), "Shakspearian Sketches," 441
 Ireland: "Bibliotheca Hibernica," 52
 Ireland not shown to our Saviour on the Mount, 299, 342
 Ireland (John), M.D., anecdote, 119
 Irish books printed at home and abroad, 414, 468
 Irish family history, 146
 Irish parliament, death of the last member, 474
 Irish parliamentary representation, 375
 Irish poor law in the 17th century, 10, 445
 Irish song: "There's the childer stark naked," 10
 Iron crown of Italy, 223
 Irvine (Aiken) on Bp. Bedell's grant of houses, 398
 Bull against mendicant friars, 402
 Cusha: Cuisbeag, 338
 Dallas, &c., 338
 Provincial Synod of Dublin, 1862, 420
 Sheriffs of Dublin excommunicated, 400
 Trinity College, Dublin, 441
 Transmutation of metals, 201
 Walker (Obadiah), printing-press, 182
 Irving (George Vere) on barley, an exclamation, 485
 Cannel coal, 485
 Cromwell's Ironsides, 120
 Hengist and Horsa, 64
 Louis XIV., his pretended son, 79
 Scottish historical gossip, 3
 Shelves in Wiltshire, 301, 362, 463
 Sydsel (Bishop Thomas), 145
 Isabel, abbess of Amesbury or Acornbury, 75
 Isabel, Countess of Gloucester, 104
 Issue Rolls, notes from, 471, 492
 Itchener (Rev. Geo.), date of his death, 440
 Itchener (Wm.), D.D., his death, 459
 "Ivanhoe," dramatised in England and France, 329
- J.
- J. on curious names, 124
 Gladys, 170
 Hagbush Lane, 13
 Veronica, its pronunciation, 135

Knights, marriages of, 322
 Knight (Miss), "Rasselas," entitled Dinabas, 504
 Knight (Thomas), epitaph, 443
 Knowles (Herbert), noticed, 430
 Knox (Alex.), inedited letters, 323, 366
 Konx Ompax, origin of the name, 424, 469
 Kyrton (Thomas), epitaph, 443

L.

"Laced mutton," allusions to the term, 132
 Lacedemonians, the 46th regiment, 390
 "Lady of the Haystack," 333
 Lady-birds, rent charge for their destruction, 399
 Laet (Gaspar), jun., "Almanac for 1530," 55
 Lælius on Eusebins and Dr. Cureton, 110
 Gladys: Gwladys, 100
 Fortescue family, 387
 Heraldic colours, 102
 Julius Cæsar and Britain, 322
 Lang-nebbed things, 404
 Mungo as a Christian name, 248
 Pew rents of early times, 103
 La Fretillen, or Mademoiselle de Schonau, 333
 Lake (Sir Thomas), noticed, 116
 Lamb (Charles), illustrative notes suggested to his Works, 46
 Lambeth Street magistrates, 167
 Lamont (C. D.) on invoice of cargo, 72
 Lamprey, a fish, 237, 265
 Lanarkshire described and delineated, 86
 Lancashire, its old timber halls, 76, 144, 248
 Lancashire Ballads and Songs, 509
 Lancastriensis on tump and toft, 163
 Landor (W. S.), epigrams, 419
 Langley Marsh church, puritan pew, 155
 "Lang-nebbed things," 334, 403
 Laodiceans, the Epistle to the, 397
 Lapis, search for it in 1865, 454
 "La Planta," ballad of the battle of, 107
 "Lapsus Lingue," its editor, 179
 Larkins (W. G.) on York Buildings fire-engine, 137
 Latibury (Rev. Thomas), his death, 146
 Lather, a provincialism, 137
 Lathy (T. P.), "The Angler, a poem," 17
 Latin names of towns, works on, 156
 Latin pronunciation at Edinburgh, 34
 Latin puzzles, 84, 145, 209
 Laud (Abp.), burial-place 146
 Lavier (Wolfgang), his coin, 132
 Lavington burnt in 1598, 293
 Lawrence family, 377
 Lawson (Rev. John), B.D., rector of Swanscombe, 271
 Laystone Abbey, drawings of, 356
 L. (G. A.) on Cuddy, &c., 165
 L. (E.) on Cromwell: Palinurus, 156
 Lee (General), letter, 219
 Lee (Principal), manuscripts, 356
 Lee (Wm.) on Daniel Defoe's political writings, 58, 244, 343, 431
 Distant light and smoke, 206
 Godfrey's cordial, its origin, 457
 Horses frightened at a camel, 446
 Infirmaries in England, origin, 176
 Lines on Dickens and Thackeray, 484

Lee (Wm.) on Philalethes, a pseudonym, 448
 Storm of 1703, 302
 Leeds dialect, 277
 Legitimation after subsequent marriage, 213, 328
 Leicester (Earl of), progress in Holland, 14, 102
 Leighton (Abp. Robert), residences, 33, 104
 Leipsic, English soldiers at the battle of, 43, 142, 189
 Le Jeune (Mr.), picture, the Release of the Captives from Exodus, 200
 Lemosmary, a bell inscription, 219, 290
 Leo (F. A.) on a passage in Othello, 453
 Paiock, in Hamlet, 51
 Le Poer family, 377, 446
 Leslie (Peter), sketch by him, 155
 Leveridge (Richard), composer, 31
 Lewis, a contrivance for raising stones, 421
 Leyson (Thos.), M.D., "Venustum Poema," 35
 L. (H. J.) on passage in "Much Ado about Nothing," 176
 "Liber Famelicus," meaning of the title, 459
 Libertines, synagogue of, 460, 505
 Libraries and their founders, 145
 Libraries chained in parish vestries, 355, 445
 Light and smoke, evidences of distant, 206, 325
 "Lillibullero," meaning of its burden, 475
 Lilly (Joseph) on "Melantha," 425
 Limehouse, its derivation, 35, 121, 190, 489
 Lincoln (Abraham), his poetic prose, 297
 Lincolnshire dialogue, 31
 Lindensis on Barley, an exclamation, 162
 Lindwood (Bp. William), arms, 134, 267, 309, 331, 429, 466
 Lion and Sun, Order of, 25
 Littledale (C. R.) on circumstantial evidence, 45
 L. (J.) Dublin, on Cuissha: Cuisheag, 409
 Irish books and manuscripts, 468
 Mummy in College of Surgeons, 42
 L. (J. H.) on Irish song, 84
 Llallawg on Richard Allestree, 328
 Baskett (Mr.), 9
 Chaplin (Dr.) and "The Whole Duty of Man," 57
 Ferne (Bp.) and Lord Capel, 261
 Free's Essay on the English Tongue, 420
 Williams (William), 329
 Woodhead (Abraham), portrait, 142
 Llaman family, 96
 Llandaff Cathedral, old text on the organ, 180
 Lloyd (Charles), a claimant of Junius's Letters, 296
 Lloyd (Rev. Dr. Charles), noticed, 46, 123
 Lloyd (George) on anonymous work, 199
 Roman hypocaut at Slack, 396
 Tavern sign, Prov. xii. 10, 378
 Lobeck's "Aglapharnus," notices of, 259, 305
 Lockhart (John Gibson), anecdote, 4
 London, new works on, 105
 Loftus (Abp.), speeches, 441, 470
 Longevity, remarkable cases, 32, 150, 154, 180, 472, 503
 Longueville (Duke of), his arms, 164
 Lope de Vega and Cervantes, 413; passage in, 167, 246
 Losse (Sir Hugh), noticed, 116
 Louis XIV., author of a "Vie de César," 238
 Louis XVI., his pretended son, 39, 79
 "Loungeur," list of contributors, 212
 Lovat (Simon, Lord), "Memoirs," 35

- Lower (Mark Antony) on trifles in England, 167
 L. (R. C.) on "As drunk as Davy's sow," 243
 Chap, 426
 Love (Christopher), quotation, 308
 Marriage rings, 12, 307
 Pagan caricature, 243
 Quotation, 329
 "Sermons to Asses," 479
 L. (R. W. E.) on Addison family, 260
 Trevor (Lady Elizabeth), 182
 Lucronium, i. e. Logroño, 12
 Lunatic literature, 120, 183, 489
 Lynchets, or shelves, 241, 301, 330, 362
 Lyndsay (Sir David) and James V., 78, 466
 "Lyra Apostolica," its contributors, 192
 Lyttelton (Lord) on adverbs improperly used, 225
 Clent hills, 365
 Cold Harbour, 303
 Greek Church, 190
 Irish poor law in last century, 10
 Milton and his illustrator, 209
 "Solution of Continuity," 42
 Tithe barns, 163
- M.
- M. on lines on Caraboo, 447
 Mabbie (James), "Sermons upon the Gospels," 379
 Macaulay (Grace), some particulars, 46, 64
 Macaulay (T. B. Lord), ancestry, 154
 M'Diarmid (Angus), "Description of the Beauties of Edinample," 43, 305
 M'C. (E.) on dragons and crocodiles, 159
 Piscis lotans, 468
 M'Henry (James), M.D., 133
 Macheren (Philip Van), picture by him, 135, 268
 Machiavelli (Nicolo), satirical engraving, 124, 308
 Mackenzie (Sir George), Viscount Tarbutt and Earl of Cromarty, 78
 Mackenzie (Laurence) on epigrams from Ausonius, 147
 Maclean (John) on Simon De Charnes, 190
 Arundel family of Lanherne, 249
 Casey (Wm.), Bishop of Killaloe, 466
 O'Connors of Kerry, 364
 Sobriquets of regiments, 363
 M'Michael (T. C.) on "O listen, man!" 120
 M'Niven (A.) on Venus de Medici, 58
 Macray (John) on Auvergne priory, 231
 English actors in France, 335
 Flemish stained glass in England, 291
 Junius and Charles Lloyd, 296
 Key to the Chaldee Manuscript, 469
 Solution of continuity, 123, 310
 Street melody, 24
 Voltaire's last hours, 388
 Macray (W. D.) on Englishmen buried abroad, 129, 442
 Westminster great bell, 457
 Mahogany, a Cornish beverage, 280
 Maitland (S. R.), D.D., "Erwin," 116
 Majesty, origin of the title given to English sovereigns, 37
 Malagon y Valenzuela (Espinosa), his play, 206
 Malet (Gen. de), portrait, 439
 Malplaquet battle, 261, 348
 Mandeville (Bernard), "Fable of the Bees" quoted, 352
 Mandrake and its properties, 27
 Manetho, his history, 356, 389, 410, 428, 464
 Manzoni's Ode and Lord Derby, 353
 March 4 and the American Presidency, 197, 290
 March (Mortimer, Earl of), motto, 95
 Marcolphus inquired after, 477
 Margate corporation, its mace, 123
 Marie Antoinette's letters a forgery, 416
 Marigny (Enguerrand de) and Montfaucon, 29
 Mariolatry of Rome, 20
 Markland (James Heywood), D.C.L., his death, 27
 Marlborough, ballad "Histoire de Marlborough," 127, 261, 348
 Marlborough (John Churchill, 1st Duke of), his mother 168
 Marlborough (Sarah, Duchess of), epigrams addressed to her, 323
 Marmion (Edmund), of Eynesbury, 46
 Marquery, a vegetable, 32
 Marriage customs, 477
 Marriage rings, their metal, 12, 307, 350, 387
 Marrying day in Scotland, 493
 Marshall (E.) on "Joannes ad oppositum," 187
 Readers in the English Church, 186
 Marshall (G. W.) on assumption of arms, 469
 Marston (John), satire on James I., 38
 Marten (Henry), regicide, arms, 114, 389, 488
 Martinoff, comic actor, and the Emperor of Russia, 92
 Martyn (Bendall), Sec. to the Board of Excise, 180
 Martyn (Henry), writer in the "Spectator," 180
 Mary Beatrice, wife of James II., epitaph, 130
 Mary Queen of Scots, bower or garden, 69, 166, 251; her Missal, 70
 Mary, the Blessed Virgin, hymn to, 11, 85, 122; history of Mariolatry, 20
 Masham (Lady), portrait, 95
 Mason (Samuel), arms and epitaph, 95
 Massachusetts on the "Simple Cobbler," 298, 299
 Masson (Gustave) on Montfaucon and Enguerrand de Marigny, 29
 Palaeography: the "Ecole des Chartes," 214
 Massymor: Mazmorras, derivation, 66, 122
 Mastmaker explained, 25
 Matfelon (St. Mary), alias Whitechapel, 208
 Matsys (Quentin), his works, 40
 Matthew (Wm.) on derivation of Borwens, 418
 Maude (W.) on superstition or sympathy, 187
 May (Thomas), historian, 364
 May-day songs, 373, 425, 449
 Mayo family, 95
 Mayor (J. E. B.) on Sir Matthew Hale, 88
 Maywood (R. C.), letter to Wm. Hazlitt, 396
 M. (C.) on Conventual discipline in Middle Ages, 151
 M. (C. R.) on caricature, Sir Mitchell Bruce, 122
 Meat used in brewing, 73, 331
 Mecca, fabulous longevity at, 150
 Medal of 1601, 114
 Meeston (William), M.A., 179
 "Melanthe," a play, list of performers, 401, 425
 Meletes on boarding books, 138
 Arms of a conquered knight, 164
 Browne (Valentine), 340
 Bruce (Robert), his claims, 319
 Cary family, 117, 425
 Cousin as used by the crown, 83
 Cromwell (Oliver), portrait, 44

- Meletes on Hubert de Burgh, 385
 Juvenal, Sat. iii. ver. 238, 45
 Legal maxim, 241, 489
 Mollitious, 169
 Moutre, its derivation, 45
 My, its modern pronunciation, 164
 Newton and Voltaire, 83
 Phillips Earls of Pembroke, 486
 Quotation, "Boni iudicis," &c., 115
 Suffolk (Countess of), 269, 388
 "To object," a verb active, 469
 Voltaire's death-bed, 366
 William, son of King Stephen, 421
 Melford, Long, the Lady Chapel, 116
 Memoria technica, 420
 Mercer (Gen. Hugh), noticed, 40, 143, 350
 Mercers' Hospital, Dublin, Townsend's History, 399
 Metals, company formed for transmuting, 200, 424
 "Metropolitan Quarterly Magazine," 477
 Mewburn (F.) on taking up one's cross, 83
 Shelves in Wiltshire, 241
 M. (F.) on the Dauphin claimants, 80
 M. (F. H.) on religious statistics, 77
 Mickleton hooter, 40, 289
 Middleton (A. B.) on the Hudibrastic couplet, 444
 Works on Satan, &c., 266
 Millais family pedigree, 292
 Milton (John) and his illustrator, 150, 209, 499; baptism, 376; visited by Charles II. and his brother James, 35; arms and motto, 260, 460, 504; the Onslow portrait, 405
 Miniature, its derivation, 477
 Miniatures on ivory, 458
 "Mirrour of Knighthood," 143
 Misinformation for the people, 435
 Mist's Journal noticed, 59, 245, 246, 343
 Mistletoe, its derivation, 76, 157, 226, 326, 426
 M. (J.) Edinburgh, on P. Coltheart, "The Quacks Unmasked," 57
 Hill (Miss Elizabeth), family, 50
 Latin pronunciation at Edinburgh, 34
 Legitimation per subsequens matrimonium, 213
 More (George), "Principles for Yong Princes," 57
 Mylne family of Balfarg, 198
 Ogilvies of Banff and Findlater, 52
 Political satires, 241
 Ramsay (Sir Andrew), 62
 Scotch peers, A.D. 1713-14, 395
 M. (J. C.) on five miniatures, 479
 M. (L. H.) on shoeing the goose, 457
 Moisey (Dr.), actor, 267
 Molesworth (Coote), M.D., marriage and issue, 378
 Mollitious, its meaning, 169
 Molyneux (Wm.), monument, 417
 Monastic establishments, fate of the lesser, 94, 364
 Montfaucon (Bernard de) and Enguerrand de Marigny, 29
 Monuments, sepulchral, their restoration, 451
 Moody (H.) on history of the turf, 95
 Moore (Geo.) on coin of Philip I. of France, 76
 Moore (Thomas), Rev. John Parsons's lines on his Poems, 239
 More (George), "Principles for Yong Princes," 57
 More (Hannah), inedited letters, 323, 366
 Morocco, the name of a drink, 73, 268
 Murrell (Hugh), noticed, 200, 270
 Moses, his life dramatised, 14
 Mother-in-law explained, 480
 Mother Red Cap, Holloway, 14
 Mottoes, of the arms of Nova Scotia, 282; of the arms of Scotland, 282; Thodey and Rough families, 115
 Moulton (A.) on funeral plume of feathers, 495
 Moutre, its derivation, 45
 Mum, a strong sort of beer, 41, 101, 163
 Mummy at the College of Surgeons, Dublin, 42
 Mundungus, trashy tobacco, 480
 Mungo, a material, origin of the term, 135, 190, 248
 Muriel, a Christian name, 82
 Murray (James), "Sermon to Asses," &c., 479
 Murray (Lady Mary), works, 154
 Museums's "Hero and Leander," translated by J. Jones, 435
 Music of ancient nations, 47
 M. (W. A.) on the Ansareys, 358
 My, its modern pronunciation, 164, 265
 Mylne family of Balfarg, 198
 Mylne (Robert), architect, 177
- N.
- Names, fantastic, 124, 298, 322, 506
 Names, origin of, 374
 Nana Sahib, his ancestry, 476
 Nankeen, origin of the cotton, 474
 Napoleon (Emperor), "Life of Julius Caesar," 68
 Nassaris, a people of Syria, 358, 426
 Naubat, an Eastern honour, 68
 N. (C.) on dragon in Herefordshire, 210
 Libraries chained in vestries, 355
 Nelson (Lord), attack on the Boulogne flotilla, 198
 Nersès IV., patriarch of Armenia, 301
 Netherlands, division of, 155
 Nettles, proof of habitation, 460
 Newbery (A. B.) on "Vampyre," a tale, 201
 Newhaven (Lord), portrait, 495
 Newtonensis on the death of Edward VI., 401
 Newnham state sword, 493
 New Style anticipated, 440, 486
 Newton (Sir Isaac) and Voltaire, 83, 211
 Newton (John) on the longevity of Miss Billinge, 207
 "New Tory Guide," its authors, 241
 "New Whig Guide," its authors, 241
 N. (G. W.) on words used in different senses, 367
 Nibis, King of Egypt, 83
 Nicean Council, decree on Pagan relics, 114
 Nichols (J. G.) on sobriquets of regiments, 390
 Nicholson (B.) on Gantlope, Tattoo, their etymologies, 374
 James I. and Marston, 38
 Parallel passages in Shakspeare and Daniel, 337
 N. (J.) on Sir Saunders Duncombe, 133
 N. (J. G.) on Lord Camelford, inscription at Holling House, 131
 English beards, 151
 Holles's Church notes, 407
 "I give you joy!" a civic custom, 135
 Limehouse, origin of the name, 121
 Knights bachelors, 167
 Royal franking, 407
 Universal Accommodation Office, 11
 Noad family, 133

., a cry of joy, 445
 Nonconformist notes, 320
 Norgate (F.) on King's Lynn, 486
 North (Roger), verses by, 436
 Northumberland (John Dudley, Duke of), letter, 8, 99
 Northumberland House, Strand, its lion, 239
 Norwegian Grammar, 509
 Noe, a large one indicative of character, 421
 Noales to a hearse, 339, 369
 Nostradamus' prophecy respecting America, 477
 "Not proven," in Scottish law, 157
 Nova Scotia, motto of the arms, 382
 N. (T.) on a ballad, "Surat Warps," 432
 Milton and his illustrator, 150
 Toothache recipe, 433
 N. (T. C.) on Shakespeare family, 498
 Nursery rhyme: "The Queen of Hearts," 462
 Nutcrackers and the Resurrectionists, 50

O.

Oath of the Romans, 460
 Object, as a verb active, 469
 Objective and subjective, 474
 O'Connell (J. E.) on Coshering, 391
 Fenians, 358
 Gaelic Grammars, 144, 345
 Irish books printed at home and abroad, 414
 O'Connors of Kerry, history of the sept, 280, 364, 409
 "Oculum Sacerdotis," 298, 367
 Ogilvies of Banff and Findlater, 53
 O. (J.) on Belfast printing, 247
 Charles Povey's works, 270
 Omar Cheyam, astronomer, 11
 On. (J. M.) on Hackney horses, &c., 55
 Rasselas: Dinabab, 504
 Organ builders and their works, 390
 Organs, a pair of iron, 378
 Orkney, St. Magnus' Cathedral, drawings, 280
 Ormsend family, 149
 Osborne (Thomas), book catalogues, 324
 Ostrich feather badge, 440
 Oughton (Thomas), proctor, inquired after, 241
 Overall (W. H.) on Smithfield market, 463
 Overbury (Sir Thomas), embassy, 121
 Overston (Lord), purchaser of Mr. McCulloch's library, 68
 Owen (Hugh) on "The Lady of the Haystack," 333
 Oxford, Great Tom Bell, 379
 Oxford, Pembroke College, 5
 Oxford visited by the Parliamentarians, 222
 Oxfordensis on Congleton borough accounts, 109
 Metrical Sermon, 209
 Percy (Bp. Thomas), ancestry, 181
 "The Robber's Grave," 66

P.

P. Canonbury, on Sago and port wine, 478
 P. Dublin, on circumstantial evidence, 44 the dress of one temp. Elizabeth, 340
 P day, 31
 P day, an old wall, 357

Palaeography, its study in France, 214; Mani
 English students, 256
 Palestine exploration fund, 354
 Palinurus, noticed in the "Danelad," 156
 Palm Sunday, cakes on, 275
 Palmer (Herbert), burial-place, 11; "The Chri Paradoxes," 111
 Paoli (Gen.), residences in London, 35
 Paper, objections to white, 64, 349
 Papworth (Wyatt) on sash windows, 449
 Paramatta, a woollen fabric, 157
 Paris, its ancient remains, 29
 Park of artillery explained, 480
 Parry (Lady Anne) and the manor of Charlton, 211, 39
 Parsons (Rev. John), lines on Moore's Poema, 239
 Paschal Lamb, badge of the Queen's royal regiment, 5
 168, 251, 303
 Patten, its derivation, 66
 Pavy (Salathiel), a boy actor, 173
 Paxton (Sir Joseph) and the late Duke of Devonshire, 491
 Payler and Cary families, 259
 Payne (J. B.) on De Vaudin family, 180
 P. (C.) on Sir Thomas Burgh, 260
 P. (C. C.) on meat and malt: Morocco, 73
 P. (D.) on symbolization of heraldic colours, 159
 Peacock (Edward) on Gospel of St. Matthew by Barnabas, 332
 Guildford family, 65
 Ring motto: "God us ayde," 158
 Taylor (Thomas), his portrait, 221
 Traditions of an ancient world, 291
 Peacocke (Adjutant G.), the oldest military officer, 93
 Pearson (C. B.) on hymn to the Virgin, 85
 Pelham (Peter), the engraver, 400
 Pembroke (Mary de Valence, Countess of), 243
 Pembroke (Philip Herbert, Earl of), 5
 Pembroke (the two Philips, Earls of) death and burial,
 378, 407, 486
 Pembroke (William Herbert, Earl of), 5
 Pembroke College, Oxford, origin of the name, 5
 Pepys (Samuel), suppressed passages of his "Diary," 93,
 171, 271
 Percy (Bp. Thomas), his alliance with the house of Northumberland, 181, 287; song, "Oh! Nanny wilt thou gang with me," 179, 259
 Pereira family, 221, 386
 Perrot (C. H.) on Shakespeare's Works, 1800, 420
 Perry (James) and Cobbett, anecdote, 41
 Perth (James Drummond, Lord), epitaph, 131
 Petrified man, 42, 125
 Pews, puritan, 116, 155, 267, 387
 Pews and pew-rents, 103
 Pewterers' Company, estates, 155
 P. (H.) on Washington arms, 11
 Philip IV., King of the French, gold coin, 76, 169
 Philippines, or Viel-Liebehien, 24, 104, 228
 Philipps (Sir Thomas) on stamp on the cross of bread,
 &c., 108
 Phillips (Rev. George), ancestry, 365
 Phillips (Jos.), jun., on Robert Brown, 67
 Curll's poetry, 74
 Phillips (J. P.) on quotations from Rogers's Italy, 348
 Song, "The Widow M'Gra," 187
 Phillips (J. R.) on Welsh parallels for Cornish proverbs, 304

- Phillips (J. R.) on Swinburne (Henry), &c., 496
 Phillott (F.) on case of reanimation, 178
 Cæsar a grammarian, 257
 Holy-water sprinkle, 200
 Strawberry preachers, 198
 Supersedeas, 242
 Third plague of Egypt, 365
 Philologus on Johnsoniana, 6, 33
 Phonetic headstones, 180
 Physicians' fees, 267
 Pifferari in Rome, 19
 Pighe (Albert), two epitaphs upon him, 141
 Pinkerton (Wm.) on Blow's Belfast Bible, 194
 Fisher's Garlands, 17
 Gallows inscription, 500
 Is it a fossil? 158
 Sarsfield (Gen.), descendant, 409
 Shelves in Wiltshire, 301, 422
 "Simple Cobbler's" references, 342
 Traditions of an antecedent world, 141
 Tyrconnel (the Countess of), 321
 Pinnock (Wm.), two of the name, 419, 449
 Piscis lotans, its meaning, 55, 124, 288, 384, 468
 P. (J. A.) on derivation of mistletoe, 157, 327
 Horse: Grace, 482
 Mary Billinge's longevity, 503
 P. (J. W.) on Muriel, a Christian name, 82
 Platt (Wm.) on "Don Quixote," 25, 73
 "Turning the tables," 7
 Plautus, passage in Rudens, Act IV. Sc. 4, l. 125, 474
 Playing-Cards, their history, 26
 P. (M.) on Robert Cranmer, 425
 Cooke (Edward), 476
 Poe (Edgar A.) and "The Fire Fiend," 61
 Poem with one vowel, 43
 Pole (Cardinal), portrait, 115
 Polès (Stéfan) on the last vol. of Voltaire's Works, 335
 Polidori (John W.), author of "The Vampyre," 201
 "Political Magazine," number of volumes, 301
 Pollard (W.) on Voltaire's last moments, 284
 Polygamy, its clerical advocates, 477
 Ponder's End, origin of the name, 476
 Pontifical rings, 135, 211
 Pontius Pilate's Body Guard, 49
 Pope (Alex.), passage in the Dunciad, canto iv., line 614, "Even Palinurus nodded at the helm," 156
 Popery, Catalogue of Tracts for and against, 212
 Portage (Thomas), epitaph, 443
 Portland (Richard Weston, first Earl of), descendants, 241
 Portugal, the Paschal Lamb in its arms, 5, 168, 251
 Portuguese families, 134, 230
 Postage stamps, engraver of the Queen's portrait, 257
 Post-Office money orders in America, 132
 Potter's Bar, origin of the name, 476
 Povey (Charles), life and works, 270; his will, 313
 Powell (Col. Thomas Sidney), noticed, 4
 Power, or Le Poer, family, 377, 446
 Power (John), on "Bibliotheca Hibernica," 52
 Church of England and Ireland, 161
 Power (Tyrone), theatrical parts, 100, 165
 Powlett manuscripts, 280
 P. (P.) on Barley, an exclamation, 84
 Confirmation of arms, 249
 Falstaff's spitting, 489
 Toasts, 501
 P. (P.) on "To pluck a crow," 104
 Words used in different senses, 387
 Praed (W. M.), Poems, 18
 Preston Oakhills, Hampshire, 115
 Prestonensis on Brest, a provincialism, 458
 Claret in 1729, 494
 Red Lion inns, 136
 Travelling Scotchmen, 420
 Prestwold register, lines from, 436
 Pretender: see Charles Edward Stuart.
 Pridden (Sarah), courtesan, 458
 Procurators in ecclesiastical courts, 324
 Prosser (R. B.) on distant light and smoke, 325
 Cannel coal, 418
 Igele Säule, 344
 Petrus de Alva et Astorga, 469
 Relick Sunday and Tenebræ office, 36
 Transmutation of metals, 424
 Voltaire's last moments, 284
 Protestant, origin of the word, 93
 Proverbs and Phrases:—
 Apple-pie order, 133, 209, 265
 Bailler aux Corneilles, 94
 Cap: "Take my cap," 44
 Cheese: "That's the cheese," 397, 465, 505
 Cleanliness next to godliness, 367
 Crow: "To pluck a crow," 104
 David's sow: "As drunk as David's sow," 243
 Gipsies: "As gipsies do stolen children," 239
 Hair of the dog that bit you, 276
 I give you joy! a civic etiquette, 135
 In two places at once like a bird, 459, 501
 Joannes ad oppositum, 114, 187
 Magna Charta will have no sovereign, 164
 Ninepence: "His noble has come down to ninepence," 219, 290, 346
 No man is hero to his valet-de-chambre, 150, 309, 364, 429
 Parallel proverbs, 337, 369
 Still waters run deep, 156, 270
 Thames: "He'll never set the Temes on fire," 239, 306
 Time of day, 136
 Tip me the traveller, 400
 Turning the tables, 7
 Welsh parallels for Cornish proverbs, 304
 When Adam dived and Eve span, 279, 331
 Whistling the Devil's music, 418
 Year and a day, 116, 186
 Prowett (C. G.) on the word Chap, 470
 Lord Derby's Iliad, 88
 Epigram of Plato and Aristophanes, 470
 Superstition, origin of the word, 487
 Pryce (George) on Caraboo, 310
 Pryce (Rev. R. Mostyn), author of "The Bobber's Grave," 66
 Psalmanazar (George), a reputed native of Formosa, 196
 P. (S. W.) on adverbs improperly used, 152
 Franklin (Benj.), London residences, 356
 Goodrich family, 346
 Hints to Atlas publishers, 375
 Phillips family, 365
 Sultans, its definition, 357
 Sun-dial designs, 200
 P. (S. W.) on works on bookbinding, 365

Punchknowle, bell inscription, 137
 Punishments, capital in Russia, 351; at Edinburgh, 402
 Purcell (Henry), "The Conjuror's Song," 30
 Purfitt (Edward) on shelves in Wiltshire, 330
 Puritan pews, 116, 155, 267, 387
 Purnell (Thomas) on the Caistor whip, 388
 Parveeur (Thomas), epitaph, 444
 P. (W.) on epigram against architects, 97
 Influenza, origin of the word, 459
 Nankeen, origin of the word, 474
 Nursery rhyme, 462
 P. (W. F.) on Dante: Hercules, 305

Q.

Q. (R. S.) on knights bachelors, 166
 Latin puzzle, 145
 Royal Standard and Union Jack, 136
 Quakers' disease, 163
 Queensberry (Duchess of), caricature, 6; poem on, 441
 "Queen's Message to the Commons," 494
 Queen's Gardens on Dighton's caricatures, 188
 Iron organs, a pair of, 378
 Lang-nebbd things, 403
 Querumania (Queen of), 268
 Quinton (J.) on Ben Adam's "Lennæ Rediviva," 445
 Quivis on Bentley's Harlequinade, 37

Quotations:—

A spirit above, and a spirit below, 153, 307
 Boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem, 115
 Cur moriatur homo, qui sumit de cinamomo, 240
 Favores ampliandi sunt, 489
 Immortal till his work is done, 280
 I never see a castle old, 56
 In the hour of trial, 56
 Mors mortis morti mortem, &c., 250
 O listen, man! 120
 O why wern't you cunning, 56, 187
 Ocean of Time! thy waters of deep woe, 56, 120
 Party is the madness of many, 126
 Perfervidum ingenium Scotorum, 11, 102
 Retribution in a human hand is havoc, 280
 Sometimes the young forget the lesson, &c., 280
 Step from the sublime to the ridiculous, 280, 366
 The sun slept on his clouds, 280, 348
 Wattle vocat, cui Thoma venit, &c., 221, 285, 366
 When just as the clock on the turret struck one, 56
 When old Adam first was created, 171
 With all his conscience and one eye askew, 56
 Quotations, Hand Book of, 26

R.

R., medical symbol, its meaning, 94, 168, 229
 Radcliffe family arms, 43
 Raeburn (Sir Henry), artist, 457
 Ragusa, governor in 1773, 180, 265, 310, 368
 Rainolds (Dr. John), confession of faith, 73
 Raleigh (Sir Walter), arms, 100
 Ralston (John), artist, 44
 Ramsay, its etymology, 288

Ramsay (Allan), lines to Dr. Robinson, 355
 Ramsay (Sir Andrew), noticed, 62, 123, 171
 Rankin (Geo.) on Christmas customs, 23
 Rankins (Wm.), "Conceits of Hell," 400
 Rapier, an old one, 265
 R. (C. J.) on biographical queries, 240
 Certificate relative to royal touch, 93
 Dudley family, 309
 Edgar and Elfrida, 74
 Fortescue (Sir Thomas), Knt., 94
 Isabel, abbess of Amesbury, 75
 Marriages of knights, 322
 Paln Sunday cakes, 275
 Payler and Cary families, 259
 Religious houses, dissolution of, 94
 Shakspeare family, 151
 Reader, an ecclesiastical officer, 109, 186
 Reading, St. Lawrence's great bell, 89, 169, 271
 Reading pointer stolen, 241
 Reanimation after execution, 178
 Rebellion of 1745, a relic of, 435
 Recipes in old manuscripts, 353
 Red Club, Oxford, 470, 488
 Redmond (S.), on Bishop Bedell, 449
 Cooshering, 450
 Clint, or Clent, 389
 Dublin Comet newspaper, 399
 Exodus of the Israelites, 464
 Irish song, 385
 In two places at once like a bird, 501
 Judas overturning the salt, 501
 Marriage rings, 387
 Relic of 1745, 435
 Sarsfield (Gen.), descendant, 378, 446
 "That's the cheese," 465
 Travelling Scotchmen, 466
 Red Lion, an inn sign, 136, 183, 306
 Reformades, or volunteers, 282
 Reform Bill, who killed it? 434
 Regimental badges, 4, 168, 251, 363
 Regiments, sobriquets of, 49, 70, 120, 183, 390
 "Register of Noblemen since the Conquest," 115
 Relick Sunday, 36
 Religious statistics of sects, 77
 Reredos, its Latin equivalent, 36
 Reverend applied to clergymen, 121
 Reynolds (Sir Joshua), Life and Times, 291; surviving sitters, 495
 Rheged (Vryan) on lady-birds, 399
 Rhodocanakis (His Highness the Captain), on H.H. Prince Francis Rhodocanakis, 403
 Eudoxia Comnena, 506
 Rhodocanakis (H.H. Prince Francis), 267, 348, 403
 Richard Cœur de Lion, "Itinerarium," 171
 Richardson (John), noticed, 50
 Richardson (John) on Chalmers of Cultra, 34
 Riddell (Robert) of Glenriddell, fate of his library, 201
 Ridley (Bishop Nicholas), letter to Sir Wm. Cecil, 8
 Riggall (Edward) on Sherman's "White Salt," 177
 Ring, marriage, its metal, 12; King Solomon's, 12
 Ring motto: "God us ayde," 153, 251
 Rings, pontifical, 135; worn by bishops, 459
 Rimbault (Dr. E. F.) on Boston House, 82
 Bottle conjuror of 1749, 84
 Garrick's song, "Hearts of Oak," 42
 Godeau (Antoine), Psalms, 67

- Rimbault (Dr. E. F.) on Goldsmith's pamphlet on the Cock Lane Ghost, 371
Hartlib (Nan) and Clodius, 398
Mum, a strong beer, 41
Saxon typography, 65
Ritchie (John), noticed, 420
Rivers, origin of their names, 296
Rix (Joseph), M.D., on Thomas Barton, 46
Foxes or sheaves, 338
Lloyd (Rev. Dr. Charles), 46
Nibus, King of Egypt, 83
Power of franking, 350, 385
R. (J.) on Historiographer Royal, 323
Names and Mottoes, 115
R. (J. S.) on Victoria Cross decorations, 33
R. (L. C.) on Hymn to the Virgin, 122
Marten (Henry), the regicide, 389
R. (M. S.) on Duncanson family, 184
R. (N. M.) on Sir Andrew Ramsay, 123
Roads of the metropolis in 1692, 396
Roan, leather used in binding, etymology, 359
Robber's Grave, 125
Robert III., King of Scotland, legitimacy, 213
Roberts (E. J.) on dissenters' colleges, 157
Robertson (Lord), publication of his Poems, 4
Robinson (C. J.) on the Cary family, 204
Herefordshire queries, 101
Roche (Sir Boyle), memorable saying, 501
Rock basins noticed by Dr. Borlase, 48
Rockets in warfare, 142, 189, 247
Roffe (Alfred) on "The Conjuror's Song," 30
Roffe (Edwin) on art in Australia, 278
Blackfriars broken bridge, 177
Breakneck Steps, Old Bailey, 233
Hagbush Lane, 81
Moisey (Dr.), actor, 267
Street melody, 118
Rokeby (Matthew Robinson, Lord), 151
Roman Catholic dogma of Mariolatry, 20
Roman Catholic priests, five miniatures, 479
Roman Church, practices of the, 155
"Roman hand," its meaning, 338, 429, 467
Roman tesserae, 281, 332
Romans, the oath of the, 460
Romney (George), portrait of the Rev. John Wesley, 11, 166
Rope-tying, its antiquity, 6
Rosamond, Queen of the Lombards, legend, 136
Ross (Alex.), "Helenore, or Fortunate Shepherdess," 272
Ross (C.) on Bonnie Dundee, 465
Canning's anecdote of the Red Lion, 183
Longevity of Mrs. Hannah Brown, 180
Milton and his illustrator, 499
Rotunda Tabula at Walden, 108
Rough family motto, 115
Royal Standard and Union Jack, 136, 208
R. (S. Y.) on John and James Caleb Anderson, 153
Anne, Countess of Argyle, 258
Caraboo's maiden name, 269
Cotton (Rev. John Daniel), 459
Crochley (Rev. Richard John), 114
Douglas (Sir Robert), 223
Elsdale (Rev. Samuel), 240
Goodwyn of Blackheath, 114
Harden (Sir Richard), Bait., 476
R. (S. Y.) on Hay (Father Richard Augustine), 58
Itchenor (Rev. George), 440
Itchenor (William), D.D., 459
James (Richard) of the Cottonian library, 135
"Jonas Redux," by Jonas Anglicus, 95
Keir (Patrick), M.D., 10
Murray (Lady Marjory), 154
Oughton (Thomas), proctor, 241
Scott (Rev. James) of Perth, 223
Street (Rev. Stephen), 95
Street (Thomas George), 56
Tetlow (Richard John), 77
"Vicar and Moses," its author, 189
Ruddiman (Thomas) and John Drummond, M.D., 280
Rudolph II., arms on his thalers, 339, 384
Ruegg (R. H.) on Berkeley arms, 388
Russell (Fanny) and Frederick, Prince of Wales, 182
Russia, capital punishments in, 351
Russian deserters at the Crimea, 115
Rye (Rev. George), queries in his Sermon, 339
Rye (Walter) on arms of a conquered knight, 46
- S.
- Sabbatarians, or Seventh-day Baptists, 97
Sage (E. J.) on the Bladen family, 326
Sago and port wine for invalids, 478
St. Agnes and her lamb, legend, 402, 465
St. Andrew, Woodthorpe, London, registers, 95
St. Augustine and the mystery of the Trinity, 440, 499
St. Barbe family pedigree, 480
St. Barnabas' copy of St. Matthew's Gospel, 278, 332
St. Bartholomew's church and priory, Smithfield, 57
St. Catharine's wheel, 222
St. Ceneu, or Keyna, her bell, 297, 365
St. Donat's Castle, co. Glamorgan, 35
St. George and the Dragon in ancient paintings, 75, 158
St. George's Cross in heraldry, 200, 287
St. John (Percy B.) on Joseph Vien, artist, 281
Longevity, 472
St. Mary Matfelon, alias Whitechapel, 203
St. Mary Rouncival Hospital, Charing Cross, 252
St. Matthew's Gospel written by St. Barnabas, 278, 332
St. Ouen's Abbey at Rouen, its abbesses, 495
St. Peter's, Cornhill, rent charge for the destruction of lady-birds, 399
St. Quiricus at Asti, seal of the provost, 150
St. Sarik noticed by Leland, 35, 103
St. Swithin on cock's feather, 459
Hymns, anonymous, 487
"Il y a fagots et fagots," 495
Memoria Technica, 420
Mistletoe, its propagation, 226
Poem, "In the Times," 269
Quakers' disease, 163
St. Augustine and the Blessed Trinity, 500
Scott (Sir Walter) at Melrose, 230
Sundry proverbs, 419
"What's in a name?" 250
St. T. on Wm. Alexander, American poet, 163
Budd (Thomas), 168
Fall used for autumn, 179
Poe (Edgar A.) and "The Fire Friend," 61

- St. T. on Smith (R.), author of "A Wonder of Wonders," 155
 Stick, its obsolete meaning, 200
 St. Th. on American depreciation of currency, 286
 Author wanted, 439
 Barcroft (John), 328
 Bookbinding, 329
 Massachusetts stone, 286
 Sancroft (Abp.), his sisters, 289
 Savannah, 462
 St. Thomas's Hospital founded, 8, 9
 Salisbury (Sally), courtesan, 458, 491
 Salmon, its price in 1832, 322
 Salt (Henry), sale of his antiquities, 441
 Salt spilling alluded to by classic writers, 282, 348, 367, 385
 Sancroft (Abp.), his sisters, 289
 Sandes (Bp. Stephen C.), his seal, 376
 Sanderson (Bp. Robert), work on "Episcopacy," 496
 Sarsen stones, 43
 Sarsfield (Gen.), descendant, 378, 409, 446
 Sash windows, their origin, 449, 487, 508
 Satan and hell, works on, 144, 220, 266
 "Satirist, or Monthly Meteor," 223, 289
 Savannah, old engraving of the city, 128, 462
 Sawyer (Wm.) on a new Shakespeare emendation, 315, 452
 Saxon topography, 65
 Sayce (A.) on Horse: Grace, 482
 Sayings, incongruous, 150
 S. (B.) on Spencer's letter to R. B. Sheridan, 235
 S. (C.) on medal of 1601, 114
 Scarlett family, 43, 251, 465
 Scarth family descent, 417
 Schin on cock's feather, 507
 Lang-nebbed things, 405
 On an altar Ed, 428
 Palestine exploration fund, 354
 Sobriquets of regiments, 120
 School Calendar, 48
 Schorne (Master John), noticed, 413
 Schwab (Gustavus), Memoir, 400
 Scotch peers, A.D. 1713-14, 395
 Scotchmen, travelling, 420, 466
 Scotland, motto of the arms, 282; restoration of its ecclesiastical buildings, 47
 Scots, Society of Ancient, 341
 Scott (Rev. James) of Perth, his death, 223
 Scott (Sir Walter) at Melrose Abbey by moonlight, 156, 211, 230; "Ivanhoe," dramatised, 242; his mottoes, 243, 329; Scotch ballad, 460
 Scottish historical gossip, 3
 "Scottish Monasticon and Episcopal Chronicle," in preparation, 298
 S. (D.) on Samuel Hartlib, 449
 New style, 486
 S. (E.) on Bernardino, a poet, 9
 Hunt (Leigh), "Description of a Classical Washer-woman," 34
 Milton (John) and Charles II., 35
 Sea-serpent again, 178, 250
 Seal of the provost of St. Quiricus at Asti, 150
 Sebastopol, history of its defence, 86
 Secker (Rev. George), D.D., noticed, 157
 Sects, religious statistics of, 77
 Seds stercoraria, 102, 271
 S. (E. L.) on epigrams, 264, 375
 Homer, translations of, 32
 "Macbeth," passage in, 176
 "Malbrough," a ballad, 262
 Vallancey (General), 26
 Words used in different senses, 367
 Senescens on "Hymns Ancient and Modern," 179
 "Sentimental and Masonic Magazine," 298
 Sermon, a metrical one, 76, 143, 209, 308
 Sermons, anecdote on short, 339, 385
 Sermons, temp. the Civil War, in MS., 152
 Seventh-day Baptists, 97
 Sewell (S. C.), M.D., on Hengist and Horsa, 10
 Seymour (Robert), "Survey of London," &c., its authorship, 233, 235
 S. (F. M.) on John Anderson of Dumbarton, 97
 Anderson (Patrick), 202
 Duncanson family of Cantire, 96
 Fraser epitaphs, 34
 Lee (Principal), manuscripts, 356
 Macanlay (Lord), ancestry, 154
 Mackenzie, Earl of Cromarty, 78 "Memoirs of the Life of Lord Lovat," 35
 Mount Athos libraries, 199
 Newhaven (Lord), his portrait, 495
 Shaw family of Saughie and Greenock, 299
 Wodrow's Private Letters, 378
 Wyvil of Constable Burton, 257
 Shakespear (Arthur) on Shakspeare family, 175
 Shakspeare family in Wiltshire, 151; in Rope Walk, Shadwell, 175, 498
 Shakspeare (William), indenture of sale of a house in Blackfriars, 181; ode to, 357
 Shakspeare's Editors and Commentators, 332
 Plays, Upcott's revision of 1808 of the first folio, 139; Keightley's Shakspeare's Expositor, 175, 207; edition of 1800, 420
 Shakspeare and Samuel Daniel, parallel passages, 337
 •••
 Shaksperiana:—
 Antony and Cleopatra, Act V. Sc. 2: "And never palates more the dung," 395
 Hamlet, Act I. Sc. 1: "The sleaded pollax," 21; Act III. Sc. 2: "A very pioack," 51; Act V. Sc. 2: "He is fat and scant of breath," 52
 Julius Cæsar, Act II. Sc. 1: "For if thou path thy native semblance on," 315, 360, 452
 King Henry the Fourth, Pt. I. Act II. Sc. 1: "I am stung like a tench," 51; Part II. Act V. Sc. 3: "A dish of carraways," 316
 Macbeth, Act I. Sc. 5: "Blanket of the dark," 51, 176, 266, 316, 452; Act I. Sc. 2: "That do cling together," 175
 Much Ado about Nothing, Act V. Sc. 1: "And sorrow wag," 176
 Othello, Act I. Sc. 1: "A fellow almost damned in a fair wife," 453
 Pericles, Act III. Sc. 1: "The air-remaining lamps," 236, 316, 350
 Twelfth Night, Act II. Sc. 3: "Call me cut," 317
 Shaksperiana from 1564 to 1864, 332; sold with Isaac Reed's library, 297, 317
 Sharpset (Sam), inquired after, 155, 211
 Shaw family of Saughie and Greenock, 299
 Shaw (John B.) on "Watte vocat," &c., 366
 Shaw (Samuel) on dragon in Herefordshire, 211

Tolbooth, old use of the term, 132
 Tooth-ache recipe, 433
 Torchlight funeral at Westminster Abbey, 357
 Tottenham (H. L.) on Gen. Hugh Mercer, 350
 Irish parliamentary representation, 375
 Tournaments, the earliest, 39
 Town-Clerk's signature, 136, 191
 Towns, Latin names of, works on, 156
 Transmutation of metals, 454
 Tregelles (S. P.) on Civitas Lucronii, 12
 Golgotha, its site, 294
 Zion, its locality in early writers, 214, 384
 Trench (Francis) on complets, 398
 " No man a hero to his valet-de-chambre," 150, 364
 Romney's portraits of Wesley and Mrs. Tighe, 166
 Spencer (Earl), "Boccaccio," 355
 Trepolpen (P. W.) on "As gipsies do stolen children," 239
 Composition at Haberdashers' Hall, 42
 Hold-forth, origin of the phrase, 239
 Nolo episcopari, 42
 Solicitor at Goldsmiths' Hall, 189
 Très, the French comparative, 359
 Tretane on Arundell of Lanherne, 167
 Trevor (Lady Elizabeth), her daughter, 182
 Triads, the Welsh, authenticity, 138
 Trine benediction, 460
 Trinity College, Dublin, documents, 441, 470
 Truffles, where found in England, 167, 265
 T. (S.) on William Bridges, 120
 T. (T.) on Mayo families, 95
 Tuck (W.) on the "Political Magazine," 301
 Tucker (Abr.) "Light of Nature," abridged, 278
 Tucker (S.) on Francis Dickens, 258
 Mason (Samuel), arms and epitaph, 95
 Mother-in-law, 480
 Tump, a provincialism, 45, 101, 163
 Tunes, slow and quick, 288
 Turf, histories of, 95
 Type mnemonics, 52
 Tyrconnel (Frances Jennings, Countess of), 321
 Tyssen (A. D.) on bell of St. Lawrence, Reading, 89

U.

Ugrians in Britain, 414
 Ulster (William, Earl of), date of his death, 478
 Umbrellas of oiled silk, 66
 Unhistorical, a modern word, 47
 Union Jack ensign, 136, 208
 Universal Accommodation Office, 11
 Uriconium, or Wroxeter, excavations, 183, 349, 427

V.

Valentines, their origin, 221, 290, 347
 Valetort family arms, 283
 Vallancey (General), anecdote, 26
 "Vampire," its authorship, 201, 429
 V. (E.) on "Oculum Sacerdotis," 367
 " The Reformed Monastery," 37
 Venus de Medici, its height, 58
 Veronica, its pronunciation, 125
 Vickers (George) on author of "Albanin," 401

Vickers (George) on burial in coffin, 266
 Heraldry accessory to eminence, 339
 Pews in Lavenham church, 367
 Victoria colony and female franchise, 93
 Victoria Cross, its decoration, 33
 Viel-Liebchen, twin almonds, 24, 104, 228
 Vien (Joseph), artist, 281
 Viles (Edward) on unhistorical, 47
 Violon : lock-up, 65
 Virgil translations, 56, 123
 Virginia Company, its history, 44
 Vize family, 96
 V. (J.) on death caused by drinking cold water, 236
 " Secret History of the Cabinet of Bonaparte," 328
 Voltaire (M. F. A.) and Sir Isaac Newton, 83 ; death bed, 211, 284, 366, 388 ; and the Diocletian persecution, 496 ; the last volume of his Works, 1862, 335
 Vossius, "De Theologia Gentili," 478
 Vowel, poem with one, 43
 V. (S. P.) on price of salmon, 322
 Sir James of Ormonde, 149
 Suffolk (Countess of), portrait, 169

W.

W. on George Chapman, poet, 461
 Origin of names, 374
 Sir William Weston, 224, 263
 W. Frankfort-am-Main, on bedstead superstitution, 9
 Wace (Robert), Anglo-Norman poet, 340
 Waits at Christmas, 23, 63 ; at York, 275, 380
 Wake (Blanche, Lady), noticed, 493
 Waking time, a local phrase, 84, 144
 Walcott (M. E. C.) on the prefix Reverend, 121
 Wales (Frederick, Prince of) and Fanny Russell, 182
 Wales, Prince of, as Duke of Saxony, 495
 Walford (E.) on Le Poer family, 377
 Pugan caricature, 330
 Walker (Henry), minstrel, 180
 Walker (Obadiah), printing-press, 182
 Wallace (James), "Shakespearean Sketches," 441
 Wallace (Robert) of Kelly, his correspondence, 378
 Waller (Edmund), MS. of his Poems, 435
 Ward (Rev. John) of Haverhill, date of his death, 259
 Ward (Rev. Nathaniel), date of his death, 259
 Ward (William), a Roman Catholic priest, 479
 Warren (C. F. S.) on Eudokia Commena, 439
 Ford (Rev. Edward), his murder, 505
 Immortality of the brute creation, 385
 William, son of King Stephen, 283
 Wart stone, 357
 Washington family arms, 11, 367
 Waterhouse (Sir Gilbert), of Kirton, 138, 268
 Waterhouse (Rev. J. J.), his case, 44
 Waterton (Edmund) on ladies of the Order of the Gam-ter, 11
 Waverley monastery, annals of, 450
 W. (C.) on curious pamphlets, 238
 Epigrams, 265
 Mungo, origin of the term, 190
 W. (E.) on Thomas Bilbie, 311
 Doddridge manuscripts, 85
 Harman family, 298
 Hawke and Bladen families, 258

- | | |
|--|--|
| W. (W.), Malta, on American money post-office orders, 132
 American steam-boat, the first, 151
 Hard Tack, 134
 Wyvil family of Constable Burton, 257 X Ximenes (Cardinal) at Alcalá, 12, 72; his arms, 102, 188 Y Yately, inscriptions on church bells, 83;
 "Year and a day," origin of the saying, 116, 183 | Years, computation of regnal, 478
 Yeowell (James) on R. Wallace's MSS., 378
 Yew trees called palms, 96, 167, 251, 306, 364
 Y. (J.) on Sally Salisbury, 481
 Yonge family arms, 164
 York, waits at, 275, 380
 York Buildings' fire engine, 137
 Yorke (John), descendants, 441
 Yorkshire poet, 191 Z Zinc spires, 461, 503
 Zion, its locality in early writers, 215, 306, 384
 Z. (Z.) on epigram against architects, 148
 Heraldic colours, 191 |
|--|--|

END OF THE SEVENTH VOLUME—THIRD SERIES.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 183.

NOTES:—Literary Inquirers and the Court of Probate, 1—
Samuel Daniel and John Florio, 4—Luis de Leon, 5—
Bishop and Lord Chancellor Thomas Goodrich, &c., 6—
Sir Christopher Wren's Mallet—Adverbs as Predicates—
Time for Summer Clothing—The Term "Pretty"—John Brooke—Shakspeare—Proverb: "The Cuckoo," &c., 6.

QUERIES:—The Academy at Paris temp. Henri IV., 8—
Anonymous Hymns—Artistic—Bewitching Eyes—Cal-deron's "Daughter of the Air"—"To Creel"—Thos.
Dyche—Epitaph at Eym—Explanations wanted—Miss
Ford, afterwards Mrs. Thicknesse—Herba Britannica—
Mr. Heston Humphreys and the Duke of Bedford—Military Encampments in England during the Years 1779-80—
Miniature illustrated Book—Beau Nash—Pedigrees—Quotation from Ariosto—Rennie of Melville Castle—
"The King of Saxony"—Sea-bathing—Gilbert Thomson,
M.D.—Wayland Wood, 8.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Incense in Divine Offices—
Stephen Perlin—Aldeborough: Raynborow and Bence Families—Opoponax—Deciphering MSS.—"Coals to Newcastle"—Order of Victoria and Albert, 11.

REPLIES:—Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales":—"Bob-up-and-down," 13—"Lillibulero," &c., 16.—Birth of Richard II.
14—Differences of Episcopal Coats: and the Coat of the See of Gloucester, 16.—Edward Dyer—Objective—Five Miniatures—The last Member of the Irish Parliament—
"Matthew Mark," &c.—John Fitzgibbon, first Earl of Clare
—Regnal Years—Mother-in-law—Totty—Exchequer Records—Spur Money in Belfries—Nickname—Sago—Marcolphus—Clent Hill—Cannel Coal—Daughter pronounced Dafter—Cary Family—Meat and Malt: Morocco
—Coutances, &c., 15.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

LITERARY INQUIRERS AND THE COURT OF PROBATE.

It was well said in the Preface to the volume of Wills from Doctors' Commons, printed by the Camden Society in 1863, that the publication of such a volume marked "an era in our literary history." So long since as the 26th March, 1848, the Director and Secretary of the Camden Society had an interview, under the authority of the Council, with the Registrars of the Prerogative Court with the view of procuring some facilities for the consultation of wills desired to be referred to in editing a volume then in course of preparation by the Society. The Registrars declined to comply with the wishes of the Council. A memorial, in the nature of an appeal, was addressed to the then Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Howley, who in reply informed the Council that he had no power to interfere.

Subsequent applications for some slight modifications of the stringent rules which prevented the literary use of the documents in the Prerogative Court were addressed to the late Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Bird Sumner, and to the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Ecclesiastical Courts, but were attended with no good results.

On the institution of the Court of Probate, the Council of the Camden Society, supported by the Society of Antiquaries, and by many eminent literary persons, renewed their endeavours. Sir Cresswell Cresswell, to whom the application was addressed, admitted the principle that documents which had none but literary uses ought to be accessible to literary inquirers, and as soon as space could be found, he made arrangements for literary inquirers to consult freely all wills proved before the year 1700, and placed this department under the charge of a gentleman who has shown himself most anxious to carry out the views of Sir Cresswell Cresswell, and to assist in every way the object of literary inquirers.

About a twelvemonth since, on suggestions made to them from various quarters, the Council of the Camden Society deemed it necessary to apply to the present Judge of the Court of Probate, the successor of Sir Cresswell Cresswell, on various points connected with the privileges which Sir Cresswell had granted to literary inquirers, and also for an extension of those privileges to inquirers who desire to consult local registries, and all other courts in which wills have at any time been proved.

To give greater weight to the application, the Council requested the co-operation of the Society of Antiquaries, which was very cordially granted, and a Joint Committee of the two Societies was appointed to carry out the object. The Joint Committee drew up the following Memorial, which, having been signed by the President and Council of the Society of Antiquaries, and by the President and Council of the Camden Society, was duly forwarded to Sir James Wilde:—

"The Society of Antiquaries,
"Somerset House.

"MY LORD,

"On the 18th February, 1859, many of the undersigned, conjointly with other persons interested in literary research, addressed a letter to the late Sir Cresswell Cresswell, in which his attention was directed to the manner in which the labours of persons engaged in literature were affected by the regulations of the Record Office for Wills. After stating the facts upon which their application was grounded, the writers concluded with the expression of a hope that the time had arrived when the practice of the Record Office for Wills might be assimilated in the case of literary inquirers to that of the Public Record Office, in which almost unlimited freedom of inspection, with the power of making transcripts, is given to such inquirers.

"After a correspondence between Sir Cresswell Cresswell and the applicants, for which we beg to refer to the inclosed printed paper, Sir Cresswell opened at the Principal Registry a department for Literary Inquirers, under certain printed Regulations which are dated the 11th March, 1862.

"The sixth clause in these Regulations specifies the nature of the documents to which access was intended to be given. This Clause is in the following terms: 'The Visitor will be allowed without fee to search the Calendars, to read the registered copies of Wills proved before the year 1700, the Probate and Administration Act Books to the same date, and to make extracts from such Wills and Books.'

"In putting these Regulations into practice, a question has arisen, whether the privilege thereby afforded shall be treated as limited to the copies of Wills and books belonging to the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, which alone at the time of the original application were deposited in the Principal Registry, or whether the same liberty shall be extended to other testamentary documents, which since the year 1859 (but not entirely since the date of the Regulations issued in March 1862) have been transferred to the same depository.

"The undersigned beg to submit that the more liberal interpretation of Sir Cresswell Cresswell's Order best accords both the letter and with the spirit of his concession. And they are not aware of any reason for excluding from literary research the documents which have been brought in from the other London and provincial registries, and which contain historical materials of a similar character to those found in the books and papers to which the Regulations admittedly apply.

"The undersigned very respectfully suggest to your Lordship that if you would be pleased to declare your view of the proper construction of the Order in question, the expression of your opinion would ensure the harmonious working of the Regulations, would be a guide to the applications of literary inquirers, and a rule to the Officers as to what they are to grant and what to refuse.

"If it should happen that your Lordship thought it right to issue any new paper of Regulations, the undersigned would venture to request that it might be considered whether something might not be done towards rendering accessible that extremely valuable collection of materials for the history of the domestic condition of our ancestors, the INVENTORIES which used to be brought into the Office on proving a will. Such an Inventory was adduced on the proof of the will of Shakspeare. It probably contained a minute account and valuation of his personal estate. It may still exist at the Record Office for Wills, but the undersigned are informed that the inventories are not in a condition in which they can be produced to inquirers.

"The undersigned further suggest that in the case supposed, it might be considered whether the limit of the year 1700, which is every year thrown further back, might not be altered into a period (say) of 150 years, which would be a limitation always equi-distant from the current time.

"The points which have been enumerated affect only those who can apply personally at the Principal Registry, but the undersigned, as, in a certain sense, representatives of a great body of historical and literary inquirers, have been urged from many quarters to point out to your Lordship that in all parts of England, as well as in London, there reside investigators of our topographical and genealogical history, not numerous in any one place, but some of them peculiarly distinguished — authors of books of the highest value, books which constitute a peculiar and most important feature in our national literature. To such persons access to the registered copies of Wills preserved in the district registries would be little less valuable than the same privilege has been found in London.

"At present they are not (as literary men were in London before Sir Cresswell Cresswell's Regulations of 1862) totally excluded. The kindness of some registrars, and the payment of fees (irregular and uncertain) at other offices, enable some of them to procure access; but no really important work can thus be carried on. On their behalf we appeal to your Lordship, in the hope that by some arrangement emanating from your authority they may be made partakers of a privilege which has made literary men deeply grateful to Sir Cresswell Cresswell, and will in due time lead to great improvements in all literary works which are based upon historical truth."

"20th April, 1864."

Sir James Wilde, in acknowledging this memorial, and explaining that the limited accommodation and staff at present provided by the Treasury rendered it impossible to increase at the present time the accommodation to literary men, gratified the Memorialists by the assurance that he had the object which they had in view sincerely at heart.

Things remained in this state until the commencement of the present year, when circumstances having brought under the consideration of the Society of Antiquaries certain difficulties in the way of procuring photographic fac-similes of wills, the council of that society determined to appeal to Sir James Wilde upon the subject, and the following letter from the council was accordingly addressed to the learned judge:—

"Somerset House, Tuesday, 21st March, 1865.

"SIR,—

"At a Council of the Society of Antiquaries held this day, the President Earl Stanhope in the Chair, it was resolved to solicit your attention to the present prohibition, except in very rare cases, of taking fac-similes from wills.

"That prohibition, as the Council understand, is continued by you in pursuance of the precedents of your predecessors in the charge of these important documents. It was no doubt perfectly just and reasonable at the time it was first made, when the art of taking fac-similes was still in its infancy, and could not be practised without greater or less risk of damage or defacement to the original. But the Council desire to submit to your inquiry and consideration, whether that prohibition does not now survive the grounds on which it was first made, and whether in point or fact, according to the new photographic process, the fac-simile may not be made with the most perfect safety to the paper or parchment of which resemblance is sought, without the chance of even touching it, and guarded from all other danger by the presence of a officer of the Court.

"The Council have now before them a letter, dated the 17th instant, from Mr. George S. Nottage, managing partner of the London Stereoscopic Company, at 54, Cheapside. That gentleman states: 'We have within the last few days photographed a Will from Doctors' Commons in this place. It was brought to us by the Record Keeper of the Court, Mr. John Smith, and was photographed in his presence. We have also executed Shakspeare's Will here in the presence of the same gentleman. It is a rule of the Court that the Will should never be out of his custody. Our process does not in any way touch the original document, that being merely placed upon an easel.'

"The Council of the Society of Antiquaries, while rejoicing in the permission which has thus been granted to obtain a fac-simile of the Will of Shakespeare, desire to observe that a similar permission would be of great value in several other cases of historical and literary interest.

"They would submit to you that such a privilege might, as they conceive, be guarded from all risk to legal rights if it were applied only to documents of less recent date, as of twenty or twenty-five years' back, when the documents are no longer likely to give ground for litigation; and if the privilege were granted only to such firms as the London Stereoscopic Company, of whose skill and care the officers of the Court of Probate were well assured by their own personal experience.

"The Council of the Society of Antiquaries are by no means unmindful of your predecessor Sir Cresswell Cresswell's kind and ready compliance with the request which, in common with the Council of the Camden Society, they three years since addressed to him, for an increase of facilities in the consultation of Wills. They are persuaded that you, Sir, feel no less cordial an interest than he evinced in the cause of literature and historical inquiry. They therefore wish no more on this occasion than to refer the matter in question to your own inquiry and deliberation, being persuaded that, if you should find yourself at last unable to comply with their request, it will not be from any want of sympathy with their object, but only because the difficulties in the way of the privilege they desire are greater and more real than at present they believe them to be.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your faithful and obedient Servant,

"C. KNIGHT WATSON, Secretary.

"The Rt. Honble. Sir James P. Wilde, Knt.

"Judge of the Court of Probate, &c. &c. &c."

The Society of Antiquaries, acting in the same spirit which had formerly induced the Camden Society to request their co-operation on former occasions, communicated their intended letter to the Camden Society, and at a meeting of the Council of the latter society, held on the 6th of April, the secretary was directed to write to Mr. Knight Watson as follows:—

"The Camden Society, 25, Parliament Street, 6th April, 1865.

"DEAR SIR,

"The letter intended to be addressed by the Council of the Society of Antiquaries to Sir James Wilde, Judge of the Court of Probate, having been submitted to the President and Council of the Camden Society, I am directed to inform you that the Camden Society has great pleasure co-operating with the Society of Antiquaries in the intended application.

The proposed letter expresses so clearly the nature of permission desired, and urges it with such propriety, that this Council thinks it unnecessary to make comment. They heartily concur both in the subject-matter of the application and in the way in which it is used to be made to Sir James Wilde.

But this Council submits to the consideration of the Council of the Society of Antiquaries whether it would be right, when making this further application to Sir James Wilde, very respectfully to remind him that there remains before him for consideration the joint application of the Society of Antiquaries and the Camden Society, forwarded to him in the month of March, 1864, and omitted to be considered by him in his letter to the Council of Antiquaries of the 13th of May following.

A portion of our previous application which relates to the Local Registries of the Court of Probate has been presented upon the attention of this Council by persons particularly interested in that part of the subject and especially by the Rev. H. T. Ellacombe, a well-known member of both these Societies. Mr. Ellacombe informed the Council that he has in the press a historical work which is full of matter derived from her records, but does not contain any thing deserving the cost of inquiry and transcription in the Local Registries having altogether prevented him from making use of that valuable class of historical evidences.

"Without presuming to urge Sir James Wilde on the subject of his promised consideration, the Council of the Camden Society are desirous that his attention should be directed to the fact, brought prominently forward in the case of Mr. Ellacombe, that, whilst almost unlimited facilities are given to literary research in other depositories of records, literary inquirers are absolutely excluded by fees from the Local Registries of the Court of Probate.

"Believe me, my dear Sir, yours very truly,

"WILLIAM J. THOMS.

"C. Knight Watson, Esq."

This letter was forwarded, with the one preceding it, to Sir James Wilde, who gave the subject his immediate attention, and in due time directed the following reply to be addressed to the Secretary of the Society of Antiquaries:—

"Court of Probate, Westminster,

"May 24, 1865.

"SIR,

"I am directed by the Judge of the Court of Probate to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st March, and to state that, although the subject had been previously investigated by him, he again called for a report from the Principal Registrar upon the possibility of allowing Wills of literary interest to be photographed, consistently with their safe custody, for which he is responsible. The Registrar says: 'With respect to photographing wills possessing historical interest, I have little to remark. It cannot be done satisfactorily on the premises belonging to the Court of Probate, and therefore entails the necessity of one of the Record Keepers attending elsewhere, as an original will cannot be entrusted under such circumstances to a junior clerk. Were these attendances of the Record Keepers to be much increased, we should be obliged to apply for a third Record Keeper, and to prevent this, I think a higher fee should be charged than at present, so as to ensure that no application be made to photograph a will without some good reason;' and he goes on to suggest a fee of 5*l.* 5*s.* The Judge does not feel at liberty to adopt this suggestion of an extra and unauthorised fee, but he is now in communication with the Treasury on the whole subject of literary enquiries, with the view of rendering the valuable records now scattered over the country in the District Registries available to literary research by being brought together in London, with proper accommodation and a due staff of clerks for their safe custody; and if the facilities he desires are accorded by the Treasury, he wishes as part of that scheme to obtain the means of permitting Photographs to be taken. I am desirous to enclose a copy of a report furnished by the Chief Registrar on this subject.

"I have the honour to be,

"Sir,

"Your most obedient servant,

(Signed)

"E. A. WILDE,

"Secretary to the Judge.

"To C. Knight Watson, Esq.

"&c. &c."

"Principal Registry, Court of Probate,

"3rd May, 1865."

"MY LORD,

"I have read the letters which you forwarded for my perusal from the Treasury, the Society of Antiquaries, and the Camden Society; and beg to say that in every communication I have had with the Treasury and the Office of Works respecting the necessary accommodation required for the Registry, I have steadily kept in view your Lordship's instructions to seize every opportunity that offered for providing further facilities for literary investigations. As I cannot, however, reconcile the extending even the privileges at present enjoyed by literary enquirers in London to the District Registries so long as they remain under their present regulations, with the duties which I conceive devolve on the officers of the Court of Probate, as custodians of probably the most valuable legal documents in the kingdom, I have thought it better to draw up a detailed report, which I send herewith. Should your Lordship concur in my views, and the Lords of the Treasury consent to carry them out, I have every hope that at the end of no great length of time, not only literary applicants, but the public generally, will have the fullest access to our Records which, in my opinion, will be consistent with our duties as their guardians.

"I have the honour to be,

"My Lord,

"Your Lordship's obed^t serv^t,

(Signed)

"A. F. BAYFORD,

"Senior Registrar.

"To R^t Hon^{ble} Sir J. Wilde."

So the matter rests at present. But with the avowed good will of the learned Judge of the Prerogative Court, and with the sympathy which the Chancellor of the Exchequer must feel in whatever has a tendency to promote historical truth, there need be little fear as to the ultimate result of the movement.

SAMUEL DANIEL AND JOHN FLORIO.

It appears to be accepted as a fact that Samuel Daniel the poet, and John Florio the lexicographer, were brothers-in-law. It was so stated by Wood, the annalist of Oxford university, in 1691; and the statement was repeated by Brydges in 1800, by Kitson in 1802, and by Alexander Chalmers in 1810. It was also repeated, with a confirmative note, in the augmented edition of the Athenæ Oxonienses in 1813-20.

As Daniel and Florio had been members of the aforesaid university, and at no remote period, the testimony of Wood must not be set aside without some substantial counter-evidence, nor should I venture to question the exactness of his intelligence if there was no such evidence to produce. Random conjectures should be avoided in literature, as they are apt to re-appear in a more deceptive shape—but I have no wish to censure conjectures indiscriminately.

This discussion is submitted as a novelty. I cannot remember to have met with any expression of doubt on the point at issue, nor any approach to it in more than one instance—which, as an act of justice to the memory of its author, I transcribe:—

"Wood says that Florio married the sister of Daniel, but he gives no authority. The verses of Daniel before the Montaigne are inscribed only, 'To my dear friend Mr. John Florio'; but in the verses before the second edition of the dictionary he addresses him as 'brother.' It is remarkable that there is no notice of any such connexion in the will of either Florio or Daniel."—Joseph Hunter, F.S.A. 1844.

It is remarkable that so experienced and sagacious an archaeologist as Mr. Joseph Hunter, whose merit as a writer on various intricate subjects no one can wish to contest, should be within an ace of achieving a discovery—and miss it!

The circumstance, however, is undeniable, and the promised evidence shall now be produced. It is accessible to every bibliophile or literate querist, and the witnesses are no other than Samuel Daniel and John Florio:

In 1611 Daniel published Certaine small workes heretofore devulged, in which precious volume he styles himself "one of the groomes of the Queenes Maiesties most honourable priuie chamber"; and in the same year Florio, who was Reader of Italian to her Majesty, published a second edition of his World of Wordes, in which he styles himself "one of the gentlemen of hir royall priuie chamber." Here, as I conceive, we learn the precise nature of the relationship between the two worthies: they were brother-officers!

But I have more evidence for those who may desire it. The dictionary of 1611 contains metrical testimonials by Il Cándido [Matthew Gwinne], Samuel Daniel, James Mabbe, and L. Thorvs. Now the verses of Gwinne, who held office under the crown, are addressed, "To my dearely-esteemed friend and fellow M. John Florio"; and those of Daniel, "To my deare friend and brother M. John Florio." The eulogists coincide. Gwinne expresses himself in plain terms; Daniel sets aside etymology and writes poetically. He has thereby misled his prosaic biographers.

A similar instance of equivocation occurs in a work of much celebrity. When Bacon published the first collection of his Essays, he addressed them, "To Mr. Anthony Bacon, my dear brother." This was in 1597. In 1612, on publishing other essays of the same nature, he addressed them, "To my loving brother sir John Constable, Kt." Now, sir John Constable was not his brother, in the primary sense of the word, as the dedication itself proves:—

"My last essays I dedicated to my dear brother, Mr. Anthony Bacon, who is with God. . . . Missing my brother, I found you next; in respect of bond both of near alliance, and of straight friendship and society, and particularly of communication in studies."

Sir John Constable, whose name has fallen into obscurity, was knighted at Royston on the 7 October 1607, and the two knights were no otherwise brothers than as members of the honourable society of Graynes Lane. BOLTON CORNEY.

LUIS DE LEON.

The name of Luis de Leon is dear to every Spaniard. Amongst the numerous and illustrious authors, whom Spain produced in the sixteenth century, many of whom were the glory and pride of the University of Salamanca, few equalled the above-mentioned writer either as a poet, a theologian, an expounder of Holy Scripture, or an elegant classical scholar. Though his works are not much known in England, yet they are justly prized in Spain, and indeed by all those of every land who can read them in the language in which they were written. As a prose writer, he is styled "El inimitable Leon." His works are not only models of the purest style, but are also considered to have been highly instrumental in purifying, enriching, and perfecting the Spanish language.

His personal history is interesting. In the year 1856 his remains were discovered in the ancient Convent of the Augustines at Salamanca, and were translated in solemn procession to the Royal Chapel of the University, with almost the same religious pomp that was thrown around the ashes of Cardinal Ximenez a few years before, in Alcalá de Henares. A short time after this event I had the pleasure of visiting the University of Salamanca, and of beholding the urn which contained all that was mortal of Luis de Leon. His fame and his virtues were then the theme of every tongue, while the shops of the booksellers were full of accounts of the discovery of his remains, and of histories of his life and writings. The Rector of the University, the Bishop of Salamanca, the professors, the students in the Episcopal Seminary and in the Irish College, and the clergy—to all of whom I was introduced—spoke in the highest terms of Luis de Leon, and proclaimed him the "glory of Salamanca." As I felt a kind of enthusiasm enkindled within my breast from the genius loci, I purchased several of the pamphlets connected with the history of such a writer, so as to make myself acquainted with his works, &c. Fortunately I met with the second edition of two of his most celebrated productions, viz. De los Nombres de Christo, en tres Libros, por el Maestro Fray Luys de Leon (En Salamanca, MDLXXXV.) The other is entitled, La Perfecta Casada. (En Salamanca, MDLXXXVI.)

According to Don Manuel Barco, in his Re-seña Biográfica y Bibliográfica del Maestro Fray Luis de Leon (Salamanca: Imprenta Nueva de Diego Vazquez, Impresor de la Universidad, año 1856, p. 7), it seems difficult to discover in what part of Spain Leon was born. Some authors, such as D. Nicolás Antonio in his Biblioteca Nueva, and Manuel Vidal in his Historia del Convento de San Agustín de Salamanca, assert that he was born in Madrid in 1527. Others, again, believe that he saw the light in Granada, while many more are inclined to think that he was a native of Belmonte en la Mancha. I leave the point undecided. His father, Lope de Leon, appears to have held some office in the Chancellory of Granada; but he afterwards removed with his wife, Doña Ines de Alarcon, to Madrid, where he practised as a lawyer. His son, Louis de Leon, was sent to Salamanca to pursue his studies, where in the fourteenth year of his age he became a religious in the Augustinian convent of that city. He made his profession on January 20, 1544. Here he led a quiet and studious life for several years, until, at the request of a lady named Doña Isabel de Osorio, he undertook a translation of the Cantic of Canticles into Spanish, Cantar de los Cantares. At that time, no translations from the Holy Scriptures were allowed to be made without the proper authority and permission of the Inquisition.* Copies in MS. were made of the translation, without the knowledge of Leon, and having got into circulation throughout the country, the matter was brought before the ecclesiastical authorities by a professor named Fray Leon de Castro, who appears to have been no friend of Luis de Leon. The consequence was that the translator was seized and sent to the prison of the Inquisition in Valladolid. Here he remained four years, having been kept in confinement from 1572 to 1576. He was at last liberated through the influence and exertions of Cardinal Quiroga, Archbishop of Toledo. By a definitive sentence, pronounced by the Tribunal of the "Holy Office," Fray Luis de Leon was absolved from all censures and penalties, and restored to liberty, and to all his former rights and prerogatives which he had enjoyed and possessed as Professor of Scripture in Salamanca. On the 30th day of December, 1577, he made his public entrance into the University amidst the rejoicings and acclamations of a vast assembly of people. He was installed once more as professor; and when the following day a crowd of students and literary men collected in the hall of one of the colleges to hear him resume his lectures, what was their astonishment when they heard him commence with the words—"Decíamos ayer," &c. (yesterday we were speaking), as if there had been no interruption of four years between this lecture and those which he had previously given! Such moderation and forgiveness, on his part, of all his enemies excited the highest admiration.

It is unnecessary to enter into any more details of his history, which can be found elsewhere. What I have said, however, may interest several readers of "N. & Q." who did not know much of Luis de Leon. In another article I shall give a list of his principal works. He died at Madrigal,

* This prohibition appears to have been necessary for Spain in the sixteenth century.

in 1591. His remains were interred in the Convent of the Augustines, Salamanca.

J. DALTON.

Norwich.

(To be continued.)

BISHOP AND LORD CHANCELLOR THOMAS GOODRICH.

LORD CAMPBELL'S LIFE OF HIM.

Lord Campbell, utterly misapprehending a quaint joke, and making apparently very superficial research on the matter, writes thus:—

"I do not find any account of his origin. (A note is added giving the names of his father and grandfather.) His name is often spelt Goodrick; but from the following epigram upon him, indicating that he had emerged from poverty, it must have been pronounced Goodrich:—

'Et bonus et dives, bene junctus et optimus ordo; Præcedit bonitas; pone sequuntur opes.'

In Wotton's English Baronets (published 1727), I find, under the heading of "Goodricke of Ribston, Yorkshire," as follows; and already I find part of his account confirmed by record in the College of Arms:—

"It appears from the visitation of Robert Glover, Somerset Herald, that this family flourished for several generations at Nortingley, or Norton-lee, in com. Somerset: all whose names, marriages, and issue, are specified in the family pedigree.

"At length Henry Goodricke, the third son of Robert Goodricke of Nortingley, marrying an heiress, the daughter of Thomas Stickford, Esq., in Lincolnshire, the family flourished in Lincolnshire; where, after six generations, William [this is wrong, it was Edward,] of East Kirby, com. Lincoln, married to his second wife Jane, the heiress of Mr. Williamson of Boston, by whom he had three sons and a daughter. The sons were John, Thomas, and Henry, of which the eldest succeeded to his father's estate. Thomas was in great favor with Henry VIII.," &c.

The elevation of Thomas to the see of Ely and Lord Chancellorship, and his employment in many important offices, is then stated. The order of the brothers was however, as appears by a pedigree in the College of Arms, Henry, Thomas, and John; and there were two daughters, Katherine and Elizabeth. Henry purchased the estate of Ribstone from Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, and became the founder of the Goodrickes of Ribston. John married the daughter and co-heiress of Sir Lionel Dymoke, of Stickforth, Knt.

The same story of the descent of the Bishop in Lincolnshire and Somerset, is told in Burke's Peerage and Baronetage, e. g. in third edit. 1830, under the heading of "Goodricke, Sir James."

The above indicates neither poverty nor obscurity of origin, and it seems worth while to correct Lord Campbell's mistake.

I seek to connect a family of the name of Goodrich, whose ancestor or ancestors emigrated I have reason to believe from Boston, in Lincoln-colnshire, to America, several generations ago, with the above-mentioned family of Bishop Goodrich. I trace them upwards to John Goodrich and Mary his wife, which John would be born about 1700.

To know which of the Lincolnshire Goodriches emigrated from Boston, and something of their pedigree before and after that event, would much interest me, as would anything proving the truth of the above history of Goodriches as given in Wotton; especially I should like to know where is "the family pedigree" he mentions. I have not as yet found it in the College of Arms, nor Robert Glover's Visitation.

I am referred to various works relating to the families of emigrants to America, which as yet my opportunities have not permitted me to consult.

The Goodriches I am interested in returned to England from Virginia; driven out by the American war towards the end of the last century.

They have a tradition that, in early times, Goodrich Castle, on the Wye, in Herefordshire, belonged to their ancestors. It is to be observed, that Somerset and Herefordshire are in the same west country.

F. J. J.

Box 62, Post Office, Derby.

SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN'S MALLET.—At a late general meeting of the London and Middlesex Archaeological Society, the original mallet, with which it is said King Charles II. laid the first stone of St. Paul's, was exhibited. By the kindness of C. J. Shoppee, Esq., the honorary secretary, I have been furnished with a copy of the inscription; which is on a silver plate, let into the head. It is as follows, and I believe will be interesting to many readers of "N. & Q." :—

"By Order of the M. W. the Grand Master,
His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, &c., &c., and W. Master of the Lodge of Antiquity, and with the Concurrence of the Brethren of the Lodge, this plate has been engraved and affixed to this MALLET. A. L. 5881, A.D. 1827.

To commemorate that this, being the same Mallet with which

HIS MAJESTY, KING CHARLES THE SECOND, levelled the foundation Stone of
ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL, A. L. 5677, A.D. 1673,
Was presented to the Old Lodge of St. Paul's, now the Lodge of Antiquity,
acting by immemorial Constitution.

By BROTHER SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN, R.W.D.G.M., Worshipful Master of the Lodge, and Architect of that Edifice."

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

ADVERBS AS PREDICATES.—I was struck the other day by the following sentence, at the commencement of an article in the Saturday Review, June 10, 1865, on "Old Catholics and New":—

"It is very rarely that any religious community. . . . receives so considerable an accession . . . as the Roman Catholic Church in this country has done during the last quarter of a century."

Here we have not only an adverb as a predicate, but another adverb used to qualify it. We may be quite certain that no attempts of the purists will succeed in depriving our language of these idiomatic forms, which add so materially to its flexibility. Some people of the Lindley Murray school would mutilate our noble English, much in the way our horses' tails were docked and gashed at the beginning of this century.

G. R. K.

TIME FOR SUMMER CLOTHING.—The Romans have a rhyme which refers the change of clothing to Ascension-tide:—

"Viri Galilai—Addio panni miei."

Viri Galilei are the two first words of the mass for Ascension Day. This proverb gives a great latitude for the time of changing to summer dress, viz. from May 1 to June 2. It will be noticed also, that this form of the proverb is rather permissive than prohibitive.

G. R. K.

THE TERM "PRETTY."—Is the almost universal application of the term "pretty" to everything that pleases—no matter how different the source of pleasure—correct and beneficial? And if not, is there any way of accounting for its great prevalence in modern conversation? Sir Joshua Reynolds used to apply the term to the drawings of young people which he could not admire, but did not like to condemn.

The other day I heard it applied to the "Dies iræ, dies illa," and later still to the "Hallelujah Chorus" of Handel. I suppose, by-and-bye, we shall hear of Heaven and Hell being "pretty places." Please give us a little light on this subject.

A LOVER OF ACCURATE LANGUAGE.

JOHN BROOKE.—John Brooke, of Ash next Sandwich, one of the original scholars of Trinity College, Cambridge, and author of six translated works, published between 1577 and 1582, is noticed in Athene Cantabrigienses, i. 459.

In that work we suggested that he resided at Mote Farm, alias Brooke House; but it turns out that his habitation was another Brooke House, in the parish of Ash—viz. that in the hamlet of Brooke Street. He was son of a person of both his names (who was living in 1555), and married Magdalen, daughter of — Stothard of Mottingham.

Dying without issue Jan. 16, 1582-3, he was, pursuant to his testamentary directions, buried in St. Nicholas's chancel in the church of Ash, where he is commemorated by the following inscription:—

"John Brooke of the parishe of Ashe
Only he is now gone
His days are past His corps is layd
Now under this marble stone.

Broke Strete he was the honor of Rob'd now it is of name
Only because he had no sede
Or child to have the same
Knowing that all must passe away
Even when God will, none can delay.

He passed to God in the yere of grace
A thousand five hundred fourscore and two it was
The sixteenth day of January I tell you for playne
The five and twentyeth yere of Elizabeth raigne."

The first ten lines of this delectable epitaph were his own composition, being contained in his will, which was proved Feb. 7, in the year of his decease.

Arms: Per bend az. and sa. two eagles displayed counterchanged. Crest: On a chapeau an eagle rising.

We owe this additional information to A Corner of Kent, by Mr. Planche, who, however, when he published that interesting book, does not seem to have been aware that this John Brooke was the author of published works.

C. H. & THOMPSON COOPER.

Cambridge.

SHAKESPEARE.—A parallel to the celebrated passage in which Wolsey reproaches himself with having manifested too much zeal in serving his king, and too little zeal for his God (King Henry VIII., Act III. Sc. 2, ad fin.), may be found in the following circumstance:—

The Marechal de Grè had offended the queen of Louis XI.; and upon his trial, when the Countess of Angoulême, to whose hand he had once aspired, gave rancorous evidence against him, he said to her—

"If I had always served God as I have served you, Madam, I should not have a great account to render at my death."—Bacon's Life and Times of Francis the First, King of France, 2nd ed. vol. i. p. 46.

H. W. T.

PROVERB: "THE CUCKOO," ETC.—We have a rhyming proverb here (it may also be popular in other parts of the country) which runs thus:—

"It comes in mid-April,
It sings in mid-May;
And the first cock of hay
Fleys the Cuckoo away."

Unfortunately, however, for the truthfulness of the proverb, hay was "housed" in Rossendale a fortnight ago, and yet the cuckoo lingers in our woods: for yesterday I heard its notes as full and clear as though it had only been "mid-May."

We have another pithy proverb, which expresses a good deal in little compass:—

"Th' quiet sow eats a' th' draff."

T. N.

Bacup, Rossendale, June 19, 1865.

Queries.

THE ACADEMY AT PARIS, temp. HENRI IV.

A letter (preserved in the State Paper Office) of Henry Lord Clifford, afterwards the fifth Earl of Cumberland, to his father-in-law the Lord Treasurer Salisbury, dated Paris, this 22nd of June, st. no. and certainly written in 1611 (because it relates to the new order of Baronets, then first instituted, and the Earl of Salisbury died in May, 1612) begins thus: "My most honored Lord,—I have soe much enjoyed the good company and love of this gentleman here, in the Academie," &c., and proceeds to second that gentleman's suit to be advanced to "this dignity of Barronett." Seventeen months later, on the 25th Nov. 1612, Thomas Puckering, Esquire (son and heir of the Lord Keeper), was created a Baronet; and the late Mr. Lemon, when arranging the papers contained in the volume, suggested that he was the party in whose favour the letter was written: and the same suggestion now appears in the printed Calendar. What guided Mr. Lemon in this conjecture is not stated; but in Sir Henry Ellis's collection of Original Letters, Second Series, vol. iii. p. 220, there is one which presents a very interesting account of the education of Mr. Puckering at Paris, and the distribution of his time there; addressed by Mr. Lorkin, his tutor, to Mr. Adam Newton, then the tutor of Henry Prince of Wales. (It was the same Mr. Lorkin who afterwards addressed to Sir Thomas Puckering, when again in France, some of the most agreeable news-letters that are extant for the latter years of the reign of James I.)

The "Academie" is not named in Mr. Lorkin's letter, but there is this passage: "Mons^r Ballendine hath commended unto us Paulus Æmilius in French: who writeth the History of the Country. His counsell we meane to follow." This was evidently William Bellenden (a native of Scotland), who is "mentioned by Dempster as humanity professor at Paris in 1602" (Chalmers's Biographical Dictionary), and who dedicated his Ciceronis Princeps in 1608, and his Ciceronis Consul in 1612, to Henry Prince of Wales, and the second edition of the latter, accompanied by his Liber de statu Prisci Orbis (all printed at Paris) to Charles Prince of Wales in 1616. These were the works which were re-edited, with great parade, by the learned Dr. Samuel Parr in 1787.

Bellenden's professorship was, I presume, in the University of Paris. The point to which I desire to direct attention is the employment by Lord Clifford of the term "Academie," and to inquire whether that was an institution distinct from the University. If so, where shall I find an account of the Academy at Paris at the period in question?

JOHN GOUGH NICHOLS.

ANONYMOUS HYMNS.—The Hymn 273 in Hymns Ancient and Modern, is called (3rd S. vii. 430), a translation by Isaac Williams. I believed it to be a hymn of Bishop Mant's, and that the first line read—

"For all thy Saints, O Lord."

It is thus given in Lyte's Spirit of the Psalms, 3rd edit. published by Rivington last year. Which is the real author? I have also believed No. 258, "Disposer Supreme" to be by Sir Robert Grant, but for this I cannot remember any special authority. I should be glad to know the author of the following—

"17. Sweet Saviour, bless us ere we go.

53. A Hymn for Martyrs.

139. Our blest Redeemer.

151. Where high the heavenly temple stands."

Also, who translated Nos. 4, 7, 8, 9, and 13, which I suppose are from the "Seven hours" hymns, which were, I believe, translated by Dr. Newman. I should be glad to know if I am right in attributing to him the translations beginning—

"1. Let us arise and watch by night.

2. Paler have grown the shades of night."

KATINKA.

ARTISTIC.—Can any one refer me to a good engraving of a blacksmith's forge, with blacksmith at work, not less than 100 years old?

P.

BEWITCHING EYES.—Beroaldus, in his Commentary on the Golden Ass of Apuleius, celebrates the beauty of the eyes of two of his lady acquaintances, whom as mere matter of idle curiosity we should like to identify. His words are as follows:—

"Expertus loquor: sensi ipse, nec dissimulabo. Sensi inquam oculos in Panthia et Martia morsicantes, quibus nihil venustius, amabilius, speciosius novit vetustas: nec noscit ipsa posteritas."

Required, the surnames of Beroaldus' flames? and a good rendering for oculi morsicantes?

ALIQUIS.

CALDERON'S "DAUGHTER OF THE AIR"—It is a strange incongruity that "the most beautiful of all Calderon's productions," as Goethe has truly termed the above drama, should have the most unintelligible and apparently absurd title of any. Neither Goethe himself, who has written a whole Essay on the subject, nor Von Schack, "the admirable historian of the Spanish drama," nor the Archbishop of Dublin, who thus commends him, and who quotes Goethe's criticism, nor the republisher of its prototype, Virues's Semiramis (Williams & Norgate, 1858), nor any writer I could find, gives any explanation of this mystery.

A clue to it, if a true one, has at last been found where one would least of all expect it, in the account of the Ascot cup day in the Times of the 16th inst., in the following passage:—

"Eventually more backers presented themselves for Fille de l'Air, whose name floated through and above the assembly, and was in all respects as much a pervading influence as her namesake of the Scandinavian mythology might have been."

If you or any of your learned readers will inform me whether there really is any such Scandinavian goddess, who she was, and where an account of her is to be found, and lastly, what it was that probably suggested this strange title to Calderon, you or he will confer a real favour on all lovers of Spanish poetry by giving a meaning to the title of the most splendid of the dramas of "the Spanish Shakspeare":—the only thing at present wanting to its perfection. The author has himself made two allusions to it—a serious, at the end of the second act, and a comic, at the end of the preceding scene; but in neither has he thrown any light on its meaning. Even Semiramis's own account of it, near the end of her long speech to Menon in the first act, is very unsatisfactory.

Lest you should refer me to the writer in the Times for information, I add that I have already made inquiry in that quarter, and received no answer.

INQUIRER.

"To CREEL."—This would seem to be an old border custom, and still exists in the southern parts of Mid-Lothian, East-Lothian, Selkirk, &c. When a newly-married couple arrive at the village of, or near to, their residence, the inhabitants having filled a basket, or creel, with stones, immediately seize the bridegroom, and fasten the creel on his back, from which he is freed by the bride cutting the cords with a knife, or "gully" as it is called, with which the bridegroom takes care to be provided. Should he, however, imprudently neglect to be so provided, he is exposed to the mercy of the inhabitants for an indefinite period, as no one will lend a knife to the bride.

Is this custom known elsewhere? Can any of your correspondents explain its origin?

SETH WAIT.

THOS. DYCHE.—I find in "N. & Q." 2nd S. viii. 249, a question from W. J. O. respecting Wm. Pardon, who completed the New General English Dictionary of Dyché. That inquiry appears not to have been answered. Allow me to call attention to it, and also to ask where some account of Thos. Dyché is to be found? I have looked over a good many biographical dictionaries in vain, and have only found the name in Lemprière's, where we learn no more than we may gather from Dyché's works, except, perhaps, that he died about 1780. He is called "reverend," and as he is not on the Cambridge list of graduates, I suppose he was an Oxford man. The most noticeable item about him which I have stumbled upon is an extract from the Post Boy of June 19th, 1719, quoted in Robinson's History of Hackney, vol. i. p. 124. Herein the once notorious John Ward of Hackney is recorded to have obtained 300*l.* damages—

"Against one Thomas Dyché, a schoolmaster of Bow, for printing and publishing a scandalous libel, reflecting upon the conduct of the said Mr. Ward in discharge of his trust about repairing Dagnam Breach."

Why should we know so little of a man whose name has been a household word for a century and a quarter? B. H. C.

EPIGRAPH AT EYAM.—I lately met with the following beautiful epitaph in Eyam churchyard, Derbyshire:—

"Rest, happy dead,
Sleep all your weariness away;
Ye shall be waked at break of day
From your cold bed."

Is this original, or a quotation? J. CHUBB.
St. Paul's Churchyard.

EXPLANATIONS WANTED.—I should be very glad if I could obtain through "N. & Q." explanations of the following terms, taken chiefly from Wardrobe Rolls, and not satisfactorily or not at all explained in Du Cange's Glossary:—

"Et comput. lib. Petro Swan p broider vni^a armilau^z [or arnulau^z?] Domine cum harebett, 1½ vln. satin alb. et blod."

"Et comput. de ij barhides p lect Domine."

"V. dloc" [delivered along with a quantity of cloaks, furs, and cloth, for the use of the royal family.]

"iiij pann. adaur. baudekyns doncren."

"Et de ij hyndi auro amarlat. alb. rusia."

Oysters, mussels, and sprats sent from my lord from London to my lady at Hertford, "ad calathos."

"ij pellu enes, et j chaufu. enen."

"Et p vna alia carecta cum duobus haib⁵ et vj eq."

"Et p ij par. lynchiam."

"xliv vln. marpie pris."

"clxxiv vln. canab."

"j p coffer trussabil pu."

"xviiij par. bras de coreo."

"j sell malar."

"ij sell p soms."

"Eidm p poudier ij acisaze arg. deaur."

"Et emenda^c vni^a ciph^r Domine."

"Et p regulac vni^a peti ptancu p cant supnotand."

HERMENTRUD.

MISS FORD, AFTERWARDS MRS. THICKNESSE.—Hone painted about 1752 a portrait of this lady in the character of a muse, playing upon a lyre. Some years later, she was painted by Gainsborough, who represented her tuning her harp, and leaning upon some of her musical compositions. This latter portrait was extant at Bath in 1806. Can any one say where these portraits now are?

JAMES BROW.

HERBA BRITANNICA.—What is that Herba Britannica which Apuleius, in his book De Virtutibus Herbarum, speaks of in these terms?—

"Græcis dicitur britannica et damasonios: Itali britannicam, alii betam plantaginis, alii bibonem vocant."

It is reported to be good for a sore mouth, tooth-ache, to cure yawning, paralysis, to be a laxative, and to be useful for the spleen.

Its blossom collected antequam tonitruum audiat, will preserve a patient from angina or quinsy a whole year.

O. T. D.

MR. HESTON HUMPHREYS AND THE DUKE OF BEDFORD.—Can any of your correspondents answer me a question asked by Junius of Woodfall, but not answered? "When did Mr. Heston Humphreys, an attorney, horsewhip the Duke of Bedford on Bedford race-course?" There is an account of the motives which led to the horse-whipping in the Sporting Magazine.

JOHN WILKINS.

Cuddington, Bucks.

MILITARY ENCAMPMENTS IN ENGLAND DURING THE YEARS 1779-80.—Could any correspondent refer me to a work relating to these, or furnish information respecting the sites of such, and the number and names of the regiments composing them?

J. P. H.

MINIATURE ILLUSTRATED BOOK.—Many years ago, when I was a boy, I saw a beautifully executed illustrated miniature book, of about two inches square. I do not remember the subject, but I have a clear recollection of the miniature publication, and its beautiful illustrations. The letterpress was fine and clear. Could some correspondent give me any information relative to this tiny publication, as I want it for a particular purpose?

S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

BEAU NASH.—Can any of your readers inform me what were the coat of arms, crest, and motto of the once celebrated Beau Nash, of Bath? of whom Goldsmith, in his Life, says that:—

"The history of a man, like Nash, who for more than fifty years presided over the pleasures of a polite kingdom, and whose life, though without anything to surprise, was ever marked with singularity, deserves the attention of the present age."

Any particulars relating to the above would be very grateful to

R. W. H. N.

Dublin.

PEDIGREES.—I should feel obliged to any correspondent who would give me (under cover to the Editor) a pedigree of the families of—1. Pringle of Sharpellaw; 2. Mr. Murray, an advocate of Edinburgh in 1720.

S.

QUOTATION FROM ARIOSTO.—

"Le même lorsque ces insectes entendent quelque bruit sur le bord des étangs qu'ils habitent, ou bien qu'ils en voient approcher des hommes dont l'aspect les épouvante, saisis d'un frayer soudain, ils sautent, ils se jettent d'un et d'autre côté dans leur asile ordinaire: l'onde résonne sous leur chute, et revenus du fond des retraites liquides où leur élançement les a plongés, ils ne laissent apercevoir que leur tête hors de l'eau."—Quoted as translated from Ariosto in Essai sur la Poésie Hérotique, p. 51, par J. B. Sarel. Paris, 1774.

I shall be obliged by a precise reference. I am almost sure that the above is not in the Orlando Furioso.

F. R. C.

Rue d'Angoulême, St. Honoré.

RENNIE OF MELVILLE CASTLE.—When did this castle (now Viscount Melville's seat near Edinburgh) first become the property of the Rennie family, and who and what was the first Rennie who acquired it?

F. M. S.

"THE KING OF SAXONY."—Whence come these lines?—

"The King of Saxony
Sat in his balcony,
To see all the monarchs go by."

I heard them quoted for their oddity a good deal more than forty years ago. Can they have formed part of a street ballad, which might have dated from the battle of Leipzig, when the humiliated King of Saxony might have witnessed the march of the victorious allies?

JAYDEE.

SEA-BATHING.—When did sea-bathing become first fashionable in England? I do not remember any mention of sea-baths in mediæval writers, and do not imagine sea-baths to have been widely used for sanatory purposes before our German kings began their dynasty. I do not think either Swift, Pope, or Addison alludes to sea-bathing. Did not tea and port wine gradually undermine our national constitution, and lead to the necessity of summer grapples with old Neptune, and pleasant dalliance with his nymphs? In Smollett's Humphrey Clinker, all readers of that work will remember a celebrated sea-bathing scene. For a long time I thought that the discovery of iodine and bromine in salt water had led to the increase of marine bathing; but I find that iodine was not discovered till 1812, nor bromine till 1826. Was Brighton the first fashionable bathing-place, or not?

WALTER THORNBURY.

GILBERT THOMSON, M.D., is author of Translations from Homer and Horace, and other poems, 1802. Can you inform me whether there is in this volume a translation of Ode 9, Book III. of Horace—"Horace and Lydia"? Is there a translation of the "Carmen Seculare"?

R. L.

WAYLAND WOOD.—In the curious little work, England's Gazetteer, London, 1778, is the following notice:—

"Wayland Wood, Norf., on the left hand between Watton and Merton, is commonly called Wailing-Wood, from a tradition of two infants murdered here by their uncle, which gave rise, 'tis said, to the old ballad of the two Children in the Wood."

Many antiquaries have been disposed to attribute all places called Wayland to the celebrated fabulous smith of that name. Which is the truer supposition in this case?

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

Queries with Answers.

INCENSE IN DIVINE OFFICES. — I should feel grateful if any readers of "N. & Q." could furnish me with any instances of the use of incense in the services of the English Church, since the change of religion under Henry VIII. There is, I believe, a form for the consecration of a censer, by Archbishop Sancroft. Would this form be simply for the consecration of the thurible or censer used at the coronation of a sovereign, or is it to be inferred that the use of incense was of common occurrence in the seventeenth century?

R. H. HILLS.

[The Form for the Consecration of a Censer by Archbishop Sancroft occurs in that prelate's Form of Dedication and Consecration of a Church or Chapel, 1685, without any allusion to the coronation service. It would appear from the following extracts that incense has been frequently used in the Church of England since the Reformation.

1603. Two pounds of frankincense were burnt in the church of Augustine, Farrington-within, London. Malcolin's Londinium Redivivum, ii. 88.

1626. "Paid for frankincense, 2d." — Churchwardens' Accounts of Great Wigston, Leicestershire.

1631. "The country parson takes order . . . secondly, that the church be swept and kept clean without dust or cobwebs, and at great festivals strewed and stuck with boughs, and perfumed with incense." — George Herbert's Priest to the Temple, chap. xiii.

Temp. James I. "A triquertral censer, wherein the clerk putteth frankincense at the reading of the first lesson. The navicula, like the keel of a boat, with a half cover and foot, out of which the frankincense is poured." Furniture of Bp. Andrewes' Chapel, Canterbury's Doom, p. 122.

Temp. Charles I. "In Peter House there was on the altar a pot, which they usually called the incense pot . . . A little boat, out of which the frankincense is poured, which Dr. Cosins had made use of in Peter House where he burned incense." — Canterbury's Doom, pp. 74, 123.

Ibid. "Upon some altars there was a pot called the incense-pot." — Neal's Puritans, ii. 224.

1683. In the accounts of St. Nicholas, Durham: "For frankincense at the Bishop's coming, 2s. 6d." — Surtees' Durham, iv. 52, fol. 1840.

1684. See Evelyn's Diary, March 30, 1684.

1760. In the coronation procession of George III. appeared the King's groom of the vestry, in a scarlet dress, holding a perfuming pan, burning perfumes, as at previous coronations. — Thomson's Coronation of George III.

About the year 1709, an eminent person of the Isle of Man wrote to the learned Henry Dodwell for his judgment on two points: "First, Whether the Church of England had just reasons, when she reformed, to lay aside the use of incense, which was practised in all churches before our quarrel with the Church of Rome. Secondly, The anointing with oil." To the last he made no answer; but his opinion respecting the use of incense he published in the following work, which is not only written with great perspicuity, but displays an intimate acquaintance with ecclesiastical antiquities: — "A Discourse concerning the Use of Incense in Divine Offices: wherein it is proved, that that practice, taken up in the Middle Ages, both by the Eastern and Western Churches, is, notwithstanding, an innovation from the Doctrine of the first and purest Churches, and the Traditions derived from the Apostles. Serving also to evince, that even the consent of those Churches of the Middle Ages, is no certain argument, that even the particulars wherein they are supposed to consent were faithfully derived from the Apostles, against the modern assertors of the Infallibility of Oral Tradition. By Henry Dodwell, M.A. 8vo. 1711." An excellent digest of this work is printed in Dr. Brokesby's Life of Mr. Henry Dodwell, with an Account of his Works, ii. 439—452, edit. 1715. Consult also Bingham's Antiquities of the Christian Church, Book viii. chap. vi. sect. 21.]

STEPHEN PERLIN. — In Charles Knight's Half-Hours with the Best Authors, edit. 1857, Part II. p. 129, are some curious extracts from Perlin's Description of the Kingdoms of England and Scotland. What is known of the author and his singular production?

O. T.

Richmond, Surrey.

[All that is known of Estienne Perlin is to be found in his work—a very curious and even amusing jumble of the transactions of the period. It appears that he studied in the university of Paris, and was an ecclesiastic, having composed a Latin work in "a lofty style, and with unparalleled industry," on the human body, and the disorders incident to it, dedicated to Henry II., who gave him license to publish it. His Description des Royaumes D'Angleterre et D'Ecosse, was published at Paris in 1558, 12mo. It was dedicated to the Duchess of Berri. This work, with the Histoire de l'Entrée de la Reine Mère dans la Grande Bretagne, par P. de la Serre (Par. 1639), was republished by R. Gough in 1775, 4to, illustrated with Cuts and English Notes. A copy of the first edition of Perlin's work was purchased for 2l. 2s. at James West's sale by John Martin, Esq., of Ham Court, Worcestershire. This copy had formerly belonged to Stephen Baluze, afterwards (in 1788) to the industrious William Oldys, who had added some marginal notes. Samuel Paterson, the bibliopole, thus describes the work: "The unfavourable report which this foolish Frenchman has made of the English; his description of London and some of its obsolete customs; the mistakes he has fallen into; the misnomers of persons and places he has committed, with his affectation of the language, of which 'tis very evident he never understood a single word, are truly ridiculous. But the particular time of his being here, the influence of the French ambassador Badaulphin, who, as he pretends, had our young King under his thumb ('il gouvernoit le petit Roy Edouart'); the unhappy union of Lord Guildford Dudley and Lady Jane Gray; the death of King Edward VI.; the proclaiming of Queen Jane; the beheading of the Duke of Northumberland, &c. (of which he was an eye-witness); the restoration of popery; the royal entry of Queen Mary, a description of her habit and complexion, and of the Princess Elizabeth, &c., render it a very singular piece of entertainment." Translations of both Perlin and De la Serre's works are given in the Antiquarian Repertory, iv. 501-547.]

ALDEBOROUGH: RAYNBOROW AND BENCE FAMILIES.—What is the best topographical account of Aldeborough in Suffolk?—a town which once sent members to parliament. Where shall I find any biographical or genealogical notices of William Raynborow, Esq., and Squire Bence, Knight, who represented that place in the parliament of 13 April, 1640? A. O. V. P.

[The best topographical account of Aldeborough is in Davy's Suffolk Collections, vol. xxiv. (Addit. MS. 19,100, Brit. Mus.), where the following monumental inscriptions to the Bence family occur: "Here lyeth the bodie of Squire Bence, the son of Alexander Bence; he had two wives, Elizabeth and Mary; by his first wife he had two children, who died young. He was balife of this Corporation three tymes, and Burgis in parliament twice. He deceased the 27th of November, 1648, of the age of fifty-one years, six months, and twelve days." On a free-stone slab: "Here resteth the body of Mrs. Mary Bence, the widow of Esq. Bence, Esq. (sic), who departed this life Oct. 16, 1618. Here also lieth the body of Mrs. Mary Glover, the neece of the said Mary Bence, who departed this life Sept. 31, 1680. Here also lieth the body of Esther Rabet, another neece of the said Mary Bence, and eldest sister of the said Mary Glover, who departed this life Feb. 7, 1713, aged seventy-five years." An account of the Bence family of Thorington Hall, Suffolk, is printed in Burke's Dict. of the Landed Gentry, edit. 1850, i. 81. We are unable to discover any notices of Wm. Raynborow.]

OPOPONAX.—I find, according to Balfour, this is an unbelliferous plant. Opoponax Chironum. My query is, the derivation of the word Opoponax? BOTANICUS.

[According to Bescherelle, the word is properly opopanax. "Quelques dictionnaires écrivent à tort opoponax; cette orthographe est contraire à l'étymologie." The word opopanax is originally Greek. ὀπὸν ἀνάξ, and means juice of the all-heal. Its source is threefold: ὀπὸν, juice; πᾶν, all; ἀκόμαι, to cure. So ὀποκύνωμιον, ὀποβάλαμον, &c.]

DECIPHERING MSS.—I observe in the Preface to the second volume of the Chronicles and Memorials of the Reign of Richard I., just published by the Government, that Mr. Stubbs observes upon the difficulty of deciphering the text which, in some places, had been defaced with some dull liquid; but he adds:—

"By a perfectly innocent process I have succeeded in making out every word, although some of the passages were at first sight almost an impenetrable brown."

Can you or any of your correspondents inform me what this innocent process may be? D. M.

Would any gentleman kindly inform me, what chemical will revive partially erased parchments, &c. I have several old family documents in my possession which are almost illegible.

H. C. M. LYTE.

[We have been informed by a gentleman who has for some years had occasion to use restoratives when transcribing ancient records either on vellum, parchment, or paper, that he has invariably found hydro-sulphate of ammonia, applied with a camel's-hair brush to the illegible parts, instantaneously effectual in freshening and restoring the writing, and, to the best of his knowledge, with perfectly innocuous results.]

"COALS TO NEWCASTLE."—Archbishop Trench, in his excellent work on Proverbs and their Lessons, speaking of the universality of this proverb, and its existence, though in different garb, in all languages and times, deduces in illustration of the fact four or five synonymous expressions in certain languages, and amongst others briefly alludes to the Greek, ἄθρως, ἡλάνη 'Athraws, hlanē' eis 'Athras, but omits to mention the Latin equivalents, Dare poma Alcinoi, and Lignum in sylvas ferre.

Will any of your readers give me the French and German expressions? A. H. K. C. L.

[As the French equivalent, Bohn (Polyglot of Foreign Proverbs), gives us, "Porter de feuilles au bois," to carry leaves to the wood. The Germans have "Wasser ins Meer tragen," to carry water into the sea.]

ORDER OF VICTORIA AND ALBERT.—What is the Order of Victoria and Albert? Her Majesty the Queen, the Princesses of Wales, and the Princesses of the Royal House, are recorded to wear the insignia of this Order on great state occasions. I shall be glad to be informed when, and under what circumstances, this "Order" was instituted? What is its character, who are the members, and what are the insignia? EQUUS.

[This can scarcely be called an Order, for it has never been formally instituted. It is a Memorial of the late Prince Consort, worn only, we believe, by the members of his family, to whom it is presented by Her Majesty.]

CHAUCER'S "CANTERBURY TALES:"
"BOB-UP-AND-DOWN."(3rd S. vi. 432.)

I am not well read in the works of commentators on Chaucer, and therefore do not know whether anyone has drawn attention to the want of probability in the conduct of the Canterbury Tales, as regards the time occupied in the pilgrim's journey. Chaucer's power of describing character, as shown in the introduction to his Tales, has been constantly admired; but did it never occur to him that a certain degree of probability was to be adhered to in respect of the time during which the journey was to be accomplished? The motley group that starts from the Tabard is not described as once halting for the night, between Southwark and Canterbury—a distance of more than fifty miles. Their arrival at Deptford, at Rochester, and at Boughton, is mentioned; but they are always travelling on.

If Chaucer thus totally neglected probability in the general travelling rate of his pilgrims, one cannot expect to find it attended to in details. It is, therefore, hardly necessary that I should show how unlikely it is that his "Bob-up-and-down" could be meant to designate Harbledown. This place is but a mile and a half from Canterbury, and yet between these two places we are to suppose all the following transactions to occur. First, the Manciple tells his tale: then the Host calls on the Preeſt, and his very long prose—not to say prosy—discourse is followed by the Coke's tale. The Host next encounters the Plowman, and lays him under contribution; and when his tale (along one) is ended, we read that "All this fresh fellowship were come to Cantirbury."

Now, by the time the cavalcade had arrived within a mile and a half of the shrine, they would surely have ceased story-telling, and been preparing to enter the city with due solemnity.

The Chanone's Yemanne's prologue begins thus:—

"Whan that tolde was the lif of Seinte Cecile,
Er we had ridden fully five mile,
At Boughton under Blee us gan attake
A man that clothed was in clothes blake."

Then follows the Chanone's Yemanne's tale—a short one; and then comes the Manciple's prologue, beginning:—

"Wot ye not wher stondith a litel town."

So that, between Boughton and the "litel town"—a distance of about four miles and a half—there is only time for one short tale, the Chanone Yemanne's; but, between the "litel town" and Canterbury, come four tales—the Manciple's, the Preeſt's, the Coke's, and the Plowman's. All told while they are riding a mile and a half, if we accept Harbledown as the—

"Under the Blee in Cantirbury way."
litel town

Tyrwhitt rejects the Plowman's tale as spurious; but even if that and the Coke's tale be left out, there still remains a disproportionate length of discourse for the short distance the pilgrims still had to travel. Tyrwhitt alludes to the very fragmentary, imperfect, and transposed condition in which the tales have come down to us. Is it possible, by any re-arrangement of their order, to apportion them in some probable accordance with the time the journey to Canterbury would require? Can this be done by a careful collation of MSS.? Or are we to suppose that, as Chaucer designed the Pilgrimage merely as a framework on which to hang his stories, he did not care to consider how far he violated the probabilities of time and space?
J. DIXON.

"LILLIBULLERO."

MUSIC FOR THE LUTE: "LEEROW WAY."

(3rd S. vii. 475.)

The words "leerow way" in the MS. of lute music noticed by MR. J. HUBAND SMITH, are directions to tune the lute "lyra way," or like the lyra viol, for that particular piece. The letters a b c d, in this "tablature" notation, are not notes, but indications where the fingers of the left hand are to be placed upon the strings. Thus a signifies the open string, b to place the finger above the first fret, c the second, and so on. The lines over which these letters are written represent the strings of the lute. So b over the highest line would mean that the highest string is to be sounded, the finger being placed above the first fret, or division of the finger board. As the note thus made would be a semitone above the open string, all would depend upon the note to which that open string had been tuned. Hence the necessity of understanding the various modes in which the lute was tuned as the one and only difficulty in deciphering lute music.
WM. CHAPPELL.

In the south and south-east of Ireland, "many a time and oft," in the corn-fields in harvest time, have I heard the girls who were engaged in binding the corn into sheaves after the reapers, sing the following chorus, which always had reference to one of the gang who was not as quick at her work as the others, and who consequently was left behind. I give the words as pronounced, and when sung in concert by several voices had a pleasing effect:—

"Lully by lero,
Lully by lero,
Lully by lero,
Help her along."

An intelligent old gentleman once told me it was the chorus of a Jacobite song, and was contemporaneous with the "Blackbird," which commenced —

"Once in fair England
My blackbird did flourish," &c.

But of the first-named song I never heard more than the above chorus.

S. REDMOND.

BIRTH OF RICHARD II.

(3rd S. vii. 471.)

Your correspondent HERMENTRUDE seems to take it as almost certain that Richard II. was born in 1366, rejecting the authority of Froissart as a very inaccurate writer, whose statements militate in this case with "the general consent of historians." I have often been struck with the fallibility of historians in cases of this kind, but so far as I am aware there is no discrepancy in this instance between contemporary authorities. The statement of Froissart, who uses the modern commencement of the year, is, that Richard was born "on a Wednesday, the Feast of Epiphany, in the year 1367." He is even particular enough to add "about eight o'clock in the morning," so that it may be presumed he was tolerably well informed. Now if he had committed an error in the date of the year it is obvious that the Feast of Epiphany (January 6) would not have fallen upon a Wednesday, and the care with which the other elements of the date have been stated would thus have enabled us to correct the numerical error. But in 1367 the 6th of January actually was a Wednesday, while in 1366 it was a Tuesday; so that if your correspondent's date is right, Froissart is doubly wrong.

It is, indeed, true that English writers give the year 1366 as the date of Richard's birth; but as they invariably make the year commence on March 25, there is no real disagreement between them and Froissart. On the contrary, their statement is a confirmation of his, and Thorne's Chronicle, which puts the event in 1366, confirms both the year and day: —

"Eodem anno in Epiphania Domini natus est Ricardus Rex Anglia apud Burdeywe." —

If this entry had been under the year, 1367, it would not have confirmed Froissart's date, but the reverse; for it would have stood for 1368 of the Roman reckoning which we now use, and which Froissart also used. But as it stands in the year 1366, we know that it means 1367 of the modern computation. If any doubt, however, be supposed to remain on this point, it is entirely set at rest by the inquisitions taken on the death of the Black Prince (Inquis. post mortem, 50 Edw. III., First Numbers, No. 70). Two inquisitions were held, the one in Warwickshire and the other in Leicestershire, on Tuesday after St. Margaret's day, 50 Edw. III. (July 22, 1376), in both of which it was found that the Black Prince died on the Trinity Sunday last past, and that his son and heir, Richard, was, at the date of the inquisition, nine and a half years old. Thus the rumours brought to London on February 25, 1368, could not possibly be those of Richard's birth.

JAMES GAIRDNER.

DIFFERENCES OF EPISCOPAL COATS: AND THE COAT OF THE SEE OF GLOUCESTER.

(3rd S. vii. 488.)

The coat of the see of Gloucester has a history which is not unworthy of a short note, which I hope MR. WOODWARD will accept as a reply to part of his on p. 480.

1. In the conventual seal, as figured in the new edition of the Monasticon, the coat is: A sword erect in pale, oppressing two keys in saltier, their wards to the chief, and turned outwards.

2. The same bearing is to be seen at Winchcombe on the Piscina. Winchcombe had a Benedictine house, of which no traces now remain. The parish church was built in the reigns of Henry VI. and Edward IV.

3. The same bearing is to be seen on tiles in Gloucester Cathedral.

4. It appears also in Little Malvern church, also Benedictine. But on the Gloucester and Little Malvern tiles, the wards of the keys are turned inwards.

5. It appears also in the sinister spandrel, on the outside wall of the south porch of Gloucester Cathedral. But there the point of the sword is in the base.

6. However, Father Clement Rayner, in his Apostolatus Benedictinorum in Angliā, printed in Douai in the year 1620, gives, at p. 214, thirty-nine shields of the convents of his illustrious Order in England; among which Gloucester stands first: Azure, two keys in saltier, the key in bend surmounted by the key in bend sinister, their wards to the chief, and turned outwards, or.

Here the new coat, which has been adopted by the Protestant Bishops, is, by a curious mistake, attributed to the abbey. Father Clement Rayner's absence from England, and his inability to refer to the seal of the abbey will account for the mistake.

It should also be mentioned that a coat appears in the chapel of the Apostles in the abbey (now the cathedral) church; which, if intended for the coat of the abbey, shows a singular variation. Two rows of shields crossed the upper part of the reredos. Several have perished. The lower row contains twenty-four; of which the twelfth is this —

The abbey coat, with the addition of a crown on the point of the sword in chief.

The question arises why the sword of St. Paul appears in the arms of a church originally dedicated to St. Peter. I think the reason can be detected in No. VI. of the "Cartæ ad Glocestrense Cænobium spectantes," in vol. i. of the New Monasticon, p. 542. There we find, in the account of a change made in the religious house in the year 1022, that —

"Wolstanus clericos qui ecclesiam Sancti Petri antea reixerant, custodierant, sub protectione Dei et Apostolorum PETRI ET PAULI et regulâ Beati Benedicti, in eadem Ecclesiâ regulariter collocavit."

The religious preserved the memory of the addition of St. Paul to their dedication in a very significant way. No. VIII. of the Cartæ (p. 543) has this: —

"In die festivitatis Apostolorum Petri et Pauli, hoc anno [1089] Glovernensis ecclesiæ locatur fundamentum, venerabili viro Roberto Herefordensi episcopo primum lapidem in eo ponente, prasente dompno Serlone Abbate."

I have not seen any ancient exemplification of the abbey coat which does not contain the sword.

The same church (Gloucester) furnishes a good example of an episcopal difference. On a tile in the Lady Chapel, on the north side, by the stalling, and again in the small chapel on the south of the Lady Chapel, and opening out of it, is this: Per pale, Baron, on a chevron between three birds contournées, as many crosiers. Femme, the see of Canterbury. Here occurred the not unfrequent workman's mistake of giving the arms reversed. It is the coat of Archbishop Dene, Prior of Lantony and Archbishop of Canterbury.

The coat of Courtenay, Bishop of Winchester, appears under the sill of the east window of Winchester Cathedral, at the north end of the sill. It shows the three torteaux placed rather low down in the field, and a label of three long points, each charged with three roundlets. Outside the shield, folded round it from the base, but not reaching to the top, are the two dolphins—placed not as tennans, but as genuine supports.

Alcock, Bishop of Worcester, and afterwards of Ely, differenced his coat with a mitre: Argent on a fesse, between three cocks' heads erased s., combed and wattled or, a mitre with lappets of the third. Jesus College, Cambridge (of his foundation) has this coat, with the additional difference of a bordure gules charged with eight crowns, or.

Reginald de Bryan, Bishop of Worcester, translated to Ely, died before he could take possession of his second see. He was buried at Worcester. When Thomas published his Survey of the Cathedral Church of Worcester, in 1736, he gave a plate of this bishop's tomb, standing against the north wall in the Jesus chapel. It has long since disappeared. The plate shows the arms of the Barons de Bryan, without giving the tinctures: (or) three piles (azure); not, however, meeting in point as they do on the tomb of Sir Guy de Bryan in Tewkesbury Abbey church. But the centre pile is differenced by a charge, very badly drawn; which may either be a cross fichée (as it was most likely intended to be), or a dagger, ensigned with a mitre at the top. This was the bishop to whom the Black Prince wrote his letter, giving an account of the battle of Poitiers.

The whole theory of these differences is told by Francis Thynne, Lancaster Herald, in his "Letter to a Peer," in March, 1605, printed at the end of Guillim's Display, edit. 1724. There (pp. 37, 38,) he says: —

"So much did our ancestors derogate from the arms of the Bishops, as that the Bishops which were interested in the arms of their ancestors might not bear the arms of their House without some notorious difference, not answerable to the difference of other younger brethren. As did the Bishop of Lincoln, Henry Burghersche; the Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Arundell; the Archbishop of York, Richard Scroop; the Bishop of Norwich, Henry Spencer, and many others; who did not bear the common differences of arms of younger sons, but great and notorious differences as bordures, some engrailed, some with mitres, or such like; whereof I can shew your Lordship many forms."

This note is already too long. Another day I will ask for room to say something about the impalement of the see with the private coat of the bishop.

D. P.

Stuarts Lodge, Malvern Wells.

EDWARD DYER (3rd S. vii. 399.) — This gentleman, I believe, is the same who resided at Sharpsham Park, near Glastonbury, which, before the dissolution of the abbey, had belonged to and was one of the country seats of the Abbots. There is a pedigree of the family of Dyer in Phelps's Hist. Som. vol. i. 563. Edward Dyer obtained a grant of Sharpsham Park, with the adjacent estate now held by Lord Cavan. A branch of the family was settled at Street, about three miles from Sharpsham Park, and occupied a mansion there called "Street House." The manor of Street also belonged to them. The name of Edward Dyer frequently occurs in commissions of inquiry, and for other purposes issued about the middle of the seventeenth century.

The following epitaphs could, until lately, be seen on a brass-plate in the church of St. John the Baptist, Glastonbury: —

"Here lie the Bodies of Alexander Dyer, and Katherine his Wife. He Son and Heir of Thomas Dyer, late of Street in Somerset, Gent., deceased. She the daughter of John Thornburgh, late of Spaddesdon in Hampshire, Esq. He died the 7th of March, 1633; she the 26th of September, 1650.

"But they shall rise; as grain in earth they lie,
Which cannot quicken unless first it die;

Here having slept they shall awak't appeare
At the trumpet's sound, and come thy blessed heare.
Here lies also what is mortall of Captaine John Dyer, who died the 24th of Aprill, 1670.

"Whom neither sword nor gunn in warr
Could slay, in peace a cough did marr;
'Gainst rebells hee, and lust and sinn,
Fought the good fight and life to winn.
Done by Alexander his brother's weive's son."

In the church of Street is a still older brass-plate thus inscribed:—

"Here lyeth the Body of Margeret, the wiffe of Thomas Dyer of this prysh, Gent., and Daughter of Robert Parrys, lat of Charde, Gent., who dyed in Chillebedd the xixth of Apryle, 1583, of the age of xxiiiij years and fyve Monethes: Maryed x yeares, savyng fyve weekes, leaving three sonnes, two daughters alyve, and one sonne more buryed, ffor whose rare and manyfold vertues, giftes, qualities most godly lyfe and deth God be praysed.—Amen."

Would C. H. M. favour me with a copy or an abstract of the commission of 1644 to Edward Dyer?
THO. SERREL.

Wells.

OBJECTIVE (3rd S. vii. 474.)—Although there is no doubt that the words objective and subjective were in use prior to Coleridge, they were not used in the same distinctive senses as he applied them. Hume had spoken of the connexion of cause and effect (Essays, ii. 75) in such a way as to indicate that this connexion might be in the mind, and independent of experience. Kant took up this suggestion in his Prolegomena (pp. 8, 52, 74, 79), working it out inductively; and in his Critique of Pure Reason, synthetically. It has since been deemed a most important distinction: objective relating to external objects; subjective to the notions of the mind; the former referred to the perceived object, the latter to the perceiving faculty. In English we still confound object and subject, which their etymology alone should serve to discriminate (Critique, Bohn's ed. pp. 62-63.) The distinction was well understood by the ancients in the terms phenomena and noumena (Proleg. p. 149).

T. J. BUCKTON.

FIVE MINIATURES (3rd S. vii. 479.)—I have some recollection of having seen a similar set of portraits of five priests who were executed in the reign of Charles I. for constructive treason, that is, under the penal statutes, as Catholic priests. Who Cooke was I cannot discover: priests were driven in those days to pass under various names, and he perhaps was better known under some other alias. But the fifth, to whom no name is attached, was, I have no doubt, the Rev. Hugh Green, alias Ferdinand Brooks. When Charles I. issued a proclamation, commanding all priests to depart the kingdom by a certain day, Mr. Green was about to embark from Lyme, on board a vessel for France; but was arrested on the ground of the day fixed by the proclamation being past. He was taken before a justice of peace, and pleaded his good intention to obey the proclamation, and hoped that advantage would not be taken of a mistake of two or three days. He was notwithstanding committed to Dorchester jail, and, after five months' imprisonment, was tried and condemned by Judge Foster to die as for high treason, solely for being a priest. He was executed at Dorchester, August 19, 1642. His execution was attended with almost incredible barbarity. He was cut down after hanging but a few minutes, being perfectly sensible, and able to sit upright. A timid unskilful man, who was to quarter him, ripped him up, which Mr. Green feeling, was so fully conscious, that he made the sign of the cross with his right hand, saying three times, "Jesu, Jesu, Jesu, mercy!"

This is the account of a Catholic lady, who knelt at his head, and held it all the time. Another account says that his words were: "Jesus, have mercy upon me." Either will, I think, sufficiently identify the portrait as that of Rev. Hugh Green.

There were other barbarities accompanying this execution too horrible to relate. It was full half an hour before the sufferer ceased to have consciousness; and it was only at last by the above-mentioned lady, Mrs. Willoughby's, intercession, that he was put out of pain by having his throat cut, and his head chopped off. (See Dodd's Church Hist. vol. iii. p. 86, and Challoner's Memoirs of Missionary Priests, vol. ii.) F. C. H.

THE LAST MEMBER OF THE IRISH PARLIAMENT (3rd S. vii. 474.)—I am anxious to correct a slight inaccuracy in my communication respecting the late Sir Thomas Staples, Bart., and with this object I ask insertion for the following extract from Saunders's Newsletter, May 23, 1865, as quoted from the Solicitors' Journal:—

"It has been stated in the public journals that he (Sir T. Staples) was one of the members of the Irish Parliament who voted against the Union. This seems to be a mistake, for neither in the Black List (those who voted for the Union), nor in the Red List (those who voted against that measure), which are given in Sir Jonah Barrington's work, does the name appear. His father, John Staples, voted for the Union. It was understood that the son entertained different views. But, in fact, he was not a member of the Irish Parliament when it ceased to exist. The Commons' Journals for 1800 show that on the 18th March Mr. Thomas Staples was sworn in as member for Knocktopher, in the room of Sir Hercules Langrishe; that on April 12 a writ issued for Knocktopher, in the room of Thomas Staples, who had accepted the office of Escheator of Ulster (an office similar to the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds); and that on May 12 Mr. Stephen Mahon was sworn in as member for Knocktopher, in the room of Mr. Staples."

ABBEA.

"MATTHEW, MARK," ETC. (3rd S. vii. 427.)—There is another, and more common, version of this, viz.:—

"Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
Bless the bed that I lie on;
All the four corners round about,
When I get in, and when I get out."

X.

When I was a Suffolk boy, near sixty years ago, this prayer (if it can be so called) was in common use, at least among the younger branches. The form differed somewhat from that given by your correspondent. There were, I think, two, if not more; but at this time I can call only one to my memory:—

"Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
Bless the bed that I lay * on;
Four corners to my bed,
Four Angels there lay * spread.
God within and God without,
And Jesus Christ all round about."

This is not so much like a prayer as that which appears on p. 427 of the last volume; but at any rate, the saying it was considered an all-sufficient protection for the night by those who used it, but whether it was against hags and witches, or against evil generally, I am unable to say.

W. H.—Y.

JOHN FITZGIBBON, FIRST EARL OF CLARE (3rd S. vii. 323.)—His parents were married in St. Peter's Church, Dublin, by license, dated 18 Jan. 1738, describing them thus:—"John Fitzgibbon, of Dublin, Esq., and Ellinor Grove of St. Peter's, Spinster." They afterwards lived in Stephen's Green, where the Earl was probably born. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, on 9th June, 1759 (Annus Academicus, 1758), aged sixteen, or in his sixteenth year, which would fix the date of his birth either in 1743 or 1744 (not 1749). A search in the parish register of St. Peter's for those years would probably enable ABHRA to discover the place of his birth, and the date of his baptism. His birthplace is entered in the College books as "Dublin." H. LOFTUS TOTTENHAM.

REGNAL YEARS (3rd S. vii. 478.)—Perhaps your correspondent HERMENTRUDE will allow me to help her out of the chronological difficulty under which she labours with regard to the Issue Roll of Michaelmas, 51 Edw. III. Upon an examination of the roll, I find that it comprises parts of two regnal years; it commences with Michaelmas in the fiftieth year, and finishes at Easter in the fifty-first year; but nevertheless it is called the Michaelmas roll of the fifty-first year; and this practice is followed with the other rolls of the same reign.

I do not pretend to any very high mathematical knowledge, or acquaintance with ciphers; but I think I can give HERMENTRUDE an illustration from the roll itself, which will quite settle the point and confirm what I have above stated.

* So in Suffolk.

The first entry on the Michaelmas roll of the fifty-first year is dated on Wednesday, October 1. Now the day of the week being given as well as that of the month, enables one to pronounce with certainty on the year of our Lord, i. e. 1376, in the fiftieth regnal year; and the last entry is for Monday, March 23, which belongs to the next year, 1377, in the fifty-first regnal year; and these dates will be found to be all consistent with each other.

There really is no difficulty at all. The roll extends from October 1, 1376 to March 23, 1377, and the king died on June 21, 1377, so that all anachronism disappears at once. W. H. HART.

Folkestone House, Roupell Park, Streatham.

MOTHER-IN-LAW (3rd S. vii. 480.)—In the Pickwick Papers, the immortal Sam Weller always speaks of his father's second wife as his "mother-in-law." From the knowledge which Mr. Dickens possesses of the sayings as well as the doings of all classes of people, I should infer that it is usual for an uneducated man to thus designate his step-mother. H. FISHWICK.

TOTTY (3rd S. vii. 450.)—I have had frequent correspondence with a person of the name of John Totty, living in Shropshire, within the last year.

G. W.

EXCHEQUER RECORDS (3rd S. vii. 476.)—Although the date of these extracts are not given, I think they must refer to fines imposed by the last High Commission, of 1686, for Stephen College, "the Protestant joiner," was not executed till 1681. The exorbitant amount of the fines for the trivial offences specified seem quite in character with the proceedings of Judge Jefferys and his High Commission, as stated in my Notices of the High Commission. There is no record of the proceedings of this last court, and I have therefore no means of identifying the names of Best, Swaden, and Bennables. JOHN S. BURN.

The Grove, Henley.

SPUR MONEY IN BELFRIES (3rd S. vii. 324, 446, 488.)—The "Rules for the Ringers" in Burnley church differ somewhat from those instanced by MR. FLECK. In Harrison Ainsworth's Lancashire Witches, the church at Burnley is described as possessing a "spire." This is not now the case, for the present tall square tower was raised from the base of the spire, a height of thirty feet, in 1803; and on a large tablet in the "ringing room" we have the complete code as follows:—

"I. That the ringers begin twenty minutes before Ten and be ready for chiming fifteen minutes after Ten, and chime five minutes, or forfeit 6d.

"II. In the afternoon to begin twenty minutes after Two, and chime five minutes before Three, or forfeit 6d.

"N.B. The above forfeits shall be paid to the Churchwardens.

- "III. Any person attempting to ring with spurs on to forfeit 6d.
 "IV. For not attending to practise on Monday and Tuesday evenings at ten minutes past Eight to forfeit 3d.
 "V. For swearing, or telling a lie in the steeple, to forfeit 3d.
 "VI. For a ringer coming into the steeple intoxicated, to forfeit 3d.
 "VII. For divulging anything out of the steeple which may tend to produce mischief, to forfeit 3d.
 "N.B. Also to the informer 3d.
 "VIII. For overthrowing a bell, to forfeit 2d.
 "IX. For ringing with the hat on, to forfeit 2d.
 "June 9th, 1804."

Many other curious extracts from the churchwardens' accounts, &c., may be seen in my History of the Parochial Church of Burnley, pp. 51-95. T. T. WILKINSON, F.R.A.S., &c.

NICKNAME (3rd S. vii. 400.)—I see that a correspondent signs his communication to you, NICKNAME, and this reminds me of a passage in Rushworth (Appendix, 40):—

"And afterwards at several other times, the Defendants and others Nicknamed, took away tithes from the plaintiff's servants."

Did this declaration refer to persons known only by some sobriquet, as "Carrotty Fred," or "Velvet Ned," or was there formerly another meaning to the word? I have referred to your first and second Series, as to the derivation of the word. JOHN S. BURN.

SAGO (3rd S. vii. 478.)—In reply to A. P. I send you the following extract from the Annual Register for 1766, "Chronicle," p. 110:—

"Mr. Bowen has lately, by his travels into China, discovered a powder which all wayfaring people use there as an occasional diet, and which cannot fail of being greatly serviceable in hospitals, the army, the navy, in all ships, especially the African, and in all long voyages, being an excellent anti-scorbutic. This powder is no other than that of sago, or China salop; and he has also discovered that the vegetable from whence it is prepared is to be found in our own colony of Georgia, from whence he has himself brought it, and manufactured some quantity, for which the Society of Arts have shown their entire approbation, by presenting him with their gold medal."

W. EARP TOMPKINS.

MARCOLPHUS (3rd S. vii. 477.)—Some account of the Marcolphus who could not find a tree to be hanged on, is contained in the following work (black letter, 4to, 1490):—

"Collationes quas dicuntur fecisse mutuo rex Salomon sapientissimus et Marcolphus facie deformis et turpissimus, tamen ut fertur eloquentissimus."

After several disputations between Solomon and Marcolphus, the king is so highly offended that he orders his servants to arrest Marcolphus and hang him. Marcolphus asks only that he may be hanged on a tree of his own choosing ("vt i illo ligno q^d elegero suspedar.") The king consents; the king's ministers conduct Marcolphus out of the city through the valley of Josaphat by Mount Olivet as far as Jericho: not a tree can he find to his liking. They then cross the Jordan and traverse Arabia, visit Carmel, Libanus, and the Red Sea. Nowhere could Marcolphus find the right tree. "Et sic euasit manus Salomonis regis. Post hoc domū remeans quieuit in pace." SCHIR.

CLENT HILL (3rd S. vii. 507.)—The book called Centine Rambles is waste paper. There are interesting notices of Hagley and the neighbourhood, in Hugh Miller's First Impressions of England. There is no doubt at all that the four stones are much older than George Lord Lyttelton's time. LYTTELTON.

CANNEL COAL (3rd S. vii. 418, 485.)—Perhaps the following precise quotations may be useful as additional proofs of the early use of the word "cannel" for this particular kind of coal. Leland states in his Itinerary, vol. vii. fo. 59, that in the time of Henry VIII.:—

"Mr. Bradeshau hath a place caullid Hawe, a myle from Wigan. He hath found moche Canel, like Se-Cole, in his grounde, very profitable to him. . . . Camale and colepittes in diuers partes of Darbyshire. . . . The great myne of camale is at Hawe."

By Darbyshire is meant West Derby hundred. Camden does not follow Leland in mentioning the Haigh Cannel. The following passage (given in "N. & Q." from a translation) occurs as follows, under "Durham" in his Britannia, of 1590, p. 590, and in his last and best edition of 1607, p. 600; but the expression cannel is not applied to the "Carbo fossiles," noticed more briefly in his first edition of 1586, p. 438:—

"Si vero Obsidianus lapis apud nos sit, illum esse credam qui aliis Angliæ locis reperitur et Canoie-cole vulgo appellatur."

LANCASTRIENSIS.

DAUGHTER PRONOUNCED DAFTER (1st S. viii. 292, 304.)—Is it not strange that when your correspondents were giving instances of this pronunciation, they overlooked that household book, Pilgrim's Progress?—

"Despondency, good man, is coming after,
 And so, also, is Much-afraid, his daughter."

JAYDER.

CARY FAMILY (3rd S. vii. 424, 466.)—I beg to express my acknowledgments to your two correspondents who have explained the origin of the error into which I had fallen in supposing that there had been a Bishop of Killaloe of the name of Cary. Allow me to avail myself of the present opportunity to inquire whether historic doubts have not recently been cast on the existence of James Cary, supposed to have been appointed to the bishopric of Exeter in 1420? MELETER.

MEAT AND MALT: MOROCCO (3rd S. vii. 73.)—The practice of putting flesh into beer, referred to by your correspondents, was probably not with the view of improving the liquor for general use, but in the same vain hope of supplying the waste caused by mortal disease in the human frame which led Bacon to write the following recipe in his first "Century":—

"Take two large capons, parboil them upon a soft fire by the space of an hour or more till, in effect, all the blood be gone. Add in the decoction the peel of a sweet lemon, or a good part of the peel of a citron, and a little mace. Cut off the shanks and throw them away; then with a good strong chopping knife, mince the capons, bones and all, as small as ordinary minced meat; put them into a large neat boulder; then take a kilderkin, sweet and well seasoned, of four gallons of beer of eight shillings strength, new, as it comes from the tunning; make in the kilderkin a great bung-hole of purpose, then thrust into it the boulder (in which the capons are) drawn out in length; let it steep in it three days and three nights, the bung hole open to work, then close the bung hole, and so let it continue a day and a half, then draw it into bottles, and you may drink it well after three days bottling, and it will last six weeks (approved). It drinketh fresh, flowreth, and mantleth exceedingly, it drinketh not newish at all, it is an excellent drink for a consumption to be drunk either alone or carded with some other beer. It quencheth thirst, and hath no whit of windiness. Note that it is not possible that meat and bread, either in broths or taken with drink, as is used, should get forth into the veins and outward parts as finely and easily as when it is thus incorporated and made almost a chylus beforehand. Tryal would be made of the like brew with potado roots or bur roots, or the pith of artichokes, which are nourishing meats. It may be tried also with other flesh, as pheasant, partridge, young pork, pig, venison, especially of young deer, &c."

It may be noted that the word "carded" in the above passage is apparently used in the sense of mixed; it is now used only in the opposite sense, and applied solely, I believe, to one operation, the carding of wool and flax. C. Ross.

COUTANCES (3rd S. vii. 494.)—The following extract from Fuller's Worthies of England, ii. 8 (Nuttall's edit.), may serve as a reply to this question:—

"And know, reader, these martyrs [previously mentioned] dying in the Isle of Guernsey, are here reckoned in Hampshire, because that island, with Jersey (formerly subordinate to the Archbishop of Coutance, in Normandy,) have, since the reign of Queen Elizabeth, been annexed to the diocese of Winchester."

D. B.

SERMONS TO BIRDS (3rd S. vi. 141. 210.)—

"Another saint Ailbhe had a different kind of intercourse with certain cranes. They went about in a large body destroying the corn in the neighbourhood, and would not be dispersed. The saint went and delivered an oration to them on the unreasonableness of their conduct, and forthwith penitent and somewhat ashamed, they soared into the air and went their way."—The Book-Hunter, 358.

F. H. A.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

The Holy Land. By W. Hepworth Dixon. With Illustrations from original Drawings and Photographs. In Two Volumes. (Chapman & Hall.)

It is long since we have taken up so interesting a book of Travels as the work before us, in which Mr. Dixon gives us from the Letters sent home by him from Palestine, the results of his studies of the Scenery and Politics of the Sacred Story made by him in the Holy Land, in the tent, the saddle, and the wayside khan. In publishing them for the purpose of affording untravelled readers a little help in figuring to themselves the country and events which occupy so many of our thoughts, Mr. Dixon modestly renounces the dream of instructing scholars in their craft, avoids dogma as beyond the province of a lay writer, and in a great measure leaves controversy to critics. Mr. Dixon has shown in some of his former works that he has an eye capable of seizing in a rapid glance the salient characteristics of a landscape. That he is as readily observant of the characteristics of a people, the work before us abundantly proves; while his pen is that of a ready writer, which can paint with a few effective words a vivid sketch of the scene or incidents which he desires to bring before his readers. With these qualifications and such a theme as the Holy Land, Mr. Dixon could not fail to produce not merely a readable, but a striking book; a book not without faults, not without occasional affectations; but a book so graphic and so full of interest that we shall be greatly disappointed if it is not destined (printed perhaps in a more compact form), to be the regular companion, in tent, saddle, and wayside khan (to repeat Mr. Dixon's own terms) of all future wanderers in the Holy Land.

The Works of William Shakespeare. The Text revised by the Rev. Alexander Dyce. In Eight Volumes. Vol. VI. (Chapman & Hall.)

This sixth volume of Mr. Dyce's valuable edition of Shakespeare contains no less than six Plays—Troilus and Cressida; Coriolanus; Titus Andronicus; Romeo and Juliet; Timon of Athens, and Julius Caesar; and there is probably no other volume of the edition which contains so many doubtful and disputed passages. Some idea of the labour which Mr. Dyce was called upon to bestow upon these Plays may be gathered from the fact that his notes in the present volume number nearly 700. Some of course are brief as the posey of a ring, but others, like the one in which he supports the reading of "That rude day's eyes may wink," in the well-known passage in Romeo and Juliet, are Essays in little. All prove Mr. Dyce's fitness for his task, and his intimate knowledge of the literature of Shakespeare's time; and the propriety of a large proportion of his readings will be readily accepted. But we think the conservative spirit influences him much too strongly in some cases, as when in the passage from Timon of Athens, Act V. Sc. 1.—

"Tell Athens in the sequence of degree,
From high to low throughout, that whoso please
To stop affliction, let him take his halter,
Come hither, ere my tree hath felt the axe,
And hang himself,"—

he prefers the unsatisfactory old text "take his haste." Surely neither such phrases as "make your speed," "with all his hast," and "take your journey," adduced by Mr. Dyce; nor "take his gait," adduced by Mr. Grant White, justify the retention of so obscure a passage as "take his haste."

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.—Before these lines meet the eyes of our readers, the last chord will have died away of one of the grandest and most successful musical celebrations ever heard in this or any other country. It is now upwards of a century since the great Shakespeare of Sweet Sounds, of whose works it may be truly said, age does not wither them, nor custom stale their infinite variety, was laid to his rest in Westminster Abbey. With Handel, as with Shakespeare, however, the popular appreciation of his genius grows with increasing years. During the week just ended, upwards of three thousand diligent students of his unrivalled compositions have gathered together to give effect to their performance; and we shall not perhaps greatly err if we state that the admiring listeners to that performance—old men and maidens, young men and children—numbered something like one hundred thousand persons.

The execution of the works of the great master was almost perfect; the new arrangements made the performances still more effective, and all who shared in those performances received public acknowledgments of their skill in the plaudits with which that skill was greeted. But there were others who contributed to the work, and we would call the attention of those who enjoyed this great musical treat to their obligation to Mr. Bowley, the General Manager, and Mr. Grove, the Secretary of the Crystal Palace, for their successful organisation of this remarkable Triennial Handel Festival.

Literature has sustained a great loss in the destruction by fire, on Thursday morning last, of the curious and valuable library of the late Mr. OFFON, which was on sale by Messrs. Sotheby & Wilkinson, whose well-known premises in Wellington Street have been utterly destroyed. Those gentlemen will, we are sure, have the warmest sympathy of all our readers.

Messrs. Moxon & Co., who devote themselves more particularly to the publication of Poetry, will hereafter publish all Mr. Martin Tupper's poetical works.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Particulars of Price, &c., of the following Books, &c., to be sent direct to the gentlemen by whom they are required, whose names and addresses are given for that purpose:—

RACON'S LORENZO DE MEDICI. Vol. I. Quarto. 2nd edition.
Wanted by Mr. Gatty, Ecclesfield Vicarage, Sheffield.

The following engraved Portraits:—

1. Geo. Mackenzie, Visct. Tarbutt. (Blanc.)
2. Viscountess Tarbutt. (Johnson.)
3. The late Mr. Brodie of Brodie.
4. James, Earl of Seafield. (Smith.)
5. David Smythe, Lord Methven. (Kaye.)
6. Sir J. Carmichael Smyth. (Hodgette.)
7. Rev. C. Wyvil. (Meyer.)

Chromo-lithograph of "Malton Priory" from Richardson and Churton's Monastic Antiquities of Yorkshire.

Wanted by F. H. S., 229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

Notices to Correspondents.

THE INDEX TO OUR SEVENTH VOLUME will be circulated with "N. & Q." of Saturday the 15th inst.

Daniel before the Assassination of Rulers, by Mr. Lee, Purcell Papers by Mr. Roff, Miniatures on Ivory, by Mr. Chalmers Morgan, and many other papers of interest in our next.

P. R. C. Met. Biographical Dictionary contains a notice of Leonard Plunket, but the best account of him is by Sir J. F. Smith in Rees's Cyclopædia, vol. xxvii. Consult also Polly's Sketches of Botany.

Answers to other Correspondents in our next.

See Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d., or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 8d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STAMPED COPIES for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly INDEX) is 11s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. BARNES, 23, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all Communications for THE EDITOR should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

NOTES AND QUERIES.—General Index

To First Series, contains about 30,000 references. Price 1s. cloth boards.
33, Wellington Street, Strand, W.C.

NOTES AND QUERIES.—Second Series.

12 Vols. Price 6s. 6d. cloth boards.

GENERAL INDEX to ditto, with 30,000 references. Price 1s. 6d. cloth boards.
33, Wellington Street, Strand, W.C.

HARLEY-LODGE, Harley Road, Adelaide Road, N.W. Since 1860, from a number limited to 18, upwards of 80 pupils have passed the various examinations, including 18 in high positions at the India Civil Service and Woolwich. No failure at Sandhurst or direct commissions in four years. Terms, 100 guineas per annum. References of the highest order. Address the Principal as above.

THE REV. DAVID C. A. AGNEW has in the Press a volume of MEMOIRS OF THE HUGUENOT REFUGEES IN IRELAND, BRITAIN, AND FRANCE. With Portraits, &c. Price (One Guinea). Subscribers' Names may be sent to him, at Wicklow, Scotland; also information regarding persons and families descended from the Refugees.

Now ready, in post 8vo,

A GENERAL HISTORY OF MUSIC. By DR. A. SCHÜTTER. Translated from the German by Mrs. Robert Tubbs. Revised and corrected by the Author.

RICHARD BENTLEY, Publisher in Ordinary to Her Majesty.

BAGSTER'S BLANK-PAGE BIBLE. A new and more convenient plan for MS. Notes. 8vo, price 2s.

At all the principal Booksellers; and at 14, Paternoster Row, London.

Just Ready, beautifully printed on toned paper, 18mo, cloth, price 3s.

THE BALLADS AND SONGS OF LANCASHIRE. chiefly older than the Nineteenth Century, collected and edited with notes by JOHN HARRIS, F.R.S.

100 Copies are printed on large paper (crown 4to), price 12s., for which early application is necessary.
London: WHITTAKER & CO.

Just published, crown 8vo, gilt edges, price 2s., by Post 2s. 6d. Stamps; quarto, 10s. 6d., by Post for 140 Stamps.

THE BOOK OF PERFUMES. By EUGENE RIMMEL. With above 250 Illustrations.

- "A curious and entertaining history."—Art Journal.
 - "There is much that will amuse the general reader."—Athenæum.
 - "A learned, elegant, and fascinating volume."—London Review.
 - "Full of odd out-of-the-way information."—Spectator.
 - "Contains much curious historical matter."—Notes and Queries.
- London: CHAPMAN & HALL, 193, Piccadilly; or to be had of the Author, 96, Strand, 21, Cornhill, and 128, Regent Street.

"REMAINDERS" OF VALUABLE BOOKS, all in new Condition, at greatly reduced prices, selling by WM. WESLEY, English and Foreign Bookseller, Queen's Head Passage, Paternoster Row. A Catalogue on application.

PARTRIDGE & COLENS,

MANUFACTURING STATIONERS,

192, FLEET STREET, corner of Chancery Lane.

Carriage paid to the Country on Orders exceeding 10s.

The LARGEST and most varied Stock in the Kingdom of Note Letter, and Fcap. Papers, Envelopes, Account and M.S. Books, Household Papers, &c.

PARTRIDGE & COLENS' celebrated GUINEA CASE of STATIONERY forwarded free to any Railway Station in England, on receipt of Post-office Order.

No CHARGE for Plain Stamping Crest, Arms, or Address on Paper or Envelopes. Coloured Stamping (Relief) reduced to 1s. per 100. Polished Steel Crest Dies engraved for 5s. Business or address Dies from 3s.

BERMON PAPER, plain, 4s. per ream; Ruled ditto, 4s. 6d. An immense variety in all sizes and qualities always in stock. Illustrated Price List of Instantaneous Dispatch Boxes, Stationery Cabinets, Postage Scales, Writing Cases, &c. post free.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1866.

CONTENTS.—N° 184.

NOTES:—Daniel Defoe on Assassination of Rulers, 21—Purcell Papers, &c., 23—General Literary Index: Index of Subjects, 25—Early Mention of Segars—Climate and Language—Sir Robert Peake—Cure for the Plague—History of Coke, 28

QUERIES:—Jonson or Johnson, 27—Duchesse d'Abrantes—Bibliographical Queries—Boteler—Luis de Camoens—Sir Samuel Clark—Cuban Use of Spanish Words—The Episcopal Dress—Extremity, Extreme—Haut Pleck—Holborn: George and Blue Boar—Words changed in Meaning: Honesty—M. E. Jones—Lits or Lyts Family—Sir James Macdonald—Engraved Outlines—Quotations—Shakspeare's Brogue—Terrible Duel—Tournamets—Maria Julia Young, 28

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—"A Copy of your Countenance"—Black Warders—Holbein's "Dance of Death"—Glottemham Manor, Sussex—An ironical Compliment, 30

REPLIES:—Miniatures on Ivory, 31—Jubilees of the Roman Catholic Church, 32—Shakspeare Family, 33—Tomb in Stone, 34—Artistic—Heston Humphreys—Gomeses de Andia, Hereditary Knight of the Garter—Zine Spire—Curious Christian Names—Lord Bacon and Sir John Constable—Demosthenes' Advice—Chartulary of Whalley Abbey—Synagogue of the Libertines—Words used in different Senses—Common Saying—Toasts—Countesses—Computation of Regnal Years—Sash Window—Cold Harbour—William, Earl of Ulster—Wyvil: Clifton—"From thence" v. "From there"—N. D., a Miniature Painter—"That's the Cheese"—Kilpeck Castle—Claret—Nettles Proofs of Habitation, &c., 35.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

DANIEL DEFOE ON ASSASSINATION OF RULERS.

By way of text, I quote from the proceedings of the Middlesex Sessions, as reported in the newspapers of Saturday, December 9, 1721:—

"On Tuesday last one Archibald Todd, who kept a chandler's shop in St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, was try'd before the Bench of Justices at Hicks's Hall upon an Indictment for cursing his Majesty, and saying he hoped to see the Pretender here before Christmas; and that then he (the said Todd) would be the first that should venture his Life to shoot his Majesty King George thro' the Head, which traitorous words he utter'd in the hearing of three Witnesses."

The above, and other similar overt offences about the same time,* were but practical consequences of the doctrines then being inculcated by Cato's Letters in The London Journal. The loyal and conservative newspapers, the legislature, and public opinion, were roused to indignation. Government proceedings were taken against the journal, which were partially defeated by the subterfuge of putting forward Benjamin Norton Defoe,† as its legal printer and publisher; while the author of the Letters (John Trenchard) transferred his services to the British Journal, and I believe escaped the hand of justice.

* A letter was picked up in Tower Street the same month, threatening the King and the Royal Family with death.—W. L.

† He was the eldest son of Daniel Defoe. Unfortunately there was no other connection between them.—W. L.

Among other papers, the Flying Post of Dec. 14 to 16, contained a letter denouncing the principles so advocated; and as (for the purpose of refutation) it states Cato's doctrine clearly and succinctly, I quote it as follows:—

"That it is lawful, nay highly necessary for any Person, by any method, though never so base, to destroy all whom he takes to be Tyrants, Usurpers, or Oppressors of the Publick."

It could not be expected that so zealous a Protestant and loyal a subject as Daniel Defoe, who had written and suffered so much for the Revolution, and the Succession of the House of Hanover, would remain silent. Hence the following Introductory Letter by him in Applebee's Original Weekly Journal, December 16, 1721:—

"Sir,—It is easy to entangle a Cause by subtilty of Words, and by long Harangues; and when Men are resolv'd to impose artfully upon Mankind, they often make such Circumstances as may amuse and confound the Judgments of their Readers: This is call'd by the Moderns fineness of Reasoning: And it must be confess'd that Men by these Methods have frequently reason'd themselves and others into, and out of, the worst and the best Principles, as well in Civil as in Religious Affairs. Thus all the most damnable Heresies, and even Principles destructive of Religion itself, have been brought into the World; and Fautors and Champions of Error have seduced Thousands from the true Religion; nay, to testify the Antiquity of it, the Devil thus deluded the first and best of Women, persuading her, by his sophistick pretended Oratory, that it could be no Crime to encrease Knowledge; that if the eating the Fruit would make her wise, it did not consist with the Goodness of her Creator to forbid it, and that such a Command must be the Effect of a jealous Knowledge of her being able to be a Goddess herself; or of Envy, lest she should attain to a Perfection of Knowledge equal to him that forbade it; with this hellish Oratory the subtle Fiend deluded the unthinking ambitious Soul of Eve, and brought her to commit Treason against Heaven.

"By the same Arts, and deriv'd from the same Fountain, have we a secret hellish Plot carrying on among us at this Time, to deface all Principles of Christianity in the Souls of Men, and Principles of Loyalty in the Minds of Subjects: These two hellish Designs have been propagated by a set of Free-Thinkers and Deists in Religion, Independent Whigs, and such as set up even Heathenism for Christian Doctrine; Principles which naturally lead us to be Commonwealth-Men, and Rebels in matters of Government, and Levellers in matters of Property. One would think that the late unnatural War, which ended in the most unnatural Murder that ever was committed since the Crucifixion of our Blessed Saviour, should have ingrafted in the mind of every loyal Subject a principle of Horror at the very Thoughts of Murder and Assassination, let the Person propos'd be who it will: But we have a set of Men, who, having first made themselves popular by writing a News-Paper fill'd with Clamour at private Grievances, tho' not sparing the King himself, are now instructing us in two Principles equally abhor'd by all Christians, viz. Self-Murder, and Assassination of others; both which the Christian Doctrine, much more the reformed Protestant Doctrine, abhors: The Authors of the London Journal have set up this new Undertaking, such I must call it; I do not doubt but the End will prove that the old Leaven is in the Lump, and that the Doctrine of KING-KILLING is at the bottom of it all: that they will tell us, some time or other, as plainly they dare, that if Justice, as they call it, is not executed on every Statesman who they please to call VILLAIN, for that has been one of their most gentle Appellations, every private Man has a Right to execute it himself; and as this is but one Step lower than an Assault upon the Head of all Government, 'tis as evident that all the Particulars are contain'd in the general Proposal, and that this is but a Preludium to that of assassinating Monarchs, and Monarchy itself, as has been once already our case. We have had many Essays of this Nature in this Kingdom: the first was that of a Pamphlet written in the late Usurper's time, entitled Killing no Murder; if ever the Killing any potent Robber, or powerful Thief in the World, was lawful, the laying Hands on such a Wretch as Cromwell must have been so; Julius Cæsar was nothing that he was not; but Cromwell was much that Julius Cæsar was not. Cromwell was the Murderer of the King, and even of the Monarchy itself; he was the Robber of his Country, and of all Civil Right; he overthrew not the Laws only, but the Legislature itself; not the Lord's Anointed Governor, but the Government itself: and it is remarkable, that this very Parricide justified himself from the same Example of Brutus, which these Men extol; and his Flatterers call'd him Brutus, and the Deliverer of his Country, as may be seen in several of the vile Harangues made to him, and Poems made in Compliment to him and his Tyranny, on that Occasion. O Loyal Britons! How can you bear this Language in your Streets? Is not this making way for Rebellion and Blood? For Murder and Assassination to rage again among you?

"It may require some Time to follow these disguis'd Phanaticks, thro' all the Parts of their bloody Principles: The Scots Scribbler concern'd in this Libel, the London Journal, could not fail of bringing hither those Tenets own'd upon the Scaffold by the bloody Murderers of the Archbishop of St. Andrews in his Country; where they defended the Assassination of that Reverend Prelate on the very self-same Principles on which Brutus and Cæsius murder'd Julius Cæsar. I shall give you a larger Account of those two Assassinations, and set them in a clear View one against the other, and you will find that the very Reasons which these Men give for justifying Brutus in assassinating Julius Cæsar, were given by the Rebels in 1648, for cutting off King Charles the First, and by the Murderers in Scotland for assassinating and murdering in cold Blood the Archbishop of St. Andrews.

"As for their Hero, whose Name they vainly assume, I shall also prove to you, that he was a proud, vain, haughty Wretch, and, that in his killing himself as he did, he was a rascally Coward; that he neither understood the Nature of Life, his own Fame as a Man, or his Duty to the Commonwealth; and I may add, that they who have wickedly and profanely stil'd him the God-like Cato, as Mr. Dennis very handsomely expresses it, neither understood what God-like means, or what Cato's Circumstances at that time were, much less what Examples they ought to recommend as Patterns of Heroick Virtue to Christians; besides, I shall go a step or two towards proving that these Men are Traytors too, as well as Phanaticks; and the Treason lyes at the Bottom of all their Writings on these Things.

"I am, Sir, your most humble Servant,
"ANTICATONIST."

This was followed up in the same Journal of December 23, 1721, thus:—

"Sir,—As we have new Doctrines as well as new Politicks put upon us every Day, by the haughty and dogmatic writers in the London Journal, give me Leave to proceed a little further in the exposing that Libel, who now declares against Heaven as well as against Men.

"Dr. Prideaux, who handled the point of the Death of Julius Cæsar, has done it with a just Moderation, tho' with much Vigour and Soundness of Judgment; and it is one of the least weighty Inferences which he draws from that History, that Divine Justice declared itself in that matter, otherwise than those do who plead for it: For, says the Reverend Doctor, 'It pursued every one of them with such a just and remarkable Revenge, that they were every Man of them, cut off in a violent manner, in a short time after, either by their own or other Men's Hands.'

"But Dr. Prideaux could not foresee that he should have a Set of Men come upon the Stage, with whom, in Argument, the Declarations of Divine Justice were of no Weight, neither would be allow'd to pass as anything in the case.

"We, who profess the Name of Christian, and who keep our Eyes up to the Hand of Divine Justice, have observ'd, and considering Christians do ordinarily observe, how Divine Justice pursues the Hands that are dipt in Blood; and how Murderers very rarely Escape the Vengeance of Heaven.

"Moreover, do we not take it for an evident Declaration of Divine Justice against the horrid Murderer of King CHARLES the First, of blessed Memory, That as in the Assassination of Julius Cæsar, the Murderers were pursued with such a just and remarkable Vengeance, that almost every one of them was call'd to an Account for it, and every one of the principal Actors in it was cut off in a violent manner in a short time after! In like manner the Murderers of the Archbishop of St. Andrews were brought to speedy Justice; and those who escaped the Hand of Man, Vengeance suffered them not to live; of which I have promised you a farther Account.

"Nor did the Divine Justice satisfy itself in bringing the Actors of that direful Tragedy to their End,—I mean that of the Murder of King CHARLES; but it overthrew the whole Usurpation; they sunk under the Blast of Heaven into all manner of Confusion, and at length in Destruction and Death; and this, considering Christians, I say, cannot but take Notice of, as an open Declaration of Divine Justice against the horrid Fact; nay, it has always, in all Ages, been understood thus; and be it of good Princes, or of bad, Divine Justice has so warmly pursued their Murderers, that very few have ever escaped in the World who have lifted up their Hand against them.

"But we are arrived to an Age wherein we can say what we please, and justify what we say: The first Argument brought to justify Brutus in the villainous Assassination of Julius Cæsar is, that Julius Cæsar was an ill Man, and the like: This has been the Foundation on which all publick Murthers have been justify'd: Nothing can be said of Julius Cæsar which the Regicides did not say of the Blessed Martyr, whom they condemn'd to Death. Now, indeed, if I were to speak of Brutus, I might enter upon a Vindication of Julius Cæsar; but as I am speaking to Christians who live under another Law, part of which says, Vengeance is Mine, I will repay: Avenge not yourselves, but give place unto Wrath; I say, to Christians, who give any Weight to Divine Laws, all Pretence to justify the Act of Brutus, from the Crimes of Cæsar, is taken away.

"But then say these Men, we insist that it was a good Action then, and that Brutus reveng'd his Country's wrong only; now if I prove that Cæsar had done his Country no wrong, but that he was vested with as legal an Authority and Power as the People of Rome themselves had, or as any of the lawful Princes of the World had, then I shall easily prove that Brutus, besides being an ungrateful Ruffian to his Benefactor, was a Traytor and Murderer of his lawful Superior and Governor.

"To blacken Julius Cæsar, in order to prepare to prove him justly murder'd, the London Journal takes the same Method that the Conspirators did to animate one another in the Murder—namely, that Cæsar had for his Title only Power gain'd by Violence: That acquiring and exercising Power by force, is Tyranny; nor, says the Journalist, did ever any reasonable Man say, that Success was a Proof of Right.

"Here he runs a length, needless to follow, about usurping Power and calling it lawful Authority; and at last brings his truly Phanatical Inference as follows: 'Against any Man,' says he, 'using lawless Force, every Man has a Right to use Force.' Which is false; for then a private Man may go and assassinate the Person of any Prince, who his Country is at War with, which is a Thing all good Men detest and abhor.

"But come we nearer to these new Advocates for the King-Killing Doctrine: Let us take our turn, and look a little who were they whom Cæsar had thus Usurp'd upon, and how came they by those Liberties which he is said thus to have invaded? Obtained they not the city they liv'd in, the Dominions they were possess'd of, the Country they rul'd in, by the same Robbery and Violence that he exercis'd over them? Were they anything more or less than a Band of valiant Thieves, who merited to be rooted out from under Heaven? And shall Julius Cæsar be censur'd for making himself the Head of this Bold Troop of Plunderers? Was not his Title to rule them as good as their Title to rule the Latines? And had not he as much Right to tyrannize over them, and to murder and destroy them, as their Title was to attack the Tuscan, to besiege the Veientians, to make continual War upon the Samnites, to Murder the Citizens of Locri and of Capua, and many other Commonwealths and Cities, who they reduced by this like lawless Force?

"How came these People call'd Romans into the World? How seated they in Italy? How arriv'd they to that Country, which they then call'd their own dear Country? How could Brutus have the Impudence to say he murder'd Cæsar for the Love of His dear Country? He should have said it was for the Love of that Land which the Thieves and Rogues his Ancestors had, by lawless Force, taken from the lawful Possessors of, and whose rightful Dominions they, against all Right and Justice, possessed.

"But thus can Thieves and Robbers cant of Justice and Right, when they have got honest Men's Goods and Lands in their Possession: And thus the Roman People, being themselves a Race of Thieves and mighty Robbers, had no Reason to object that Julius Cæsar having led out their Armies to commit more Robberies in their Names, and by their consent, (for that it must be allow'd he did) usurp'd a little more Authority than they gave him; in which he did nothing but what he had been employ'd before to do upon other Nations, much more Innocent than they; and for this Brutus murder'd him, which was a villainous Act in him, whatever Julius Cæsar had done; and had no Principle in it but this, that he murder'd him because he would not rob any more in the People's name, and with their Armies, as he had done before, but would rob by his own Authority, and in his own Name; which he had, Forsooth, every Jot as much right to do, as they had to do all that had been done before in their Names.

"I am, Sir,

"Your most humble Servant,

"ANTI-KING-KILLER."

Out of consideration for your limited space I think it better to break off here. The remainder of Defoe's writings on the subject shall be forwarded in a short time.

W. LEE.

PURCELL PAPERS, No. IV.*—"FROM ROSY BOWERS."

"From Rosy Bowers," may, I believe, claim to be, upon the whole, the finest secular Soprano song in the English language, and therefore something of its history specially merits to be known. In the Orpheus Britannicus the music has simply this heading, very interesting, indeed, in itself, as coming, apparently, upon the authority of Purcell's widow:—

"The last Song the Author Sett, it being in his Sickness."

Dr. Clarke, in his Beauties of Purcell, entitles the song thus: "From Rosy Bowers. A Cantata." Now, in general, this word, Cantata, seems to convey the idea of a piece written expressly as chamber-music, and so far, therefore, is a word having the tendency to throw a singer off from the truest conception of the work. The admirable song now to be considered is, however, in the strictest sense, what a modern would call a Scena, and was written for the character of Altisidora, in D'Urfey's Don Quixote. This being the case, it really seems to have been a somewhat curious perversity upon the part of Sir John Hawkins, that he should have penned such a paragraph as the following. The italics are mine:—

"As to the chamber-music of Purcell, it admits of a division into vocal and instrumental; the first class includes songs for one, two, and three voices; those for a single voice, though originally composed for the stage, were, in truth, Cantatas, and perhaps they are the truest models of perfection in that kind extant. Among the principal of these are 'From Rosy Bowers' . . . the incantation in the Indian Queen, 'Ye twice ten hundred deities,' and that base song sung by Cardenio in 'Don Quixote, 'Let the dreadful Engines.'"

Sir John, apparently, here considers, and, as I apprehend, rightly, that a Cantata implies a piece of chamber-music, and then he mentions, as Cantatas, three songs, all most eminently dramatic Scenas, and, consequently, requiring for their thorough appreciation and execution, a knowledge of the stage-situations and surroundings.

So much having been offered as to these Cantata ideas, it is now proposed to show, that the whole conception of Altisidora's song is most highly dramatic; since it is strikingly calculated to afford every opportunity for displaying, not only the ability to perform a most varied recitative and air of the first class, but also the accomplishments of dancing, and of action fitting to the varied music.

As hardly anyone, now-a-days, ever thinks of looking into D'Urfey's works, the right Purcell Editor, when he comes, will, doubtless, deem it still the more advisable to state the general conception of the scene in which Altisidora's mad song occurs. Altisidora then is to be understood, as wishing to penetrate Don Quixote with the persuasion that she is quite overcome by love for him, and she offers, as if with the view of causing reciprocal feelings in that unparalleled Knight, to display at once her abilities and her own feelings in music, dancing, and action. All this, however, will perhaps be best explained, by citing the chief portion of a speech for Altisidora, which occurs just before the Scena is introduced:—

* Vide 3rd S. vii. 80.

Altisidora.—"I intend to teize him now, with a whimsical variety, as if I were possess'd with several degrees of passion—sometimes I'll be fond, and sometimes freakish; sometimes merry and sometimes melancholy—sometimes treat him with Singing and Dancing, and sometimes scold and rail as if I were ready to tear his eyes out."

According to these ideas, D'Urfey has written his song in what he calls five "Movements," with directing words attached, in this order, namely: "Love, Gaiety, Melancholy, Passion, and Frenzy." As to the composer, the student of Purcell finds himself warranted in believing that there has never been any musician who could have surpassed the strength and feeling with which Purcell has carried out the author's conception of the scene in question.

Dr. Burney tells us that the eminent tenor-singer of the last century, Mr. Beard, used to sing "From Rosy Bowers," although, as we have seen, it is pre-eminently, a woman's song. However, this fact, perhaps, tends the more to show the interest attached to the music in itself, even when stripped of such important adjuncts as its fitting action, and its true personalities. Dr. Burney, however, has not told us another fact, which, it must be owned, does appear somewhat startling. Looking over the advertisements in the Daily Courant for the year 1704, I found that Richard Leveridge, the base-singer, had also laid hands upon Altisidora's song, and, we must suppose, expected to please the public with it, from the manner in which it is particularised in the advertisement, for, it must be observed, that it is, comparatively, very seldom, in these old advertisements, that the songs to be sung are particularised. Take, for example, the two following tantalising advertisements, each from the Daily Courant for 1704, and each partly relating to Purcell:—

"At the desire of several Persons of Quality.—At Chelsea College, this present Wednesday, being the 7th of June, will be perform'd a Great Consort of Musick, in which the famous Signiora Francisca Margarita de l'Epine will sing several English Songs of Mr. Henry Purcell's."

And again:—

"At the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane, this present Tuesday, being the 13th of June, will be reviv'd a Play call'd The Rival Queens, or, The Death of Alexander the Great. With some of the best songs compos'd by the late Mr. Henry Purcell, and perform'd by Mr. Leveridge."

And now then, reverting to Altisidora's song, let us take note of the ensuing advertisement:—

"At the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane, this present Thursday, being the 25th of May, will be presented a Comedy call'd The Constant Couple, or, A Trip to the Jubilee. With several Entertainments of Singing by Mr. Leveridge, particularly a Song compos'd by the late Mr. Henry Purcell, beginning 'From Rosy Bowers.'"

Another advertisement, only a few weeks later, again brings Altisidora's song before us:—

"For the Benefit of Mr. Williams.—At the Desire of several Persons of Quality. At the Theatre Royal in Drury Lane, this present Thursday, being the 29th of June, will be presented a Play call'd The Fatal Marriage All the parts being play'd to the best Advantage. With several Entertainments of Singing by Mr. Leveridge, particularly a Song compos'd by the late Mr. Henry Purcell, beginning 'From Rosy Bowers,' &c."

Upon the principle that the original singer of any celebrated song ought not to be passed over in mere silence, I would note that in this case the original singer appears to have been Miss Cross (also often called Mrs. Cross). Miss Cross was evidently a performer of a certain mark in her day; although, as to how far she was competent to do full justice to all the tasks of Altisidora, a friend studious in dramatic things tells me that no sufficient evidence exists. However, the following advertisement, which I find in the Daily Courant for 1705, will show that Miss Cross distinctly aspired to be at once the actress, dancer, and musician:—

"For the Benefit of Mrs. Cross. At the desire of several Persons of Quality. At the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, this present Thursday, being the 8th of February, will be presented a Play call'd Secret Love, or The Maiden Queen. The part of Florimel to be performed by Mrs. Cross. With several Entertainments of Singing and Dancing by her. Particularly a Dialogue compos'd by the late Mr. Henry Purcell, beginning 'Tell me why, my charming Fair,' perform'd by her and Mr. Leveridge."

This is a very interesting advertisement, and we may safely affirm that it was not everyone, who, like Miss Cross, could thus have ventured to take an important part in one of Dryden's plays, give a display of dancing, and sing, with the best base-singer of the day, a serious duet composed by Purcell, and one absolutely requiring the true expressive style of singing, if any effect is to be attained.

In conclusion, it is pleasing to remember, that at least one classical vocalist of our own time has been identified with Altisidora's song. I allude to the late Miss Masson. I once had the pleasure of hearing that lady perform "From Rosy Bowers," and am therefore able to offer a testimony to the truly earnest and impassioned style in which she gave the admirable composition of Purcell.

ALFRED ROFFE.

Somers Town.

GENERAL LITERARY INDEX: INDEX OF SUBJECTS.*

OPHIR AND TARSHISH: continued from 3rd S. v. 440.

Whilst proposing this specimen of a General Literary Index, I am compelled to apologise for the space it will occupy: but, notwithstanding its length, I feel justified in offering it for insertion in "N. & Q."—inasmuch as it contributes, in the very important province of bibliography, to the fulfilment of its original Prospectus, viz. to "form a most useful supplement to works already in existence—a treasury for enriching future editions of them." In Watt's Bibliotheca Britanica two works are mentioned on this subject, which have not been noticed in this article, viz. De Navigatione Salomonis, by J. Blomius, 1660, 5vo; and Pharus ad Ophir auriferum, by J. L. Hannemann, 4to, 1712. Query, does Matthew Gwynne, in his learned treatise, Aurum non Aurum, &c., touch upon Ophir?

—The views of those who maintain the probability of voyages by the Phœnicians to distant lands—who suppose them to have sailed to the amber-coast of the Baltic, and even hint at their having reached America—receive some confirmation from the accounts preserved by the ancients of the circumnavigation of Africa."—G. C. Lewis ("N. & Q." 3rd S. vi. 61).

Purchas (vol. i. ch. i., entitled, "A large Treatise of King Solomon's navie, sent from Eziongeber to Ophir," and vol. v. p. 858), paid an early attention to this subject—the navigation of the Phœnicians, and the Ophirian voyage—which, it is probable——comprehended all the gulfe of Bengala, from Zeilan (Ceylon) to Sumatra on both sides; but the region of Ophir we make to be from Ganges to Menan, and most properly the large kingdom of Pegu, from whence it is likely in process of time the most southerly parts, even to Sumatra inclusively, were peopled before Solomon's time."—P. 32.

Ophir (Opheir, Sophir, Sophora, the Sanscrit Supara of Ptolemy, see Humboldt's Cosmos, Bohn, vol. ii. p. 499), was a port to which expeditions were undertaken conjointly by Tyrians and Israelites, who sailed from Eziongeber, near Elath, on that branch of the Red Sea which is now called the Gulph of Akabah: see Purchas's Pilgrimage, p. 177, and Clarke's Progress of Maritime Discovery, p. lxxx. seqq., who observes:—

"The first mention of Ophir in Scripture occurs in the Book of Genesis x. 29, 30. . . . It afterwards appears in the name of a distant country, in the first Book of Kings: when the ships fitted out by Solomon at Eziongeber, and conducted by Phœnician pilots, are described as bringing four hundred and twenty talents of gold from Ophir, and stung-trees and precious stones."

It may be necessary, Clarke continues, to mention the opinions of other writers: and first, those to whom venerable Purchas gave the appellation of "owls."

* Continued from 3rd S. vii. 457.

1. "Postellus, Goropius Becanus, Arias Montanus, Vatablus, Possevinus, Genebrard, Marinus Brixianus, Sa, Eugubinus, Avenarius, Garcia, and Morney, place Ophir in Peru."

"Arias Montanus (Bochart, Phaleg, pref. and ch. ix.), led by the similarity of the word Parvaim, supposed to be identical with Ophir (2 Chron. iii. 6), found it in Peru. This strange idea of one of the most learned Spaniards of his time—born 1527 A.D., died 1598—accounts for the following passage in Ben Jonson's Alchemist, Act II. Sc. 1:—

'Come on, Sir, now you set your foot on shore
In Novo Orbe. There's the rich Peru;
And there within, Sir, are the golden mines,
Great Solomon's Ophir.'

Arias Montanus fancied that Parvaim meant in the dual number two Perus: one, Peru proper, and the other, New Spain."—Smith's Dict., cf. Ovalle's Historical Relation of Chile, ch. iii. (Pinkerton's Collect., xiv.).

Pfeiffer, in his Difficiliorum Scripturæ Locorum Cent. iii. Loc. xvi., enumerates other writers who found Ophir in America, viz. Geo. Hornius, De Orig. Americanorum, lib. vii. cap. 8, 9, 10, fusissime et Notis ad Hist. Sulpit. Severi, p. 207 p. 188; Erasmus Schmidius, ut supra, "N. & Q." 3rd S. v. 440; D. Dannhæwærus, Coll. Psychol., p. 233.

2. "Calmet, in his Prolegomena [Dissertationes, &c., vol. ii. t. 2, pp. 55–64], has written a long dissertation to prove that Ophir was in Colchia, on the banks of the Phasis." [Cf. his Dict. of the Bible, s. v. "Ophir."]

3. "Cornelius a Lapide prefers the western coast of Africa." [Rennel, in his Geographical System of Herodotus, supposes there were distinct kinds of voyages performed by these fleets: that to Ophir from the Red Sea; and to the coast of Guinea from the Mediterranean. On the western coast of Africa, near Mozambique, there is a port called by the Arabians "Sofala;" which, as the liquids l and r are easily interchanged, was probably the Ophir of the ancients. When the Portuguese, in A.D. 1500, first reached it by the Cape of Good Hope, it was the emporium of the gold district in the interior. In Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, there is a reference to Milton's Paradise Lost, xi. 390. Herbert (Travels, p. 368) says that, with a fair wind, Sofala might well be attained in a month's time: whereas the voyage to Ophir was triennial.]

4. "Vatablus [upon 3 Kings ix.], Genebrard, and Robert Etienne, the island of St. Domingo, or Hispaniola." Cf. Jackson's Chronolog. Antiq., iii. 350, seqq., and Cluverius, Introduct. Geograph., p. 548.

5. Juan dos Santos, Raphael de Volterre, Barros, Ortelius, Thomas Lopez, Le Grand, Huet, Pluche, Montesquieu, D'Anville, L'Abbe Mignot, and Bruce, who is supported by Dr. Vincent (Voyage of Nearchus, p. 280, n. 284), are all inclined to place Ophir in the kingdom of Sofala, on the eastern coast of Africa.

"Quatremère in a recently published treatise (Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, tom. xvi. pt. ii. 1845, pp. 349—402), still maintains with Heeren, that Ophir is the east coast of Africa. . . . Arabia and the Island of Dioscorides to the south-east of the Straits of Babel-Mandeb, may be regarded as affording intermediate links of connection between the Indian Peninsula and Eastern Africa, for the combined commerce of the Hebrews and Phœnicians. . . . The trade to Ophir might be extended in the same manner as a Phœnician expedition to Tartessus, might touch at Cyrene and Carthage, Gadeira and Cerne; and as one to the Cassiterides might touch at the Artabrian, British and East Cimbrian coasts."—Humboldt's Cosmos, Bohn's edit., vol. ii. pp. 500—502. Cf. Grotius ad iii. Reg. ix. 28.

Huet and others, see Purchas, pt. i., assert that the Cape of Good Hope was often frequented and doubled in Solomon's time. The facts on which the supposed law of monsoons in India is founded, which seem so cogent that they induced the historian Robertson to place Ophir in Africa (Disquisition on India, sect. 2), have been pointedly denied by Mr. Salt, in his Voyages to Abyssinia, p. 103.

6. "The learned Jesuit, Jean Baptiste Riccioli, who published his treatise of Geography and Hydrography in Twelve Books at Boulogne, in 1661, assigns Ophir to Sumatra; but Mr. Marsden, in his history of the island, does not subscribe to this opinion." The passage in Riccioli (on the merits of his work see "N. & Q.," 1st v. 235) here referred to, is as follows:—

"Idcirco quinto dicimus probabilius esse nomine Ophir comprehenda esse non solum Ceilanum, sed etiam Sumatram, Aureamque Chersonesum, seu Malacæ regnum et Peguvium, nec excludendas Javas aliasve insulas prædictis locis proximas, aut littoralia Indiæ citra et ultra Gangem: ita enim cum S. Hieronymo et Josepho sentiunt Acosta, Bergeronius, Morisotus, Salianus, Tirinus; tum Ribera, Pererius, Barrerius, Barradas, Malvenda, et alii penes Pinedam, c. 16, num. 9, et ipse Pineda ibi. Accedit Maffei, lib. 16," etc.

The work of Pineda here intended is, Ad suos in Salomonem Commentarios Salomon Præcius, id est, de rebus Salomonis Regis Libri octo, 1613, folio. He discusses the site of Tarshish in cap. xiv. In cap. xviii. he enumerates all the Indian gems, and records the discovery of the magnet by an Indian herdsman of the same name:—

"In the above account," adds Clarke, "I have necessarily omitted many authors, such as Josephus, St. Jerome, and Theodoret, who place Ophir in the Golden Chersonese of India; as well as Rabanus Maurus, Lucas Holstenius, and others, who fix it higher up in the Continent."

Pererius, says Sir W. Raleigh, takes it rightly for an island, as St. Jerome doth, but he sets it at the head of Malacca; but Ophir is found among the Malaccas further east. Book i. ch. viii. "Ophir esse Pegusæ regnum, et regiones vicinas in India Orientali, præter alios probarunt Caspar Barrerius, lib. De Ophira; Fr. Stypmannus, De Navigat., l. ii. c. 3, n. 35 seq.; Joh. Loccenius, De Jure Maritimo, l. iii. c. 6, n. 2; Salianus, Annal., t. iii. p. 92; Cornelius a Lapide, Sanctius et alii ad c. ix. l. 1 Regum; Petrus Ravanelius, Biblioth. Sacra, p. 159; Gerhardus J. Vossius, Lex. Etymol., p. 350; Theoph. Spizelius, De Israelitis Americanis, p. 34, seq.; et Martinus Lipenius, De Navigatione Ophyrítica, p. 518 seqq." (Pfeiffer, Opp. Omnia, 1704, p. 247). To these may be added J. T. Buddeus, who, in his Historia Eccles. 1st Test., p. 331, assigns the locality to India: "quemadmodum et India auro, argento, similibus pavonibus, aut si mavis, psittacis abundat;" and remarks, that a voyage to the Arabian side of the Red Sea would not have employed them three years.

BIBLIOTHECAR. CHETHAM.

(To be continued.)

EARLY MENTION OF SEGARS.—In that very curious book called—

"A faithful Account of the Distresses and Adventures of John Cockburn, Mariner, and Five other Englishmen, who were taken Prisoners by a Spanish Pyrate," &c. London, 1730,— the following passage occurs:—

"On the third day of our abode here arrived three friars, who were just come from over the mountains of Nicaragua. . . . These gentlemen gave us some segars to smoke, which they supposed would be acceptable. These are leaves of tobacco rolled up in such manner, that they serve both for a pipe and tobacco itself. These the ladies, as well as gentlemen, are very fond of smoking; but, indeed, they know no other way here, for there is no such thing as a tobacco-pipe throughout New Spain, but poor awkward tools used by the negroes and Indians."

From this account it would appear segars were unknown to English sailors sailing in the Spanish main a hundred and twenty-five years ago. Is there any earlier mention than the above? It is generally said their use came into England after the Peninsular war. I have, however, been told by old officers, that the usual method of smoking there at that time was by the papelita, or by wrapping tobacco up tight in a piece of paper, much as is done at present. The date of the introduction of any custom is most useful, not only as curious in itself, but as the means of detecting literary forgeries.

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

CLIMATE AND LANGUAGE.—Looking through Thomas Moore's Diary recently, I met with the following note (vol. iii. p. 267):—

"1821. August 14th.—Dined at Lord Holland's: company, Lord and Lady Sefton, Rogers, Humboldt, &c. Humboldt mentioned at dinner, a theory of Volney's (I think) with respect to the influence of climate upon language; that in a cold, foggy, atmosphere, people are afraid to open their mouths, and hence the indistinctness, and want of richness in the sounds of their language; whereas, in a soft balsamic air, which the mouth willingly opens to exhale, the contrary effect takes place."

This "theory" is not Volney's; it has a much earlier origin. Dr. William Falconer, in his able book on the Influence of Climate, &c. on Mankind, quarto, 1781, says:—

"The learned Dr. Arbuthnot* is of opinion that the air, or rather the temperature, has some influence in forming the language. The serrated close way of speaking of the northern nations may be owing to their reluctance to open their mouths wide in cold air, which must make their language abound in consonants. Whereas, from a contrary cause, the inhabitants of warmer climates, opening their mouths wider, must form a softer language, abounding in vowels."

X. A. X.

SIR ROBERT PEAKE, painter, picture-seller, and royalist commander was, according to Walpole (Anecdotes of Painters, ed. Wornum, 221) buried in the church of St. Stephen, London (no date being given).

David Lloyd (Memoirs, 577) says that Sir Robert Peake was buried at St. Sepulchre's, London, with great military pomp in July, 1667.

There can be no doubt that Lloyd is correct, and I hope this note may be of use to some future editor of Walpole's work. S. Y. R.

CURE FOR THE PLAGUE.—The following clever mock prescription for the cure of the plague occurs in "A new booke conteynynge an exortaciō to the sicke. The sycke mans prayer. A prayer with thankes at the purificatiō of women. A Consolatiō at buriall. 1561, 8vo, B. L.," noticed in Collier's Bibliographical Catalogue, i. 74:—

"Take a pond of good hard penance, and washe it wel with the water of youre eyes, and let it ly a good whyle at your hert. Take also of the best fyne fayth, hope, and charyte y^e you can get, a like quantite of al mixed together, your soule even full, and use this confection every day in your lyfe, whyles the plagis of God reigneth. Then, take both your handes ful of good workes commaunded of God, and kepe them close in a clene conscience from the duste of vayne glory, and ever as you are able and se necesseite so to use them. This medicine was found wrytten in an olde byble boke, and it hath been practised and proved true of mani, both men and women."

J. Y.

HISTORY OF COKE.—The following advertisement, fixing the period when coke first came into public use in this country, will no doubt be acceptable to any future historian of our coal trade. I do not find that it has been noticed by any writer on the subject hitherto:—

"There is a sort of Fewel made by Charking or Calcining Newcastle coals which burns without smoak, without fouling the furniture; and altogether as sweet, and is much more lasting and profitable then Wood or Charcoal; it kindles suddenly, and is useful either for Chambers, Roasting of Meat, Drying of Malt or Hops, Woolcoming, Distilling, Preserving, or any such like employment. His Highness the Lord Protector, with the advice of his Council, have encouraged and authorised the making thereof in order to the preservation of the Woods of the Nation.

* Arbuthnot, Concerning the Effects of Air on Human Bodies, 1738.

"If any shall desire to make tryal of it for any of the use aforesaid, which will cost little or nothing the experiment, they may repair to London at Northumberland Wharff, near Chearing-Cross; and according to the satisfaction they receive therein, they may be supplied from time to time with what quantity they shall have occasion to use.

"Those that have made tryal of it, finde it very profitable to all those uses abovementioned.

"It is also very useful for the Tobacco Pipe burners."—Public Intelligencer, No. 139, from Monday, August 16 to Monday, August 23, 1658, p. 764.

This advertisement appears also in the succeeding number for August 30, but not in any of the previous numbers, so far back at least as my imperfect series extends. S. H. HARLOWE.

Queries.

JONSON OR JOHNSON?

In his Curiosities of Literature, ii. 237 (edit. 1863), Disraeli says: "I think I have seen Ben Jonson's name written by himself with an h;" and in "N. & Q." 1st S. ii. (the only volume, I believe, in either series, in which it is mooted), p. 167, N. A. B. raised the question; and, p. 238, MR. HALLIWELL answered it, beginning with—"Ben Jonson: so the name was spelt by most of his contemporaries;" and then he doubts of a MS. of the Underwoods being autograph, "not merely because the poet spelt his name without the h, but because the verses in question are only part of his Eupheme" (a part of the Underwoods).

Now, Ben died in 1637; and I have before me a collection, printed in folio, of fifteen or sixteen Masques, consecutively paged from 1 to 159, but without a general title-page; pages 9 and 47, only, show the date of the printing of the two masques, of which they are the title-pages, the former in 1617, and the latter in 1621, while the latest date of the performance of some of the others is 1630; and it is only on three of them that the author's name is given. Thus: on "Pan's Anniversarie," presented in 1625, the inventors, Inigo Jones, Ben Johnson; on p. 144, "Love's Triumph, performed in 1630, the Inventors, Ben Johnson, Inigo Jones;" on p. 151, "Chloridia, personated in 1630, the Inventors, Ben Johnson, Inigo Jones." (The precedence given to Ben's name in the latter two, it will be recollected, was the cause of the great quarrel between him and his celebrated colleague.) With these masques, and bound up with them, I have also before me, "The Magnetick Lady," "A Tale of a Tub," "Underwoods," with an "Address to the Reader," "Mortimer, his Fall, a Tragedie," all dated 1640, and "The Sad Shepherd," and "The Asse," printed in 1641, and e these, as well as the above-mentioned address to the reader, is "By Ben JOHNSON;" and, moreover, consecutively paged, "Horace his Art of Poetrie, made English by Ben. Johnson," "The English Grammar made by Ben. Johnson," and "Timber or Discoveries. By Ben. Johnson."

With this evidence, I have come to the conclusion, that from the surname of "immortal Ben," the h should not be dropped. I must confess, however, that I do not adopt this conclusion without some sorrow, for the long-used name of Jonson has so thoroughly distinguished the poet from the great lexicographer and the innumerable host of others who bear the name of Johnson, that I must always entertain for it what the French well term, a prix d'affection.

Of the very general adoption of Jonson as the true spelling, I have an illustration in the works above mentioned. When I acquired them, they were not bound, and some of them were not even cut. On handing them to a binder, he asked me how I would have the volume lettered, and I answered, in writing, in the words which I then understood were on the poet's tomb in Westminster Abbey, namely: "O, rare Ben Johnson." On the binder sending home his work, I found that he had lettered the book accordingly, but—he was not a Cockney—he had dropped the h! A few years afterwards, in 1843, I, for the first time, saw the tomb (or mural tablet?) in the abbey, and the impression remaining on my mind is, that h occupied its proper place in the poet's name.

ERIC.

Ville-Marie, Canada.

DUCHESSE D'ABRANTES.—Can you inform me whether there are now in existence any descendants of the Duchesse of Abrantes, the celebrated wit and beauty of the time of the First Empire; the widow of Marshal Junot, and herself a princess of the ancient house of the Comnènes? and if so, whether the Duchess of Abrantes, at present Lady of Honour to the Princess Clothilde, is connected either by marriage or otherwise, with the family of the above-named?

HISTORICUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL QUERIES. — 1. Menu de la Maison de la Reine (Marie Stuart), par M. de Pinguille." This work was privately printed some years ago. Wanted, the complete title, editor's name, &c., as I cannot find it in the British Museum Catalogues.

2. Life of Charlotte Smith.

3. Clarke's Letters of Scottish Prelates. Wanted complete titles, authors' names, &c. of the two last.

4. The Marchmont Papers, ed. by Sir G. Rose, must surely be in the British Museum, yet I cannot find it, either under "Marchmont" or "Rose."

F. M. S.

BOTTLER.—Can you refer me to any information respecting the Ralph Boteler, living in the time of Edward I., who married Maud, one of the daughters and co-heirs of Philip Marmion, by whom he had a son and heir, also called Ralph?

P. S. C.

LUIS DE CAMOENS.—A few weeks ago, in a provincial newspaper, under the head of "Art, Science, and Literature," it was stated that some unpublished poetry of Camoens had been found amongst the MSS. in the possession of the University of Coimbra. I should be glad to know from any of the correspondents of "N. & Q." whether this statement is true, and if so, to have a reference to some further notice of so interesting a discovery.

A description of the public monument lately erected under royal auspices in honour of the poet, from any recent visitor to Lisbon, would also be very acceptable.

E. H. A.

SIR SAMUEL CLARK.—Some time since I sent you a query respecting Sir Samuel Clark, Sheriff of London. I now find from Berry's Hunts, page 341, that he was knighted in 1712. He is there described of West Bromwich, but the only issue given is his son Samuel; in addition to this child he had a daughter, and possibly had other children. Where can I obtain particulars of his family, and with whom they intermarried, and when?

GEORGE PRIDRAUX.

Highbury New Park.

CUBAN USE OF SPANISH WORDS.—I shall feel much obliged to any of your correspondents who can give me any information respecting the Cuban local use of the following Spanish words. They are generally terms relating to manufactures, many of them being connected with the sugar manufacture. If any of them are not merely provincial, they have been omitted in all dictionaries I have access to:—Aguijones con casquillos de hierro; agujas jalmeras; alcayatas (the Dictionaries only say "hooks"); aretas (ear-rings or ear-pendants); arcilla; bombones de hierro ó cobre; balómetros; barrenas llamadas pasadores; bocamangas de carretas; cachimbos; cubos de metal para pistolas; catres de madera con tijeras; carrilleras para morriones; coronas para trapiches; furos para hormas; guatacas de cubo; guarda-brisas para mesa; guardabrisas para candeleros;

[* The Marchmont Papers, 8 vols. Lond. 8vo, 1831, are entered in the Old Catalogue, Press mark 1202, h.—Ed.]

[† Sir Samuel Clark, citizen and skinner, was elected sheriff of London and Middlesex, on June 24, 1712; sworn and sealed bond on July 1, 1712. Has our correspondent consulted his will in the Prerogative Office? "N. & Q." 2^d S. xii. 337.—Ed.]

fagot; fallebas; fuminos para dibujar; escantilonos de carpintero; gatos ó lirones de hierro; geringas de candelero; hachas de viento; hebillas, hebillones, ó grampas con sus; pasadores para carruages; heniqueu ó susquil; huacal; marcadores de tonelero; marcarios de zapatero; machiembrados para carpinteros con sus hierros.

A Spanish writer, disparaging the character of instruction given in the South American schools, says that the highest attainment made was the art of making "jeroglificos de estile pastrano." What is the meaning of the last word?

COLON Y LUCO.

THE EPISCOPAL DRESS.—Can any reader of "N. & Q." fix the date of the first assumption of lawn sleeves by Anglican bishops as a portion of their ecclesiastical attire? I can find no authority for the costume. When was the canonical dress of bishops, in church, generally discontinued?

C. W.

EXTREMITY, EXTREME.—Perhaps some of your readers will kindly explain the exact difference between these words as used by the Chorus at the conclusion of the first Act of Romeo and Juliet:—

"But passion lends them power, time means, to meet, Temp'ring extremities with extreme sweet."

A. H. K. C. L.

HAUF PLECK.—Can any one kindly tell me what probably would be the size of a hauf pleck about 300 years ago? According to Halliwell a pleck is a place, plot of ground, small enclosure, field. In Todd's Johnson it is a place.

H. W. COOKES.

HOLBORN: GEORGE AND BLUE BOAR.—Can any one inform me where I could obtain a print of Middle Row, Holborn, just executed from another in Faithorne's Ichnographical Description of London (temp. Charles I.)? This information appeared in "Archæology of the Month" (June), Illustrated London News. I wrote to the editor, but he never replied.

I also wish to know if any print exist of the late "George and Blue Boar" Inn, Holborn?—a place most interesting in English history as the scene of the finding of Charles I.'s letter in the saddle, by Cromwell and Ireton.*

A. P. WALTON.

WORDS CHANGED IN MEANING: HONESTY.—Has not this word undergone a change? Formerly it had that of honour, as, "Honesty (properly honour) is the best policy;" "Make Biddy an honest (honourable) woman;" that is, by taking her to church instead of living with her out of wedlock. The distinction is important.

[* The "saddle letter," we believe, is now considered a palpable forgery, as its contents remained unknown till nearly a century after it was said to have been discovered. Vide D'Israeli's Commentaries on the Life and Reign of Charles I. v. 323.—ED.]

NEWINGTONENSIS.

M. E. JONES.—This lady is author of The Lake and other poems (printed at Liverpool), 1844. Can any of your readers give any information regarding the authoress, or tell me whether she has published any other works? R. I.

LITS, OR LYTS FAMILY.—Could any of your readers inform me, 1st, if there is anything known about Roger de Lit, who was a scholar at Eton in or within five years of 1560? 2ndly. Is there any record of the Lits, Lyts, or De Lits having settled in the Isle of Thanet? H. C. M. LYTE.

SIR JAMES MACDONALD.—Information is desired on the following points in the life of Sir James Macdonald of Knockrinsay, Knight, the last chief of the Clandonald of Kintyre and Isla:

1st. Regarding his escape from Edinburgh Castle in May, 1615. His cousin Ranald M'Donald helped him, and the keepers were suspected of conniving at his escape; but I can find no information as to the manner of it.

2ndly. Regarding his residence in Spain (from 1615 to 1620) to which he fled, and where, it is said, "he was favoured by the king." In 1618, the Earl of Argyle, who had driven him from Scotland, repaired himself to Spain, on his conversion to Roman Catholicism; and there is some allusion to the two Scotchmen there plotting against the government of their own country.

3rdly. Regarding his residence in England from 1620, in which year he was recalled from Spain and pensioned by James I., to 1626, when he died. The only information on this point, known to me, is contained in a few of the original letters of the Melrose Papers printed for the Abbotsford Club, and in the Thanes of Cawdor, printed for the Spalding Club.

F. N. HAMILTON.

Edinburgh.

ENGRAVED OUTLINES.—I lately selected from a printseller's portfolio two engraved outlines, which seem to have formed part of an octavo volume. They are numbered respectively vii. and viii. Opposite to each are verses in letter-press not paged. No. vii. represents a large square with a cathedral of Palladian architecture and palatial houses, rather dilapidated. Four stalls and a dozen poor-looking customers occupy the ground. The lines are:—

"Mother of praise and chosen seat of health,
Blest with firm uncontaminated faith,
Where the seven virtues found their safest home;
I see thee now barren of ornament,
With sorrow robed, and brimming o'er with vice."

No. viii. is a grove with a draw-well. An clerical richly draped, or rather heavily laden with crosses, and several priests are looking at it:—

"This strange well a treasure may hold,
Richer than silver, richer than gold.
'Cheerfully drink, piously think,
'Tis the water of life you are suffered to drink."

I think the engravings are not more than fifty years old. The vendor bought them in a lot, and could give no account of them. Perhaps some reader of "N. & Q." may know their meaning, or to what book they belong. E. J. F.

QUOTATIONS.—Who are the authors of the following quotations? The first is—

"All goeth but Goddis will,"

and is prefixed to one of Mrs. Browning's poems, (The Island.) The second I came across in an old number of the Cornhill Magazine. I forget the title of the article in which it occurred, but it was as follows:—

"Dites moy où n'en quel pays,
Est Thais la belle Romaine,
Archipiada ne —
Qui fut sa cousine germaine?"

My memory fails to supply the name wanting in the third line. There was a second verse which ended thus:—

"Mais où sont les neiges d'autant?"

ORIELENSIS.

Whence the adage—

"Græcum est et non legitur."

Is it a mediæval gloss?

A. O. V. P.

SHAKESPEARE'S BROGUE.—Can any of your readers inform me in what No. of the Westminster Review there appeared (some years since) an article on the probability of Shakespeare having pronounced English with a brogue. W.

TERRIBLE DUEL.—In the Romance of London, Mr. Timbs describes a terrible duel, in the time of James I., between a Duke of B — and a Lord B — concerning a Countess of E —. Who are the three persons alluded to? E. H.

TOURNAMENTS.—In the Chronicle of the Grey Friars, printed for the Camden Society, I find, under the date of 1411, the following entry:—

"xii^o A^o [Henrici IV.] Thys yere there came a Cardinelle to London. And menny justes and batteles ware in Smythfelde."

Is there anywhere any account to be found of these doings at Smithfield? MELETES.

[* There is some obscurity in the account of this "terrible duel." The details of it are printed in Dr. Millingen's History of Duelling, ii. 14—21. The Doctor states that the narrative was found in manuscript in the library of Mr. Goodwin, author of The Life of Henry VIII., and signed R. Deerhurst, and that "the duel was fought by two gentlemen of that period." Now Thomas Goodwin was the author of The History of the Reign of Henry V. vol. 1704, not of Henry VIII. Can Mr. Timbs fix the date of the occurrence in the reign of James I.?—ED.]

MARIA JULIA YOUNG is author of a book called Voltaireana, 4 vols. published about 1800. Does this miscellany consist of translations from Voltaire's works? R. I.

Queries with Answers.

"A COPY OF YOUR COUNTENANCE"—I write to ask if any of your correspondents have ever heard the phrase, or can trace its origin, of "That is a copy of your countenance," meaning, a deception? as if one should say, he did not wish to do anything it was well known he wished to do, and some one should answer, "Oh, that is only a copy of your countenance." It has been an old phrase used habitually from father to son in a family of my acquaintance, but none of them can say where the phrase came from. There is an idea, out of Don Quixote. H. M. HERDS.

[The phrase, "That is a copy of your countenance," which we have occasionally heard, but which is not of frequent use, civilly implies, "That is not spoken sincerely," "You have used disguise, you have prevaricated." If "copy," in this expression, "copy of your countenance," is to be taken in the ordinary sense of the word, the allusion may be to the copy, or impression, of an engraved plate, which, as we know, totally reverses the plate itself, making left hand right, &c. "That is a copy of your countenance," i. e. quite the reverse of the reality. We would, however, suggest that the word "copy" itself may, in this particular instance, be the modern representative of some older term signifying concealment or disguise.]

BLACK WARDERS.—Was any Scotch regiment ever known as Black Warders, or Black Watch? Supposing such to have existed, can any subscriber give a list of names of officers, or refer to any source where such list could be obtained about the years 1615-1625?

T. W. CLARKE.

[The corps, which has been known for more than a century under the appellation of the 42nd Highland regiment, and which, at different periods, has been designated by the titles of its successive commanders, as Lord Crawford's, Lord Sempill's, and Lord John Murray's Highlanders, was originally known by the name of the Reicuden Du, or Black Watch. This was an appellation given to the Independent Companies of which the regiment was formed. It arose from the colour of their dress, and was applied to them in contradistinction to the regular troops, who were called Red Soldiers, or Seidar Dearag. From the time they were first embodied, about the year 1729 or 1730, till they were regimented, the Highlanders continued to wear the dress of their country. This, as it consisted so much of the black, green, and blue tartan, gave them a dark and sombre appearance in comparison with the bright uniform of the regulars, who, at that time had coats, waistcoats, and breeches, of scarlet cloth. Hence the term Du, or Black, as applied to this corps.—Stewart's Sketches of the Highlanders, i. 223-261.]

HOLBEIN'S "DANCE OF DEATH."—I have before me two editions of this work—one engraved by Hollar, and the other by Deuchar. The former edition has thirty subjects, and Deuchar's has forty-two. In Hollar's edition there are four subjects not in Deuchar's; and in Deuchar's there are sixteen subjects not in Hollar's. Deuchar's edition is dated 1786; Hollar's has no date, but the letter-press description looks like type of the end of last century. Will any reader of "N. & Q." be kind enough to give a list of Holbein's undoubted subjects in the "Dance of Death"?

JAMES J. LAMB.

Underwood Cottage, Paisley.

[The following is a list of the engravings in the first edition of Holbein—viz. Imagines Mortis, Lugduni sub scuto Coloniensi, 1547. They are forty-nine in number—
1. The Creation of all Things; 2. The Temptation; 3. The Expulsion from Paradise; 4. The Consequences of the Fall of Man; 5. A Cemetery; 6. The Pope; 7. The Emperor; 8. The King; 9. The Cardinal; 10. The Empress; 11. The Queen; 12. The Bishop; 13. The Duke; 14. The Abbot; 15. The Abbess; 16. The Gentleman; 17. The Canon; 18. The Judge; 19. The Advocate; 20. The Magistrate; 21. The Preacher; 22. The Priest; 23. The Mendicant Friar; 24. The Nun; 25. The Old Woman; 26. The Physician; 27. The Astrologer; 28. The Miser; 29. The Merchant; 30. The Ship in a Tempest; 31. The Knight; 32. The Count; 33. The Old Man; 34. The Countess; 35. The New Married Lady; 36. The Duchess; 37. The Pedlar; 38. The Husbandman; 39. The Child; 40. The Soldier; 41. The Gamesters; 42. The Drunkards; 43. The Idiot Fool; 44. The Robber; 45. The Blind Man; 46. The Waggoner; 47. The Beggar; 48. The Last Judgment; 49. The Allegorical Escutcheon of Death.]

GLOTTENHAM MANOR, SUSSEX.—I am at present residing upon a farm called Glottenham, within one mile of Robertsbridge, Sussex, Salehurst parish. In the rear of the farm buildings are the remains of a castle or castellated building, with the moat at present quite dry. The ground is an offshoot of Etchingham parish, though Etchingham is distant some five miles. Can any of your readers give me information concerning these ruins? I can only ascertain in the neighbourhood that they are believed to be the remains of a castle, upon the strength of which my landlord calls his estate Glottenham Castle. Any information regarding Glottenham would also oblige.

G. E. M.

[The manor of Glottingham in Mountfield is a portion of the rental of "Castle Guard" rent due to the Duke of Newcastle. The various grants of the crown connected with "the Castle and Honour of the Rape of Hastings," seem to imply a manorial jurisdiction over the whole rape, appendant to the tenure of the Castle. Horsfield (Sussex, i. 563), informs us, that "Glottingham is a manor on Mrs. Righton's estate. In a wood, called the Castle Wood, is the site of the ancient mansion" [of the Etchingham family?]; "a space of seven rods by ten rods is contained within the foundations. As the adjoining farm is called Mountfield Park, it is probable there was once a park belonging to this mansion. The space is completely surrounded by a moat, now nearly dry." Some particulars of this locality may also be found in Rouse's Beauties of Sussex, i. 23, and in Sir W. Burrell's Sussex Collections in the British Museum, Addit. MS. 5679, p. 333.]

AN IRONICAL COMPLIMENT.—

"He, i. e. Bp. Hacket, did not live to finish the palace (at Lichfield), nor did his successor, Wood, though rich, willingly do anything to it. Sir Simon Degg, a gentleman of that country, to incite him to undertake it, dedicated to him a book entitled The Parson's Counsellor, and then in the preface compliments him upon the subject of having most nobly restored to the church that demolished fabric for the good of his successors, although at the time he had not so much as turned over one single stone towards it. But I think the good Abp. Sancroft by his authority forced him at last to do something, though full against his will. So vast is the difference in the moral characters of men under the same call and obligation."—Life of Lord Keeper Guildford, i. 280.

E. H. A.

[Dr. Thomas Wood, who was a thorough Puritan, became Dean of Lichfield in 1663. Bishop Hacket complains frequently and in no measured terms of his obnoxious conduct there. See the Bishop's correspondence with Abp. Sheldon in the Tanner MSS. xlv. 66, 69, quoted in the Surtees Society's Miscellanea, vol. xxxvii. p. xiv. Dr. Wood became eventually Bishop Hacket's successor at Lichfield, through the unworthy intervention of the Duchess of Cleveland, whose favour he gained by contriving that his niece, a wealthy heiress, to whom he was guardian, should marry the Duke of Southampton, the Duchess's son by Charles II. His subsequent gross and flagrant neglect of his episcopal duties led to a remarkable and unusual exercise of discipline on the part of Abp. Sancroft, namely, the suspension of Bishop Wood from his episcopal dignity and functions, which took place in April, 1684. The instrument of suspension, taken from Archbishop Sancroft's registers at Lambeth, is printed in D'Oyly's Life of Sancroft, i. 194. The Bishop submitted some time after, and the suspension was taken off in May, 1686.]

Replies.

MINIATURES ON IVORY.

(3rd S. vii. 458.)

In reply to the query of MR. BECK relative to the date of miniature painting on ivory, I beg to state that I have in my possession a miniature which may throw some light on the subject. I was unfortunately unable to take it to South K till I was informed by those who were arranging the collection of miniatures that it was too late for them to receive it; it is therefore not exhibited.

It is a miniature, or rather a small picture, painted on ivory, $6\frac{1}{2}$ inches long, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, and represents Frederick V., Elector Palatine, and his wife Elizabeth, daughter of James I. of England, afterwards King and Queen of Bohemia. They are represented as walking on a terrace accompanied by two attendants, and in the background is a bird's-eye view of the Castle of Heidelberg and its gardens, to which the electress is pointing with her fan. It is painted in transparent water-colours on ivory, and is executed with the most minute accuracy. The figures are delicately stippled, the remainder being painted in the same manner as the illuminations of ancient manuscripts. The architectural details of the castle are given with such minuteness as to enable me to fix the date of the painting.

The elector was married in 1613, and in 1614 took upon himself the government of his electorate. During his short reign, between 1614 and 1619, he carried his castle-palace of Heidelberg to its greatest extent of splendour. He raised the "big towers," building on the top of it a large circular saloon. He erected the "English Building" for his wife on the northern rampart; he transformed the old chapel of the Rupert's Buildings into a royal hall, substituted a platform with a balustrade for the high roof of the building where the great gun was kept; and, lastly, filled up the "Round Bastion," substituting a handsome balustrade for the original parapet. These works were all completed in 1619, and in the month of September of that year he and the electress left Heidelberg for Prague to accept the crown of Bohemia, and never afterwards returned; for the Thirty Years' War then broke out, he was put under the ban of the empire, and being deprived of his dominions, he and his queen became fugitives on the face of the earth, and never again visited Heidelberg.

All the above alterations in the castle, even the balustrades, are most minutely given in the miniature, which agrees in the very smallest detail with a view of the castle taken in 1619, and it consequently could not have been painted before that year; and it can hardly have been painted later, for it is not likely that any artist would have represented the elector and electress standing in state on a terrace, pointing with pride to their magnificent castle after they had been deprived of their dominions, and were houseless wanderers on the world at large. Moreover, the "Octagon Tower" at the corner of the castle is represented entire, and just as it was in 1619. In 1622 and 1623 the castle underwent two sieges, in one of which the upper portion of this tower was destroyed, and was not rebuilt till 1640, and then it was not restored in the same form it had in 1619, and as it is here represented. So that, if the architecture is any guide, this painting and view of the castle must have been done between 1619 and 1623.

Frederick died of the plague at Mayence, 1632, and Elizabeth died in London, 1602. I am therefore disposed to fix 1619 as the date of the painting, that being the only time when the elector and electress could have been properly represented as pointing with pride to the splendid palace which they had only just finished. The style of painting is not that of a later period, and the costumes quite correspond with the time.

The miniature is most probably the work of some German artist. It is imbedded in an ivory frame, with a wavy moulded border round it; and the whole is so closely glued up within an outer frame under a glass that it cannot be taken out to be examined without breaking it to pieces. It is enclosed in a box of walnut wood, with a sliding lid. This may be a single and exceptional work, but it is quite clear that the art of painting with transparent water-colours on ivory was understood early in the seventeenth century. It is not possible to see whether it is painted on a thick piece of ivory or a thin sheet, but I should rather suspect the former; and I am disposed to think that the sawing ivory into thin sheets for painting was the consequence of there being a demand for it as a ground for miniatures, in substitution of the card and vellum of the earlier artists.

OCTAVIUS MORGAN.

9, Pall Mall.

JUBILEES OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

(3rd S. vii. 440.)

Lists of the great or ordinary Jubilees may be seen in many Catholic treatises of theology and canon law, such as Bouvier, Traité des Indulgences et du Jubilé, translated by Canon Oakeley; and Ferraris, Prompta Bibliotheca, arts. "Annus Sanctus" and "Jubilæum." But the following is a correct list of the greater Jubilees:—

Pope.	A.D.
Boniface VIII.	1300
Clement VI.	1350
Urban VI.	1390
Nicholas V.	1450
Paul II.	1475
Alexander VI.	1500
Clement VII.	1525
Julius III.	1550
Gregory XIII.	1575
Clement VIII.	1600
Urban VIII.	1625
Innocent X.	1650
Clement X.	1675
Innocent XII.	1700
Benedict XIII.	1725
Benedict XIV.	1750
Pius VI.	1775
Leo XII.	1800

I presume that your correspondent requires a list of the ordinary Jubilees only. The Popes have been accustomed to grant extraordinary Jubilees, occasionally in times of great necessity, or for obtaining particular favours from heaven. There have been moreover ordinary Jubilees granted for particular dioceses. And of late years extraordinary Jubilees have been granted: in 1829, by Pius VIII.; in 1833 and 1842, by Gregory XVI.; in 1847, 1850, 1854, 1858, and in the present year 1865, by the reigning pontiff Pius IX. F. C. H.

Your correspondent A. O. V. P. will, I think, find the required information respecting the "Jubilees of the Roman Catholic Church," in Staveley's Romish Horseleech, chap. ix., "On Jubilees and Pilgrimages," pp. 85—96, edit. 1779. At least, a perusal of the chapter referred to will repay the reader, as it throws considerable light on the doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome.

E. C. HARINGTON.

The Close, Exeter.

SHAKESPEARE FAMILY.

(3rd S. vii. 175, 498.)

The name of Shakspeare has been ever associated with my almost religious veneration; and the recent allusions to his family in "N. & Q." are as a "ticket of leave" for this communication; but, as age and infirmity have for some years held me in solitary confinement, within the four walls of my study, I am unable to satisfy myself whether much if not all of what I here write about the "Swan of Avon" has not already appeared in print. If such has been the case, I request that the Editor of "N. & Q." will for my sake and that of his trustworthy periodical, commit this sheet to the flames.

From my MS. Genealogical Collections (No. 58), it appears that a Thomas Shakspeare was, at the close of the reign of King Edward III., a Controller of the Customs in the ancient port of Youghal. Let the archivists of Ireland proudly endeavour to link the Thomas with John of the next notice, and the discoverer will merit at least a statue perennius.

In the reign of Queen Elizabeth —

"John Shakspeare, now of Stratford-upon-Avon, in the County of Warwick, Gent., whose Parent and Great-Grandfather and late antecessor (sic in my copy), for his faithful and approved service to the late most prudent Prince King Henry the Seventh of famous memory, was advanced and rewarded with lands and tenements given to him, in those parts of Warwickshire, where they have continued by some descents in good reputation and credit. We therefore" (say the Heralds of the day, William Dethick, Principal King-of-Arms of England, and William Camden, Clarendieux), "have assigned and granted," &c.

As I feel that this heraldic patent of arms must have appeared heretofore in print, I shall not occupy more of your space. The copy which I have of the patent is stated to have been taken from the original in the Heralds' Office, marked G. 13.

The John Shakspeare, Esq., who died in 1775, was an Alderman of Aldgate Ward.

Further references in my Collection are to the Gentleman's Magazine, vol. lxxvii. 609; id. lxxxvi. part ii. 204; id. lxxxvii. pt. i. 35, &c.

J. D'ALTON.

I am very glad to find this subject mooted in the pages of "N. & Q.," and I hope the discussion may enable us to add some branches to the (as at present ascertained) meagre family tree of the poet.

It may be interesting to your readers to know that there is now living at Wolverhampton a poor man named George Shakspeare, who earns a precarious livelihood by net-making. This man claims to be descended from Humphrey, the poet's brother, and his pedigree is as follows:—

Pedigree of George Shakspeare of Wolverhampton.

John Shakspeare, buried at Stratford, 1601 =

William, Humphrey, son of John S., bap. May = the poet. 4, 1590, at Stratford.

Humphrey, son of Humphrey S., bap. =
Feb. 2, 1639, at Lapworth.

John, son of Humphrey S., bap. April =
9, 1678, at Lapworth.

John, son of John Shakspeare, born = Mary at Charlecote, 1697 (a carpenter).

Edward, son of John S., d. 1770, at = Charlecote.

Edward, son of Edward S., bap. March = 15, 1761, at Charlecote, died 1828, aged 66 (sic).

John, son of Edward S., b. 1782, died =
at Henley-in-Arden, 1855.

George Shakspeare, son of John S., b.
Oct. 10, 1812, at Henley-in-Arden.

This pedigree is unsupported by any documentary evidence further than the church registers, filled up by a deposit of silt washed in by rain, or by an infiltration of calcareous matter, perhaps both, and so continued to exist in a hybernating state till at length liberated by the quarryman or mason. But all this must depend upon the geological formation, and the nature and condition of the bed of stone in which the animal is found.

OCTAVIUS MORGAN.

ARTISTIC (3rd S. viii. 8.)—Perhaps the best engraving of a blacksmith's forge with a blacksmith at work is a mezzotint by Earlom, after a picture by Wright of Derby. E. H.

In reply to ARTISTIC, I would mention the portrait of William Haulbrook, the Blacksmith of Marlborough (1659), working at his forge. It is prefixed to his Life, published, I think, about 1744. Underneath the portrait are these lines:—

"I am the Loyal Blacksmith who was a prisoner in chains, But bloody Bradshaw was hang'd like a Rogue for his pains."

J. H. W.

HESTON HUMPHREYS (3rd S. viii. 10.)—Mr. Heston Humphreys horsewhipped the Duke of Bedford at the Lichfield races on Whittington Heath, in Sept. 1747. The parties guilty of the riot and assault were tried the August following. The races were held annually in the second week in September. After the year 1745, when party spirit ran very high, there were two race meetings, the Whig meeting being held a fortnight before the Tory meeting.

I have two engravings and one woodcut representing these races and the duke's mishap. There is also a ballad upon the subject. In one place it is entitled "The Lord's Lamentation; or, the Whittington Defeat." In the Foundling Hospital for Wit, No. V., it is called "The Lichfield Defeat." E. H.

GONZALEZ DE ANDIA, HEREDITARY KNIGHT OF THE GARTER (3rd S. vii. 492.)—It does not appear from the diploma cited, that the Order of the Garter is at all mentioned in it. The Collar of the Order of the Garter had not then been introduced. Is it not most likely that the king sent to his "well beloved Domingo Gonzalez de Andia" his Livery Collar of the Suns and Roses? No such person was a Knight of the Garter; nor is there any instance of the Order having been conferred with hereditary succession to the honour. A search in the Public Record Office might disclose the real fact. Y.

LORD HOWDEN inquires for hereditary Knights of the Garter. In Collins's Peerage, i. 206-7 (ed. 1778), he will find the singular commission granted in 1644 by Charles I. to Edward, Marquis of Worcester, in which occurs this passage:—

"The title of Duke of Somerset to you and your heirs male for ever; and from henceforward to give the Garter to your arms, and at your pleasure to put on the George and Blue Ribbon."

Blanche Lady Wake, whom HERMENTRUD mentions in 51 Edw. III., I think can be no other than Blanche, daughter of Henry Plantagenet, Earl of Lancaster. HERMENTRUD says, from Burke's Extinct Peerage, that this Blanche died in 1349; but I think she is here in error, as on referring to that work, I find that Blanche's husband, Thomas Lord Wake, is said to have died in 1349, and that no date at all is given for Blanche's death. CHARLES F. S. WARREN.

Over Vicarage, St. Ives, Hants.

ZINC SPIRES (3rd S. vii. 461, 503.)—At the time that Dalston spire, spoken of by J. C. J., was being recovered, I sent and obtained a piece of the old zinc, as I was at the time collecting all information I could about zinc. I found the piece of metal thus obtained to be far too thin, and also of inferior quality, being brittle, and, as J. C. J. says, "hard and stubborn;" but let me add for his information, that good zinc is very soft and ductile; it will bend, and bend again, without cracking; and a reference to the work executed in high relief by stamping in an iron mould, will show still more that this is so. I believe the spire at Dalston was recovered in the same mistaken way as before; and unless a better sort of sheet zinc has been used the same result will take place. But from inquiries I have made as to the mode in which Ilford church spire has been done, I believe there is no such disappointing results to fear there.

JAMES EDMESTON.

CURIOUS CHRISTIAN NAMES (3rd S. vii. 494.)—A correspondent mentions his having found in a parish register "the very uncommon name of Wylgeforde given to a daughter in two different families in 1582 and 1584." This is St. Wilgefortis, Virgin and Martyr, who was crucified with ropes, and who prayed that she might have a man's beard, so that her sex being mistaken, she might be preserved from insults to her chastity. Hence she is represented in old illuminated books of Hours—too often ignorantly called Missals—with a long beard, crucified with ropes, in a blue, or red robe, tied round her feet, or ankles. This saint, thus depicted, is still to be seen on the roodscreen of Worstead church, Norfolk. F. C. H.

LORD BACON AND SIR JOHN CONSTABLE (3rd S. viii. 4.)—MR. CORNEY may be right as to the use of the word "brother" by Daniel, but he is wrong as to Bacon, who called Sir John Constable his brother as being the husband of his wife's sister. Is it known, by the way, upon what authority

Nickolls states that Sir John Constable was knighted on Oct. 7, 1607? There is a letter of Bacon's in which he speaks of the king having "most graciously, at his humble request, knighted, the last Sunday, his brother-in-law, a towardly young gentleman." Now Oct. 7, 1607, was a Wednesday. The date attached to the letter in the modern printed copies (1803) was, I believe, introduced by Dr. Birch. In the earliest printed copy (Remains, p. 78) it has no date; and it cannot, I think, have been written so early.

Bacon left Sir John Constable all his books. Is there any chance of finding what became of them?

J. S.

DEMOSTHENES' ADVICE (2nd S. vi. 70; 114, 3rd S. vii. 430.)—The answer to the question, "Is the saying, in which Demosthenes is supposed to have spoken of action [ἡ ὑπόκρισις] as the one thing necessary to make an orator, to be found in the works of any Greek author who wrote before the time of Cicero?" must, I believe, be given in the negative. I have already shown from Aristotle (Rhetoric, iii. 1, 2) that ὑπόκρισις, as "the art of delivery," was recent in his day. The best, indeed the only, description we have of it in Greek, besides Aristotle, is in the Ion of Plato; Ion being one of the rhapsodists, or actors (ὑποκριταί), Socrates asks him,—

"Whenever you recite verses, or tell the pathetic story of Andromache, Hecuba, or Priam, are you not excited beyond yourself (πλεον ἐμῶν εἰ ἢ ἔγω σπανοῦ), and does not your soul think itself carried away in ecstasy (ἐνθουσιάζουσα) to Ithaca or Troy?"

The reply is,—

"When I am reciting any tale of pity my eyes are filled with tears; but when it is awful or terrible, my hair stands on end, and my heart leaps. . . . From the stage I constantly see the spectators weeping, looking aghast, or astonished, in unison with my recitation."

So Hamlet (Act II. Sc. 2) remarks like effects as to the story of Hecuba in the actor, but not in Polonius the spectator. Plato beautifully compares the effect of this kind of elocution to the loadstone which attracts iron rings, imparts that property to other rings, and forms a chain of them. This is in part on the principle of imitation (see that word in Rees's Cyclopædia), whereby one auditor sympathises with another, by the art of the actor, who is the loadstone, whilst the auditors are the magnetised rings. Ion was complete master of his art, his passion was only simulated, for, being a tragic and not a comic actor, he says,—

"I must set my auditors weeping, that I may laugh when taking their cash; for if I set them laughing I weep, for I lose their money."

This word, ὑπόκρισις, is not here used by Plato, but he explains the feeling by the word κατέχευται, "he is possessed, since he is held fast." To the attractive powers of the rhapsodist, or actor, the repulsive powers of Socrates, by his dialectic method, afford a striking contrast, the effect of the latter being forcibly described by Plato as like the shock of the torpedo, ἡλεκτρίλα (Meno. xiii.).

T. J. BUCKTON.

CHARTULARY OF WHALLEY ABBEY (3rd S. vii. 376.)—I rather think that in factum is the correct reading. There was in the Roman law a class of actions denominated Actiones in factum. If any of your readers should wish to enquire into the nature of these actions, I would refer him to Ortolan, Explication des Instituts (1843) pp. 1031-1038. But as far as the Chartulary is concerned, it is enough to observe that in the Middle Ages writers who affected classicality at the expense of precision were in the habit of using this term of the Roman law to designate what in the Latin of our English Common Law were styled, Actiones de Transgressione super casum—an expression to which the modern reader might be disposed to apply the remark which in the Promptorium Parvulorum we find made on the word plagiarius (a pledge)—"Latinum est Anglie, et non alibi." To the modern lawyer, these actions are known as "actions on the case."

P. S. C.

SYNAGOGUE OF THE LIBERTINES (3rd S. vii. 460, 505.)—It is not necessary to recur to the theory that Λιβερτινων may have been corrupted into Λιβερτινων. The latter word is, as MR. BUCKTON correctly states, simply the Greek adaptation of the familiar Latin term Libertinorum; as κοδραντην (St. Matt. v. 26) of the Latin quadrantem; and as many other foreign words are employed in the New Testament.

In accordance with this fact, the following remarks of Bishop Marsh may be acceptable to your correspondent:—

"Whatever meaning we affix to this word—whether we understand emancipated slaves, or the sons of emancipated slaves—they must have been the slaves or the sons of slaves to Roman masters; otherwise the Latin word libertini would not apply to them. That among persons of this description there were many at Rome who professed the Jewish religion, whether slaves of Jewish origin or proselytes after manumission, is nothing very extraordinary. But that they should have been so numerous at Jerusalem as to have a synagogue in that city, built for their particular use, appears at least to be more than might be expected. Some commentators, therefore, have supposed that the term in question, instead of denoting emancipated Roman slaves, or the sons of such persons, was an adjective belonging to the name of some city or district; while others, on mere conjecture, have proposed to alter the term itself. But the whole difficulty is removed by a passage in the second book of the Annals of Tacitus, from which it appears that the persons whom that historian describes as being libertini generis, and infected, as he calls it, with foreign—that is, with Jewish superstition—were so numerous in the time of the Emperor Tiberius, that four thousand of them who were sent to carry arms were sent to the island of Sardinia; and that all the rest of them were ordered either to renounce their religion or to depart from Italy before a appointed. This statement of Tacitus is confirmed by Suetonius, who relates that Tiberius disposed of the young men among the Jews, then at Rome (under pretence of their serving in the wars), in provinces of an unhealthy climate; and that he banished from the city all the rest of that nation, or proselytes to that religion, under penalty of being condemned to slavery for life if they did not comply with his commands. We can now, therefore, account for the number of libertini in Judæa, at the period of which [St.] Luke was speaking, which was about fifteen years after their banishment from Italy."

H. W. T.

In the number for December, 1864, of De Rossi's interesting Bullettino di Archeologia Cristiana, CANON DALTON will find the article for which he inquires. Chevalier De Rossi's opinion is that the Libertines referred to in the Acts were Judei Libertini, Jews who (or whose fathers) had been made slaves in war, and afterwards gained their liberty. These emancipated Jews had a synagogue of their own at Jerusalem. I am surprised so good an antiquary as your correspondent MR. BUCKTON does not know De Rossi's periodical. It is to be had in London, I believe, of Molini, the Italian bookseller in King William Street, Strand.

G. R.

WORDS USED IN DIFFERENT SENSES (3rd S. vii. 425.)—To insense, i. e. to make another sensible of one's meaning and purpose, is a very common use of this verb, both in Ireland and in the northern and midland counties of England. I have not seen it noted that the word is employed in the same signification by Shakspeare, King Henry VIII., Act V. Sc. 1, where Bishop Gardiner says to Sir Thomas Lovell:—

"Sir (I may tell it you), I think I have Insensed the lords o' the council that he is
(For so I know he is, they know he is,)
A most arch heretic."

H. W. T.

COMMON SAYING (3rd S. vii. 494.)—A curious variation of the saying referred to by your correspondent ST. SWITHIN, was once used in conversation with myself by a Polish Jew. After discussing some points connected with our respective creeds, he pulled something out of a small bag, and asked me if I knew what it was. I replied that it was a phylactery. He then observed, in a severe and caustic tone, that there were many teachers of our church who would not have known him to be an Israelite at all; and that if he had chanced to fall ill, and die in their parishes, they would have had him buried like any other person amongst themselves (a consummation from which he seemed to shrink with sincere horror); but that any clergyman who knew Hebrew could tell at once, from this little sign, that such a person ought to be conveyed to the burial ground set apart for members of the Jewish faith. He animated upon sundry parties whom he stated as being, to his knowledge, entirely ignorant of the very elements of the sacred language; and concluded in the following words, which I wrote down at the time (February, 1861), and which I transcribe from my note:—

"Ah! those parsons who do not know Hebrew have no business to be parsons. They should be butchers; they do not know Aleph from a bull's foot."

It gives even more than ordinary point to this man's sarcasm, which was spoken in a very bitter tone, as I well remember, if he was aware of the identity presumed to exist between the Hebrew letter aleph and a bull's head, to which the most ancient form of that letter in the Phœnician alphabet bears a rude resemblance, as Gesenius has remarked.

H. W. T.

TOASTS (3rd S. vii. 501.)—MR. WILLIAM BATES quotes the story of the Earl of Stair's famous toast from the Anecdote Library, 1822, in which Lord Stair's "Master King William" is made a contemporary of the Empress Maria Theresa and Louis XV. The scene of the story is the Hague, where Lord Stair was British Plenipotentiary in 1742-3, immediately before the Dettingen campaign, when George II. was king, whom he served in the double capacity of ambassador and commander-in-chief.

The Anecdote Library has confused this Lord Stair with his grandfather or father, who both served King William III.; the former, Sir James Dalrymple, whom King William created Viscount Stair, as Lord President of the Court of Session; and the latter, John, second Viscount and first Earl of Stair, as Secretary of State for Scotland, in which capacity he earned the hatred of his countrymen by his share in the barbarous massacre of Glencoe, and his exertions in favour of the Union with England, which were so arduous as to shorten his life. His son, the ambassador and field-marshal, was, however, generally beloved and admired by his countrymen. It has been remarked that rarely, if ever, have men of such eminent talent been produced by one family in three successive generations.

SCOTUS.

A wish having been expressed that the "Climax of Toasts" should be turned into a metrical form, as a mnemonic aid to diners out, the following attempt is with great deference submitted to them:—

L'Abbé de Ville proposed a toast,
His Master, as the rising Sun:
Reisbach then gave the Empress Queen,
As the bright Moon, and much praise won.
The Earl of Stair, whose turn next came,
Gave for his toast his own King Will,
As Joshua the son of Nun,
Who made both Sun and Moon stand still.

F. C. H.

COUNTANCES (3rd S. vii. 494, 506.)—MR. J. WOODWARD will find, by reference to the histories, Duncan and Durell, of the Channel Islands, that they were formerly within the diocese of Coutances.

MACKENZIE E. C. WALCOTT, B.D., F.S.A.

COMPUTATIONS OF REGNAL YEARS (3rd S. vii. 478.)—"O that I had been writ down an ass!" exclaims our old friend Dogberry; but I doubt whether he would have found it a very pleasant process to "write himself down an ass" in the august pages of "N. & Q." Yet this is, on my own account, the object of my present communication. I really am astonished at my own stupidity. Not until I had sent you my query on this subject, did it occur to me to subject the Rolls to the simplest possible test—that of the coincidence between the days of the month and those of the week. Having tried this test, may I now state, for the benefit of any one who may be puzzled as I was, that the Michaelmas Rolls of Edward III. really belong to the year previous to that for which they are dated, i. e. that the Roll for Michaelmas, anno 38, contains the Michaelmas Term for anno 37, and the Hilary Term for anno 38. While the Paschal Rolls of Richard II. are dated for the regnal year of which they contain the commencement, i. e. the Roll for anno 4 is that for 1381.

As the one object of all my researches, here and elsewhere, is truth, I hasten to acknowledge at once that this discovery entirely disproves my suggestion concerning the sons of the Black Prince. The dates of the arrival of news to King Edward must be as follows:—

Mich. 30, Feb. 25	. . .	1365
Pasch. 30, July 7	. . .	1365
Pasch. 41, May 3	. . .	1367

The first time, news was brought of the birth of Prince Edward. The second, letters concerning the birth of the same prince. The third, letters concerning the birth of Prince Richard, whose nativity Froissart has correctly placed in 1367.

The remainder of the dates in my "Notes from the Issue Rolls," Nos. 1 and 2, must also be read, when taken from the Michaelmas Rolls, a year earlier than those given. Having once discovered the test which I must apply, I shall be careful to date my future "Notes" correctly; and I beg your pardon Mr. Editor, and that of your readers, for having unwittingly misled you. I was not the only person mistaken, for I asked "an opinion" on the subject from a competent judge before writing to you. My informant appears to have been mistaken as well as myself; and the dates of the Rolls are certainly not such as any person would at first have supposed. HERMENTRUE.

SASH-WINDOW (3rd S. vii. 508.)—Unlike the window that opens and shuts on hinges, and with a horizontal movement, the sash-window works up and down like a sluice. Hence I have always thought that sash-window meant sluice-window, Sasne, in old English, a sluice: so, in Dutch, sas. Sash-window = sasse-window. SCHIR.

COLD HARBOUR (3rd S. vii. 483.)—Notwithstanding the ingenious theories put forward as to its derivation, I believe Cold Harbour is a nickname and nothing else. In looking for the origin of names, I venture to think that we do not pay sufficient attention to the proneness of the labouring population of all countries to that kind of humour (often a very poor sort of wit) that consists in affixing a stigma to persons, places, and things, by coining a name for them. We know that a great number of established surnames originated in that way, and that almost every collier and miner in England and Wales has a fresh or second name given to him by his fellows, derived from some personal peculiarity or from some incident in his career. As to nicknames of places, I may mention as an illustration that Sir Roderick Murchison, in his Silurian System, calls in aid local names as illustrative of the character of the soil. Speaking of the coarse drift, loading the surface of the old red sandstone in the western part of Herefordshire, he says (first edit. p. 512), it "renders whole parishes arid, as indicated by the appellations of 'rough moors,' 'labour in vain,' &c. One name of a place in that district, marked in the ordnance map, is "Cold Heart."

If a far-fetched derivation is to be sought for "Cold Harbour," why not for the above, or for a variety of other names of houses and cottages, e. g. "Knave's Castle," "Folly" (the latter generally coupled with the name of the builder of the house), and a variety of other names of frequent occurrence? But to come still closer to the point, I know a house in Shropshire, built within the last forty years on uninclosed nameless ground, and that house acquired the name of "Cold Harbour;" and on my asking, some twenty years ago, the first occupier of the house, how the name was acquired, he told me the masons who built it so christened it over a jug of beer! I will only add, that I know several "Cold Harbours" which could not have had any relation to a Roman road.

J. E. DAVIS.

Rownall Hall, Leek.

WILLIAM, EARL OF ULSTER (3rd S. vii. 478.)—Several of the Annals of Ireland make mention under the year 1333, of the assassination of this young earl. Those (edited for the Irish Archaeological Society by Dean Butler) of Friar John Clyn, who lived at the time, state the occurrence to have been in that year, "sexto die Julii in octabis Trinitatis:" the earl being "20 annorum etatis, unicum et unius anni filiam relinquens heredem." The word "Julii" here must, by some accidental mistake, have taken the place of the word Junii; Trinity Sunday having fallen that year on the 30th of May, and its octave, or first Sunday after, on the 6th of June. There is an English Inq. p. Mort. of the earl's, in 7 Edw. III., which, I conclude, gives the day of his death; and possibly, too, the precise age of his infant heiress, future wife of Lionel of Antwerp.

J. KYNASTON EDWARDS.

WYVIL: CLIFTON (3rd S. vii. 257.)—It may assist the inquiry into William Clifton's descent to state, that he was solicitor of Excise at Edinburgh from c. 1720 to c. 1760; that his wife's name was Mary Diryck (qu. Derrick?); and that his children were: 1. William, afterwards Vicar of Embleton, Northumberland; whose son afterwards held a living somewhere in the south. 2. Humble, died young. 3. Humble. 4. David Barnaby, died young. 5. David, born 1724; married Katherine, daughter of James Baird of Chesterhall. 6. Christian Catherine, wife of Edward Wyvil; and possibly other children. Probably, therefore, he or his wife were connected with some of the Humbles of Yorkshire. We have the somewhat uncommon name of Clifton, associated with the very uncommon ones of Diryck and Humble: a fact which may help some of your readers to identify this family of Cliftons. P.

"FROM THENCE" versus "FROM THERE" (3rd S. vii. 437.)—Your correspondent C. E. P. would have fortified his position in claiming for the first of these expressions a place in classical English, had he, in my opinion, noticed the fact that the use of such words, as there, thence, as adverbs is in itself a corruption; though, like many other words and phrases originally used in very different or even opposite senses, they have forced for themselves by the necessities of our thought, a well-ascertained position in our colloquial and written language. There, thence, are but oblique cases of the pronoun the: the ce in thence, though not apparent to the eye, reveals itself to the ear, as the es or 's of the possessive case. And bearing this fact in mind, it seems to me a better expression. In from thence, rather than from there, you revert as it were to the primary meaning of the word—an inflected pronoun in possessive case with a preposition before it. PAUL A JACOBSON.

West Derby.

N. D., A MINIATURE PAINTER (3rd S. vii. 495.) As Nathaniel Dance, R.A., is not recorded as a miniature painter, the pictures in question were probably painted by Nathan Downer; whose name appears in the Royal Academy Catalogue for 1771 and 1773. U. O. N.

Westminster Club.

"THAT'S THE CHEESE" (3rd S. vii. 397, 465, 505.)—In a work recently published, entitled Stray Leaves from the Diary of an Indian Officer, appears the following passage:—

"Few who use the word cheez, are aware of the exact meaning. It is simply the Hindoostanee word for thing. In my young days we used to say that so-and-so was just the thing, whereas now we hear that it is just the cheez."

The author also states that the Anglicised word "bosh" is also of Hindoostanee origin; and signifies, as in our language, nonsense.

C. S. REVELL.

None of the explanations of the meaning or origin of this popular, or rather slang phrase, appears to me very satisfactory. I am disposed to think that it is a corruption of good Saxon, thus:—The word choice was formerly written chose, from Eirjan—to chese; or Ang.-S. ceorjan, to choose:—

" Now thou might chese,
How thou couetist to cal me, now thou knowst al mi names."—Vision of P. Ploughman.

When one says, "That's the cheese," I understand it to mean: That is just the proper thing—just what I would have chosen; or, taking for the orthography of the word its agreement with the original orthography and orthoëpy, "That's the chese, or choice." I need hardly refer here to the fact, that ceorjan belongs to that class of words which change the z into s. PAUL A JACOBSON.

West Derby.

KILPECK CASTLE (3rd S. vii. 476.)—From a pedigree in my possession of the Pye family, Lords of Kilpeck Castle in the Mynde Park, Herefordshire (which they possessed from before 25th Henry I. (1124) until the flight of King James II., when they disposed of it and retired to the Continent), I find the following references:—

"There is an interesting account of Kilpeck Castle. See Gentleman's Magazine for Sept. 1789."

Also see —

"Dugdale's Baronage, vol. i. p. 597; Pedigree of Pye Family in Noble's Memoirs of the Cromwells, vol. ii. p. 99."

THOMAS BALGUY ALLEN.

Tombland, Norwich.

CLARET (3rd S. vii. 494.)—The practice of drinking claret in Scotland and Ireland continued some time after the flight of James II. In Campbell's Life of Lord Loughborough (vi. 29), it is stated that excellent claret was drawn from the cask at the rate of eighteen-pence the quart; and that the extinction of the "Poker" society (a promilitia association at Edinburgh) was effected by the tax on French wines (cir. 1757), which doubled its price. Hence the joke of John Home:

"Firm and erect the Caledonian stood,
Old was his mutton and his claret good;
Let him drink port, an English statesman cried;
He drank the poison, and his spirit died."

T. J. BUCKTON.

NETTLES PROOFS OF HABITATION (3rd S. vii. 460.)—I had noted this in Glencreggan (ii. 207)

when speaking of a vitrified fort on the western coast of Cantire; and I quoted some interesting remarks on the subject from Pictures of Nature around Malvern, by Edwin Lees, F.L.S., who says,—

"However much Nature may adorn solitary spots of her own selection, she refuses to throw any but the rankest and most lurid plants where the ground has been contaminated by human vices. So prophesied Isaiah of the structures of Idumæa: 'Thorns shall come up in her palaces, nettles and brambles in the fortresses thereof;' and how often are we reminded in the present day of where some dwelling or garden has formerly been, by the nettles, thistles, or wormwood, that almost choke the spot. This appears to be the case generally in the world; for either weeds delight to dog the footsteps of man, go wherever he will, or the turning up of the soil and the manure left there unfits it for the old flowers of the country, but makes a pabulum for rank strangers, which they quickly take advantage of. Thus, North America has become a garden for English weeds; and Professor Buckman told me that he saw them among the backwoods of Ohio wherever the ground was upturned. Scleiden says that Russian steppes are peculiarly fertile in weeds called 'burian' wherever cultivation has loosened the soil. They rise, he says, to an incredible height; and 'These thistles, as in the Pampas of Buenos Ayres, distinguish themselves by acquiring a size, a development, and ramification which is truly marvellous.'—Rambles of a Geologist, pp. 364-5.

CUTHBERT BEDE.

FAMILY NAMES: DOOLITTLE (3rd S. vii. 459.) The name of Doolittle is still to be found in Kidderminster, and has existed there for upwards of two centuries. Of this family was the Rev. Thomas Doolittle, born at Kidderminster, 1630, who was vicar of St. Alphage, London, from 1654 to 1692; after which he was a celebrated non-conformist divine, and the projector of the first meeting-house. A sketch of his life and a list of his works (of which the Treatise on the Lord's Supper, and A Call to Delaying Sinners, have passed through numerous editions), will be found in Chambers's Biographical Illustrations of Worcestershire, pp. 222-3.

CUTHBERT BEDE.

"THOUGHTFUL MOLL" (3rd S. vii. 495.)—This and similar stories are to be found in "N. & Q." 1st S. v. 303, 459, and 601.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

DANIEL AND FLORIO, p. 4, col. ii.—The subscription to Mr. Anthony Bacon is, "Your entire loving brother." The subscription to sir John Constable is, "Your loving brother and friend."

BOLTON CORNEY.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

A Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art. Edited by W. T. Brande, D.C.L., and Rev. G. W. Cox, M.A., assisted by Gentlemen of eminent Scientific and Literary Acquirements. Part IV. (Longmans.)

We are glad to chronicle the steady progress of this useful work. The present Part completes the first of the three volumes of which the work is to consist.

England as seen by Foreigners in the Days of Elizabeth and James the First. Comprising Translations of the Journals of the Two Dukes of Wirtemberg in 1592 and 1610; both illustrative of Shakespeare. With Extracts from Travels of Foreign Princes, and others, Curious Notes, an Introduction, and Etchings. By W. Branchley Rye, Assistant Keeper in the Department of Printed Books, British Museum. (J. Russell Smith.)

If Mr. Rye deserves credit for the happy idea of producing a book which should exhibit the endeavours made by intelligent foreigners, in the days of good Queen Bess and James the First—

"... the gift to gie us
To see ourselves as others see us,"—

he is equally deserving of credit for the manner in which he has worked out that excellent idea, for the industry and intelligence with which he has collected his materials, and for the pleasant manner in which he has laid the same before his readers. After an introduction, which occupies some hundred and thirty pages, and which, treating of Foreign Travel, Foreign Travellers, Englishmen Abroad, Handbooks of Travel Talk, the Biography of Frederick Duke of Wirtemberg, his endeavours to obtain the Garter, the embassy to invest him with it, and a vast store of information upon cognate subjects, we are presented with a translation of the Travels of that Duke, as also those of his second son Lewis Frederick, Prince of Wirtemberg. These are followed by similar translations from various other travellers, the majority Germans, but among them a Swiss, a Dane, a Spaniard, and a couple of Dutchmen. What they saw and what they tell, combined with Mr. Rye's illustrations, furnish a series of very curious pictures of England in the Olden Time, and make a book replete both with information and amusement, the information being made doubly useful by means of a capital Index.

Notices to Correspondents.

THE INDEX TO OUR SEVENTH VOLUME will be circulated with "N. & Q." of Saturday the 16th inst.

GEOMETRICUS whose article on Euclid Illogical appeared in "N. & Q." of Nov. 5, 1884. We have a communication for this Correspondent. Where shall we direct it?

W. H. Holland's Leaguer is in the Grenville Collection at the British Museum. See the Grenville Catalogue, Part I. p. 321.—Burton (Thomas), R.F. is entered in the new catalogue (p. 124) under "Burton (Thomas), R.F." the press mark 809 L. 1.—The Paston Letters are in the Reading Room, press 2072 b.

F. O. P. The appalling accident at the fall of the Suspension Bridge at Angers occurred on April 16, 1880. See the Annual Register of 1881, p. 87.

S. RICHMOND. There is no allusion to the mariner's compass in 1st xxviii. 13. The text may be thus paraphrased, "And from thence it fetched a compass" (that is, it coasted round the eastern shores of Italy) "and came to Rhegium."

J. H. Three articles on "Coins placed in Foundations" have appeared in "N. & Q." 1st S. vi. 470; vii. 166; and S. vii. 493.

INVESTIGATOR. The Fencible Light Dragoons were the principal and most effective force of the cavalry disposable in all parts of Great Britain from 1794 to 1800. In "N. & Q." 2nd S. v. 155, 328, will be found a full description of its nature and uses, and it was wholly omitted in all respects from the Volunteers or Yeomanry of this country.

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d. or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 8d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for SEVEN SHILLINGS for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 11s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. BAKER, at WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all COMMUNICATIONS FOR THE EDITOR should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 185.

NOTES:—Blackfriars Bridge, 41—Shakespeare Emendations, 42—Luis de Leon, 43—The MS. Collections of Thomas Dineley, 45—Curious Story about the Original of the "Pilgrim's Progress"—Phaer's "Æneid of Virgil"—The Canton: Planter—Two Sovereigns, 44.

QUESTIONS:—Miniature of Cromwell, 46—Heraldic Queries, 47—"Ceter et Audax"—"La Clomira di G. Magnani"—Coney-garth—"The Five Wounds of Christ"—Mary Kerr Hart—Hoo—Kemble's "Ode on the American War"—Lyon, Lords Glaucus and Earls of Strathmore—Nestorian Curse—The Nervous System—Quotations in Plume's "Life of Hackett" wanted—Arthur Pole—Webb, 47.

QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS:—Eleanor James—Richard Brinsley Sheridan—Obelisks at Kew—Yorkshire Dialogue—Ludovick Brodie, W.S.—Lawrence Cross, 49.

REPLIES:—St. Augustine and the Mystery of the Blessed Trinity, 51—Albini Brito, 52—Calderon's "Daughter of the Air," 53—Daniel and Florio, &c., 56—Voltaire: Dialectic, 58—Dragon in Heraldry—Kar, Ker, Cor—Like a Bird, in two Places at once—Epigrams by W. S. Lander—Gibbon's Autobiography—Herba Britannica—Daughter pronounced Dafter—Day for Marrying—Hudibrastic Couplet—Medieval Churches in Roman Camps—Collar of Edward IV.—The Rev. George Rye's Sermon—To clear the Glass—Proverbs prevalent in Rosendale—The Term "Pretty"—Park of Artillery—Deciphering MSS.—Gibbon Arms—Sash Windows—Quotation from Aristotle—The Dublin "Comet" Newspaper—Sea Bathing—Holies Church Notes—Climate and Language—Shelves and Terraces—Objective—Beast—Words used in different Senses—Bibliographical Queries, &c., 55.

Notes.

BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE.

Papa, do you remember the old Blackfriars Bridge with its elegant nine arches? This question may probably be asked in many a domestic circle of the next generation. It is just about a century since Blackfriars Bridge was first built, and very nearly a quarter of a century since it began to show chronic symptoms of failure and decay, and the skill of our eminent engineers was required to prevent the old structure from making away with itself. No less than ten years and three-quarters were consumed in building it, and it cost from first to last 152,840*l*.

As a curious question of longevity, is there to be found among us one who can call to mind the battle of the arches—the elliptical of Mr. Robert Mylne the engineer, versus the semicircular of Mr. Thomas Simpson the mathematician? Pendente lite, Dr. Johnson, as is well known, engaged in the controversy in behalf of his friend, Mr. Gwynn, one of the competitors, and wrote three letters in The Gazetteer in opposition to the elliptical side of the question. The palm of victory was ultimately awarded to the Scotch engineer.

The last day of October, 1865, will be the 106th anniversary of the commencement of the old Bridge, when the first stone was formally laid in the north abutment, with much state and the firing of several rounds of cannon, by Sir Thomas Chitty, the then Lord Mayor. Under the stone was deposited money in gold, silver, and copper coins of the reign of George II., namely, a five guinea piece, a two guinea piece, a guinea and half-guinea, a crown, a half-crown, a shilling, a sixpence, a halfpenny, a farthing, together with the silver medal given to the architect, Mr. Mylne, by the Roman Academy of St. Luke. There was also inclosed in the cavity under the stone a plate of pure tin, containing the famed Latin inscription* eulogising the political merits and social virtues of the great commoner, William Pitt, after whom it was originally intended the Bridge should be named. But long before it could be formally christened, it was so widely known as Blackfriars, that all attempts to alter its designation were wisely abandoned. On Wednesday, Nov. 19, 1768, the Bridge was made passable as a bridle-way, and was finally opened for traffic on Sunday, Nov. 19, 1769. It may not be generally known, that Iolo Morganwg (i. e. Edward Williams, the Bard and last of the Druids), the most indefatigable of literary Welsh antiquaries, worked as a common mason on this Bridge.

The site of the old Bridge may be considered classic ground; for here lies embedded "in a tongue unknown to our citizens," the memorable specimen of "City Latin," the scholastic effort of that "famous citizen of credit and renown," Mr. John Paterson, nicknamed by the wits of his day, Busby Birch, LL.D. The luckless solicitor to the Corporation never heard the end of his "City Latin." Churchill, in his poem founded on the story of the Cock Lane Ghost, thus expresses the popular feeling against Paterson as well as Mylne:—

"What of that Bridge, which, void of sense,
But well supplied with impudence,
Englishmen, knowing not the Guild,
Thought they might have a claim to build,
Till Paterson, as white as milk,
As smooth as oil, as soft as silk,
In solemn manner had decreed,
That on the other side the Tweed,
Art born and bred, and fully grown,
Was with one Mylne, a man unknown;
But grace, preferment, and renown
Deserving, just arrived in town:
One Mylne, an artist perfect quite,
Both in his own and country's right,
As fit to make a bridge as he,
With glorious Patavinity,†
To build inscriptions, worthy found
To lie for ever under ground."

The Ghost, book iv.

A witty and critical dissection of this inscription also appeared in a pamphlet, entitled—

"City Latin, or, Critical and Political Remarks on the Latin Inscription on laying the first stone of the intended new Bridge at Black Fryars; proving almost every word, and every letter of it to be erroneous, and contrary to the practice of both Ancients and Moderns in this kind of writing: interspersed with curious Reflections on Antiques and Antiquity: with a Plan or Pattern for a new Inscription. Dedicated to the venerable Society of Antiquaries. By the Rev. Busby Birch, LL.D., F.R.S., F.A.S., F.G.C., and M.S.E.A.M.C., i.e. Member of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. London, 8vo, 1760, second edition, 1761."

* Vide "N. & Q." 1st S. vi. 20, 89.

† Patavinity, bad Latin.

This sparkling frisky squib, from the pen of Bonnel Thornton, was let off more in merriment than rancour. The witty author followed up his whimsical strictures in another droll pamphlet, entitled—

"Plain English, in Answer to City Latin; or Critical and Political Remarks on the Latin Inscription on laying the first stone of the intended new Bridge at Black-Fryars: showing the several applications made, or proposed to be made, to the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, &c. &c., the London Clergy, the Lawyers, the College of Physicians, &c. for a proper Latin Inscription; likewise pointing out the supposed Author of the Inscription, first in English, and the real Translator of it afterwards in Latin. By a Deputy. London, 8vo, 1761."

Of course, the finding of the foundation stone of the old Bridge is anticipated with some curiosity; not so much on account of the coins in circulation when George the Second was king, but as a memento of one of the most notable transactions in our civic history, and deserving to be preserved among the other interesting relics now in the custody of the worthy librarian of the Corporation Library. J. Y.

Barnsbury.

SHAKESPEARE EMENDATIONS.

Pericles.

"Opinion's but a fool that makes us scan
The outward habit by the inward man."

Act II. Sc. 2.

Has it been noticed that Simonides is here made to say the reverse of what he means? I had noted among my marginalia—Query, for by read not. Now, however, I am more inclined to adopt the reading of my friend Mr. Crawhall—

"The inward habit by the outward man."

The transposed applications of habit and man are easily understood, and not unaccordant I think with the taste of the day, while their use in these senses probably led to the intentional or unintentional transposition by the transcriber or printer.

In Marston's What You Will (Act II. Sc. 1). Lampatho says to the fop:—

"Sir, I protest I not only take distinct notice of your dear rarities of exterior presence, but also I protest I am most vehemently enamoured of, and very passionately dote on, your inward adornments and habilities of spirit."

"1st Fisherman. O sir, things must be as they may; and what a man cannot get, he may lawfully deal for,—his wife's soul."—Act II. Sc. 1.

In the absence of any explanation of this last saying, evidently a proverbial one, I would offer the following:—

As a rule a man cannot deal for (sell or bargain about) what he neither possesses nor is likely to possess. Some schoolman-humourist, however, discovered the following exception. A man's wife is his goods, his chattels; a man may do what he likes with his own. Ergo he may sell or bargain about his wife. But his wife's soul is a part of his wife. Ergo he may sell or bargain about his wife's soul, though he cannot get or obtain it. Hence, when a man talked largely, as Pericles seemed to here, of trying for or dealing with things beyond his sphere or powers, and which he has no chance of obtaining, the unbelieving listener ironically quoted a precedent—"Yea, friend, what a man cannot get, he may lawfully deal for—to wit, his wife's soul—I know of no other case" (subaud.).

"1st Sailor. Slack the bowlines, there. Thou wilt not, wilt thou? Blow and split thyself."

The bowlines are slackened when reefing or furling, and in either case men must go aloft. But what meaning can be got out of "Thou wilt not—wilt thou?" I can only find one, and that one—almost too ridiculous to mention. It is that some sailor refuses to go aloft, causing the ejaculation—"thou wilt not," and then when struck show fight, and brings out the "wilt thou?"—a far-fetched explanation, not harmonising with the phrase nor with the punctuation, and above all not falling in with the popular ideas as to the courage and achievements of Elizabeth's sailors.

But if we turn to Marina's recollections of her nurse's oft-repeated tales of the incidents of her birth, we find that the violence of the waves and wind—

" . . . from the ladder-tackle washes off
A canvas-climber" (Act IV. Sc. 1.), the nurse's canvas-climber being what is called in nautical phraseology a topman; for with large crews, such as would man a ship carrying a king and a queen, the daughter of a king, certain of the crew are specially told off for duties aloft. So frightful an incident fixed itself in the nurse's memory, and her land phrases are preserved by Marina. But there was an accompanying circumstance, which, as exemplative of a seaman's unconcern in danger and disregard of death, also infixed itself in the nurse's mind, and became an oft-told tale. How is the loss received? "Ha!" says one, "wilt out?" Is it not then likely that this happened when in that very storm the topmen, as shown by the order "slack the bowlines," were just going aloft, and when a sudden heel and heavy sea washed one off the shrouds? and is it not likely that it was the first sailor, who, brought up in the school of Prospero's boatswain, said "Thou wilt out, wilt thou?" His short elegy is then followed by an angry objurgation to the winds that caused the misfortune, and were then threatening to split the sails—"Blow and split thyself."

Othello.

"Cassio. One that excels the quirks of blazoning pens,
And in the essential vesture of creation,
Does tyre the Ingeniver."—Act II. S. 1.

Instead of the last line one of the quartos gives, "Does bear all excellence," and, looking to the context, it is clear that this, whether a gloss or first draft, gives in more prosaic terms the general meaning intended to be expressed. What it wants is a sufficient rise in hyperbole to conclude fitly the hyperbolic praises of the previous lines, and a poetical phraseology that will carry on the simile commenced in "vesture." Turning again to the folio reading it will readily be seen, I think, that the word "tire" cannot mean "weary," but that as a verb suggested by, and having reference to, vesture, it must either be the shortened form of "attire," or formed (perhaps for the nonce as is not unfrequent in writers of that day) from "tire," a head-dress, and meaning to make or form a head-dress, and this either transitively or agentally in the sense of "arrange a head-dress," or reflectively, in the sense of "to act as." But if creation be represented as a vesture, it follows that Desdemona, as a part of creation, should (agreeably to the last given meaning of tire) be part of the dress; and, giving the word this sense, we obtain the plain meaning corresponding with the reading of the quarto—that creation being the vesture, she, Desdemona, is the tire, tiara, or crown of it, one who "tops all."

Again, if all creation be represented as a vesture, it can only be as the regal robe of God its ingener or artificer; and hence therefore we may consider ingeniver as the representative of some form of ingener, this being a term the more appropriate that it signified a deviser or maker of anything, whether of works of art, fortifications, or head-dresses. The exact form is unimportant, but I would prefer the French ingenieur, as this, printed ingenier, might easily have been changed by an ignorant compositor into ingeniver.

And now a word or two on the probable origin of the phrase, an origin which will strengthen the above views if indeed they need strengthening. To me these two lines always had an echo, as it were, of Scripture sound, and I cannot but think that they were formed on the remembrance of verses 25-6 of psalm cii. :—

"Thou hast laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of Thine hands, . . . they all shall wax old as doth a garment, and as a vesture shalt Thou change them, and they shall be changed."

This being combined with the thought of Desdemona as a pure daughter of Eve, the last, and therefore, according to the previous gradation of creation, the crowning work of God. Combined perhaps with these, and assisting the association of the two, may have been the remembrance of the ray, circlet, or "glory" which surrounds the head of sacred images or pictures, and the phrase forasmuch as man is the glory of God. Possibly the reader who has not paid attention to the frequency with which Shakespeare draws from Scriptural sources, and to the frequency with which these form his phrases, may consider my remarks more subtle than sound, but the addition of the word "essential" strongly corroborates them, and illustrates how fully and perfectly Shakespeare elaborated a thought, and how comprehensively and succinctly he expressed it. Desdemona is represented as a being of purity and love—a female Abdiel 'mong Italian women; and hence Cassio is made to break out into such expression-seeking praise, as to call her the top of creation as creation is "essentially" and without "the accident" of sin, or as it was when it was beautiful before God, and pronounced to be very good.

B. NICHOLSON.

LUIS DE LEON.*

The works of Luis de Leon principally consist of original poems; a treatise entitled De los Nombres de Christo; and another known under the title of La Perfecta Casada; translations from the classics, and a version of the "Canticle of Canticles," besides an explanation of Psalm xxvi., and an Exposition of the Book of Job. He also wrote a treatise in Latin, entitled De idriusque Agni typici et veri Immolatione legitimo Tempore, first published at Salamanca in 1587.

The translation, however, of the "Canticle of Canticles" (Cantar de los Cantares) is considered to have been one of the earliest of his works. But I cannot discover the exact date of its publication. It was probably about the year 1571, or 1572. As to the merits of the translation, I have no means of forming an opinion; and have, therefore, no right to pronounce any judgment. It seems, however, that the authorities of the Inquisition were led into a serious error respecting the intentions of Luis de Leon. In 1572, he published a vindication of himself; stating, in most forcible and eloquent terms, what had been his object and intention in the translation; and how he had consulted the Archbishop of Granada, and obtained his approbation of the work. And that he had also written to Arias Montanus, to ask his opinion and that of the Professors at Louvain, on the subject, &c. The persecution which its author had to endure, was evidently the work of a secret enemy of Luis de Leon, who envied his merit and rising fame. Others were soon found to denounce him as a Lutheran. The times were indeed dangerous to the Spanish Church; and at such periods how often did it happen, that the innocent suffered instead of the guilty? * Luis was at last honourably acquitted by the tribunal, his great friend having been one of the Grand Inquisitors, viz. Cardinal Don Gaspar de Quiroga.

* Continued from p. 6.

As it seemed necessary to many of his friends, that something else should be done to vindicate his reputation, he published in Latin, 1580, an extended "Commentary on the Canticles," with a literal and symbolical interpretation. This work, no doubt, met with the approbation of his superiors.

The most eloquent of his works, as well as the most devout, viz. De los Nombres de Christo ("The Names of Christ"), was written during his confinement in the prison of the Inquisition at Valladolid. The first edition, I believe, was published in 1583; the second appeared in 1585. The work is divided into three books, and is thrown into the form of a dialogue, the two principal speakers being Sabino and Marcello; whose remarks appear more like sermons, or dissertations on the names of Christ, than discussions carried on in the form of a dialogue. The character of our Saviour is beautifully portrayed, under the different names given to Him in the Holy Scripture: such as, "the Bud of the Lord;" "the Way, the Truth, and the Light;" "Pastor," "Father," "King," "Jesus;" "the Prince of Peace;" "Spouse," "Son," and "Beloved." As Ticknor justly observes:—

"Many parts of this work are eloquent, and its eloquence has not unfrequently the gorgeous colouring of the elder Spanish literature; such, for instance, as is found in the following passage illustrating the title of Christ as the Prince of Peace, and proving the beauty of all harmony in the moral world, from its analogies with the physical," &c.—History of Spanish Literature, vol. ii. p. 42, London, 1849.

The passage in the original Spanish will, I am sure, be acceptable to many† of your learned readers, who may be conversant with the language:—

"Quando la razon no le demonstrara, ni por otro camino se pudiera entender, quan amable cosa sea la Paz, esta vista hermosa del cielo que se nos descubre agora, y el concierto que tienen entresi aquestos resplandores que luzen en él, nos dan suficiente testimonio. Porque, que otra cosa es sino paz, ó ciertamente una imagen perfecta de paz, esto que agora vemos en el cielo, y que con tanto deleyte se nos viene á los ojos? Que si la Paz es, como San Augustin breve y verdaderamente concluye, una orden sossegada, ó un tener sosiego y firmeza en lo que pide el buen orden, esso mismo es lo que nos descubre agora esta imagen.

"Adonde de el exercito de las estrellas puesto como en ordenança, y como concertado por sus hileras luzen hermosissimos; y adonde cada una dellas invariablemente guarda su puesto; adonde no usurpa ninguna el lugar de su vezina, ni la turba en su officio, ne menos olvidada del suyo rompe jamas la ley eterna y sancta que le puso la Providencia, antes como hermanadas todas, y como mirandose entre si, y comunicando sus luzes las mayores con las menores se hazen muestra de amor. . . . Y todas juntas templan á vezes sus rayos y sus virtudes, reduziendo las á una pacifica unidad de virtud, de partes y aspectos diferentes compuesta, universal y poderosa sobre toda manera. Y si assi se puede dezir, no solo son un dechado de paz clarissimo y bello, sino un pregon, y un loor que cõ bozes manifestas y encarecidas, nos notifica quan excellentes bienes son los que la Paz en sí contiene, y los que haze en todas las cosas," &c.—Libro Segundo, p. 177, Salamanca, segunda impression, MDLXXXV.

This passage gives a fair specimen of the flowing and harmonious style of the Los Nombres de Christo.

But the other prose work of Luis de Leon, entitled La Perfecta Cusada ("The Perfect Wife"), published in 1583, appears to have been more popular, and extensively read, than the preceding one.* The title is certainly very attractive. The work is dedicated to a newly-married lady, named Doña Maria Osorio. It contains many excellent lessons on the holy state of matrimony; and forms a kind of commentary on chap. xxvi. of Ecclesiasticus, as well as on a portion of chap. xxxvi. There are also some excellent remarks, founded on the Book of Proverbs, respecting good and bad wives; and the mistakes and erroneous notions into which many ladies fall, respecting the nature and duties of the married state. The following is very true, and very applicable to the present times:—

"En lo qual (estado) se engañan muchas mugeres que piensan, que el casarse no es mas que dexar la casa del padre, y passarse á la del marido, y salir de servidumbre y venir á libertad y regalo. Y piensan que con parir un hijo de quando en quando, y con arrojarlo luego de sí, en los brazos de una ama, son cabales mugeres," &c.—P. 2, edit. Salamanca, 1586.

Space will not allow me to dwell on the great merit of Luis de Leon as a sacred and lyric poet. His poems and translations from the classics were published by Quevedo, and may be seen in the last tome of his works published at Madrid, 1804—1816 (Obras del Maestro Fray Luis de Leon). His most celebrated ode, commencing with the words—

"Quando contemplo el cielo De innumerables luces adornado," &c.—

has been translated by Bowring, in his Ancient Poetry and Romances of Spain (London, 1824, p. 228). Consult also, tom. v. of the Parnaso Español, and Bouterwek's History of Spanish and Portuguese Literature (London, 1823, p. 240); likewise Ticknor's History of Spanish Literature (London, 1849, p. 38, vol. ii.). Luis de Leon's Life, however, has yet to be written; as both Ticknor

* See the account of the judicial proceedings in tomes xi. and xii. of the Collecion de Documentos Inéditos.

† Ticknor gives only a poor English translation.

* Several editions of this work have been published. I possess the second, 1586. Another beautiful edition appeared in 1603, at Salamanca.

and Bouterwek have given us somewhat scanty accounts of it.

J. DALTON.

P.S. The account of the literary labours of Luis de Leon would be incomplete, were I not to mention that to him was intrusted by his friend Cardinal Quiroga, the correction and revision of the works of St. Teresa. This important commission he faithfully and lovingly performed, the interesting particulars of which he sent in the form of a letter, addressed to the Prioress of the Carmelites at Madrid. This letter is prefixed to many of the Spanish editions of the works of St. Teresa. It is dated "En San Felipe de Madrid, a 15 de Setiembre, 1587." (See Obras de Santa Teresa de Jesus: Edicion completisima, formada con vista de las mas acreditadas asi nacionales como extranjeras, de las publicadas hasta el dia. Madrid, 1851. Tomo i. p. xix.)

J. D.

Norwich.

THE MS. COLLECTIONS OF THOMAS DINELEY.

Thomas Dineley, though not to be ranked with John Leland, and still less with William Camden, was a zealous follower in the steps of John Weever, our prince of Old Mortality's, and his labours may be compared with those of Captain Richard Symonds, whose diaries, combined with church-notes, have been printed for the Camden Society. He lived a little after Symonds, in the reign of Charles II.: and his collections, after remaining in manuscript for nearly two centuries, are at length, like those of Leland and Symonds, in part committed to the safe custody of the press.

It is, however, exactly ninety years ago since the Editor of Camden expressed his opinion that Dineley's Notitia Cambro-Britannica: a Voyage of North and South Wales, well deserved to be printed:—

"The Quarto MS. seems highly worthy to see the light. Is there no probability that his Grace [the Duke of Beaufort] could be induced to give it the publick? The drawings are too interesting to remain locked up; and it seems the best and fullest account of the Principality."—Letter to Mr. John Price, Librarian of the Bodleian, June 24, 1775.

At length, in the year 1864, the present Duke of Beaufort has liberally printed, at his own expense, but for private circulation, 100 copies of the Notitia Cambro-Britannica, or, as it is otherwise entitled, "The Beaufort Progress through Wales," the occasion of its being written having been the progress which the first Duke of Beaufort made in the year 1684, he being the Lord President of Wales, and his business being to review the Militia of the several counties of the Principality, and re-establish, if possible, the waning loyalty of the Welsh towards the House of Stuart. In the Fifteenth Part of The Herald and Genealogist (now on the eve of publication) I have given, in abstract, an account of this memorable Progress, which I am inclined to regard as an extraordinary measure, and not, as Lord Macaulay has alluded to it (History of England, 12mo, 1860, ii. 171) as one of frequent recurrence.

The book is very handsomely printed in quarto, is edited by Charles Baker, Esq., F.S.A., the Duke's Steward of the Seigniories of Gower and Kilvey; and has the "interesting drawings" which were mentioned by Mr. Gough, very neatly engraved on wood.

Besides this volume of Dineley's MSS., there are three which are in the possession of Sir Thomas Edward Winnington, Bart., at Stanford Court, Worcestershire, namely—

1. In 12mo, containing his Observations in Holland, where he attended Sir George Downing on his Embassy in 1671.

2. A thick quarto volume, containing two compositions: one being Observations in a Voyage in the Kingdom of France, made in the year 1675; and the other his Irish Itinerary, written in 1681.

3. History from Marble: being ancient and modern Funeral Monuments in England and Wales, by T. D. gent. The dates 1680 and 1683 and others about that time may be found in it. This was exhibited by Sir Thomas Winnington, at the annual meeting of the Archaeological Institute at Worcester, in the year 1862, and I believe is briefly described in the Catalogue of the Temporary Museum formed on that occasion.

The Irish Itinerary has been published, in portions, with engravings of the drawings, in the Transactions of the Kilkenny Archeological Society, edited by Evelyn Philip Shirley, Esq., F.S.A. It was commenced in 1856, but is not yet completed.

Dineley's MSS., like those of Symonds, appear to have been dispersed, and it is therefore impossible to say how many he may have left behind him. Not many months ago, another, that is evidently his—or one of his friend Mr. Theophilus Alys of Hereford, to which he made additions—appeared in the Catalogue of a London bookseller. It was thus described:—

"339. Curious old Volume of Miscellaneous Subjects in Manuscript, comprising Old Epitaphs, Poems, and commonplace Memos.; including curious Pen and Ink Drawings, appear to have been originally written by Theophilus Alys and Thomas Dineley, between 1640 and 1680. 8vo, bound. 10s.—Catalogue of Lincoln & Son, August, 1864.

Beyond the fact that the volume was sold, I have been unable to learn anything further about it. It will be a subject of regret to future antiquaries if it is again lost sight of. May I therefore beg its present owner to acknowledge his good fortune?

And if any other of Dineley's MSS. should be existing, in the knowledge of the readers of this, it will be desirable that they also should be placed upon record.

JOHN GOWER NICHOLS.

CURIOUS STORY ABOUT THE ORIGINAL OF THE "PILGRIM'S PROGRESS."—A man of more than ordinary intelligence, who keeps a book stall in this town, told me the following story, and assures me it is true: would it be worth investigation? For a long period there was an old book, which he understood to be in Spanish, on his stall, but where he had got it he knew not. He sold it to a gentleman one day, about four years ago, for a shilling, and two or three days after the purchaser returned and handed him a sovereign, at the same time stating that he had sold it to the Earl of Derby, and had secured such a price as enabled him to give the additional sovereign. On inquiring what the book was, he says the gentleman told him it was the original of "The Pilgrim's Progress" in Spanish. He assures me strongly, and I have no doubt of his truthfulness, that such is the story. Should such a work be in the library of the noble earl it can be easily ascertained.

S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

PHAER'S "ÆNEID OF VIRGIL."—I have a copy of this work in black-letter type, and English ballad measure, wanting a few verses at the end.

Phaer worked easily, for at the end of each book he states the number of days employed in the translation, and these are generally few: as e. g. at the end of book five—

"Per Thomam Phaer in foresta Kilgerran finitum iiii Maji, Anno 1557, post periculum ejus karmerdini; opus xxiiij dierum."

Kilgerran is in Pembrokeshire. What was the periculum karmerdini?

The translation is more literal than that of Homer by Chapman, but wants the wild fire and grace of the latter. Many of the words are racy nevertheless, and many also obsolete. In the sixth book Deiphobus says:—

"My goodly spouse this while my weapons alloway she cloin'd
From all my house, and from my head my trusty sword purloin'd."

Does cloin'd mean cleaned or collected? Further on Deiphobus says—

"O gods, redub them vengeance just!"

At least a thousand good old words might be recovered from this not very rare volume.

O. T. D.

THE CANTON: PLANTER.—

"The canton," says Morgan, "is a fit bearing for the planters of colonies. The canton sinister is also suitable for the Western Colonies."

The canton is conspicuous in the arms of families named Hodges. Sir Joseph Hodges, Bart., a merchant of London towards the close of the seventeenth century traded with Spain, and probably with the West Indies. Francis Hodges about the same period was first treasurer(?) of Nova Scotia, and afterwards held the same appointment in Jamaica, where he settled estates in St. Elizabeth (parish.)

The term planter is often erroneously taken to mean one who planted trees or sugar canes in the West India colonies, instead of a planter or establisher of a colony. In Newfoundland the proprietors of nothing but fisheries are denominated planters from the planters or founders of the colony. Sr.

TWO SOVEREIGNS.—Although our Cuttlean hebdomadal is not a bank wherein to deposit good mots, if there is an exception to every rule, perhaps that exception may be made in favour of the following, which for its genuine and natural originality may be entitled to a corner in "N. & Q.," for I thought at the time I heard it, and think so still, that, in its way, it would be difficult to produce anything superior to it: and although my experience in law courts ranges nearly over a quarter of a century, I do not remember its parallel for smartness, at the same time that there was not the smallest effort about it. In a court of justice in this town, a few days ago, I was present, when a poor illiterate Irish-woman came forward to prosecute another female who had stolen some twenty-eight shillings from her. A lawyer, who prides himself on his oratorical powers, and his knowledge of common and statute law, rose up to cross-examine the poor unsophisticated daughter of the Green Island, he being engaged to defend the prisoner, when the following dialogue took place:—Lawyer: "Tell me, good woman, what sort of money had you?" Witness: "Eight shillings in silver, and a sovereign in gold."—Lawyer (drawing himself up in the dignity of forensic elevation): "Tell me, good woman, did you ever see a sovereign in any thing else but gold?" The poor woman looked the very personification of humility, but replied without the least hesitation, "Oh, yes, sir; I saw Queen Victoria, God bless her!" A shout of laughter that culminated in an absolute cheer followed the answer. The lawyer sat down, and was "silent" afterwards for more than "half an hour."

S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

Queries.

MINIATURE OF CROMWELL.

The Exhibition of Miniatures leads me to inquire if any of your correspondents can give information respecting one of Cromwell, of which I heard West, the President of the Royal Academy, speak with the highest enthusiasm. The anecdote relating to it was to me curious and interesting, and must no doubt be known to many, who may be able to correct mistakes, and supply the blanks which I make, as I write from memory after the lapse of many years. West, when painting, I think, the "Dissolution of the Long Parliament," was most anxious to see authentic portraits of Cromwell. He heard of a miniature in the possession of — (one of the Russell family). She was an old lady, very infirm and bedridden; but Lord — Russell offered to mention his desire to the lady. Great objections were made, and many communications took place; at last the lady consented, on the specific condition that all present should be in court dress. "This," West said, "was to me a serious difficulty, as from national feeling I have a special aversion to that costume; but the condition was absolute, and rather than lose a sight of the portrait, I consented to put on the sword and other paraphernalia. On the appointed day I found that the carriage had been sent to the bankers, where the miniature was deposited, the servants being put in full costume, as if going to Court. When I arrived at the house, I was ushered with great state to the room, where I found the lady propped up in bed, with her head dressed with plumes and jewels, as if going to a drawing room." The box was opened, and she gave him the miniature. After some remarks, he expressed his admiration of it, and said it was by far the most expressive portrait of Cromwell he had Upon this the lady stretched out her arm, seized the miniature, and covered it up. The first impression of West was, that the lady was seized with a fit of derangement; but he begged to see the portrait again; she was evidently much excited, and positively refused. Lord — Russell then endeavoured to persuade her to allow another view of the miniature; all in vain. At last, partly exhausted, partly relenting, she consented, while saying, "You must know that in my presence he is never to be spoken of but as My Lord Protector." West said that he had the miniature in his hand for a good while afterwards, taking special care to speak frequently of the Lord Protector.

Not long after the lady died, and he inquired of the executors about this portrait. He was told that the box had been received from the bankers, but the miniature was not in it; and when West spoke to me about it, he said it had never been discovered. He added, that probably it must have been sent abroad, but that the execution was so beautiful that it would certainly appear again.

T. B. N.

HERALDIC QUERIES.

1. Hance, Hans, or Hansby. — In Berry's Encyclopedia Heraldica I find Radulph Hans, alias Hansby of St. Giles or Beverley, East Riding, Yorkshire. The following coat of arms was granted to him Oct. 10, 1582: Az. three sheldrakes, closes arg., chief erm. Crest: A pheon or. I wish to know the names of his ancestors as far as they are given in the records, and also his descendants as late as 1684.

2. The Mackalls of Beverley, Yorkshire. Did any member of this family emigrate to Maryland? If one can be found, please state his ancestors to the time of Lancelot, who married Frances, daughter of Sir Richard Sandford of Hardee Castle, co. Salop.

3. Who was Thomas Beauchamp (temp. Edward III.), whose daughter Elizabeth married Walter, grandson of John Lee Mauchell?

4. Who was Wm. Threlkeld of Melmarby, Cumberland, temp. Rich. II.? Arms, arg. a maunch gules.

5. Who was Wm. Thornborough (cir. temp. Hen. VI.), whose daughter Margaret married Wm. Mackall? He was of Yorkshire or Westmoreland. Arms, erm. fretty gu., chief of the last. Crest, a tiger sejant, arg. pellettée.

6. Catherine Huddleston, married John Mackall, temp. Henry VI., Lancashire, Lincoln, Cambridge, and Cumberland, gu. a fret arg.

7. I know that Thomas Blenkinsop was of noble Northumbrian family; he lived about 1520. Please give his ancestors.

8. The ancestors of Wm. Boteler, first Lord Boteler of Wem?

9. I find in Fuller's Worthies, (1) Hyde Winsbury or Wynnesbury, 16th Rich. II.; (2) Simon de Winsbury, Hen. IV.; (3) John de Winsbury, 7th Hen. VI. Please name any others that may be found. Arms, or, a fess counter company or and gu., a chief indented az.

10. I find in Fuller's Worthies, (1) Roger Sprengehouse, 7th Edw. I.; (2) Edward, 11th Hen. IV.; (3) Fulk Springseaux, 25th Hen. VI. Please name any others that may be found.

11. Who was Wm. Bromley, Yorkshire, about the time of Hen. VII.

12. I wish to have the pedigree of Oliver St. John of Bletshoe, the first husband of Lady Margaret Beauchamp. He lived temp. Hen. IV. and Hen. V.

13. I find in Fuller's Worthies, (1) Richard Sapcote, Sheriff of Cambridgeshire, 9th Edw. IV.; (2) Richard, sheriff, 25th Hen. VIII. Arms, sa. three doves, arg. Please give the names of any others that may be found.

14. Seth Sweetser was one of the "Pilgrim Fathers;" his descendants lived at Stoneham, near Salem, Massachusetts. Is there such a family in England? JAMES OWEN DORSEY.

Baltimore, Md. U. S.

"CELER ET AUDAX." — Can any of your correspondents inform me if the regimental motto, "Celer et Audax," is of classical origin; and, if so, from what author is it taken? J. C.

"LA CLOMIRA DI G. MAGAGNATI."—I have not been able to meet with any particulars respecting the following work, or its author, and shall feel obliged by being directed to a source of information:—

"La Clomira; Favola Pastorale di Girolamo Magagnati; al Sereniss. Principe Don Ferdinando, Duc de Mantova, &c. 12mo, Vinegia, 1612."

WILLIAM BATES.

CONEY-GARTH.—There are three spots called by this name in the Ordnance Maps of Wilts and Dorset: one to the south of Marlborough, and about 1½ miles south of Savernake Forest station; the second a little north of Winterbourn Stoke, and about three miles west of Stonehenge; the third (spelt Cony-gar) about three miles to the east of Wimborne Minster. There is also a hill called "Conygore Hill," close to Stowerpaine. Any information as to the meaning of the name, or what it represents, will greatly oblige

X. Y. Z.

"THE FIVE WOUNDS OF CHRIST."—Will any of your readers be good enough to give some particulars relative to this ancient work? It would appear that a reprint for private circulation from an ancient roll, intitled The Five Wounds of Christ, and consisting only of a few pages, was produced some short time since.

T. F. W.

MARY KERR HART.—I lately bought a thin 8vo volume, Heath Blossoms; or, Poems written in Obscurity and Seclusion, by the above-named lady. By the singularly sad and touching "Memoir of the Author," it would appear that she was a daughter of the sixth Marquis of Lothian, by his wife, who died at Farnham, 1792-3, when the poetess was an infant. The volume, published by subscription, and from "The dread of being overtaken by absolute penury," is dedicated to R. A. Dundas, Esq., M.P. for Ipswich. It had appeared some time subsequent to May, 1830, as an affectionate letter to the authoress from Lord Robert Kerr bears that date.

Can any correspondent of "N. & Q." give the name and date of the marriage of the mother of the author? Douglas and Burke are both silent upon the subject.

J.

HOO.—What were the armorial bearings of Thomas Hoo, who, in 1447, was created a baron? What leads me to make the inquiry is that, in the Roll of Baronets (Bibl. Cott. Caligula, A. 18) supposed to be of the date of Edward II., the arms of Sir Robert de Hoo (Bedfordshire) are given as being "Quartile de argent et de sable, a une bende de or." But in a sketch that I have before me of the shield on the monument of John, third Lord Hunsdon, the quartering that I suppose to contain the arms of Lord Hoo and Hastings is shown as consisting merely of quarterly sable and argent, without a bend; and it strikes me as singular that the more modern coat should be the simpler of the two.

MILKTES.

KEMBLE'S "ODE ON THE AMERICAN WAR."—

"Mr. Kemble, in the latter part of the American revolutionary war, wrote and recited on the stage an Ode exhorting Britons to enlist and subscribe. We have heard that he afterwards ceased to be proud of it; and though it is said to have appeared in the newspapers, we have not been able to find a copy."—Anecdotes of the Green Room, London, 1812.

The above is from a very poor collection, published by Roche. Is the story true; and, if so, is the ode preserved?

W. P.

LYON, LORDS GLAUCIS AND EARLS OF STRATHMORE.—I am engaged in writing a genealogical sketch of this family, and shall be much obliged for any information as to its different branches which any of the readers of "N. & Q." can give me. The published pedigrees are all singularly incomplete, and give no information whatever as to its collateral branches.

Who was James Lyon of Easter Ogil, whose daughter Barbara married Thomas Ogilvie? Who did he marry, and what other issue had he? Who were the Lyons of Auchterhouse, which was I believe originally the property of the Ogilvies? Who were the descendants of Sir Thomas Lyon of Auldbar, and had he any other children than John and Euphemia? Burke, in his Landed Gentry, gives a pedigree of Lyon of Auldbar, but it appears to be inaccurate. Who were the Lyons of Lancaster? Peter Lyon (son of a John Lyon) lived in 1700 at a place called Skearton (quere, where is that?), and married Agnes—. Had James and Frederick Lyon, the younger sons of the first Earl of Kinghorn, any issue? Who was the Mr. Lyon who founded Harrow School, and was he any and what connection of the Scotch family?

H.

NESTORIAN CURSE.—

In The Bible of every Land, published by Bagster in 1851, 4to, p. 37, speaking of the Chaldeans or East Syrians, known by the name of Nestorians, it is said:—

"Their religious tenets are more uncorrupted than those of most oriental churches. They seem never to have practised image-worship nor auricular confession; and so great is their antipathy to popery, that they have a singular and most anti-christian custom of cursing the Pope regularly every day, his grandfather, grandmother, and grandchildren."

On whose, or on what, authority is this "anti-Christian custom" asserted? And, if there be good authority for the assertion, what possible reason can the Nestorians have for omitting from their curse, on the one side the Pope's father and mother, and on the other his children? Also: did the curse originate with Nestorians, the founder of the sect, or his immediate followers, as a result of his controversy with Cyril of Alexandria, supported by Celestin, Bishop of Rome, and the condemnation of his doctrine of the existence of two distinct persons in Christ, by the third council of Ephesus, in 431, or was it adopted at a later date?

ERIC.

Ville-Marie, Canada.

THE NERVOUS SYSTEM.—The commentator on Apuleius, Basle, 1560, writes thus:—

"Spina dorsalis a medicis longum cerebrum vocatur: ex spinali medulla . . . ut suum ministerium impleant, nervi ministrantur."

Who first called the spinal marrow a protracted brain? Was not the nervous system known, in its broad essentials if not in its minute anatomy, 300 years ago, to the continental physicians?

GALEN.

QUOTATIONS IN PLUME'S "LIFE OF HACKET" WANTED.—May I ask you kindly to insert the following passages, which I have been unable to trace in my recent edition of Plume's Life of Bishop Hacket. Your learned correspondent F. C. H., who some months since gave me assistance in your pages, or some other reader, may give the references to the original sources of information which have eluded my persistent search:—

"Mirari in trunco, quod in fructu non teneas. S. Hieron."—P. 6.

"Ἐβρίτια φέρει καὶ σπουδὴ προαιρέτως, as John Patriarch of Constantinople [Jerusalem] said of Damascen. In Vita."—P. 9.

"Joseph Scaliger would say he envied the learning of three men, T. Gaza, A. Politianus, and P. Mirandula. In Opusc."—P. 85.

"Liturgia infelicissime ad Scotiam missa. Selden."—P. 42.

"Selymus threatened to St. Peter's at Rome to stable his horses in the church."—P. 72.

"It was said of Friar Giles that the Pope had marred a painful clerk by making him a powerful Cardinal."—P. 96.

"The Historian says of Charles V.: 'Mane frequentior cum Deo quam cum hominibus sermo.' Floria. Raimond. lib. I."—P. 101.

"In vetera via novam semitam querentes. S. Hieron."—P. 108.

"Quæ vobis mentes recte quæ stare solebant?"—P. 63.

"The Historian said of Marius he led the army and the army led him."—P. 68.

"Tum votorum locus est quam nullus est spei. Seneca."—P. 78.

"Tully said of a villain, 'Mortem quam non potuit optare obit.'"—P. 73.

"Post nubila Phœbus."—P. 72.

"The Historian said of the days of Nero, 'Alium horti alium thermæ trucidarunt.'"—P. 121.

"Erasmus' words, 'Mibi adeo est invisa discordia, ut veritas displiceat seditiosa.'"—P. 102.

I saw in Trinity College library, Cambridge, when collecting materials, many Common-place Books of the seventeenth century, such as Plume or Hacket might have compiled, with loose references or utterly destitute of even such hints.

Those who have had to verify quotations made by writers of that period will have a sympathy with me, knowing the extreme difficulty of the task.

MACKENZIE E. C. WALCOTT, B.D., F.S.A.

ARTHUR POLE, eldest son of Sir Geoffrey Pole, and nephew of Cardinal Richard Pole (not their brother, as in Burke's Extinct Peerage, 3rd ed. p. 432), is said in Froude's Hist. of Queen Eliz. i. p. 428, to have married "a daughter of the Earl of Northumberland." The Earls of Northumberland in those days were Percies. There was for a brief interval John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland. But in neither Percy nor Dudley pedigree can I find this match.

J.

WEBB.—Can you give me any information respecting the parentage of Philip Carteret Webb, an antiquary of some note, who was born in the reign of King William III.?

MELETES.

Queries with Answers.

ELEANOR JAMES.—I have lately met with some printed broad-sheets, signed with this name. They are Addresses: To the King; To the Lords; To the Lords and Commons; Prayers for the Queen and Parliament; To Gentlemen Citizens, &c.,—all evidently the effusions of a well-meaning but rather odd and enthusiastic person, who seems to have been a character, and to have been charitably tolerated as such. She lived in the reigns of Charles II., James II., and William and Mary. She lectures them all in their turn, and all the world besides: was a zealous admirer of Dr. Sacheverell, "neither Popish nor Whiggish, not a drop of blood of either in her;" and very much given to fasting fourteen days and nights in order to avert, as she hoped, Divine Judgments upon the sins of the nation.

In one of these productions the following passage occurs:—

"I remember, in King Charles's Time, there was one Roswell a dissenting Minister. They had informed the King that he had preach'd Treason, and he was taken up and put into Prison, and the King was resolv'd he should die; but his Friends had made such Interest that the whole Court was against it; and the Duke of York and the Duke of Monmouth beg'd his Pardon, and the most part of the Lords; but the King was very angry with them, and would not hearken to any of them; and when they had try'd all Things, at last they came to me, and I went to the Prison to him, and he did confess that he did not say the Words that they alledg'd to his Charge; and I thought it was pity he should die, so I went to the King at night, with a Candle and Lanthorn; it was Eleven a Clock before I got there, for I think the next day he was to die; and when I came the King was in his Bed-chamber, and a Lord went in to tell him that Mrs. James was come to beg Roswell's Life; and I heard him say, 'Does Mrs. James come to beg Roswell's Life? then she shall have it,'—and yet I did not know the Man (i. e. Roswell), nor I never saw him but that time I went to

LAWRENCE CROSS.—Is anything known of this miniature painter; when, and where he lived?

JAMES BECK.

[Is not this Lewis Crosse of whom Walpole tells us, in his Anecdotes of Painters (vol. ii. p. 636, ed. 1849 and 1862), that he painted several portraits in miniature in Queen Anne's time; and that he had a valuable collection of the works of Peter Oliver, Hoskins, and Cooper, &c., which collection was sold at his house, the sign of the Blue Anchor, in Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, Dec. 5, 1722; and Crosse died in October, 1724?]

Replies.

ST. AUGUSTINE AND THE MYSTERY OF THE BLESSED TRINITY.

(3rd S. vii. 499.)

A correspondent, A. T. T., professing to answer the query of H. C. respecting the Vision of St. Augustine, acknowledges that he has not "books, or any facilities" by him; and is, therefore, unable to "give dates and authorities" as he should wish. This is certainly much to be regretted, as he has been led into sadly erroneous statements in consequence. He says, contrary to every other account, that the incident is not told of St. Augustine; but he thinks that the saint relates it of "a learned convert to Christianity, who lived in the fifth or sixth century. His name was Alanus; and, from being born in an island, [he] was surnamed De Insula." Even if this were correct, St. Augustine could hardly have known anything of him, as he himself died in 430. But the truth is, that Alanus de Insula did not live till eight centuries after St. Augustine. He died about the year 1294; and seems to have obtained his surname not from having been born on an island, but at Lisle: so that his proper name was Alain de Lisle, which was latinised by Alanus de Insula. Of course, there can be no question of his having been a heathen at any time; and "the main facts," which A. T. T. professes to know to be such, must be altogether abandoned. F. C. H.

I see that, by mistake, the printer of my query on this subject in "N. & Q." has put "Dr. Stanley's Sermons in the East" as the source of my extract. I sent the query with that on "St. Agnes and her Lamb," and said that the book quoted was the same, viz. Notes, Ecclesiological and Historical, on the Holy Days in the Calendar of the English Church, republished from The English Church Union Calendar, 1864 (London: The Church Press Company, 1864). It was only in my query about "Abraham's Conversion" that I cited Dr. Stanley's Sermons in the East.

I should like to know where St. Augustine

"himself relates" the vision "as occurring to him." H. C.

After a diligent search I can find no trace whatever of this legend, either (1) in the genuine writings of St. Augustine, or (2) in those of Cæsarius of Arles and others, which have frequently been attributed to that father; or (3) in the elaborate life appended to the Benedictine edition of Augustine's works.

In reference to A. T. T.'s suggestion, I beg to observe, that it is just chronologically possible that St. Augustine might have related such a legend of a convert who lived in the fifth century, but not if Alanus lived in the sixth: seeing that the Bishop of Hippo, who was born Nov. 13, A.D. 354; died Aug. 28, A.D. 430. No such personage, however, as Alanus is mentioned in any of the works of St. Augustine, genuine or supposititious. H. W. T.

ALBINI BRITO.

(3rd S. vii. 497.)

As your correspondent, L. P., has suggested that I am satisfied that the armorial bearings of De Toden, otherwise D'Albini, have been at last ascertained, I think I am obliged to say something. I had already pointed out that it was possible and probable that the family may have had two coats. It is known that great historical families in England used different coats at different times: not, in any case with which I am acquainted, "a fancy coat"; but sometimes the paternal coat, sometimes a maternal coat. But, I inquired, "whence comes the confusion, if it is a confusion, between De Albini and Trusbut?" I also asked, "Why do the coats assigned to De Toden and D'Albini stand 15 and 16 after other coats which came in before them?" (3rd S. v. 383.)

The friendly replies which appeared in "N. & Q." did not appear to satisfy their writers. I cannot say that they satisfied me. I think such cases as the Haddon glass, and the marshalling mentioned by WATERBOUDET (3rd S. vi. 255), show that marshalling is one of the details which has to be looked into a good deal more, if we wish to understand what our forefathers meant. I feel certain that our modern idea of marshalling does not interpret the heraldic works which they left behind them.

I do not write now to add any fresh conjectures, but I will make a note upon one or two details in L. P.'s obliging communication.

1. He says that "the chevrons do not stand alone in Albini's seal, but, &c. . . . not indeed within the shield, but, thirteenth century fashion, arranged around it." If we are to understand that L. P. connects the objects visible outside shields with the contents of the shield, so as to be in some sense, "emblazoned with them," there will probably be some difficulty in accepting his statement without explanation. I say this with the knowledge, e.g., that on the seal of Edward II. a castle appears on each side of his throne, and on the seal of Edward III. a fleur-de-lys in the same place, to mark, no doubt, the Castilian and French descents.

2. Strictly speaking the De Clares cannot be called "of the royal house." Richard de Clare, Earl of Hertford, m. Amicia, granddaughter of Robert Consul, illegitimate son of Henry I. His descendant, Gilbert de Clare, made a legitimate royal match by marrying Joan of Acres, daughter of Edward I. But their only son left no surviving issue. And Hugh le Despenser, marrying Eleanor de Clare, daughter of Gilbert de Clare and Joan of Acres, carried into his house and to his descendants the representation of the De Clares, whose name then ceased in history.

3. The inferences of L. P. are open to remark so widely, that I would rather not undertake the task of criticising them. But he will allow me to say, that he must not consider me to accept any, unless I distinctly say that I accept them.

There must be evidences at Belvoir which would give the true solution of these curious arrangements of the quarterings of the great lines centering in the house of Mannors. It is too much to expect that the Duke of Rutland should allow himself to be drawn into any such inquiry as has been raised in "N. & Q." But any persons who are permitted to inspect the evidences, and to make use of them for the purpose of historical inquiry, would confer a favour on many readers of "N. & Q." besides myself, by giving the result of their search as to arms. D. P.

Stuarts Lodge, Malvern Wells.

CALDERON'S "DAUGHTER OF THE AIR."

(3rd S. viii. 8.)

It is unnecessary to have recourse to Scandinavian mythology, or the sporting columns of The Times, for an explanation of this title of two of Calderon's finest dramas. The poet himself takes care to explain it in more than one passage. The Daughter of the Air, in the figurative oriental language of Calderon, simply means a bird, and is applied to Semiramis in direct reference both to her story and to her name. Diodorus mentions that Semiramis, having been when a child exposed by her mother, was miraculously protected and supported by doves; and that it was from that circumstance she derived her name, Semiramis meaning in the Syrian language a dove. Calderon extends the meaning of the word to birds in general; and thus, by a local image, he imparts to his heroine the very nature of her first friends and protectors:—

"And as in the language of Syria," writes Calderon, "he who says 'bird,' says 'Semiramis,' that name has been given to me from my having been the Daughter of the Air and of the Birds, who are my instructors."—

"Y como en la lengua Siria,
Quien dijo pajar, dijo
Semiramis, este nombre
Me puso, por haber sido
Hija del aire y las aves,
Que son los tutores míos."

Hija del Aire, p. 1, Jornada 1.

Diodorus mentions that at her death Semiramis disappeared from the earth, and took her flight to heaven under the appearance of a dove. Calderon, at the conclusion of the second part of his Hija del Aire, does not adopt this story of her death; but seems to refer to it in the last words which he puts into the mouth of Semiramis:—

"Hija fui del aire, ya
En él hoy me desvanesco."

Hija del Aire, p. 2, Jornada 3.

Some of the foregoing references have been given with his usual accuracy by Schmidt, in his Die Schauspiele Calderons dargestellt und erläutert, p. 365. He considers that the epithet "The Daughter of the Air" not only figuratively expresses the name of Semiramis, but symbolizes her character:—

"Der Name Semiramis selbst bedeutet Taube, a. Wesseling zu Diodor. ii. 4; nach Calderon Vogel im Allgemeinen. Die Vögel sind Symbol des Elements der Luft, und Sie ist Tochter der Luft, hochfliegend, aufgeblüht, und zerflattert, zuletzt spurlos und ungeliebt."

D. F. MAC-CARTHY.

Dublin.

DANIEL AND FLORIO, ETC.

(3rd S. viii. 4, 35, 40.)

The assertion contained in the last paragraph of my note on Daniel and Florio has been contested in a private communication, and is now contested in open court—so I must enter at once on my defence.

I ventured to assert that sir Francis Bacon and sir John Constable "were no otherwise brothers than as members of the honourable society of Graves-Inne." Now, they might have been brothers in point of consanguinity; or brothers by affinity, alias brothers-in-law; or brothers in the sense of associates. On each of these theories I submit some brief remarks:

1. I rely on the statement of Robert Stephens esquire, historiographer-royal, that sir Francis Bacon had only one brother; and we have seen that he died before 1612. No more need be said on that head. (Letters of Bacon, 1734, p. xxviii.)

2. It is admitted that Bacon "married Alice, one of the daughters and co-heirs of Benedict Barnham esquire, alderman of London"; and that Constable married Dorothy, another daughter of the said alderman. (Birch, Heads of illustrious persons, 1747-52, I. 64 + Calendar of State papers, 1603-10, p. 400.) But the knights were no more brothers-in-law after they married than they were before—as witnesseth a learned writer on relationship, a master of arts in two famous universities, and a doctor of divinity:

"Now the affinity that ariseth unto me by my wife is easily computed thus:

My wives consanguinei or cousins are affines or allies to me, and are in the same degree of affinity to me, as they stand in degree of consanguinity to her.

And therefore my wives own father and mother are my father-in-law and mother-in-law, which to me is affinity in the first degree of consanguinity.

So my wives own brothers and sisters are my brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, which is affinity in the second degree.

So my wives own uncles and aunts are my uncles-in-law and aunts-in-law, which is affinity in the third degree."—The degrees of consanguinity, and affinity. Described and delineated. By Robert Dixon, D.D. London, 1674. Sm. 8° p. 41.

3. It is certain that Constable was a member of Grayes Inne in 1608 (Calendar, as above). It is certain also that Bacon became a member soon after 1680, and that he dates thence as late as 1624. (Letters of Bacon, 1763, p. 369). It afforded pleasant walks and the choicest society. So wrote Howell in 1621. Men who occupy chambers in the same house, are busied in the same studies, and meas together, may be said to lead the life of brothers—but in what sense Bacon used the word brother in the dedication of 1612, no one can positively affirm. The tenor however of the dedication is in favour of associate. So also is the subscription, "Your loving brother and friend."

The laxity with which the terms of relationship were formerly used is rather perplexing. Hoskins of Hereford was the father of Ben. Jonson; Randolph, Marmion, Cartwright and others, were his sons! Various instances occur in the Familiar Letters of Howell, 1655. He addresses Ben. Jonson as "Father Ben." and subscribes, "Your son"—"Your son and servitor." He addresses Christopher Jones esquire, of Grayes Inne, as his "Honoured father," and subscribes, "Your constant son to serve you J. H." As to brother, in the sense of associate, it is in daily use, and so are its equivalents all over Europe.

I shall conclude with an illustration in verse. Thus wrote the admired Randolph to the adoptive Ben:

"thou hast given me power to call
Phœbus himself my grandire; by this grant
Each sister of the nine is made my aunt."

BOLTON CORNEY.

VOLTAIRE: DIOCLETIAN.

(3rd S. vii. 496.)

I cite the following passages from a French biography of Voltaire:—

"C'est dans le courant de cette année (1760) que le lieutenant de police dit à Voltaire: 'Quoique vous écriviez, vous ne parviendrez pas à détruire la religion chrétienne?'—'C'est ce que nous verrons,' répondit-il."—(Lettre de Voltaire à d'Alembert, 20 Juin, 1760.)

"Un autre jour Voltaire dit: 'Je suis las d'entendre répéter que quinze hommes ont suffi pour établir le Christianisme, et j'ai envie de leur prouver qu'il n'en faut qu'un pour le détruire.'"—Histoire de la Vie et des Ouvrages de Voltaire, par L. Paillet-de-Warcy, 2 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1824. (Tom i. p. 172.)

On turning to the letter of Voltaire to which I am referred for the former of these passages, I find that what he actually did write was as follows:—

"Herauld disait un jour à l'un de ces frères: 'Vous ne détruirez par la religion chrétienne.'—'C'est ce que nous verrons,' dit l'autre."

No reference, it will be seen, is given for the second passage; but the fidelity with which the former is transcribed will enable the reader to form a judgment as to the correctness of the latter. I have cited it, as giving the sentiment ascribed to Voltaire in a French dress, and as evidence—quantum valet—that he did make use of some such expression.

For my own part, I scarcely think it likely that this passage is to be found in the works of Voltaire; if the idea had entered his mind, his caution would hardly have permitted him to embody it in words. If to any of his correspondents, it would have been to some one of the members of the Holbachian confraternity; and even to them he wrote in very different terms; such, for instance, as the following:—

"C'est un bon arbre, disent les sociérats dévots, qui a produit de mauvais fruits; mais puisqu'il en a tant produit, ne mérite-t-il pas qu'on le jette au feu? Chauffez-vous-en donc, tant que vous pourrez, vous et vos amis. Vous pensez bien que je ne parle que de la superstition; car, pour la religion chrétienne, je la respecte et l'aime, comme vous."—Lettre à d'Alembert, 28 Nov. 1762.

"Plus nous sommes attachés à la sainte religion de notre Sauveur Jésus-Christ, plus nous devons abhorrer l'abominable usage qu'on fait tous les jours de sa divine loi."—Au même, Fev. 1762.

"Je vois avec douleur qu'on a une bibliothèque nombreuse contre la religion chrétienne, qu'on devrait respecter. Vous savez que je ne l'ai jamais attaquée, et que je la crois, comme vous, utile à l'Europe."—A Damienville, 14 Août, 1767.

There is a passage, however, in a letter to this latter friend, which reminds one somewhat of that under discussion, and may perchance be the parent of it:—

"Serait-il possible que cinq ou six hommes de mérite qui s'entendraient ne réussissent pas après les exemples que nous avons de douze faquins qui ont n" 24 Juillet, 1760.

Goldsmith, a hundred years ago, in his beautiful paper on the supposed death of Voltaire (Citizen of the World, Letter XLIII.), showed us what manner of character of that great genius we were to look for "among the journalists and illiterate writers of the age"; it is singular to observe with what fidelity the shallow, dishonest herd have handed down the old tradition. In 1848 was published an 8vo volume, entitled, A Course of Lectures on Infidelity, by Ministers of the Church of Scotland in Glasgow and Neighbourhood. In Lecture III., by the Rev. John G. Lorimer, occurs the following passage:—

"But we must not wonder at his (Voltaire's) reckless moral madness,—at what he said or did against Revelation. His motto, or watchword against the Saviour of Men was, 'Crush the wretch!' This indicates a spirit which was ripe for any wickedness, however unprincipled. The man who was such an enemy to what he alleged were evil principles and precepts in the Scriptures, and who was the mortal foe of Christian ministers as the greatest criminals (Hinc ille lacrymæ, Mr. Lorimer?), was himself a shameless adulterer, who, with his abandoned mistress, meanly violated the confidence of his visitors by opening their letters. To use the language of Horne, 'His total want of all principle, moral or religious, his impudent audacity, his filthy sensuality, his persecuting envy, his base adulation, his unwearied treachery, his cruelty, his profligacy, and his hypocrisy, will render him for ever the scorn, as his undoubted powers will be the wonder of mankind.' In the prospect of death he professedly recanted his infidelity, and confessed to a Roman Catholic priest, drove his infidel friends from him with withering execrations, and died in howling despair amid cries and exclamations which made all who heard—tremble." (!!!)

Enough, perhaps too much, has been already said, from the time of Barruel downward, as to the real meaning of the celebrated phrase, "écrasez l'inf. . . ." with which Voltaire, imitating Cato of old, and his delenda est Carthago, was wont to round off his letters to his friends of the coterie, in order that they and he should not lose sight of the great work, which he thought it their mission to accomplish. This work was unquestionably the abasement and destruction of superstition and fanaticism, whose dire effects he had seen and deplored in the malignant persecution of the Sirvens, and the infernal torments of Calas and La Barre. What other interpretation can be given of such passages as the following?—

"Je voudrais que vous écrasassiez l'inf. . . ; c'est là le grand point. Il faut la réduire à l'état où elle est en Angleterre; et nous viendrez à bout si vous voulez; c'est le plus grand service qu'on puisse rendre au genre humain."—Lettre à d'Alembert, 23 Juin, 1760.

"Poursuivez l'inf. . . ; je ne fais point de traité avec elle."—A Damilaville, 3 Nov. 1762.

"J'avoue que je ne sais rien qui déshonore plus mon pays que cette infame superstition, faite pour avilir la nature humaine."—Au Roi de Prusse, 29 Août, 1742.

"On réduira la superstition à faire le moindre mal qu'il soit possible."—A Damilaville, 21 Dec. 1763.

"Continuez, vous et vos confrères, à renverser le fantôme hideux, ennemi de la philosophie, et persécuteur des philosophes."—A d'Alembert, 2 Dec. 1757.

"Criez partout, je vous en prie, pour le Calas, et contre le fanatisme, car c'est l'infame qui a fait leur malheur."—Au même, 15 Sep. 1762.

Now, is it not inconceivable, that, with or without examination of these passages, men can be found in the present day to pervert their obvious sense with such diabolical malignity?

With regard to the pillars erected to commemorate the persecution of Diocletian, and his alleged triumph over the Christian faith, I beg to refer FITZHOPE to the Inscriptiones Antiquæ of Gruterus (p. 280), and the Annales of Cardinal Baronius (an. 304). He may also turn to "Choice Observations on Diocletian" in Select and Choice Observations concerning all the Roman and Greek Emperors, by Edward and Henry Leigh, M.A., 8vo, London, 1670, where he will find the following:—

"There was a Column (as a Trophy of Extinguishing the Christian Faith) erected to him with this inscription:

"Diocletiano . Cæs . Aug.

Galerio in Oriente

Adopt.

Superstitione Christi ubique deleta

Et cultu Deorum ubique propagato."

Page 363.

This inscription was at Clunia (now Corunna), in Spain, and, according to Gal. Baluzius, was also to be found at Nicomedia, the capital of Bithynia, and a favourite residence of Diocletian. It is also cited, together with the two following, in Inscriptionum Antiquarum Sylloge, &c., a Guil. Fleetwood, Coll. Regal. apud Cantab. Socio, 8vo, Lond. 1691:—

"Imp . Maximian . Hercul . Cæs . Aug . Constantio . in Occid . Cæs . effecto . et . Imp . Reip . longe . et . late . aucto . Diocletiano . Principi . invicto . et . uno . temp . Collega . effecto."

"Diocletianus . Jovius . et . Maximinian . Herculeus . Cæs . Augg . Amplificato . per . Orientem . et . Occidentem . Imp . Rom . et . nomine . Christianorum . deleto . qui . Rempub . evertabant."

These two latter appear also to have been at Clunia. Fleetwood appends the following note, which, as it appears of some importance, in referring either to him, or Gruter, I think your correspondent will like to see:—

"Si tanta tribus hisce Inscriptionibus quantam pre se ferunt, tribuenda est fides, Persecutio Diocletiani citius commoveri debuit quam A.D. 303; prima enim suadet, Christ. superstitionem eodem ferè tempore deletam esse quo Galerius Caesar factus erat, quod erat A.D. 293. Secunda inscriptio, eodem tempore quo prima facta est. Et cum tertia, in eodem loco, eodem sensu, et lieder ferè verbis posita est, diverso tempore factam non facile credo. Sed non hoc dico ad fidem aureo illo Lactantii libro amolendam (propter quem totus terrarum orbis gratias maximas doctissimo Baluzio in æternum debet), sed potius astruendam; nam quæ in illo libro reperta sunt, ut de hac Inscriptione multum hæream, faciunt.

Persecutio enim mota est A.D. 303 Kal. Mart., continuata est per annos octo, usque ad 311; at Diocletianus et Maximianus Herc. purpuram deposuere 305, nec illam unquam resumere Diocletianus, nec Augustus postea dici voluit. Ergo hæc Inscriptio facta est in anno 304, vel 305, et deletum est nomen Christianum in duobus annis; cum tamen sex sequentibus atrocissima sæviit persecutio. Sed et hæc et alia doctorum iudiciis præmitto. Vivet in æternum nomen Christianum, nec erit unquam, quod de Tyrannis ferocientibus et stolidis Christi sponsa metuat." — Fleetwood's Sylloge, p. 115.

I find two of the above inscriptions in another collection Hortus (Variarum Inscriptionum, &c., à P. Ottone Aicher, Salisburgi, 1876-84), with the note appended, "Leguntur etiam Arevaci in columnis pluribus." Vide Pars Prima, p. 168.

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

The impious boast of Voltaire, inquired for by FITZHOPKINS, is quoted in the Abbé Barruel's Memoires pour servir à l'Histoire du Jacobinisme Chap. i. p. 6, as follows:—

"Je suis las de leur entendre répéter que douze hommes ont suffi pour établir le Christianisme; et j'ai envie de leur prouver qu'il n'en faut qu'un pour le détruire." — Condorcet, Vie de Voltaire, edit. de Kell.

There is another passage very similar in one of Voltaire's Letters to D'Alembert, of July 24, 1760:

"Seroit-il possible que cinq ou six hommes de mérite, qui s'entendroient, ne réussissent pas, après l'exemple de douze faquins qui ont réussi?"

This is plain enough, I should imagine, to remove all doubt of the diabolical spirit and meaning of Voltaire. F. C. H.

On March 11 there appeared a note from FITZHOPKINS, inquiring whether there was any evidence of a certain dialogue represented by Mr. Danzy Sheen to have passed between Voltaire on his death-bed and his doctor. On April 8 there appeared a communication from F. C. H., in which he gave it as his opinion that it was very likely that the dialogue referred to did occur. This expression of opinion I considered at the time to be highly valuable, as conveying an assurance that if any evidence of the dialogue existed it would be produced. Three months have since elapsed, but no further communication has been made. Under these circumstances I am led to conclude that there is no evidence to support the statement contained in the sermon of Mr. Danzy Sheen. MELETES.

DRAGON IN HERALDRY (3rd S. vii. 418, 449).—The angel of Edward IV. and the sovereign of George IV. furnish specimens of the dragon, but as these are conventional, like the unicorn, griffin, and other heraldic figures, we can only conjecture that such dragon was designed to represent the crocodile, or the crocodile with some variations, perhaps partly from Cerberus. St. George and the dragon intended to be represented on the sovereign of George IV. is founded on the celebrity of a man who was perhaps once an unjust army contractor, but who became a defender of the faith, and was afterwards worshipped as a saint and martyr. His fame and popularity in Europe, and especially in England, proceeded from the crusades. (Gibbon, ch. xxiii. vol. iv. p. 125-9.) Hence, also, the dragon which he combated, and which typified St. Athanasius, who was deemed by the Arians to be a magician, although subsequently admitted as a saint. The Jews would carry away with them the tradition of this reptile of the Nile, and such of them as visited Egypt could not fail to know some of its habits. The inhabitants of Ombos, on the right bank of the Nile, not far from Assuan (Syene), worshipped the crocodile. Those of Dendera (Tentyra), on the opposite bank, persecuted and ate that animal. Hence Juvenal, an eyewitness, says,—

"Immortale odium, et nunquam sanabile vulnus Ardet adhuc Ombos et Tentyra."—(xv. 35.)

The horned cerastes was worshipped in Egypt, and a most venomous snake, the naja haje, was an emblem of Cneph (ḥ dyadhs daiuaw), the good deity (Egypt. Antiq. L. E. K., ii. 315, 318).

The dragon, דִּבְלִי, tannim, and serpent, שֶׁרֶפִּי, nachash, seem to be interchangeable terms in Scripture. (Comp. Ex. iv. 3, with vii. 9.) The word rendered dragon, however, which occurs twenty-nine times, sometimes translated erroneously whale, means generally the crocodile. So also does the word leviathan, which occurs in five places only (Job iii. 8; xli. 1; Ps. lxxiv. 14; civ. 26; Is. xxvii. 1). In one passage (Lam. iv. 3) tannin means jackals (also named נֶאֱעִי, ee), which are said to "draw out the breast," and "give suck to their young ones," being of kin to the Arabic ثَنَان, thaenan, wolf.

Many errors exist in modern as well as ancient natural history. The best reference on this subject (exclusive of heraldry) is Bochart, with notes by Rosenmüller (Hierog. ii. iii. 14; vi. 13-15).

T. J. BUCKTON.

KAR, KER, COR (3rd S. vii. 336).—Not having observed any reply to the inquiry made by F. C. B. regarding the etymon of Kar as a constituent of many names of places in the Eisach Thal and elsewhere, I venture, though with some diffidence, to suggest the following:—

In the oldest dialects of Southern India, which are now proved to be of Turanian origin (taking that term in its generally accepted, though not fully admitted, sense, as referring to the earliest known races of central Asia), the word kādu means, 1, a tract of country, especially a wild uncultivated region, a forest; 2, a village; 3, a place; 4, a limit, a boundary. In Rottler's Tamil Dictionary the last is given as the primary signification. It is a term constantly used in composition to signify wild, mountainous, &c. The Tamil ḍ in kāḍu is the hard, cerebral consonant, pronounced like r, and in the Telugu, Canarese, and other cognate dialects which have adopted the Sanscrit alphabets, it is actually replaced by the letter r, as in the words Kāḍūr, the name of a town, quasi "Hilton" [Hill-town], "Wootton" [Wood-town]; kār-kona, "the bison," literally "wild ox;" kār-allanu, "wild ginger;" and hundreds of other words and names of places, trees, plants, or animals, &c. The inhabitants of most of the hill-tracts of Upper India, and of many parts of the Himalayas, as shown by Mr. B. H. Hodgson, still speak dialects derived from the same Turanian source, although surrounded by the modern Hindu races using Aryan languages; and it is not unreasonable to infer that the frequent recurrence of this particular term in the Eiseach Thal, is due to the early settlement of some Turanian tribe during the progress westward of successive waves of population from the officina gentium in Central Asia.

W. F.

LIKE A BIRD, IN TWO PLACES AT ONCE (3rd S. vii. 459, 501.)—It is singular that none of your correspondents have referred to Tom Jones for the occurrence, and probably the origin of this phrase. It is many years since I saw the book, and I have it not at hand. But I well remember that an attorney wishes for the privilege so expressed in a very early part of the story, and is introduced towards the end as using the same language again.

W. P. P.

EPIGRAMS BY W. S. LANDOR (3rd S. vii. 419.) Several of these epigrams appeared in the Atlas about 1855 or 1856, Mr. Landor being then a frequent contributor to that paper. Among my autographs I find the following epigrams by the same hand:—

"LEADERS AND ASPIRANTS.

"Palmerston lies and gives the lie
With equal volubility.
The 'artful dodger,' little John,
Is scarcely match for Palmerston.
Who next? Jim Crow; he prigs our letters,
And trips up Freedom like his betters."

"ON JUDGE HALIBURTON.

"Once I would bid the man go hang;
From whom there came a word of slang;
Now pray I, tho' the slang rains thick
Across the Atlantic from Sam Slick.
Never may fall the slightest hurt on
The witty head of Haliburton,
Wherein methinks more wisdom lies
Than in the wisest of the wise."

PHILIP S. KING.

GIBBON'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY (3rd S. vii. 417, 483.)—Gervase Gibbon is, in the inscription on the monument to his son-in-law, Sir John Lawrence, in Chelsea church, described as of Benenden (not Berenden, as the ingeniously incorrect Faulkner has it). Perhaps this may help Mr. Woodward to discover the locality of "The Pump."

WALTER RYE.

Chelsea.

HERBA BRITANNICA (3rd S. viii. 10.)—It is generally supposed that the Herba Britannica, or Δαμασκόβιον of the ancients was our Water Dock, or Rumex Hydrolapathum. Muntingius contends for this in his Dissert. Hist. Med. de vera herba Britannica, and the authority of Dioscorides is also alleged in its favour. If the Water Dock is not found to possess all the virtues which the ancients attributed to their Herba Britannica, it is still undoubtedly a very valuable plant; and from having witnessed remarkable proofs of its virtues, I am persuaded that it is not so highly esteemed, nor so much employed, as it deserves. It is particularly efficacious in scrofula, and glandular swellings in the neck. We must always remember, however, that modern science has exploded the supposed virtues of very many plants, held in great esteem by our forefathers.

F. C. H.

DAUGHTER PRONOUNCED DAFTER (3rd S. viii. 18.)—JAYDEE has made a mistake, through happy ignorance of the vulgar pronunciation of both words of John Bunyan's rhymes. It really is to be read thus:—

"Despondency, good man, is coming arter,
And so, also, is Much-afraid, his darter."

The sound is much harder than ah-ter, dah-ter—though not so hard as the Continental r. Q. Q.

DAY FOR MARRYING (3rd S. vii. 493.)—An old farmer in Norfolk told me that he was married on the 31st of December, that he might give the lie to the old saying, that no one was married without repenting before the year was out. B. B. B.

HUDIBRASTIC COUPLET (3rd S. vii. 445.)—An earlier edition of Ray's Compleat History of the Rebellion, &c. than that mentioned by your correspondent, A. B. MIDDLETON, was printed at York in 1749. There is internal evidence, I think, of this being the first edition of the work. The lines in question are of much the same style and merit as other rhymes which occur in this volume, and which make it probable that these were written by the author himself. F. B. B.

[We would remind F. B. that thirteen years before the publication of the first edition of Ray's History of the Rebellion, a parody on these very lines appeared in the Grub Street Journal of May 13, 1736:—

"The coiner that extends a rope,
To coin again can never hope;
But he that coins and gets away,
May live to coin another day."

Iide "N. & Q." 2nd S. vi. 161.]

MEDIEVAL CHURCHES IN ROMAN CAMPS (3rd S. vi. 37.)—The Cistercian Abbey of Cupar-Angus, Scotland, founded by King Malcolm the Maiden, 1164, was built within the boundaries of a Roman camp.—Ide Roy's Military Antiquities, 133.

ANON.

COLLAR OF EDWARD IV. (3rd S. vii. 492.)—It is clear that the Collar conferred by King Edward IV. in 1471 on Domingo Gonzalez de Andia was not the Collar of the Garter, but that of the King's livery, viz. of the Roses and Suns. It was not unusual to confer this upon foreigners, often accompanied by a grant of armorial bearings; but perhaps the Spaniard who received this grant had coat-armour already. I do not recollect any other grant of a livery collar to be worn in inheritance; but probably there is no need to doubt that the document communicated by Lord Howden has been correctly translated in that respect.

JOHN GUTH NICHOLS.

The name of Gonzales de Andia does not occur in Sir Harris Nicolas's list of the Knights of the Garter, and I should rather think that the collar conferred upon him was something in the nature of what is now called a collar of S. S. I would, however, beg to inquire whether it was not unusual that the right to wear such a collar should be conferred on a man and his heirs? P. S. C.

THE REV. GEORGE RYE'S SERMON (3rd S. vii. 339.)—The second prophecy is taken from Lycophron:—

Αἰ, αἰ, τάλαινα θηλαίων κεκαυμένη, καὶ πρόσθε μὲν πεύκῃσιν οὐλαμπόροισ τρεπτόν τε λείοντος, ὃν ποτε γνάθοις τρίτωνος ἡμάλαψε κάρχαρος κίων
Ἔμπρους δὲ δαιτὸς ἡπάτων φλοιδόμενος, τυφῶ λίθῳτος, ἀφλύγοις ἐπ' ἐσχάτους,
Ζυήρεγγας ἐστάλαζε κωδείας, πέδιψ.

Cassundra, vv. 31-37, ed. Lipsiae, 1788.

Of the last two verses Reichard says,—“Sane tropi valde duri et difficiles, sed amat hoc Lycophron.” I do not understand the passage, and I add two translations, which have not much helped me. The first is by Lord Royston.

“Ah, luckless nurse! enwrapped in ruddy flame,
Then, when the Lion, sprung from triple night,
Steered his dark pine across the Ægean wave,
And hid a host within her hollow womb:
Who fearless leaped into the caverned jaws
Of the sea-monster, through the black abyss
Cleaving his bloody way; whose shadowy locks,
Singed in the flameless furnace, wave no more.”

The second is from a “Specimen of a Translation of Lycophron,” vv. 1-138, in the Classical Museum, May, 1822, p. 123:—

“Ah, wretched Motherland! to flames devote;—
First by that Lion, sprung of three nights' joys,
Whose crowding squadrons left his galley's sides,
Rapine and death o'er all thy coasts to spread.

Him though the sea-dog's jaws serrate ingulfed,
And in his entrail-chambers captive held,
Till, cleft a passage through the monster's side,
He sprang to life again,—all unimpaired,
Save that amid the heats of that pent home
Were shed the cresting terrors of his mane.”

H. B. C.

U. U. Club.

TO CLEAR THE GLASS (3rd S. vii. 494.)—The following extract from a note describing the Earl of Essex's expedition to Cadiz, may help your correspondent to the meaning of this expression:—

“To inculcate discipline and subordination, and to impress the sacredness of their cause, Dr. Marbeck records that the Lord Admiral had service performed three times a day: in the morning, in the evening, and at bed time, at the clearing of the glasse.”—Walton's Life of Donne.

PAUL A JACOBSON.

PROVERBS PREVALENT IN ROSSENDALE (3rd S. viii. 7.)—The proverb “It's the still (quiet) sow that eats up the draff” is universally prevalent in Scotland, as is also another, sarcastically applied when one, eating of anything, begins to dispraise it—“As the sow fills, the draff sours.” The dialects of the Northern and Midland Counties of England seem identical with Scotch.

C. B.

Montrose.

THE TERM “PRETTY” (3rd S. viii. 7.)—De Quincy somewhere (qy. where?) tells a story of Coleridge gazing on a waterfall, and pondering in his mind what epithet would best describe its wondrous beauty. Presently come up a tourist and his wife, and the former immediately bursts forth with “That's sublime!” and Coleridge turns round and thanks him for having given him the one word wanting to describe the waterfall; but the wife jangles in with “Yes, it's very pretty,” and poor Coleridge turns away disgusted.

I once heard the story told by the editor of a leading literary journal with this alteration, the epithet was “magnificent”! Ever since that day I confess I have not thought much of his critical ability. To make Coleridge satisfied with “magnificent”—an epithet applied to jewels, to a horse, to a woman—the critic I suspect knew but little of Coleridge and his mind. BRIGHTLING.

PARK OF ARTILLERY (3rd S. vii. 480.)—Your reply to the query “Park: How came the word Park to be applied to artillery?” as contained in your number, June 17, 1865, hardly satisfies me. I am aware of the signification of the word park, and also that artillery “parked” is occasionally surrounded with a rope. Some notion of the antiquity of the term park so applied, of which I am entirely ignorant, might assist us to a more definite solution. The idea which originally presented itself to me was, that the custom of protecting artillery, when halted, by surrounding it with obstacles of various descriptions, such as killed in a skirmish at Muskham bridge near Newark, and buried in Winthorp church—"cujus memorie (says Gervase) si pacem aliquando Deus dederit, monumentum voreo." There is, however, no trace of such a monument. In his notes on Lincoln Cathedral the cavalier's wrath breaks out in recording Dame Lucy Wray's epitaph (a Montagu of Northants): "This wretched epitaph was writ by that owle and changeling, Sir John Wray; however, the lady was a good woman." Sir John was a leading Parliamentarian. The monument was in the N.E. transept, and being cumbrous (with rail enclosure) was taken down in 1730. Holles' Notes are in the Lansdowne Collection, in the Addit. MSS. No. 6118. I find others referred to as "Darcy," 332, 529, &c.

LINDENSIS.

CLIMATE AND LANGUAGE (3rd S. viii. 26.)—The "theory" must be at least a century older than Dr. Arbuthnot, Concerning the Effects of Air on Human Bodies, 1733. In Milton's Tractate of Education, published at the request of Hartlib in 1644, and written, as its title avers, "above twenty years since," is to be found the following passage:—

"Their speech is to be fashion'd to a distinct and clear pronuntiation, as near as may be to the Italian, especially in the Vowels. For we Englishmen, being far Northerly, do not open our mouths in the cold air, wide enough to grace a Southern Tongue; but are observ'd by all other nations to speak exceeding close and inward; so that to smatter Latine with an English mouth, is as ill a hearing as Law-French."

Ἀλλεύς.

Dublin.

SHELVES AND TERRACES (3rd S. vii. 241, 308, 390, 362, 422, 463.)—A striking instance may be seen from the London and North Western Railway between Tring and Cheddington, looking westward. A gentleman travelling along the line told me some years ago, that it had puzzled Stephenson the engineer when making the railway, and that Stephenson told my informant he never could solve the problem of its origin to his satisfaction.

J. E. DAVIS.

Rownall, Leek.

OBJECTIVE (3rd S. vii. 474; viii. 16.)—The words subjective and objective are used in the following passage of Richard Baxter (1696), precisely in the modern or Coleridgean sense:—

"Whatever men may pretend, the subjective certainly cannot go beyond the objective evidence: for it is caused thereby as the print on the wax is caused by that on the seal."—Wordsworth's Ecclesiastical Biography, iv. 486, 3rd edit.

Baxter refers, in defence of this sentiment, to Hooker; who does not, I think, use these words.

I give this instance, because I happen to have it at hand; but I have no doubt that earlier instances might easily be produced: for the words, though they dropped out of use to a great extent in the eighteenth century, are a part of our inheritance from the schoolmen. The definition, quoted in Johnson's Dictionary from Watts's Logic, would answer perfectly well for the modern usage.

It is perhaps worth while to refer to a note on the subject (the object, I ought perhaps to say,) in Sir W. Hamilton's Discussions, p. 5, 1st edit.

S. C.

BEEST (3rd S. vii. 458, 507.)—In Jamieson's Scotch Dictionary, I find—

"Beist, Beistyn: the first milk of a cow after she has calved.—Scotch."

"Anglo-Sax. Beost, byst; Teutonic biest, biest-melch, id. (colostrum). As this milk is in such a disordered state as to curdle when boiled, it is not improbable that it received this designation from Moeso-Gothic Biests = fermentum, q. in a state of fermentation."

"Biest-cheese: the first milk boiled to a thick consistence somewhat resembling new-made cheese."

In the Supplement to Jamieson's Dictionary there are given Mearns and Annandale, as districts where the words are in use. It is also used in Ayrshire. All being dairy districts, if not the chief dairy localities of Scotland. Besides biestyn-cheese there is a cake, or scone, made of the milk mixed with flour; which, being beaten into a batter, is afterwards heated, and approaches in appearance and taste somewhat to the pancake.

Biest-milch, and Biest-butter, are so named in Germany.

SETH WAIT.

WORDS USED IN DIFFERENT SENSES (3rd S. vii. 367, 425; viii. 37.)—As examples of this, the following Lancashire expressions I think are worth recording in the columns of "N. & Q.," viz. "To beat a fire;" i. e. to light or kindle a fire. "If he had as much brass in his pocket as he has in his face he would be a rich man." Here the word brass is used to express money and impudence.

H. FISHWICK.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL QUERIES (3rd S. viii. 28.)—F. M. S. is informed that "Menu de la Maison de la Roynie (Marie Stuart), fait par Mons. de Pinguillon, MDLXII.," was one of the privately printed historical works of Thomas Thomson, Advocate, Edinburgh, the Deputy-Clerk Register of Scotland, and President of the Bannatyne Club. It forms a thin volume in 4to, and was issued in 1824.

T. G. S.

Edinburgh.

MARKET HARBOROUGH (3rd S. vii. 441.)—I quite agree with the late John Cade Esq., of Gainford, Durham, who deduces the name of Harborough from a Roman road, which he calls Hare Street. Hare is the A.-S. here, an army, and Hare-street is the A.-S. herestret; Germ. Heerstrasse, a high, main, or military road. Harborough may, therefore, come from A.-S. here, an army, and A.-S. buruh, burh, or burg, a castle, a town, and signify a fortified place situated on Hare-street. It may also be the same word as Harborough in Cold Harborough for Cold Harbour.

In the Kingdom of Hanover there is a town called Harburg, with an old castle.

J. C. HAHN, Ph. D.

Heidelberg.

THE CHARTERS OF HOLYROOD (3rd S. vii. 448.) The verb herbergare is a corruption of A.-S. verb herebirigan, hospitari. In the passages quoted by G. I would translate herbergare by to harbour in, to inhabit. The other quotations referred to I have not seen.

J. C. HAHN, Ph. D.

Heidelberg.

SIR SAMUEL CLARKE (3rd S. viii. 28.)—Sir Samuel Clarke, Sheriff of London, was probably the ancestor of the present Sir Jervoise Clark Jervoise, M.P. for South Hants in the late parliament. Samuel Clarke, his son, married Mary Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Jervoise of Herriard, Hants. (See Burke's Peerage and Baronetage).

The present baronet still possesses property in the neighbourhood of West Bromwich.

T. E. WINNINGTON.

"JOSEPH AND HIS BRETHREN" (3rd S. vii. 495.)—The author of this sacred drama, written in the form of a dialogue in seven parts, or acts, is Mr. J. F. Winks; it was printed by Winks & Son, Leicester, in 18mo, pp. 108. D. JONES.

42ND REGIMENT: "FREICUDAN DU," OR "BLACK WATCH" (3rd S. viii. 30.)—T. W. CLARKE may obtain all the information he requires by consulting Richard Cannon's Historical Record of this celebrated regiment (London, 1845). The Record contains an account of the formation of six companies of Highlanders in 1729. It also gives the names of the officers who received commissions, when the Companies were regimented in 1739: together with a succession of colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors, down to the year 1843.

Much interesting information may also be gleaned from "The Legends of the Black Watch," which first appeared in Colburn's United Service Magazine for December, 1856. GIBSON.

Liverpool.

EDWARD DYER (3rd S. vii. 309; viii. 15.)—Many thanks to MR. SEREL for the information he has so kindly supplied me with. The following is an abstract of the commission:—

"Charles, Prince of Great Brittain, &c., Captain-General of the Associated Western Army which accompany the Petition for Peace, to Edward Dyer, Esquire, greeting. Whereas the Gentry, freeholders, and others of the Counties of Somerset, Dorset, &c., have resolved to become petitioners of the Lords and Commons of Parliament assembled at Westminster for speedily settling the peace of this kingdom, &c., and in case they cannot obtain so just a request, to settle the same by ye power of ye sword, &c. Know ye, that we, in order to the aforesaid designe (we holding especial trust and confidence in your valour), do hereby appoint you to be a Colonel of a Regiment of Foote in that expedition. And for raising and completing y^r said Regiment, authorize and appoint you to list all men within the hundreds of Brent except Wrington and Bearington, and in the parishes of Rodney-stoke and Cheddar, and the tythings of Meare and Eggorfie (?) &c. and to make Captains &c. under you of the choicest gentlemen and persons of quality in those parts, &c. And if you know of any persons who will not list themselves, to certify it to us, &c. &c.

"In witness whereof we have signed &c., at Oxford this 27th day of Jan^y 1644.

"CHARLES P."

This commission has been preserved by the descendants of John Dyer of Langford (parish of Burrington) who died 1697, and who was probably the son of Edward Dyer. If this is the case, Edward Dyer of the Commission cannot be the same as Edward Dyer of Sharpam, as the latter had issue two daughters, heiresses. I think he must have belonged to a family established at Burrington or the neighbourhood. This I should be glad to ascertain. I believe that Sir Edward Dyer, Chancellor of the Garter (temp. Eliz.) possessed estates at Banwell, not far from Burrington. If I could be supplied me with further information, I should be most gratified. C. H. M.

P.S. I have a copy of the pedigree in Phelps' History.

Miscellaneous.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Particulars of Price, &c., of the following Books, to be sent direct to the gentlemen by whom they are required, whose names and addresses are given for that purpose:—

SHARON TURNER'S EDWARD VI., MARY, AND ELIZABETH. 2 Vols. 3rd edition, 1835.

Wanted by Messrs. Hemmingsham & Halls, 5, Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, W.

HOYLE ON THE DOCTRINE OF CHANCES. Last edition if possible.

Wanted by Mr. Henry Moody, Nottingham.

Notices to Correspondents.

We are compelled to postpone until next week our usual Notes on Books.

W. S. J. will find no less than thirty-one articles on Collars of SS. in our First Series. See General Index to First Series of "N. & Q."

T. G. G. All Barons are now "of the United Kingdom." An originally created, they were either "of Ulster" or "of Nova Scotia." The armorial design of a Baron of Ulster is the badge of Ulster, "Arpa, a sinister hand, couped at the wrist, and appaunce gules."

JAMES TOWN is referred to a List of Prime Ministers to Haydon's Dictionary of Dates.

D. JONES. The imperfect volume is entitled, England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, Described and Abridged with the Historical Relation of Things worthy of Memory from a far larger volume done by John Speed. Lond. 1688, oblong 8vo.

 Cases for blinding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d. or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 8d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STRAPPED COPIES for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 11s. 4d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. BURNS, 25, WELLINGTON SQUARE, LONDON, W.C., where also all COMMUNICATIONS FOR THE EDITOR should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 22, 1865.

CONTENTS.—N° 186.

NOTES:—Sir E. Brydges's Sonnet on "Echo and Silence," 61—Notes from the Issue Rolls, 62—The Growth of a Modern Myth, 64—"Memoirs concerning the Affairs of Scotland," 64—Second Sight, 65—Marriages in Scotland—Fly-leaf Inscriptions, Epigrams, &c.—The Cow and Calf—Praying by Machinery—Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin—Curious Epitaph, 65.

QUERIES:—Queen Anne and Charles Gerard, second Earl of Macclesfield, 66—When was the Bible first divided into Verses, 67?—Bathurst Family—Beatrice of Cologne, third Wife of Richard Earl of Cornwall—Bohun—Genealogical Information: T. R. Barlow—Gentility for Four Hundred Years—The Old Maids' Song—Post Mortem Inquisitions—"The Purgatory of St. Patrick"—Quarvering—Red Facings—Shropshire Legend of Will-o'-the-Wisp—Virga Ulmaria—Arms of the See of Wellington, 67.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Necromancy—Walpole and the Scotch Peers—Priory of St. Denys—Giles van Tilburg, Jun.—Saulac, 69.

REPLIES:—Cold Harbour, 71—Encampments, 72—Rogers, and Byron, 73—Marcolphus, 75—Toasts, 74—Is a Thing itself, or something else? 75—Adverbs improperly used, 75.—Chartulary of Whalley Abbey—Sancroft—Massachusetts Stone—Chorus: "Romeo and Juliet"—Anonymous Hymns—Authors of Hymns—Petition of I—Leading Apes in Hell—Slavery prohibited in Pennsylvania—"Bene cepisse est dimidium facti"—"Pereant qui ante nos"—&c.—Fun—"Clontarf"—Daughter pronounced Dafter—The Duchesse d'Abantes—"Dites moi où, n'en quel pays"—Coney-garth—Beest—Dragon in Heraldry—Lord Aston of Forfar—Mitrea, 76.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

SIR E. BRYDGES'S SONNET ON "ECHO AND SILENCE."

At the end of the recently published third volume of the Life and Letters of Washington Irving, edited by his nephew, will be found (I speak, by the way, of Bentley's edition, for in that published simultaneously by Bohn the matter does not exist) an interesting Appendix of "Narratives and Letters," derived from Mrs. Fuller, the Emily Foster, referred to in the preceding volume. This concludes with a sonnet, which this lady informs us was written by Irving in 1832, while in London, in her scrap-book; and it would appear that she is under the impression that it was the original composition of this most graceful writer. Now as there can be no doubt whatever that the sonnet in question is the production of a different pen, and we cannot believe for an instant that Irving would take credit for the composition of another, we are forced to the conclusion that Mrs. Fuller has laboured under a misapprehension as to the originality and value of her friend's contribution to her album, and that, taking au pied de la lettre a request for "anything from his pen," he simply wrote from recollection a few lines, the beauty of which had caused them to be present to his mind; and we are the more strongly convinced of this, as the lady adds that, at the very time, "he declared it was impossible for him to be less in a writing mood." This sonnet, which, in elegance of expression, epigrammatic point, and condensation of imagery, might add a leaf to the chaplet of any author, is the production of Sir Egerton Brydges, and in claiming it for this elegant writer, it is singular that I am but doing that which he has had, on more than one occasion, to do for himself, so strong a tendency has this favourite child of his Muse to wander abroad from its rightful paternity. It was written, as he informs us, in his twentieth year, and was first published in his Juvenile Poems, printed in 1785. The little volume was reviewed by Maty in the same year, in the May number of his Review, and this sonnet was one of the specimens selected by him. Somehow it got into the collection of Sonnets edited by Coleridge at Bristol, and was there attributed to Henry Brooke, the author of Gustavus Vasa, "who died, an octogenarian, before it was written." Wordsworth thus spoke of it to a relative of the actual author, and on this account the latter, in his Recollections of Foreign Travel (2 vols. 8vo, 1825), was led "to set himself right with the public, as to a little poem which he did not desire to have wrested from him." He speaks of it as "his best Sonnet," and adds:—

"The present Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, my school-fellow, class-fellow, and earliest and most intimate friend, the confidential companion of all my juvenile studies, by whose severe and classical taste I was urged to correct it over and over again, till, by repeated labour, I brought it to its present form, will bear testimony, from his own personal knowledge, that it is mine. I happen, too, to possess the MS. of each successive shape which it took. Mr. Wordsworth, as soon as he was apprized of his mistake, has had the goodness to acknowledge the claim, in the kindest and most flattering manner; and Mr. Coleridge has promised to take the earliest opportunity of correcting his error. I confess that what Mr. W.'s partiality has said of this sonnet has made me anxious to retain the credit of it. It ought to be original, for it cost me intensity of thought to bring it into so narrow a shape. I drew the first idea from these words in a short poem of John Walters of Ruthen (who died about 1797), 'Echo and Silence, Sister-Maids.' All the rest of the conception, imagery and words, are exclusively my own. At that time I studied the manner of Collins with enthusiastic intenseness."—Vol. ii. p. 16.

Southey, too, in a letter to Sir Egerton, gives his testimony to the authorship and merits of the piece, saying, "I know not any poem in any language more beautifully imaginative than your sonnet on Echo and Silence;" and thus we see that its author had good reason to be jealous of his property in the little poem which the reader may now desire to see:—

"ON ECHO AND SILENCE."

"In eddying course when leaves began to fly,
And Autumn in his lap the store to strew,
As mid wild scenes I chanced the Muse to woo,
Thro' glens untrod, and woods that frown'd on high,
Two sleeping Nymphs with wonder mute I spy!—

And lo, she's gone!—in robe of dark green hue,
 'Twas ECHO from her sister SILENCE flew;
 For quick the hunter's horn resounded to the sky;
 In shade affrighted SILENCE melts away;
 Not so her sister!—hark, for onward still,
 With far-heard step she takes her list'ning way,
 Bounding from rock to rock, and hill to hill!
 Ah, mark the merry maid in mockful play,
 With thousand mimic tones the laughing forest fill."

Here the conception of Echo as a green-robed nymph, is original and striking, as opposed to the love-lorn maiden of classical fable, who had lost all external form and human semblance:—

"Vox manet; ossa ferunt lapidis traxisse figuram;
 Inde latet sylvis, nulloque in monte videtur,
 Omnibus auditur; sonus est qui vivit in illa."
 Ovid, Metamorph., lib. iii.

The reader may chance to remember a stanza of Barry Cornwall:—

"But ECHO from the rock and stone
 And seas earns back no second tone;
 And SILENCE pale, who hears alone
 Her voice divine,
 Absorbs it, like a sponge that's thrown
 On glorious wine!"

The Lord Chief Justice alluded to above was Charles Abbott, Lord Tenterden, to whose severe taste our author admits his obligations in the correction and polish of his sonnets generally.

Sir Egerton Brydges reprinted his Juvenile Poems in his very rare and interesting Anglo-Genevan Journal, published by him at Geneva, in 2 vols. 12mo, 1831. Of this work only fifty copies were printed, and I obtained mine—where I imagine it was alone to be obtained—in the beautiful little city of Beza and Rousseau, and through the kindness of M. Cherbuliez, the very intelligent libraire-éditeur of that city, who was intimately acquainted with Sir Egerton Brydges, and published several of his books. In Part II. of this work is reproduced the following extract:—

"From the Spectator Weekly Paper of Saturday, 19 Feb. 1831.

"ARCHDEACON WRANGHAM.

"If the world at this moment can command attention for any other species of transfer than of funded securities, we will present them with an elegant little transfer from English into Latin, upon which no Chancellor of the Exchequer, present or future, will be able to pounce. It comes from a distinguished scholar, who, longer than any other man, keeps up the elegant tastes of youth and college; who contrives to adorn theological with classical pursuits, and who, amidst political strife and party contests, by the aid of kind feelings, bland manners, and high talents, preserves universal regard and respect. The original is a magical model of fancy, characteristic of the peculiarly refined and delicate tissue, spun from the brain of the contemplative printer of Lee Priory:—

"ECHO ET TACITURNITAS.

"Hæc arborum atque illæc ferebantur comæ,
 Autumnus et fruges sinu collegerat;
 Sylvestribus Musam in locis, per devios
 Calles vagus nemorumque noctem, dum sequor,

Somno graves Nymphas stupens video duas;
 Enque evolavit!—viridi amicta tegmine
 Echo soror, Taciturnitatem deserit.
 Venantium namque ivit ad cælum fragor,
 Umbrisque territa liquet Taciturnitas;
 Secus ac soror, properantibus quæ saltibus
 Rupeque per collesque pernix emicat,
 Audita longè, celere præcipitans iter,
 Jocosa jamque Virgo voces millies
 Imitata lætum replicat, audin? per nemus.

"F. W."

"Cestria, Januar. 1831."

These classical iambics will be read with some pleasure by the few "who keep up the elegant tastes of youth and college," and by these the following elegiacs, in which it is sought to express the same ideas, will not be devoid of interest:—

"ECHO ET SILENS.

"Cœperat Autumnus frondes dispergere latè
 Largaque de pleno fundera dona sinu:
 Tunc ego per sylvas liber, vacuusque vagabar,
 Adfuit et studiis Musa petita mea.
 Ecce! duas vidi cumbentes gramine Nymphas,
 Hæc Echo dicta est, Nympha sed illa SILENS!
 Classica mox resonant: tenuous vanescit in auras
 Nympha Silens; Echo concita voce fugit,
 Atque pedes agitat celeres, licetæque sorore,
 Per juga, per sylvas, saxaque carpit iter:
 Dumque fugit ridens ludoque intentas jocosas,
 Excitat auditos ingeminate sonos.

"D. L."

The Sonnet has also been translated into Greek iambics, but I do not feel justified in claiming further space for their insertion.

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

NOTES FROM THE ISSUE ROLLS.—No. III.

Friday, 19 Oct. [1352]. To Engelbert Count de la Mark, son and heir of Arduif Count de la Mark, in money delivered to him, &c., 400 florens of Florence annually, &c., which the Lord [King] conceded to the said Arduif, by his letters patent, as well for his good service to the Lord King, as for his homage and fidelity paid to the King, &c. 60l. (Mich. 27 Edw. III.)

Thomas Prior, valet of Philippa Queen of England, to whom the Lord King conceded xl marks per annum for the pleasing news which he brought to the said Lord King of the birth of Edward Prince of Wales. (ib. and many others.)

Alianora Countess of Ormond, late the wife of Thomas de Dagworth, deceased. (ib. and many others.)

Monday, 8 April [1353]. The expenses of the Duchess of Bretagne, residing in the Castle of Tykhill, 52l. 10s. (Pasch. 27 Edw. III.) [This was the Duchess Jeanne de Montfort, the heroine of Hennesbow.]

To Philippa Queen of England, for the sustenance of the children of the Duke of Bretagne, in the custody of the said Queen, 100l. (ib. This entry recurs periodically for many years.)

May. Radulphus Earl of Stafford, the King's Lieutenant in Aquitaine. (Ib.)

15 July. Henry, Duke of Lancaster, Lieutenant of the King in the Duchy of Aquitaine. (Ib.)

[From the Rolls for 44 Edw. III., which have been translated and published, I merely make the two following extracts, to inquire who is thus designated:—] The Lord de Leck, Knight, coming as envoy from the Duke of Albright.—Clasius del Haye, nuncio of the Duchess of Albright. (Mich. 44 Edw. III.)

30th May [1375]. The cerecloth of Edward I. renewed. (Pasch. 40 Edw. III.)

Sat. 31 May [1376]. To Geoffrey Chaucer, valet, to whom the Lord King assigned 20 marks per annum for his life, for the good service rendered by him to the said King, by his letters patent: this day, x marks, &c. 6l. 13s. 4d. To Philippa Chaucer, late one of the damsels of the chamber of Philippa, late Queen of England, to whom the King assigned x marks per annum for her life, &c. by the hands of the said Geoffrey, her husband, &c. 66s. 8d. (Pasch. 50 Edw. III.)

23 Sept. Domina d'Engoyne, and Domina de Luterell, invited to the funeral of Edward Prince of Wales. [Who were these ladies? The latter I presume to be identical with Elizabeth Luterell, to whom letters were sent Aug. 2, 1380.] (Ib.)

Thurs. 6 May [1378]. The Lord King in his chamber.—For mending a gold "ciphr." [Qu. what is this?] 5s.—For mending two clasps of St. George, 6s. 8d.—For gold "wyre" for two swords, 40s.—For mending a white bear of silver [is this a badge?] and a gold chaplet, 6s. 8d.—For mending a gold garter, 13s. 4d.—For mending a cross, one vase for holy water, one thurible [and other articles] for the King's chapel, 40d.—For mending a large gold circlet, and for a large pearl put in the said circlet, 26s. 8d.—For mending the gold buckles of garters, 40d.—For collars for greyhounds, with silver letters, 32s. 4d.—For a silver seal for the County of Chester, 8s. 2d.—For a great seal for North Wales, 60s. 9d.—For a great seal for South Wales, 69s. 1d. [With many other similar entries.] (Pasch. 1 Ric. II.)

May 6 [1379]. For John and Guy, sons of Charles de Blois to Sir Roger de Bello Campo, for their sustenance and clothing, 60l. (Ib. Pasch. 2 Ric. II.)

20 June. The cerecloth of Edward I. renewed. (Ib.)

16 July. The Lord King in his chamber, for two "ciphr" and two pitchers of silver gilt, bought of Nicholas Twyford, goldsmith, London, and delivered for the nuptials of Philip de Courtenay, Knight, and Anne de Wake his wife. 22l. 17s. 4d. (Ib.)

9 Dec. [1379]. To Geoffrey Chaucer, to whom the Lord King Edward, grandfather of the King, granted xx marks per annum, 6l. 13s. 4d.—To the same Geoffrey, to whom the present Lord the King granted xx marks per annum for his life, for his good service to the said King, by letters patent for Michaelmas term last past. 6l. 13s. 4d. (Ib. Mich. 3 Ric. II.)

11 May [1380]. The executors of Guichard d'Angle, late Earl of Huntingdon, deceased. (Ib. Pasch. 3 Ric. II.)

15 June. Borzireogus de Siryne, Knight of the King of the Romans and Bohemia, coming as envoy to the Lord King from the King of the Romans and Bohemia, &c. [Concerning the King's marriage with Anne of Bohemia.]

Same day. Simon de Burleigh sent from the Lord King to the King of the Romans and Bohemia, on certain arduous and secret negotiations touching the Lord King. Master Robert Braybrooke, clerk, sent to the King of the Romans for negotiations of the said Lord King Bernardus Zedeletz, Knight, sent on a similar embassy, in the suite of the said Simon and Robert. (Ib.)

6 Mar. [1381]. To Geoffrey Chaucer, Squire of the King, by his own hands, assigned in payment of 22l. which the King commanded to be paid him, of his gift, in recompense for his journeys as well in the time of the King Edward, the King's grandfather [when he was] sent by the said grandfather to Mounstreil [Montreuil?] and Parys, in France, to treat of peace between the King and his Adversary of France, as in the time of the present King, by reason of the contract of marriage between the Lord King and the daughter of his said Adversary of France. 22l. (Ib.) [This entry is very perplexing. In 1381 the King was contracting marriage with Anne of Bohemia. When, then, did he treat for his marriage with a French princess? The intended bride could not be Isabelle, eldest daughter of Charles VI., who afterwards became his second wife, for she was not born in 1381. The only "daughter of the King's Adversary of France" whom this can have been, is Catherine, youngest sister of Charles VI., born Feb. 4, 1377; married Aug. 1386, her cousin Jean de Berry, Count of Montpensier, and died in Oct. 1388. She was only four years old in 1381; but no other French princess was unmarried at that time, or at any previous period subsequent to Richard's accession. Miss Strickland takes no notice of this embassy in her life of Anne of Bohemia.]

31 May. To Przemislaus, Duke of Theschenen [Saxony], Conrade de Kreyg, Master of the Court, and Peter de Wartenburg, Master of the Chamber of the Most Serene Prince and Lord, the Lord Wenceslaus, King of the Romans and Bohemia [these are called in the margin Procurators of the King of the Romans and Bohemia], 3000l. (Ib. Pasch. 4 Ric. II.)

9 July. The cerecloth of Edward I. renewed. (Ib.)

HERMENTRUDE.

THE GROWTH OF A MODERN MYTH.

The mode in which erroneous statements of fact creep into circulation and are perpetuated, is well exemplified by a recent inquiry in which "N. & Q." has unwittingly been the means of propagating error, which once having obtained currency, it may be very difficult to set right.

The age to which human life may attain has recently attracted much attention. One case in particular has been discussed in "N. & Q."—that of Mary Billinge, said to have reached the patriarchal period of 112 years.* This has been disproved by evidence which cannot be disputed, and her age reduced by twenty-one years. The mischief, however, had already been done. In a very thoughtful and well-written book recently published, entitled "Man's Age in the World by an Essex Rector," the following passage occurs at p. 147:—

"Abraham and Isaac both lived long lives, both perhaps inexactly recorded, as did Jacob, but not longer, under the blessing of God, than the human powers as they now exist."

To this is appended the following reference:—

"The utmost modern powers of man, authenticated, may be placed thus:—

"Thomas Parr,	A.D. 1635,	age 152.
Hy. Jenkins,	" 1670,	" 169.
Mary Billinge,	" 1863,	" 112.
Sarah Lee,	" 1864,	" 105."

Here Mary Billinge takes her place beside the venerable patriarchs who have figured so long before an admiring world; and since the error and its correction will circulate in different spheres, no doubt the record in the book will pass current as a well authenticated instance of extreme longevity in modern times. It is worthy of record as an instance of the mode in which error may innocently pass into circulation as undoubted fact, and I suspect that in reference to the subject of longevity, many recorded cases have no better foundation.

J. A. P.

Wavertree.

[This communication furnishes an additional proof that the series of PAPERS ON LONGEVITY, which we have in forward preparation, may be of good service in calling public attention to the fact, that most of the cases of alleged centenarianism rest upon no satisfactory evidence, and will not stand the test of thorough investigation. Our correspondent B., who dates from The Athenæum Club, is informed that the case of his military centenarian is under investigation, as indeed are several other instances which have recently been forwarded to us.

We take this opportunity of saying that we shall be greatly obliged by the communication of references to any contemporary notices of those well-known types of Human Longevity, HENRY JENKINS and THOMAS PARR. Of course we are in possession of all that is said of them in the Philosophical Transactions, and the authorities usually quoted.—ED. "N. & Q."]

* "N. & Q." 3rd S. vii. 154. For satisfactory proof that the lady was born, not in 1751, but in 1773, see same vol. p. 508.

"MEMOIRS CONCERNING THE AFFAIRS OF SCOTLAND, 1714."

I promise to repeat only so much of what has already appeared in the pages of "N. & Q." as may be necessary to elucidate my present subject.

On June 4th, 1864, an article was published in the London Review, asserting, without any shadow of proof, that the treasonable book, of which the above is the short title, was written by Daniel Defoe. Having thus placed the innocent "author of Robinson Crusoe" in an imaginary pillory, the Reviewer pitilessly pelted him with abusive epithets, such as "baseness," "pretended," "rascality," &c. &c.; and derided, as hypocritical, his intensely pathetic "appeal to Honour and Justice," printed the following year, 1715.

In two following numbers of the London Review, a most able writer, using the appropriate signature of "A Lover of Honour and Justice," clearly proved that Defoe was not, and could not have been, the author of the Memoirs concerning the Affairs of Scotland.

In my first article on "Daniel Defoe and the London Review," in your columns, I did not follow the lines of argument already satisfactorily adopted by another, but endeavoured to show, by internal evidence, that no other than George Lockhart, of Carnworth, could possibly have written the book. I am compelled, in this instance, to the unsavoury practice of quoting myself. ("N. & Q." 3rd S. vii. 60):—

"What people told to Lockhart in his own house in the utmost secrecy—and his replies—are contained, apparently verbatim, in the Memoirs. The same may be said of the secret conversations (whilst travelling), between the Duke of Hamilton and Lockhart; and also, between the latter and Captain Straton."

With this, and other similar proof, and in the absence of all evidence against Defoe, I concluded that the authorship of the book in question was fully established. That I was right will appear from the following paragraph, which I have recently discovered in Read's Journal of Saturday, the 30th January, 1725:—

"On Tuesday night last, his Grace the Duke of Hamilton, and Mr. Lockhart, son of Mr. Lockhart, who wrote the Memoirs of Scotland, had the misfortune to quarrel about the said Memoirs, at his Grace the Duke of Wharton's House in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and did propose to fight a duel, as yesterday morning; but the same was prevented, Mr. Lockhart being put under arrest before day, by Colonel Howard, who was then upon the Prince's Guard at Leicester House, and had notice given him of what was intended, by a justice of the peace, who was present when the quarrel happen'd."

One could without difficulty believe that the public violation of the duke's confidence—which I pointed out six months ago in "N. & Q.," as a proof of Lockhart's authorship—was the cause of the quarrel above described. In any case it will be admitted that the authorship of these Memoirs is now settled.

W. LEE.

SECOND SIGHT.

The following instance of what I suppose would be termed Second Sight was related often in my hearing, and also written down for me by an intimate friend, of undoubted veracity, who was close to the spot at the time of its occurrence. This gentleman was the late Rev. Joseph Bowdon. He was on a visit on the 27th of September, 1809, at the house of his brother, at Radford, near Kidding-ton, in Oxfordshire. On that evening, the old shepherd in his brother's service, on returning from his work, at about five o'clock in the evening, saw a priest, the Rev. John Austin, walking in the garden where he usually did when he visited a brother priest, the Rev. Samuel Rock, at Radford, whose house adjoined that of the old shepherd. When the shepherd, whose name was John, came into his house, he said to his wife: "Hannah, so Mr. Austin is come." "No," she answered, "I have not seen him; he always calls upon me when he comes here." "Yes," said John, "he is come. I have just now seen him walking in the garden." He had scarcely spoken these words, when a man came up to the door on horseback anxiously inquiring for the Rev. Mr. Rock, who was not at home. They asked what he wanted of him, and he answered that the Rev. Mr. Austin was dying at Brailles, and wished to see Mr. Rock. Upon which John, the old shepherd, said — "No, that he is not; for he is walking in our garden, and saying his office." The man, however, rode off to Somerton, about seven miles distant, and finding Mr. Rock there, took him at once to Brailles, where he attended Mr. Austin, who died that night.

Of the facts of this case there can be no doubt. Two of the clergymen were well known to me, and were incapable of deception. Old John the shepherd was a plain honest countryman, without a particle of imagination or enthusiasm about him; and he had not the least idea of the affair being anything supernatural. Perhaps, however, it was intended as a serious warning to him; for he had disregarded the spiritual advice of the Rev. Mr. Austin, and never troubled himself about religion; and it was remarkable that shortly after this occurrence, he was thrown from a horse, and died without ever recovering his consciousness.

F. C. H.

MARRIAGES IN SCOTLAND. — There are several curious customs still used in Scotland in regard to marriages, especially in remote districts. The friends of the bridegroom assemble at his residence and proceed to that of the bride, where the clergyman meets them, and the ceremony is performed. They then proceed in procession, preceded by a fiddler, to the future residence of the young couple. All the young men present start off at full speed on foot or horseback, as the case may be: and the one who first reaches the future home of the happy couple, is said to have won the broose, and is entitled to salute the bride on her arrival; and I believe originally was entitled to some refreshment out of the kail-pot prepared for the approaching party.

On the arrival of the bulk of the marriage party, a farle of oat cake (i. e. the quarter of a circle into which this is generally cut), is broken over the bride's head. Then the person in charge of the house presents her with a pair of tongs as the symbol of her future right to rule over the household. The latter custom is not, however, necessarily performed on the day of the marriage, if the maiden home of the bride is at a distance from her future residence, but on her first arrival thereat.

In some large towns, such as Edinburgh, the custom of throwing money to the crowd, as shown in Hogarth's plate of the marriage of the Industrious Apprentice, is still continued; with this difference, that it is not done by the bridegroom in person, but after the happy couple have driven off. As soon as they have departed, generally followed by a volley of old slippers and satin dancing shoes thrown after them for luck, the crowd raise the cry of "Poor oot" (Anglicè, "Pour out"), which is responded to by a shower of coppers from the windows—a proceeding which leads to an amusing scramble, in which I have seen members of the police force most actively assist, and carry off no small share of the loot.

Another curious custom is that of washing the bridegroom's feet on the evening before the marriage day, but this has now become almost obsolete.

GEORGE VERE IRVING.

FLY-LEAF INSCRIPTIONS, EPIGRAMS, ETC. — Written in a Prayer Book presented to a young lady: —

"Small is the token — fair,
Yet take the wish with which 'tis given:
If Power Supreme should grant my pray'r,
'Twill smooth thy upward path to Heaven."

The following is from the fly-leaf of an old book. It reminds me of the style of Quarles' Emblems, and would be no unsuitable motto for that curious work: —

"Reader, if thou away these truths wouldst bear,
The laws of living well be sure to hear:
With Learning store thy mind, cease not to learn;
Without it, Life from Death none can discern.
Thou mayst get good by it, but if that thou it scorn,
Thou mak'st thyself, not me that writes forlorn."

On ——— having attained his majority: —

"Your tender ranks, where looms yon aching void,
With tearful eye, ye beardless minors scan;
But not your joy, ye sapient sages, hide;
No common truth, the world hath gained a man!"

The following are by a gentleman, deceased, late of the legal profession at Bury, Lancashire; whose many friends will have no difficulty in recognising him by the initials "R. T. G." :—

" EPIGRAM.

" Jack says that of Law common sense is the base,
And doubtless in that he is right;
Though certain am I, that in many a case,
The foundation is quite out of sight."

" A PUNNING VINDICATION.

" Hal's blamed for not leading a soberer life,
For spending his cash, and neglecting his wife;
Just list to the truth, and then judge for yourself,
If the man's not belied by some slanderous elf:
He, in love with a girl, went discreetly to court her,
Got married, and now scarce does aught but supporter!"

T. N.

Bacup.

THE COW AND CALF. — I had frequently heard country folks affirm, that in separating a calf from its mother for the purpose of driving it to market, it should always be led backwards out of the stall, for then the mother would not be aware of her loss. I have recently heard another piece of "folk-lore" on the same point, which is entirely new to me. A small farmer, in giving his boy directions about removing a calf from the cow, a short time ago, told him to cut some of the hair from the calf's tail; and to put this into the cow's ear, and then she would not grieve after her calf. This direction was given not at all as a jest, but in all seriousness, and with perfect faith in its efficacy.

H. W. T.

PRAYING BY MACHINERY. —

" Every one, no matter how he is occupied, incessantly repeats the favourite invocation of the Deity: 'Om, Mane, Pudme, Om,'—the precise meaning of which is not explained. People of a little extra pretension to respectability, as the Nono (i.e. the Deputy) and his attendants, always carry about with them a little bundle of sacred books, and many of them have constantly in their hands a prayer drum: a little cylindrical box three or four inches long, and two or three in diameter, usually of copper, filled with rolls of paper on which prayers are written, and revolving on a handle about eight inches long. A rotary motion is given to the cylinder by the movement of the wrist, and it is kept spinning round by a small weight attached to it by a string. Larger drums of the same kind are placed at the entrance of monasteries; and as a person passes in, he gives a good sharp twist to one or more of these, which go on revolving prayers for a considerable time. In many places they are often made to revolve by means of little windmills, which is carrying mechanical contrivances for facilitating devotion about as far as it is possible to carry them. The custom in its origin, and as it prevails in Mongolia and Thibet, is not so wholly destitute as might be expected of a rational interpretation. The revolving drums are intended solely for the benefit of those who are unable to read: they are turned by the hand, and the process is regarded as efficacious only so long as the personal exertion of turning them is persevered in. In Spiti they are made to roll off prayers with the least possible exertion on the part of the worshippers, or with none at all."—Christian Remembrancer, No. CXXVIII., p. 373 (Egerton's "Tour through Spiti.")

E. H. A.

MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT GODWIN.—The following lines by Mr. Roscoe on this lady were "written from memory" on a blank leaf of my copy of her husband's Memoir of this injured woman, by the late Dr. Shepherd, the biographer of Poggio, and may be acceptable to some of the readers of "N. & Q." :—

" By the celebrated Mr. Roscoe on reading this work.

" Hard was thy fate in all the scenes of life,
As daughter, sister, mother, friend, and wife;
But harder still thy fate in death we own,
Thus mourn'd by Godwin with a heart of stone."

F. B.

Caton.

CURIOUS EPITAPH. —

" A stone was lately laid upon the grave of Captain Tully, with the following inscription, in one of the churches of Coventry :—

" Here lies the body of Captain Tully,
Who liv'd an hundred and five years fully;
And threescore years before, as mayor,
The sword of this city he did bear.
Nine of his wives do by him lie,
And so shall the tenth when she does die."

British Journal, Dec. 29, 1724, p. 5.
W. LEE.

Queries.

QUEEN ANNE AND CHARLES GERARD, SECOND
EARL OF MACCLESFIELD.

Miss Strickland, speaking of Queen Anne's proceedings immediately after her accession to the throne, says :—

" The queen, too, testified some of her hoarded antipathies: Charles Earl Macclesfield was discharged by her from all the rich offices and sinecures with which he had been loaded by her sister and her spouse. Her Majesty's reasons, according to his own quotation of her words, were 'because he had thrown blood in her father's face'—a startling metaphor, whereby Queen Anne indicated her remembrance that he was the chief instigator in the calumny that loaded her father with the death of Lord Essex, who destroyed himself in the Tower at the explosion of 'the Rye-house plot.' "—Lives of the Queens of England, ed. 1865, vi. 216.

The following note is subjoined :—

" Lord Macclesfield was at that time entitled Lord Brandon; he had been banished for slaughtering a poor sentinel, who only did his duty by stopping him and another nobleman from entering the palace of Whitehall by the stairs that led from St. James's Park to the Long Gallery at a forbidden hour. The transaction was a cowardly one, for the two titled ruffians, setting upon the poor youth together, flung him over the balustrade, and broke his bones miserably on the pavement. For this detestable murder Lord Brandon was justly condemned to die, but his punishment was unwisely commuted by James II. to banishment. While in Holland, he became the author of the numerous attacks on King James, charging him with the death of Lord Essex, to which Queen Anne alluded. He returned as a patriot with the Prince of Orange; became a minister of state, and, when Earl of Macclesfield, enjoyed an immense share in the enormous grants which William III. bestowed on his supporters."—Trial of Lord Brandon for Murder; Howell's State Trials.

Charles Gerard, the second Earl of Macclesfield, the nobleman referred to, died 5th Nov. 1701 (Luttrell's Brief Historical Relation, v. 106), four months before Queen Anne's accession, and therefore could not have been dismissed by her from any office.

My curiosity to know how this remarkable blunder could have arisen is enhanced by the reference "to his own quotation of her words."

The earl had a regiment of horse, and was lord lieutenant of Lancashire, Cheshire, Montgomery, Flint, Denbigh, Merioneth, and Anglesey, but I can learn nothing about his rich offices and sinecures. Assuredly he was not a minister of state.

I should like a little additional information about the trial of Lord Brandon for murder, especially as to the time at which it took place.

Sir John Reresby (Memoirs, 222), mentioning the pardon by James II. of Lord Brandon, after his conviction of treason says:—

"Which it must be owned was a great act of mercy in his majesty, this lord having been pardoned in the late reign (i.e. the reign of Charles II.) for breaking a boy's neck, when he was in his cups, of which being convicted, he was condemned as guilty of murder."

Hereupon Howell (State Trials, x. 1416), observes, "Of the trial for murder to which Reresby alludes, I know nothing more."

I do not believe that Lord Brandon was in Holland during the reign of James II. In September, 1688, he had a commission from that monarch to raise a regiment of horse, which was disbanded by the Prince of Orange in Jan. 1688-9. (Luttrell, i. 464, 495.) S. Y. R.

WHEN WAS THE BIBLE FIRST DIVIDED INTO VERSES?

It has been stated more than once that the first division of the Bible into verses occurred in the Greek Testament, printed by Stephens in 1551; and in the Latin version of the Old Testament by the same printer, in 1556. In the number of the Quarterly Review for April of this year, there is an article on "the great Printers Stephens;" in which the author, after mentioning the division into chapters, goes on to say:—

"The necessity of a smaller subdivision for exactitude of citation was more and more felt. The transition, a very simple one, from long to shortened sections, numbered in figures instead of noted by letters, was first made Robert Stephens in his Greek Testament of 1551; and extended to the Old Testament in his Latin Bible of 1556-7. . . . We learn the fact on the authority of his son, that this operation was the occupation of a tedious journey on horseback from Paris to Lyons."

Whether Stephens made a revision or re-adjustment of a division previously made—or whether, as the reviewer states, that arrangement is the one which has been followed in Protestant versions, and also in Roman Bibles since the recension of the Vulgate under Clement VIII., in 1592—I have not at this moment the means beside me of verifying. But of this I am very certain, that it was not Robert Stephens who first made the division into verses, and that this operation had been performed at least a quarter of a century earlier than 1551. I have in my own library a Latin Bible, printed in 1527-28, in which the division into verses occurs—the verses being distinguished by numbers. The title of this Bible is as follows:—

"BIBLIA. Habes in hoc libro, prudens lector, utriusque instrumenti novam translationem editam a reverendo sacre theologie doctore Sancte Pagnino luctuconcionatore apostolico Prædicatorii ordinis, etc., 1528."

The colophon is as follows:—

"¶ Veteris ac novi instrumenti nova translatio per reverendum sacre theolo. docto. Sanctem Pagninum Lucen. nuper ædita explicit. Impressa est autem Lugduni per Antonium du Ry calcographum diligentissimum impensis Francisci Turchi et Dominici Berticinium Lucensium et Jacobi de Giuntis Bibliopole civis Florentini. Anno dñi. 1527. Die vero xxix Januarii."

The Bible is printed in paragraphs, the numbering of the verses being on the margin, and the commencement of each verse being indicated by the prefix ¶. The numbering is different from that of our present version. For example, the first chapter of Matthew is divided into forty-nine verses instead of twenty-five, as at present; while the second chapter has only twelve verses instead of twenty-three, as in our copies. But the division appears to be exceedingly judicious. After Revelations there is an address by Pagninus, "Thomæ Sartino Florentino;" and this is followed by the "Liber Interpretationum Nominum Hebraicorum," extending to sixty-nine folios. This, then, is the first edition of the Bible in which the text was divided into verses.

Pagninus was an Italian of the order of St. Dominic, illustrious for his skill in oriental and sacred literature. He was born at Lucca in 1463. He published several works, the principal of which was a Hebrew Lexicon; and died in 1537. The Bible which I have just described is said to agree more closely with the Hebrew text than any other Latin edition. Several privileges are prefixed to it: one of which is by Pope Adrian VI., prohibiting every one except Pagninus from publishing this edition. The Old Testament was finished in 1518, but the work did not appear till 1528. A. M.

BATHURST FAMILY.—1. What is the origin and explanation of the arms, crest, and motto as now borne by Lord Bathurst, and can any of your correspondents recommend me to probable sources of information on this point?

2. Lawrence Bathurst, said to have been of Bathurst, co. Sussex (near Battle), and to have been deprived of his estates in 1461 by Edward IV. for adherence to the cause of Henry VI. Can any one supply me with proof of this story, or recommend me to any probable sources whence I may gain the following information? (1) At what period the Bathursts were first settled at Bathurst (Bodherst or Botherst, &c.); (2) whether the acts of attainder of all persons so punished by Edward IV. are in existence in the House of Commons' Library or elsewhere; and, if so, whether the name of Lawrence Bathurst occurs amongst them?

3. Is there, or was there at any time, such a place as Batters in the Duchy of Luneburg? I am collecting materials for a History of the Bathurst family, and shall be grateful for any information on the subject. HENRY BATHURST.

8, West Cliff Terrace, Ramsgate.

BEATRICE OF COLOGNE, THIRD WIFE OF RICHARD, EARL OF CORNWALL.—Is anything known concerning this lady of a later date than her quarrel with her stepson in 1277, concerning which a document is printed in the Fœdera (ii. 87)? So far as I can hitherto ascertain, she completely disappears after this period. Did she die shortly after, or return to end her days in Germany? If the latter, did she ever marry again? Any information which may serve as a clue to the discovery of her further history is solicited by HERMENTRUE.

BOHUN.—Where can I find any information respecting John de Bohun, son of Humphrey, Earl of Hereford, who in 10 Edw. I. was deputed by his nephew Humphrey (who had succeeded to the earldom on the death of his grandfather) to attend the king in his absence, for the performance of the office of Constable of England? (See Dugdale's Baronage, vol. i. p. 182.) P. S. C.

GENEALOGICAL INFORMATION: T. R. BARLOW. It appears that Thomas Richard Barlow, of Lancashire, was married in Ireland about 1758 to Susannah, daughter of Thomas Loftus of Killian or Killyan, or Killinan, and possibly may have died there.

Can any reader of "N. & Q." say where the aforesaid T. R. B. lived in Lancashire before he was married, and anything further as to his parentage, &c.? ANON.

GENTILITY FOR FOUR HUNDRED YEARS.—In the Westminster Review (July, 1853,) it is stated that in the time of Louis XV. "no gentleman could be presented at court who could not prove gentility for 400 years." Where is the authority for this assertion to be found? There were surely many minions of the French court of that period who enjoyed this distinction without meeting so difficult a requirement. But might not proofs be taken as such at that court which would not have been admitted in any other? This would be one way of settling the question. SP.

THE OLD MAIDS' SONG.—Having lately taken up my abode at Leamington Spa, and wishing to gather all possible information respecting it, I have been acquainted with the following most interesting fact—that this town contains six hundred spinsters of a certain age.

This recalls to my memory an old song, of which I remember nothing but the first verse, which runs as follows:—

"Threescore and ten of us poor Old Maids!
Threescore and ten of us, without a penny in our purse;
What will become of us? Poor old Maids!
We'll petition George the Third—Poor old Maids!
We'll petition George the Third, and our petition shall be heard."

In George III.'s time, seventy old maids seemed to be despairing; what would they say to the 600 at this famous Spa? Should any of your correspondents be able to supply the missing verses of the song above alluded to, it would very much oblige

ONE OF THE OLD MAIDS OF LEAMINGTON.

POST MORTEM INQUISITIONS.—I frequently find in genealogical writers such a sentence as the following:—

"This earl was found to be twenty years of age by the post mortem inquisition taken on the death of his father in such a year of Edward I."

Now the volumes bearing this title, published by the Record Commission, do not, so far as I have found, contain any of these chronological details, but are mere records of lands owned by various persons. Where, then, are the "Inquisitions" to be met with which do contain these particulars? HERMENTRUE.

"THE PURGATORY OF ST. PATRICK."—As one of the Dramas of Calderon is entitled El Purgatorio de San Patricio, can you inform me of the source whence the Spanish poet drew the materials of this admired drama? In 1627 Juan Perez de Montalvan, the biographer of Lope de Vega, published at Madrid a small octavo volume with the curious title of Vida y Purgatorio de San Patricio. A second edition appeared in 1655. Now in 1627 Calderon was probably only in his twenty-seventh year, and was serving as a soldier in Flanders. When he returned to Spain, Philip IV. attached him in 1636, to the Court, for the purpose of composing dramas to be represented in the royal theatres. Was it about this period that Calderon composed his Purgatorio de San Patricio? If so, does he refer to Montalvan's Vida y Purgatorio de San Patricio, or state whence he drew his materials? According to Alban Butler, in his Life of St. Patrick (March 17), St. Patrick's Purgatory is a cave in an island in the Lake Dearg, in the county of Donegal. Many superstitions seem to have been connected with the place in 1497. There are, I believe, some curious legends told about a certain Ludovico Enio, who holds a prominent place in Calderon's Drama, and who is mentioned under other names by several ancient writers, who style him Owen, Oien, Owain, Eogan, Euennius, or Ennius. I have read the "Introduction" to the Purgatory of St. Patrick, by Denis Florence McCarthy, Esq., in his admirable translation of the "Dramas" of Calderon, London, 1853. But perhaps some of your correspondents may be able to throw some additional light on the subject. A work entitled Essay on St. Patrick's Purgatory, was published by Mr. Wright in 1844 (London), but I have never seen a copy of it, nor of Montalvan's work in Spanish.

Norwich.

J. DALTON.

QUARTERINGS. —

"Quarterings," says Edmonston, p. 182, "are not confined to the eldest son; on the contrary, all the other sons and daughters are intitled to bear the same tokens of such consanguinity."

Is not this a mistake, except in cases where a younger son receives as his share of the inheritance a portion of his father's estates, the arms for the families from which they descended being taken with them?

There are several examples of this latter rule of quartering, and in which the eldest brother also retained the quarterings for the dissevered estates.

SP.

RED FACINGS.—Can any of your readers inform me if red facings for infantry regiments in the English army were, at any time, a mark of disgrace? They were worn, if I mistake not, by the 41st when an invalid corps, and before they assumed the title of "The Welsh Regiment." They are also worn by three of the most distinguished fighting corps of the army at the present time.

The practice of cutting off the facings from the coats of a soldier, when "drummed out," has existed from time immemorial; and I have heard it asserted that red facings, although not now a mark of discredit, originated in one or two instances in the regiment wearing them having been deprived of its facings for misconduct in the field.

MILES PEDITUS.

SHROPSHIRE LEGEND OF WILL O' THE WISP.

—A curious version of a legend relative to this phenomenon is current in Shropshire. Can you or any one learned in such lore inform me if it is known in any other form, and how? —

In the days of St. Peter, that Apostle had occasion to travel it seems on horseback, and the badness of the roads cost his horse a shoe. Fortunately not far off worked a smith known as Will, who speedily relieved the Saint of any anxiety on his horse's account, in return for which St. Peter granted any wish that might occur as being useful to him. William was old, had evidently enjoyed life, and had no objection to start again. His wish was granted, and a sad rake he proved. However, time brought him to his knees again, and departing this life, he "made tracks" for the lower regions; but meeting his majesty, was informed that he couldn't come in. He was too knowing, and couldn't say what might happen if he was let in. In short he was too bad even for him to speculate on. As he could not locate here, there was no help for it but to see what St. Peter would do for him; so he called on his old friend above; but St. Peter knew his man, and would not even wink at him, much less let him in. So poor Will had nothing else but to wander back to Nicholas, with the same success as before. Tired of this, he asked for a live coal, and getting one, has done nought else ever since but wander up and down deluding travellers to their death.

Such is the legend, altered in no important part from that in which I heard it a short time ago.

Query, whence is Wisp derived? OLIVER.

VIRGA ULNARIA.—In a charter of the reign of Edward I., the land therein granted is thus described: —

"Unam placeam terre quæ extendit se in longitudine a terra, &c., usque ad, &c., et continet sexdecim virgas domini regis ulnarias cum pollicibus interpositis, in latitudine vero continet sex virgas domini regis ulnarias cum pollicibus interpositis."

What is the translation and exact measurement of the virga ulnaria, and what is the meaning of pollicibus interpositis? Again, in another charter of about the same date, land is thus described: —

"Terra vero per visum legalium virorum mensurata habet in fronte decem virgas ulnarias cum pollice interposito et quarterium; in posteriori parte novem virgas ulnarias cum pollice interposito et tria quarteria et tres pollices; in profunditate autem undecim virgas ulnarias cum pollice interposito et dimidium duobus pollicibus minus."

I have met with the same expression in numbers of charters from Edward I. to Henry VII., and should be very glad of an elucidation if any of your readers can help me. BENEDICTINE.

ARMS OF THE SEE OF WELLINGTON. — Can any reader of "N. & Q." tell me where to find a description of the arms of the see of Wellington, in New Zealand, which was founded in 1858?

SELBACH.

Queries with Answers.

NECROMANCY.—Why called negro-mancy and the black art? J. E. T.

[The change from "necromantia" (νεκρομαντεία) to "negromancia," "nigromancia," &c. took place in the middle ages, and it is not easy to say how or where the alteration began. In med. Latin we find negromanticus for necromanticus, as well as nigromantia for necromantia, and nigromantici for necromantici; in Italian, negromanzia, nigromanzia; in Spanish and Portuguese, negromancia, nigromancia; in Romance, nigromancia ("n.e tota magica sciencia"). Moreover negromancien, negromant, nigromantie, are terms recognised by some French lexicographers, though apparently without full approval; and in old French we find the line—

"Tant savait d'art et de nigremanche."

In tracing the terms in question through the various languages of modern Europe, it will probably be remarked that in the first syllable i occurs far more frequently than e. It would appear that the first change was from necro- (or νεκρο-) to negro-; and that this subsequently became nigro from a supposed connection with the Latin niger. As the Latin form nigromanticus occurs only in one passage that has fallen under our observation, we here subjoin it, as preserved by Muratori, Rer. Ital. Script. xiv. 930: "Dehinc evigilans, et somnium quod viderat animadvertens, mane facto mox Astrologos, Nigromanticos quoque, et quosdam Magos . . . ut ad eum citius adventarent nuntium misit." (Chronicon Brizianum of Dr. J. Malvecius, begun about 1412.)

The term necromancy has not only its proper and literal signification, as implying divination by the aid of dead bodies or departed spirits, but is also used in a more general sense, to signify any kind of sorcery, witchcraft, or dealing with the devil. In common parlance, all such uncanny things are included in the "black art." Should the question be asked "Why black?" it might be answered, first, because of their unlawfulness and malignity; secondly, because they are supposed to be chiefly practised at night; and thirdly, because night has been also thought the time of learning them. "Diabolus, a quo nigros libros noctibus discunt" (cited by Du Cange). Indeed, the idea of blackness, as connected with arts magical, is of very early date, and may perhaps have exercised some influence in the verbal change from necromantia to negromantia and nigromantia. Thus "μελανεία" in med. Gr. was equivalent to magical arts or præstigiæ: Μελανεία τινὶ χρησάμενος.—Du Cange, Gloss. Græc.)

Hence also the more modern distinction between "black magic" and "white magic;" black being that which deals with the devil; white, that which by natural means produces surprising results, vulgo, conjuring tricks. So in Spanish, Magia negra, magia blanca; and again in French, magie noire, magie blanche.

The old English distinction between a "black witch" and a "white witch" is somewhat different: the black witch hostile and maleficent, the white beneficent and kind; but quite as much a witch as the other, as some of us have no need to be told.]

WALPOLE AND THE SCOTCH PEERS.—What is the full title of a pamphlet called The Fatal Consequences of Ministerial Influence, and who was the author? The copy before me wants the title-page, to compensate for which nearly all the blanks left by the prudence of the author have been filled up by a contemporary hand, so that we may learn with whom, among the Scottish peers, Sir Robert Walpole's agents were successful or otherwise.

The Earl of Kincardine and Lord Elphinston make an honourable figure in the pamphlet; but many others quite the reverse, selling their votes at the election of the sixteen representative peers without any attempt at concealment. UNEDA. Philadelphia.

[This pamphlet is entitled, "The Fatal Consequences of Ministerial Influence: or, the Difference between Royal Power and Ministerial Power truly stated. A Political Essay, occasioned by the Petition presented last Session of Parliament by Six Noble Peers of Scotland; and Addressed to the Noble, the Ancient, and the Rich Families of Great Britain. With an Appendix, containing copies of those Accounts of Illegal Practices at the last Election of P . . . s, which some N . . . le and others were ready to have given upon Oath, if required. London: Printed for A. Dodd, at the Peacock without Temple Bar, and sold by the Booksellers of London and Westminster. 1736." The name of the author must remain a query.]

PRIORY OF ST. DENYS.—Wanted, the date of the building of the Abbey [Priory] of St. Denis, on the banks of the river Itchyn, near Southampton; also, a short account of it.

W. CLARKE.

[We learn from Dugdale that "this house was built for Black Canons to the honour of St. Denys about the year 1124, by King Henry I., as may be gathered from the names of the subscribing witnesses to his charter of endowment, William Corboile, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 1122, and William, Bishop of Winchester, ob. 1128. Speed ascribes the foundation to King Richard I." Tanner, from a MS. in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, says, "Here were a prior and nine religious at the dissolution." Their total revenues in the 26th Hen. VIII. amounted to 91l. 9s.; the net income of the house to 80l. 11s. 6d. per annum. The site was granted in the 30th Hen. VIII. to Francis Dawtrey. The ruins are only of small extent, and appear chiefly to have formed the west end of the priory church. Some of the possessions of this house were held by the tenure of arming a certain number of men for the defence of Southampton. For an engraving of the ruins, see The Beauties of England and Wales, vi. 120.]

GILES VAN TILBURG, JUN.—Can you give me any information as to Giles Tilburg, Flemish painter, but who painted in England during the latter end of the seventeenth century. At any rate he was in England in 1670. The smallest information as to his pictures, &c., would much oblige
A. D. G.

[Giles van Tilburg, the younger, was a son of an artist of the same names, born at Brussels in 1625, and was first instructed by his father; but on the death of that painter he became a scholar of the younger Teniers, at the time when Francis Du Chatel studied under that master. He imitated the style of his last instructor with some success, and Teniers had sometimes the mortification of seeing the works of Tilburg preferred to his own. His pictures represent peasants regaling, and village feasts, which are ingeniously composed and vigorously coloured, though infinitely inferior to those of Teniers in the lightness and dexterity of his pencil, and in the clearness and purity of his colouring. The works of the younger Tilburg are held in considerable estimation in Flanders, where they are found in the best collections. Vide Bryan's Dictionary of Engravers and Painters, ii. 475, and Hobbes's Picture Collector's Manual, i. 439; ii. 292.]

SENILAC.—I frequently meet with the word Senlac as the name of a place that was the scene of a remarkable battle some centuries ago, but I have never been able to find any mention of this place in any dictionary, or any map. Will any of your correspondents help my ignorance? T. A.

[Senlac is supposed to be the modern Battel-Abbey, in Sussex, the spot where what is commonly called the Battle of Hastings was fought between Harold II. of England and William, Duke of Normandy, on October 14, 1066.]

Replies.

COLD HARBOUR.

(3rd S. vii. 253, 302, 344, 407, 483.)

In reference to my "Remarks on the Origin of Cold Harbour," and in answer to the observations made upon this subject in the subsequent numbers of "N. & Q.," I beg to state that I have submitted my etymology of the above proper name to several English and German philologists, who perfectly agree me with as to the derivation of the word.

A few days ago I received a copy of the new edition of Webster's Dictionary just published, and was much pleased to find that the etymology of harbour given therein perfectly corresponds to that given by me in your paper. For the benefit of those of your readers who may not have this new edition at hand, I herewith transcribe the article "Harbor" verbatim:—

"Harbor, n. [O. Engl. herbour, herbergh, O. Fr. herberge, héberge, hauberge, f., and helberc, herbert, m., N. Fr. auberge, Pr. alberga, f., alberc, m., It. albergo, Sp. albergue, L. Lat. heriberga, heribergum, from O. H. G. heriberga, A.-S. hereberga, Icel. herbergi, a lodging for soldiers, a military station, from O. H. G. heri, hari, A. S. here, army, and O. H. G. bergan, N. H. G. bergen, A. S. beorgan, Goth. baigan, to shelter, protect; N. H. G., Dan., & Sev. herberge, D. herberg, an inn.] Written also harbour.

"1. A station for rest and entertainment; a place of security and comfort; a lodging; an asylum; a refuge; a shelter.

"For harbor at a thousand doors they knocked."

Dryden.

"2. A refuge for ships; a port or haven."

Webster's Dictionary being the authority for matters of this kind, I trust that this will be considered as a conclusive proof of the correctness of my derivation.

I now wish particularly to direct the attention of your readers to the fact that the ancient mansion Cold Harbour in London is called Cold Herbergh in a grant of Henry IV. (Vide Nares's Glossary, "Cold Harbour.") It is therefore evident that the word harbour in Cold Harbour is our common word harbour, originating in the A.-S. hereberga, and in the O. H. G. heriberga.

Moreover, as mentioned by me in my last, we find places in Germany called Kaltherberg up to the present day. I named three of them, and am now able to add, after having made further researches, that these places called Kaltherberg are scattered all over Germany, and are quite as numerous as the Cold Harbours in England. As to the expression Kaltherberg, no other signification can be applied to the word than that of a cold lodging, a cold retreat; and, as Kaltherberg and Cold Harbour (Kalt = Cold) are the same expression, I hope that those of your readers who at first differed from me in opinion will now see that our Cold Harbour was only a name for a cold abode, a cold retreat, brought over to England by our Saxon ancestors—Cold Harbour = Cold Station, Cold House, Cold Lodge.

In the preface to the new edition of Webster's Dictionary, the editor very correctly remarks that it is only within a very few years that the true principles on which the science of comparative philology rests have been suggested and confirmed, and that the methods have been determined by which future investigations may be successfully prosecuted,—I may further add, that this has been especially the case in England with comparative philology of the various Germanic dialects, and the reason why numerous Germanic words and expressions have often been erroneously referred to a Latin or some other source.

To conclude this questio vexata, which, I presume, will now be considered as settled, I will give the various forms of harbour from the A.-S. through the various stages of the English language as far as I have been able to collect them. Hereberga, A.-S.; herbergh, grant of Henry IV., and in Webster; herborw, "Legende of St. Julian"; harbergh, given in Nares's Glossary; harborough and harbrough, Spenser; herborough, Ben Jonson; herbour, given in Johnson and Webster; harbour and harbor, Mod. Eng. Cold Harbour is also sometimes written Cold Harborough.

J. C. HAHN, Ph. D.

Heidelberg.

P.S. In a work written by M. de Ladoucette, shire, North Devonshire, East Middlesex, and Staffordshire Militia.

Rye.—6th Foot and East Devon Militia.

Chatham.—West Middlesex Militia.

Dartford.—52nd and 59th Regiments; Montgomeryshire, Northamptonshire, Yorkshire (East Riding), Anglesey, Carnarvonshire, and Rutlandshire Militia.

Blackheath.—North Hampshire, Hertfordshire, and York 2nd West Riding Militia.

Tiptrey Heath.—45th Regiment; Cambridge-shire, Cumberland, Huntingdonshire, East Norfolk, Oxfordshire, Warwickshire, Pembrokeshire, and Radnorshire Militia.

Danbury.—West Essex and East Kent Militia.

Tempenny Camp.—West Norfolk Militia.

Landguard Fort.—1st Company of Royal Lancashire Volunteers.

Finchley.—2nd and 18th foot, and South Hampshire Militia.

St. James's Park.—1st, 2nd (1st Battalion), and 3rd (2nd Battalion), Foot Guards.

Hyde Park.—1st Foot, 2nd Foot, and 18th Regiment; Hertfordshire, North and South Hants Militia.

Museum Gardens.—West Riding, Yorkshire Militia, 2nd Battalion.

The foregoing List has never been printed.

THOMAS CARTER.

Horse Guards.

Your correspondent will find the information he seeks in Add. MS. Brit. Mus. No. 15,533.

MACKENZIE E. C. WALCOTT, B.D., F.S.A.

ROGERS AND BYRON.

(2nd S. i. 253.)

Nine years ago your correspondent J. M. B. asks if Byron wrote the sarcastic lines upon Rogers, which appeared in Fraser's Magazine, No. XXXVII. 1833; and this query appears still unanswered. May I be permitted to reiterate the question? The lines began thus—

"Nose and chin would shame a knocker."

For my part, seeing that Byron apostrophises Rogers so highly in English Bards—

"And thou melodious Rogers! rise at last, Recall the pleasing memory of the past," &c.,

and not only in the text of that poem, but in a footnote to those lines compares Rogers and Apollonius to his favourite Pope, I imagine it to be a slander. Can no one set the matter at rest? I everywhere else praises Rogers. Witness his dedication of the Glaucus, his footnote in the Albion, &c. But beside the above-mentioned query, I have one of my own to trouble Rogers and Byron, and this is it:

In Byron's Poems, 1857, (ed. Murray), there are some verses said to have been written by Byron in a blank leaf of the Pleasures of Memory, commencing thus, and no doubt familiar to all:—

"Absent or present still to thee,
My friend, what magic spells belong," &c.,

and which lines were, I have no doubt, actually composed by the poet.

Now two literary friends of mine inform me that on a blank leaf of the Pleasures of Memory, Byron also wrote the following verses, and I am anxious to know if this is true, that is, if any of your correspondents can prove them to be Lord Byron's. For tristeness, they remind me of his poem—

"River that rollest by the ancient walls Where dwells the lady of my love," &c.

and they otherwise appear to me characteristic of the noble poet. Here are the seventeen lines I allude to. I repeat from memory:—

"Pleasures of memory! oh, supremely blest,
And justly proud, beyond a poet's praise,
If the pure confines of thine hallowed breast
Contain, indeed, the subject of thy lays;
By me how envied, for to me,
The herald still of misery,

I hail her as the fiend to whom belong
The vulture's ravening beak, the raven's funeral song.

"She tells of time misspent, of comfort lost,
Of fair occasion gone for ever by,
Of hopes too fondly nursed, too rudely crossed,
Of many a wish, and many a fear to die.
For what besides the intuitive fear
Lest she survive detains me here?

What but the deep inherent pain,
Lest she beyond this life resume her reign,
And realise the Hell that priests and beldames feign."

And whilst still on Byron, who but he wrote the fine lines which I have seen in at all events one edition of his poems, but which are not included in the later ones?—

"Ah triumph sorrow, there is not one string," &c.

If he did not write that beautiful poem, to whom has it been traced? W. EASSIE.

MARCOLPHUS.

(3rd S. viii. 18.)

The story of the man who escaped hanging, because he could not find a tree to his liking, has several different versions in folk lore. It is told as one of the Astucias de Bertoldo, a favourite of Albuin, King of the Lombards, who held his court at Verona. Bertoldo was a rustic jester, whose wit was of the school of Eulenspiegel. His wise suggestions to the king, not to give too much power to women, had greatly offended the Queen Ipsicratia; who ordered his attendance, and placed two ferocious dogs in the antechamber. Bertoldo, suspecting this, took with him a hare, which he turned loose, and the dogs pursued it. Some smart language followed, in which he had the advantage; but the queen ended it by tying him in a sack, and leaving him in charge of an alguazil. He persuaded the alguazil to change places, as he was brought in a sack to be married against his will to a rich and beautiful lady; and that, as she did not know his person, whoever might be in the sack would be the bridegroom. The queen in the morning, on opening the sack, ordered it to be tied up again and thrown into the river—which was done. Bertoldo escaped through the guards by putting on the queen's clothes, and on getting outside the walls took shelter in a brick-kiln. An old woman who saw him enter, and knew the clothes, reported that the queen was in the kiln. Finally, Bertoldo was brought before the king; and, after the usual encounter of wit, condemned to be hanged. He obtained the favour of choosing the tree:—

“El Rey no entendió lo metáfora de Bertoldo, y conduciéndole los ministros á un bosque mui frondoso y poblado de varios árboles, viendo que no había árbol alguno que le gustase, le llevaron despues á otro cercano. Preguntaronle, ¿Si había allí alguno que le agradase? No, por cierto respondió. ¿Pues cuál ha de ser? De todos estos ninguno, volvió á replicar. Le llevaron á otros muchos, y nunca pudieron hallar alguno que fuese á su gusto. Enfadados los ministros de viage tan dilatado, fatigados y cansados, y conociendo su astucia y gran picardía, le desataron y pusieron en libertad.”—P. 123.

The king sent for Bertoldo, and reconciled him to the queen. He became a favourite; had rooms assigned to him in the palace, but soon died of the rich food, and the refusal of the physicians to allow beans, garlic, and onions, which he knew would have cured him.

“Historia de la Vida, Hechos, y Astucias sutilisimas del Rustico Bertoldo, la de Bertoldino su hijo; y la de Cacaseno su Nieto.” Madrid, 1811. 12^o. 1p. 376.

The second part contains the “simplezas” of Bertoldino, the son; and the wisdom of Marcolfa, the widow of Bertoldo. They are in the style of the German Schildburger, and our men of Gotham. Bernardino becomes sensible, marries, and has one son, Cacaseno; who is a feeble repetition of his father, brought to court by his grandmother at the order of the king and queen.

The book is rich in proverbial expressions, and the matter seems to be Spanish; but is “Traducida del Idioma Toscana por Don Juan Bartolomé, agente de la refacción del serenísimo Señor Infante Cardenal,” etc. It abounds with engravings of the rudest sort. The stories are not unamusing, though overloaded with words; but to many is prefixed an “Alegoria” of great dulness. I take one of the shortest. Bertoldino being left in care of the poultry sits on the eggs of a hen, and breaks them:—

“Los hombres, bufones, músicos y farasantes reducen á algunos locos á un tan grande y deplorable estado, que despues aunque caben y fomenten lo poco que les ha quedado, quedan hechos á lo ultimo una tortilla. La prudencia ó el juicio tarde ó nunca se recupera sino con solo un don puro particular del cielo que se la conceda para remediarse.”—P. 203.

Brunet gives an account of the Italian editions, from which it appears that Bertoldino is a supplement to Bertoldo, and Cacaseno a continuation by Camillo Scaliger (M. du Libraire, t. i. c. 820).

H. B. C.

U. U. Club.

TOASTS.

(3rd S. vii. 501.)

To many of the readers of “N. & Q.” the following list of toasts, extracted from Dean Ramsay's Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character, may be interesting. Some of them are exclusively Scottish:—

“The land o' cakes (Scotland).

Mair freens and less need o' them.

Thumping luck and fat weans.

When we're gaun up the hill o' fortune, may we ne'er meet a frien' coming down.

May ne'er waur be amang us.

May the hinges of friendship never rust, or the wings of love lose a feather.

Here's to them that lo'es us, or lenns us a lift.

Here's health to the sick, stilts to the lame,

Claise to the back, and brose to the wame.

Here's health, wealth, wit, and meal.

The deil rock them in a creel,

That does na' wish us a' weel.

Horny hands and weather-beaten haffets (cheeks).

The rending o' rocks and the pu'in' down o' auld houses.

(The above two belong to the mason craft; the first implies a wish for plenty of work, and health to do it; the second, to erect new buildings and clear away old ones.)

May the winds o' adversity ne'er blaw open our door.

May poortith ne'er throw us in the dirt, or gowd in to the high saddle.*

May the mouse ne'er leave our meal-pock wi' the tear in its e'e.

Blvthe may we a' be

Ill may we never see.

Breeks and brochan (brose).

May we ne'er want a freend or a drappie to gie him.

Gude e'en to you a', an' tak' your nappy.

A willy-waught's a gude night cappy.

May we a' be canty an' cosy,

An' ilk hae a wife in his bosy.

A cosy but, and a canty ben,

To couthie (loving) women, and trusty men.

The ingle neuk wi' routh (plenty) o' bannocks and bairns.

Here's to him wha winna beguile ye.

Mair sense, and mair siller.

Horn, corn, wool, an' yarn. (Toast for agriculturdinner.)

For further information on this topic, the De refers to a little work published at Edinburg

* May we never be cast down by adversity, or elevated by prosperity.

the year 1777, entitled The Gentleman's New Bottle Companion. But, before I close, allow me to cite another admirable toast from another part of the same work:—

"Miss Carnegie, of Craigo, well known and still remembered amongst the old Montrose ladies as an uncompromising Jacobite, had been vowing that she would drink King James and his son in a company of staunch Brunswickers, and being strongly dissuaded from any such foolish and dangerous attempt by some of her friends present, she answered them with a text of Scripture: 'The tongue no man can tame—James Third and Aucht;' and drank off her glass!"

GEORGE VICKERS.*

Shimpling, Bury St. Edmund's.

IS A THING ITSELF, OR SOMETHING ELSE?

(3rd S. vi. 161.)

"The question asked above is assumed by all the world as not merely to be settled without proof, but as actually incapable of demonstration?" So says PROFESSOR A. DE MORGAN, who clenches the assertion by adding: "I believe the world to be right." And both by assumption and reputation, the Professor is a mathematician. For the evidence that I am not drawing upon my imagination and making assertions without proof, I refer the reader to "N. & Q.," 3rd S. vi. Aug. 27, 1864.

Now it may be proved that mathematicians in general, and PROFESSOR A. DE MORGAN in particular, do that which is equivalent to making a thing to be not only itself, but something else besides.

The geometrical construction of a circle is a purely mechanical operation; and any geometer may produce equal parts of the same circle by drawing radii, and making the angles at the centre of the circle contained by any two of these radii equal. Conceive angles so constructed to be angles of 36°. Then, assuming $\pi = 3.1416$ (and, according to orthodox mathematicians, this is a very close approximation to its true arithmetical value), is the circular measure of an angle of 36°: that is, the arithmetical value of the circular measure of the angles produced as I have described. Now, let A and B represent the circular measure of two of these angles. Then: A and B represent equal lines (of which the arithmetical value is .010472), for if not, let B be some other line x, and by hypothesis, let x be equal to the natural sine of an angle of 36°. Then: because A=B and B=x, therefore, A=x. And x is a something not A. But, according to all our existing mathematical tables of natural sines (and these tables have been calculated by mathematicians), x=.010472, which makes A and x equal; that is, makes a circular measure and natural sine of an angle of 36° equal.

$$\frac{36^\circ \times \pi}{180 \times 60} = \frac{36^\circ \times 3.1416}{180 \times 60} = \frac{113.0976}{10800} = .010472$$

But the natural sine of an angle of 36° is not the same thing as the circular measure of that angle; and it follows of necessity, that mathematicians make a thing to be itself and something else besides; or, at any rate, do that which is equivalent to it, and equally absurd, make two lines of indisputably unequal length to be exactly of the same length.

PROFESSOR A. DE MORGAN has worked up his imagination into the belief, and in the article referred to has by vicious reasoning arrived at the conclusion, that Euclid was a mere reasoner in a circle, and no logician; and that "geometers are, and always have been, given to this vicious circle." The Professor advances as his proof, the reasoning of Euclid in the 18th and 19th propositions of his third book.

One of your correspondents, under the signature of GEOMETRICUS, in an article entitled "Euclid Illogical" (3rd S. vi. 373), has demolished the vicious reasoning of PROFESSOR A. DE MORGAN in a masterly style. The learned Professor has never dared to reply. Why not? Is it because he has made the discovery that any attempt to controvert the reasoning of his opponent would necessarily result in proving GEOMETRICUS to be the better logician? NAUTICUS.

ADVERBS IMPROPERLY USED.

(3rd S. vii. 152, 224, 363, 406, 426.)

I thus entitle this reply, because former queries and replies have been so entitled. But if A. A. will refer to pp. 224, 406, he will see that I do not, as he appears to suppose, affirm that adverbs in general are incorrectly used. I would merely make a distinction between the use of certain verbs with adjectives, and their use with adverbs; and to each usage I would attribute its own peculiar force. Some expressions I would condemn, not because in themselves radically incorrect, but because they cannot correctly bear the meaning which custom has attached to them. If I rightly understand A. A., he would make the distinction between adjective and adverb to be this: that while the adjective expresses a fact, the adverb imports into the sentence an element of doubt or uncertainty, or is at least inferior in strength to the adjective. This may seem to be borne out by the different meaning of the phrases—"He is sick"; "He is sickly": but I much question whether sickly is an adverb at all, for can we not say, "A sickly season"? And I would ask whether A. A. considers me justified in saying "I am wisely," "I am hungrily," &c., in order to signify that I am like one who is wise, hungry, &c., though not really so. If this force ever resided in the adverb, it is surely never recognised in classical English; and it is with classical English that we have to do. I quite agree with A. A.,

that "Your offer is fair" is one proposition, "I think you mean fairly" is another: that is, that the latter contains an element of doubt which the former does not. But why is it so? Surely any element of vagueness is due to the presence, not of the adverb, but of the word mean, which implies intention as opposed to fact. Let us compare "Your offer is fair," and "You offer fairly," and we shall not, I think, find the one expression a whit more vague than the other.

I suppose that there can be no doubt that the termination -ly = like, the Ang.-Sax. -lic, -lig. So the Greek has ὡς, ὡς, "as," and an adverbial termination -ως: and Ihre says (I quote from Jamieson's Etymological Dictionary):—

"Cognate dialects can scarcely have anything more like than qualis, and the term used by Ulphilas quileiks; similis, and Mœs.-G. samaleiks; talis, and Gothic tholikh. Thus it appears what is the uniform meaning of the Latin termination in -lis [should he not rather have said in -ilis?], as puerilis, virilis; and which the Goths constantly express by -lik, barustig, manlig. Both indeed [and compare the German termination -lich] mark similitude to the noun with which they are joined, that is, what resembles a man, a boy."

But I would point out that all the examples adduced, both here and by A. A. from Bosworth, are adjectives, not adverbs—manly, earthly, for example. The termination -lik, -ly, added to a substantive, produces an adjective; but the adverbs in -ly are produced by the addition of that termination to adjectives. From hal, heil (whole), comes thus the adjective holy, Ang.-Sax. halig; and from holy is formed the adverb holily.

After all, the question is not about the radical meaning of the adverb, but whether in certain particular cases, whatever be its meaning, the adverb is or is not correctly used; and any rule based upon the meaning of adverbs in -ly is insufficient to answer this question, because it does not comprise a number of adverbs, such as ill, well, fast, &c., which do not end in -ly.

I am aware that in Holy Scripture "godly" and "ungodly" are used as adverbs: "All that will live godly," and "their ungodly [adj.] deeds which they have ungodly [adv.] committed:" but according to analogy, we should say godlily, ungodlily,—and the shorter form is but a contraction euph. grat. of the longer.

May I be allowed to refer P. S. C. (p. 487) to the distinction which (at p. 406) I have endeavoured to point out between two senses in which we employ the verb "to be"? I cannot agree with Bishop Bloomfield that, in the example cited, "finely" is the predicate; if by that expression he means that "is" is the mere copula. The true predicate is the existence, being, of the horse (expressed in the word is) qualified by the word "finely." The only limit which we can impose upon this use of the adverb is, I suppose, that furnished by good sense and good taste.

FABIUS OXONIENSIS.

CHARTULARY OF WHALLEY ABBEY (3rd S. vii. 376; viii. 38.)—The whole discussion in this matter arises from the erroneous use of the word actionibus. So far from being a cause of action, factum was a ground of defence, as is clearly shown by the following extract from the Institutes of Justinian, lib. iv. tit. xiii.:—

"De Exceptionibus. Sequitur ut de exceptionibus dispiciamus. Comparate autem sunt exceptiones defendendorum eorum gratia cum quibus agitur. Saepe enim accidit, ut licet ipsa persecutio, qua actor experitur, justa sit, tamen iniqua sit adversus eum quo agitur. § 1. Verbi gratia, si metu coactus, aut dolo inductus, aut errore lapsus, stipulanti Titio promissisti quod non deberas [promittere], palam est, jure civili te obligatum esse; et actio qua intenditur, dare te oportere, efficax est: sed iniquum est te condemnari. Ideoque datur tibi exceptio, quod metus causa, aut doli mali, aut in factum, composita ad impugnandam actionem."

GEORGE VERE IRVING.

SANCROFT (3rd S. v. 213, 200.)—I have not yet seen any answer to the queries of St. T. I am unable to speak positively, but I have reason to believe that the archbishop had only the six sisters named, and that one only of them (Frances) married. Her first husband was Anthony Grenling of Stradbroke, in Suffolk, gent. Her second, Giles Barrett of the same place, gent, but she had no issue by either. She died October 9, 1707, aged eighty-four, and was buried at Stradbroke. It does not appear that the archbishop had a sister named Catherine, but a niece was so-named, who died unmarried. The two nephews about whom St. T. inquires were probably the younger sons of his brother Thomas,—William, his steward, and Thomas, neither of whom were married. The family is now represented by the descendants of the eldest nephew, Francis Sancroft.

The pedigree which I possess does not contain the name of Hearn, which I have not met with in any of the wills of the family, nor does the name of Sarah appear in the parish registers. John Sancroft, an uncle of the archbishop, died in the East Indies, it is said; but it is not stated that he was married. Dr. William Sancroft, the Master of Emmanuel, did marry, and had a son, but it is not supposed that his line continued. G. A. C.

MASSACHUSETTS STONE (3rd S. v. 208.)—This, I suppose, must be the Dighton Rock, of which a full account, illustrated by engravings, is to be found in the great work upon the American Aborigines, published by the government of the United States, and edited by the late Henry R. Schoolcraft. He held the inscription to have been made by the American Indians. UNEDA.

Philadelphia.

CHORUS: "ROMEO AND JULIET" (3rd S. viii. 20.)—The whole of the Chorus is a wordy play upon the untoward circumstances of the loves of two enemies, whose contrarieties seem to defy a union; yet, says our poet, desperate cases have desperate remedies. "Those whom time means to meet, passion teaches to temper the extremities of the disease by as extreme (or unexpected) a sweet, culled from its opposites."

I do not know if A. H. K. C. L. will think this suggestive of a better afterthought of his own.

J. A. G.

ANONYMOUS HYMNS (3rd S. viii. 8.)—The hymn "Where high the heavenly temple stands," is No. 58 of the Paraphrases of Scripture sung in the sacred music of the church of Scotland, and was composed (with many others in the same collection) by the Rev. John Logan, minister of Leith, a short biographical account of whom will be found in the eighth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. ix. p. 551. No. 57 of these paraphrases is another of the same passage of Scripture (Hebrews, iv. 14, et seq.), by Blair, the author of the Grave.

Edinburgh.

AUTHORS OF HYMNS (3rd S. v. 280.)—The Episcopal Recorder of this city, published a few years ago some essays upon this subject. According to the writer, the hymn in our Prayer Book commencing—

"Christ, the Lord, is risen to day, Sons of men and angels say,"

(which I presume is what is called "Jesus Christ is risen to-day" in the query), is by Charles Wesley. "Saviour, who thy flock art feeding" is by the Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg, of the Episcopal Church, a native of Pennsylvania, but for many years past a resident in the State of New York. He is the author of several other hymns, among which is that commencing "I would not live away," probably known in England.

Philadelphia.

PETITION OF I (3rd S. v. 115.)—The pronunciation of u for i in such words as firm, virgin, virtue, &c., is at least as old as the time of Butler, in whose Hudibras, virgin is made to rhyme with urging (part i. canto i. lines 915-6). A clergyman of this city, distinguished for his careful pronunciation, gives to the i in the word virgin the same sound which it has in the first syllable of the word irritate, which no one thinks of calling urritate.

BAR-POINT.

Philadelphia.

LEADING APES IN HELL (3rd S. v. 341.)—A song commencing—

"Ah! no, no, I never will marry,
To live single and happy's my plan;
We had better lead monkeys for ever,
Than be tied to that thing called a man,"

professes to be a translation of a Spanish song, commencing—

"¡Ah, no, no quiero casarme!"

but not having seen the words of the Spanish song in full, I cannot say whether the idea of leading apes is in it. If so, it shows that it was not confined to England.

UNEDA.

Philadelphia.

SLAVERY PROHIBITED IN PENNSYLVANIA (3rd S. v. 480.)—The "Act of prevent the Importation of Negroes and Indians into this Province," was passed, not in 1711, but June 7, 1712, and "Recorded A. vol. ii. p. 46." (Peter Miller and Co.'s edition of the Laws of Pennsylvania, vol. i. p. 50.) On Feb. 20, 1713, at the Court at St. James's, the queen, upon the recommendation of the solicitor-general and with the advice of the privy council, was pleased to declare her disallowance and disapprobation of the above-mentioned act and fourteen other acts passed in Pennsylvania. (Ibid., vol. i. pp. 51-2.)

UNEDA.

Philadelphia.

"BENE CŒPISSE EST DIMIDIUM FACTI" (3rd S. vii. 148.)—MR. L. MACKENZIE is informed that the maxim to which he refers was penned by Horace four hundred years before Ausonius, and runs in these words: "Dimidium facti qui cœpit habet."—Epist. i. 2, 40.

W. T. M.

Government House, Hongkong.

"PEREANT QUI ANTE NOS," ETC. (3rd S. vii. 141.)—MR. PINKERTON quotes as from St. Donatus, "Pereant illi qui ante nos nostra dixerunt," while the American writer Mr. J. R. LOWELL in the Biglow Papers ascribes the words to Austin (St. Augustin), and gives them thus—"Pereant qui ante nos nostra dixerint." The latter is the more grammatical form. Who is right as to the authorship?

W. T. M.

Government House, Hongkong.

FUN (3rd S. vii. 477.)—These lines from Spenser will, perhaps, help in getting at the meaning and derivation of the word Fun. In the Shepherd's Calendar, Thenot, speaking to Cuddy in "February," says, "Thou art a fon of thy love to boast." Again, in "April,"—"Siker I hold him for a greater fon." Evidently in these passages fon means fool; and fun means foolery of a harmless, or, if I may allow myself the phrase, of a mitigated kind. In the present day, the words fool and foolery seem to gain force as words of reproach, meaning more than mere negative stupidity, which is all that the word fon seems to convey in the above extracts from Spenser. Chaucer has fonne = to be foolish. Fond, even to this day, retains in many cases of its use, the sense of foolish. Fun, then, I suggest, is connected with and derived from fonne = fon, fond; and with the change of the vowel has acquired a gentler sound and meaning. I should, however, notice here, that I remember having noted this word before, as coming from a Gothic stem, unna = to please: but I am writing away from books of reference, and likely to be in error. The word fun must have been in use, one might venture to say in general use, before 1724, as appears from these verses :—

"Don't mind me, though for all my rux and jokes,
Your bards may find us bloods good-natured folks."

PAUL A JACOBSON.

"CLOXTARF" (3rd S. iii. 111.)—This poem is by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, of Dublin. M. S.

DAUGHTER PRONOUNCED DAFTER (3rd S. viii. 56.)—Q. Q. is in error in supposing that my mistake (if I have made one) occurred "through happy ignorance of vulgar pronunciation." For nearly forty years my occupation has brought me into almost daily contact with poor people from all parts of England, town and country; and there can hardly be a vulgarism or provincialism that I have not, at some time or other, encountered. It is the very fact of the word after being so frequently corrupted, especially in certain country districts, into a'ter (a as in German) that makes me believe that daughter (in like manner corrupted into du'ter) was once very extensively pronounced dafter. It is so written in Izaak Walton's will, as printed in the Life of Ken, by a Layman (1854, pt. i. p. 213, note):—"And I give to my son-in-law, Doctor Hawkins (whome I love as my owne son), and to my dafter, his wife," . . . The will is given at length in the Introduction to Major's edition of Walton's Angler, but with the spelling modernised.

JAYDEE.

THE DUCHESS D'ABRANTES (3rd S. viii. 28.)—In answer to a query contained in the last number of your valuable journal, I beg to say that the present Duchess d'Abrantès is the daughter of General Lepic. She married, in 1845, M. Adolphe d'Abrantès, second and only son of Marshal Junot. The celebrated Duchess d'Abrantes died in 1838.

GUSTAVE MASSON.

"DITES MOI OÙ, N'EN QUEL PAYS" (3rd S. viii. 30.)—The quotation referred to, is from Villon. I give the entire stanza:—

"Dites moy où, n'en quel pays,
Est Flora, la belle Romayne;
Archipiada, ne Thaïs,
Qui fut sa cousine germaine;
Echo, parlant, quand bruyt on maine,
Dessus rivière ou sus estan,
Qui beauté eut trop plus qu'humaine? . . .
Mais où sont les neiges d'autan?"*

Ballade des Dames du Temps jadis, edit.
Jannet, p. 62.

GUSTAVE MASSON.

Your correspondent is inquiring for the famous rondeau of Villon: "Où sont les neiges d'autan?" As this old French word is a contraction of autre-an, it ought not to be spelt with a t. Roquefort, under the head of "Autan," in his Glossaire de la Langue Romane, gives the following extract from the rondeau:—

* Of the last year, ante annum.

" . . . Où est la reine
Qui commanda que Buridan
Fut jeté dans un sac en Seine?
Mais où sont les neiges d'autan?
La reine blanche comme un lys,
Qui chantait à voix de Syrene,—
Bertha au grand pied, Biétris, Alys,
Harembourgs qui tint le Mayne,
Et Jeanne, la bonne Lorraine,
Qu'Anglois brûlèrent à Rouen,—
Où sont ils, Vierge Souveraine?
Mais où sont les neiges d'autan?"

"La reine" is Jeanne of Burgundy, wife of Philippe V. of France; and "La reine blanche comme un lys," may possibly refer to Blanche, mother of St. Louis. "Berthe au grand pied," perhaps better known to most readers as "the beautiful Bertha, the spinner, the Queen of Helvetia," of Longfellow's Courtship of Miles Standish, is the wife of Pepin la Bref, and mother of Charlemagne. "Harembourgs" must be Ermengarde of Maine, the witch Countess of Anjou; while "Jeanne, la bonne Lorraine," is unmistakably the Maid of Orleans. But who are Biétris and Alys?

HERMENTAUBE.

CONY-GARTH (3rd S. viii. 48.)—Max Müller, in his second series on the Science of Language, says:—

"One word, however common, of our own dialect, if well examined and analysed, will teach us more than the most ingenious speculations on the nature of speech and the origin of roots."

"The stony rocks are a refuge for the coney." May not the three spots marked in the Ordnance Maps, of Wilts and Dorset, mean simply rabbit-warrens? The word rabbit not long since was discussed in "N. & Q." without a clear elucidation of how it got into the English language. The derivation of coney is far less difficult to be found. Lepus cuniculus defines distinctly this little burrowing animal, i. e. a miner that bores into the clefts of rocks on the sea shore, and scratches out hiding places ("rabbits' holes") in the loose soil of the hills anywhere in land. The adjunct "Garth," especially in Scotland, merely expresses a piece of common ground. Gar is an abbreviation or corruption of garth. But the hill called "Conygore Hill," close to Stowerpaine, in Dorsetshire, requires some further explanation. It stands at no great distance from a British encampment called "Hod's Hill" (Hod's, Hood's, Odo's); and the strip of land between these two hills is the "Gore," just as the strip of land which runs along the road before the site of the Great Exhibition and Prince Albert's Museum, time immemorially has been denominated "Kensington Gore." These few simple remarks may perhaps supply your correspondent X. Y. Z. with all the information he requires.

QUEEN'S GARDENS.

Garth, a small field or close, is very common indeed in the north of England. We have connected with farm-houses — cow-garths, goose-garths, stock-garths, turnip-garths, &c., &c.

J. WETHERELL.

BEEST (3rd S. vii. 458, 507; viii. 59.)—I suspect that, in seeking for the origin of this word, there has been a good deal of that work which is well described by the Scotch saying: "Ganging faur about to find the nearest." Jamieson had the clue in his hand when he referred to "biest melch," but lost it when he went off into a state of "fermentation." Referring to that admirable work, The Book of the Farm, by Henry Stephens (Edinburgh, 1844), I find the following passages in reference to the term:—

"The milk that first comes from the cow after calving is of a thick consistency, and yellow colour, and is called biestings. It has the same coagulable properties as the yolk and white of an egg beat up. After three or four days the biestings" is followed by milk.—Vol. ii. p. 458.

"The young calf should get quit of the black and glutinous faeces that have been accumulating in its intestines during the latter period of its foetal existence, and there is no aperient better suited for the purpose than biestings."—P. 470.

It occurred to me that, as cattle are so often spoken of in the north as beasts, biestings was simply a diminutive thereof: the letter l having been dropped, and also the word milk. And on reference to A Glossary of North Country Words, by John Trotter Brockett, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, I found the following (vol. i. p. 30):—

"Beastlings, or Beastings: the thick milk given by the cow for a short time after calving. Sax. bysting."

"So may the first of all our fells be thine,
And both the beestings of our goats and kine."
Ben Johnson, Hymn to Pan.

The word, therefore, simply indicates the milk which Providence has provided for the food of beastlings, or calves, during the first three or four days after their birth.

I have not a Dutch dictionary at hand; but I strongly suspect that it was through the Low Countries—long famous as a dairy country, and whence we derived our famous breed of Clydesdale horses—that the term beesting reached Scotland. The similarity of the two languages is most striking. I recollect being told by an aged relative an anecdote of a Scotchman, a merchant in Edinburgh, having called upon a merchant in Amsterdam, and understanding from the servant that he was out, said in his broadest Scotch: "Gang an' fetch him,"—which was instantly understood and obeyed.

The following examples of Dutch words, taken from memory, clearly show the affinity of the two languages: Hawnd shoon, gloves; Far keeker, a telescope.

GEORGE VERE IRVING.

DRAGON IN HERALDRY (3rd S. viii. 55.)—Dragons were the commonest military ensigns of the Sclavonians. In the ancient Teutonic armies also, there was one to every thousand men. The emperor M. Aurelius mentions* that his camp was surrounded by a German force of seventy-four dragons. Might not such forms have originated in accident? It would be easier to stuff cloth so as to represent a dragon than a veritable animal. Explanations are often very ingeniously made for cases of which accident was the parent. In a history of China which I have read, there is a question raised as to what animal or reptile was meant in the tradition of a very early emperor having at one of his great feasts eaten a dragon. The author immediately suggests the cerastes, or horned snake, as the nearest type of the Chinese dragon, quite forgetting that from the nature and attributes of the imperial dragon, he could never have been confounded with "vulgar terrestrial reptiles." The story referred to must have been mistranslated or incorrectly transmitted; or it might have been a figurative way of describing the sovereign's power. Moreover, it might have been satirical. The imperial dragon of China is a creature made on Pythian principles, the scales on his back amount exactly to the mystical and perfect number, 81, and with every other attribute of wisdom, knowledge, and power, he fails but in one respect—he is deaf: in short, he represents what may be called Destiny.

SP.

I am sorry to observe in the respectable pages of "N. & Q." the old falsehood of the infidel Gibbon revived respecting the person and character of St. George, particularly after the refutation of his assertions by Bishop Milner, so long ago. I recommend those who have been deceived by the base attempt of Gibbon to confound the glorious martyr St. George with the "infamous George of Cappadocia," as he himself styles him, to read Dr. Milner's—

"Historical and critical inquiry into the existence and character of St. George, patron of England, of the Order of the Garter, and of the Antiquarian Society; in which the assertions of Edward Gibbon, Esq., ch. 23, Hist. of Decline and Fall, &c., and of certain other modern writers concerning this saint, are discussed; in a Letter to the Right Hon. George Earl of Leicester, President of the Antiquarian Society, by the Rev. J. Milner, F.S.A., 1792."

F. C. H.

LORD ASTON OF FORFAR (3rd S. vii. 475.)—Walter Hutchinson Aston, co. Forfar, in the peerage of Scotland, a clergyman of the Church of England; born Sept. 15, 1769; married, June 15, 1802, Elizabeth, daughter of the late Rev. Nathan Haines, D.D.; but (by her who died in 1833) had no issue. His lordship succeeded to the honours as ninth baron at the decease of his father, July 29, 1805; and died January 21, 1845.

Fuller, speaking of the Astons, says:—

"A more noble family, measuring on the level of flat and disadvantaged antiquity, is not to be met with: they have ever borne a good respect to the Church and learned men."—Vide Burke's Peerage and Baronetage, 1848.

* Tertullian.

The late Lord Aston was of Christ Church, Oxford. He was curate to his father-in-law; and afterwards presented by his College to the perpetual curacy of Caversham, near Reading. An old friend of ours residing at the Priory there, which also belonged to the College, knew his lordship well. He always told us his lordship's father was a cook in some baronet's family. On succeeding to the title, he left Caversham, and lived in Cadogan Place. Her ladyship was a very singular person, and seldom to be seen.

JULIA R. BOCKETT.

Bradney, near Burghfield Bridge, Reading.

MITRES (3rd S. vii. 437, 488.)—In addition to the instances adduced by MR. WOODWARD of mitres introduced into the bearings of a bishop, I may mention the case of John Grandison, Bishop of Exeter, 1328 to 1370.

The arms of the family were Paly of six, argent and azure, on a bend gules three eagles displayed or. The bishop bore the same arms, except that one of the eagles was removed to make way for a mitre, so that the bend was charged with two eagles only, and a mitre between them. See Symonds's Diary, pp. 83, 84. P. S. C.

PASSAGE IN "OTHELLO," Act I. Sc. 1. (3rd S. vii. 453.)—Will not a very simple, almost obvious emendation, restore the sense of this perplexing passage?—

"A fellow, almost damn'd in a fair strife,
That never set a squadron in the field,
Nor the division of a battle knows
More than a spinster."

Here the unity of the idea is preserved throughout. Str, in sixteenth century handwriting, might easily be mistaken for w.

JOHN J. B. WORKARD.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

Promptorium Parvulorum sive Clericorum, Dictionarius Anglo-Latinus Principis. Auctore Gulfrido Grammatico Dicto, ex Ordine Fratrum Predicatorum, Northfolciensi. Circa A.D. MCCCLXII. Olim ex officina Pynsoniana editum, nunc ab integro, Commentariolis subjectis, ad fidem Codicum recensuit Albertus Way, A.M. Part III. (Printed for the Camden Society.)

We congratulate the Camden Society, no less than Mr. Way, on the completion of the important work which has for so many years engaged the attention of that accomplished scholar. A new edition of the First English and Latin Dictionary, for such is the Promptorium, is no small contribution to English Philology. Mr. Way describes it as "one of the most valuable linguistic monuments of its class to be found in any country;" and he proceeds—"Whether we regard the Promptorium Parvulorum as an authentic record of the English language in the earlier half of the fifteenth century, as illustrative of the provincial dialects of East Anglia, or as explanatory of the numerous archaisms of a debased Latinity that pervades early chronicles and documents, its value can scarcely be too highly estimated. If, on the other hand, we take into consideration the curious evidence which it supplies to those who investigate the arts and manners of bygone times, it were difficult to point out any relic of learning at the period equally full of instruction, and of those suggestive details which claim the attention of students of mediæval literature and antiquities in the varied departments of archaeological research." And the work in its simple and original form fully justifies all that is here said of it. But edited as it is by Mr. Way, who has brought to bear upon it, not only his rich stores of philological knowledge, but that vast amount of curious learning illustrative of the manners, habits, customs, arts, costume, and daily life of our forefathers, in which he is unrivalled, the original value of the work is at least doubled. Mr. Way's preface contains a mass of materials illustrative of early English philological works such as has never before been presented to the reader; his notes turn to full account the information as to bygone habits which the Promptorium furnishes, and some carefully prepared indices enable the student to discover without difficulty the knowledge of which he is in search.

We have great pleasure in announcing that arrangements have been made for the sale of copies of the Promptorium to persons who are not members of The Camden Society. Gentlemen desirous of securing such copies must apply to Messrs. Nichols, 25, Parliament Street, Westminster.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Particulars of Price, &c., of the following Books, to be sent direct to the gentlemen by whom they are required, whose names and addresses are given for that purpose:—

SIR JOHN HAWKES'S ENGLISHMAN'S RIGHT; OR, Dialogue between a Barrister and a Jurymen (1690). Reprinted in 1799 and 1844. Edition of 1799 preferred.

Wanted by Mr. Robert Hardwicke, 182, Piccadilly.

M. CHARLES BLANC, DE PARIS À VENISE, NOTES AU CAYEN. Paris, 1857.

VON Tschudi's SKETCHES OF ALPINE NATURE. 1858.

Wanted by the Rev. J. Maskell, Tower Hill, London, E.C.

Notices to Correspondents.

W. R.'s query about Funerals from Yvancaria is scarcely suited to our columns. We presume that about all coast cemeteries are attached to such establishments.

BONHAMOLIST. See Richardson's Dictionary, s. v., who quotes Fortescue's Sermons as his authority.

AGRICOLA. The passage quoted in Twenty-four Practical Discourses is from Flavius Arrianus, de Epicteti Dissertationibus, lib. I. c. 14.

T. B. Declined with thanks. The document is left with our publisher.

T. See Phaedrus, Fab. lib. II. fab. v. line 25, where the passage reads "Multa majoris magis meum creant."

ERRATA.—3rd S. viii. p. 39, col. I. line 45, for "in" read "in the"; col. II. line 26, for "z" read "j."

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Stationers.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 6d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STAMPED COPIES for SIX MONTHS forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 11s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. SMITH, 9, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all Communications for the Editor should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JULY 29, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 187.

NOTES:—Kitty Fisher, 81—Devonshire Household Tales, 82—Inedited Letter of Randle Cotgrave, 84—Bims—The Hathway Family—Burning of Libraries—Trundle Beds—The Admirable Crichton, 85.

QUERIES:—The Countess Marshal and her Sons, 86—Chasseurs in the English Army—Dodd Family—"The English March" and John Budd—Suffolk "-hay," &c.—Heraldic Query—Jewish Letters—Joseph Maberly—Agnes Pearson—Plymouth—Quotation wanted—Raleigh—Robin Hood Ballad—"Trois Saints de Glace"—Turners of Halberton, Devon—Arthur Tyton—Written Rocks, 86.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Holkham MS. Library—"To run amuck"—Scepter-broad—Hervey's Meditations and Harvey's Sauce—"Animali Parlanti"—The Scots of Ireland—"Conveyancing," 98.

REPLIES:—Voltaire, 90—Men of Kent and Kentish Men, 92—Congleton Accounts, ib.—"Five Wounds of Christ," 93—Caraboo, 94—Yorkshire Dialogue, ib.—The New Testament: its Division into Verses, 95—Toads in Stone—Miniature of Cromwell—Daniel and Florio, &c.—Gibbon's Autobiography—Lawrence Family—Rogers and Byron—Lord Aston of Forfar—The Term "Pretty"—Rev. Edward Ford, F.T.C.D.—Cuban Use of Spanish Words—Calderon's "Daughter of the Air"—St. Augustine's Vision—Climate and Language, 96.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

KITTY FISHER.*

This celebrated courtesan was probably of German descent, for, although called usually "Fisher," yet on the best engravings of her portraits, as that by Fisher, after Sir Joshua Reynolds, she is called Kitty Fischer. Of her parentage we know nothing, but she seems in girlhood to have been of that occupation which is still fertile in the production of the frail sisterhood. One of the satires at the time of her celebrity says:—

"All that we can know of her
Is this—she was a milliner.
Her parentage so low and mean
Is hardly to be trac'd, I ween;
Say, has she wit—or has she sense?
No!—nothing but impertinence."

(Kitty's Stream, 1759.)

It is certain, judging from her portraits, that her beauty was not above prettiness, yet it is also certain that she was superlatively attractive. The same satire charges noblemen and gentlemen with neglecting their duty to England as statesmen and soldiers, and being—"Now turn'd dupes of Kitty Fisher."

Nor was the preceding the only satire upon the same subject, and all appearing within a few months of each other. Thus, in the March Gentleman's Magazine of 1760, are announced—

(* See "N. & Q." 1st S. viii. 440; 2^d S. iii. 848.)

"An Odd Letter on a most interesting subject, to Miss K. F—h—r." 6d. Williams.

"Miss K. F—'s Miscellany." 1s. Ranger. [This is in verse.]

"Elegy to K. F—h—r."

The full title of the satire I have quoted is—

"Kitty's Stream; or, the Noblemen turned Fishermen. A Comic Satire addressed to the Gentlemen in the interest of the celebrated Miss K—y F—r. By Rigdum Funidos," 1759.

It is a 4to pamphlet. A copy is in the British Museum, with a few notes by the Rev. J. Mitford and others.

Mr. Mitford says:—

"I have seen three different portraits of Kitty Fisher by Sir J. Reynolds. Two are engraved. One is at Field Marshal, Grovesnor's, Ararat House, Richmond, and one is gone to America."

There is also a miniature of her now among the miniatures exhibiting at the South Kensington Museum; and I have a small circular engraved miniature of her full face from some painting, of which I recognise no description.

Lieut.-Gen. Anthony George Martin, who died in May, 1800, at his house in Leicester Square, was, when a young man, considered by the ladies so handsome as to be called by them the "Military Cupid." He had the reputation of introducing Kitty Fisher into public life. His connection with her was broken off in consequence of his restricted means, he being then only an ensign, but she retained during life her partiality for him, and for his sake was always ready to quit the most wealthy and elevated of her admirers. (Gent. Mag. Aug. 1800.)

How well Kitty Fisher was known is further evidenced by Mrs. Cowley introducing her, for a special object, in The Belle's Stratagem. She is there called "Kitty Willis," and there is this thrust at her. Saville says, instructing her how to play her part, "Remember, Kitty, that the woman you are to personate is a woman of virtue." To which Kitty is represented as replying, "I am afraid I shall find that a difficult character."

Thus notorious, it is scarcely credible that Kitty should be admitted into respectable society, yet Madam D'Arblay states (Memoirs, i. 66)—"Bet Flint once took Kitty Fisher to see Dr. Johnson, but he was not at home, to his great regret." It is not surprising, therefore, that she was to be seen among the promenaders in Kensington Gardens, and renders probable this narrative of Horace Walpole's:—

"Orange girls at that time were invariably courtezans, and little Prince Frederick (1759), seeing Kitty pass, said to the Prince of Wales 'That's a Miss.' 'A Miss! are not all girls Misses?' 'Oh! but a particular sort of Miss—a Miss that sells oranges.' 'Is there any harm in selling oranges?' 'Oh! they are not such oranges as you buy; I believe they are a sort that my brother Edward buys!'"

Like the fast young ladies of the present day, Kitty was among the noted equestrians of the parks, and one satire has this title:—

"Horse and away to St. James's Park, on a Trip for the Nootide Air. Who rides fastest, Miss Kitty Fisher or her gay gallant?"

It is miserably printed, though said at the bottom of the page, for it is only a single one, "Written and printed at Strawberry Hill."

It merely relates that she was in a black riding habit, attended by "her officer and servant," cantering down the Green Park on a horse singularly marked: that she fell from her horse, and caused a great sensation among the fashionables; and this caused great disgust in a gentleman, who exclaimed "Who the devil would be modest when they may live in this state by prostitution! Why 'tis enough to debauch half the women in London." (Satirical Tracts in King's Lib.)

The time, however, had arrived when Kitty had an opportunity of forsaking the paths of vice, and she wisely accepted the opportunity for escape. Envy probably suggested many of the satires I have named, and their especial birth-year was 1759. They induced her to insert the following in the Public Advertiser of March 30 in that year:—

"To err is a blemish entailed upon mortality, and indiscretion seldom or never escapes without censure the more heavy, as the character is more remarkable; and doubled, nay, trebled by the world, if that character is marked by success: then malice shoots against it all her stings, and the snakes of envy are let loose. To the humane and generous heart then must the injured appeal, and certain relief will be found in impartial honour. Miss Fisher is forced to sue to that jurisdiction to protect her from the baseness of little scribblers and scurvy malevolence. She has been abused in public papers, exposed in print-shops, and, to wind up the whole, some wretches, mean, ignorant, and venal, would impose upon the public by daring to publish her memoirs. She hopes to prevent the success of their endeavours, by declaring that nothing of that sort has the slightest foundation in truth.

"C. FISHER."

This seems like a skirmishing to protect a retreat, for she soon after became the wife of John Norris, Esq., of Hemsted Manor, in the parish of Bennenden, Kent.

From that time she ceased to be a celebrity, and I find no other published notice of her than the bare mention by Hasted that she was buried at Bennenden.

I learned, through the kind attention of the vicar of that parish, the Rev. W. J. Edge, that there is in its churchyard a large low tomb, which is popularly regarded as "Kitty Fisher's." It is enclosed by an iron palisading, and of somewhat awkward access: but one of the parish school-boys surmounted the difficulties, and rendered legible this epitaph—

"CATHERINE WYNNE. Born the 27th day of August, 1711, died the 7th day of February, 1788."*

* Who was this? It has been suggested that she

This, therefore, is not Kitty Fisher's tomb; and upon searching the register, "Kitty's" death is proved to have occurred twenty-one years previously. Mr. Edge has furnished me with this extract from the Bennenden register:—

"Burials, 1767.—March 23. Catherine Maria, Wife of Jno Norris, Junr, Esq."

I can remember fifty years ago a common exclamation among the elderlies was, "My eye, Kitty Fisher!" I fear no explanation of this survives.
G. W. J.

DEVONSHIRE HOUSEHOLD TALES.

It is of great importance that the household tales of England should be collected, as they have been collected in France, in Germany, in Russia, in Greece, in Scotland, &c.

Dr. Dasent, in his introduction to The Norse Tales, speaks of English household tales as a thing of the past, as though they were no more to be discovered. I am convinced that they are still told in out-of-the-way rural districts, but they are very difficult to obtain, as old people are shy of relating them. Von Hahn was twenty-seven years in the Levant, living among the people, without being able to obtain from them a single household tale. At last he offered to pay for those related to him, and with silver opened the women's mouths. By this means alone was he able to form his invaluable collection of Greek and Albanian popular tales. I think that the same means might be employed in England. An intelligent girl, in a national school, may also be made very useful in gathering materials.

Our antiquarian collectors of folk lore have hitherto searched for legends, superstitions, and charms: let them diligently seek out true household tales, and I am sure they will find them still existing.

I am now removed from my native county of Devonshire, where I know these tales may be picked up, and I have but a few which I was able to collect. Seeing before me no prospect of being able to continue my search for them, I contribute what I have to "N. & Q.," in hopes of setting others on the scent:—

I. THE ROSE TREE.

There was once upon a time a good man who had two children: a girl by a first wife, and a boy by the second. The girl was as white as milk, and her lips were like cherries. Her hair was like golden silk, and it hung to the ground. Her brother loved her dearly, but her wicked step-mother hated her. "Child," said the step-might have been a daughter of Kitty Fisher's. In the parish register, Mr. Edge informs me, is this entry of the burial—"1788, Feb. 18. Catherine Wynn, buried in linen; 27. 10s. paid."

mother one day, "go to the grocer's shop and buy me a pound of candles." She gave her the money; and the little girl went, bought the candles, and started on her return. There was a stile to cross. She put down the candles whilst she got over the stile. Up came a dog, and ran off with the candles.

She went back to the grocer's, and she got a second bunch. She came to the stile, set down the candles, and proceeded to climb over. Up came the dog, and ran off with the candles.

She went again to the grocer's, and she got a third bunch; and just the same event happened. Then she came to her step-mother crying: for she had spent all the money, and had lost three bunches of candles.

The step-mother was angry, but she pretended not to mind the loss. She said to the child: "Come lay thy head on my lap, that I may comb thy hair." So the little one laid her head in the woman's lap, who proceeded to comb the yellow silken hair. And when she combed, the hair fell over her knees, and rolled right down to the ground.

Then the step-mother hated her more for the beauty of her hair; so she said to her: "I cannot part thy hair on my knee, fetch a billet of wood." So she fetched it. Then said the step-mother: "I cannot part thy hair with a comb, fetch me an axe." So she fetched it.

"Now," said the wicked woman, "lay thy head down on the billet whilst I part thy hair."

Well! she laid her little golden head down without fear; and, whist! down came the axe, and it was off. So the mother wiped the axe and laughed.

Then she took the heart and the liver of the little girl, and she stewed them, and brought them into the house for supper. The husband tasted them, and shook his head. He said they tasted very strangely. She gave some to the little boy, but he would not eat. She tried to force him, but he refused; and ran out into the garden, and took up his little sister and put her in a box, and buried the box under a rose tree; and every day he went to the tree and wept, and wept, and wept, till his tears ran down on the box.

One day the rose tree flowered. It was spring. There among the flowers was a white bird; and it sang, and sang, and sang like an angel out of heaven. Away it flew, and it went to a cobbler's shop, and perched itself on a tree hard by; and this it sang:—

"My wicked mother slew me,
My dear father ate me,
My little brother whom I love,
Sits below, and I sing up above,
Stick, stock, stone dead."^a

^a I think that these lines are not quite correct, a line seems to be wanting.

"Sing again that beautiful song," asked the shoemaker. "If you will first give me those little red shoes you are making." The cobbler gave the shoes, and the bird sang the song; then flew to a tree in front of a watchmaker's, and sang:—

"My wicked mother slew me,
My dear father ate me,
My little brother whom I love
Sits below, and I sing up above.
Stick, stock, stone dead."

"Oh the beautiful song! sing it again, sweet bird," asked the watchmaker. "If you will give me first that gold watch and chain in your hand." The jeweller gave the watch and chain. The bird took it in one foot, the shoes in the other, and flew away after having repeated the song, to where three millers were picking a millstone. The bird perched on a tree, and sang:—

"My wicked mother slew me,
My dear father ate me,
My little brother whom I love
Sits below, and I sing up above,
Stick!"

Then one of the men put down his tool, and looked up from his work:—

"Stock!"

Then the second miller's man, laid aside his tool, and looked up:—

"Stone!"

Then the third miller's man laid down his tool, and looked up:—

"Dead!"

Then all three cried out with one voice: "Oh what a beautiful song! sing it, sweet bird, again." "If you will put the millstone round my neck," said the bird. The men complied with the bird's request, and away to the tree it flew with the millstone round its neck; and the red shoes in the grasp of one foot, and the gold watch and chain in the grasp of the other. It sang the song, and then flew home. It rattled the millstone against the eaves of the house, and the step-mother said: "It thunders." Then the little boy ran out to see the thunder, and down dropped the red shoes at his feet. It rattled the millstone against the eaves of the house once more, and the step-mother said again, "It thunders." Then the father ran out, and down fell the chain about his neck.

In ran father and son laughing and saying: "See! the thunder has brought us these fine things." Then the bird rattled the millstone against the eaves of the house a third time; and the step-mother said: "It thunders again, perhaps the thunder has brought something for me," and she ran out; but the moment she stepped outside the door, down fell the millstone on her head; and so she died.

This is the same story as the German tale of "The Juniper Tree," but it differs from it in many particulars. In the German story the boy is killed, not the girl; and he is killed by the shutting down of the lid of a box on his neck, as he is looking at some apples. The father is not made to eat of the flesh either; though in the corresponding Greek tale, of Asterinos and the Pulja, the bad woman tries to make the sister eat of it. In the Greek story an apple tree grows out of the grave, and bears a golden talking apple, not a bird.

In the Hungarian tale (Erdélyi Népmesék, 5), "A mosolygó alma," the life of two princes is bound up with golden pear trees, which a step-mother hews down. From them goes forth a bird which lays two golden eggs, and out of these eggs come forth the princes unhurt.

The millstone occurs in many household tales as thunder.

I have no doubt that there is a mythological root to this curious story.

II. THE RIDDLE.

There was once a lady, very beautiful and well born. For some reason or other she was condemned to die a cruel death.

She pleaded her case, and her beauty and her great goodness touched the judges; and they so far relaxed their severity, as to promise that she should save her neck if she could propose a riddle which they could not answer in three days.

She was given a day to prepare. They came to her in her cell to know the riddle. She said:—

"Love I sit,
Love I stand;
Love I hold.
Fast in hand.
I see Love,
Love sees not me.
Riddle me that,
Or hanged I'll be."

The judges could not guess, so she was acquitted. Then she gave them the explanation. She had a dog called "Love." She had killed it, and with its skin had made socks for her shoes—on these she stood: gloves for her hands—and these she held; a seat for her chair—on that she sat. She looked at her gloves, and she saw Love; but Love saw her no more. S. BARING-GOULD.

INEDITED LETTER OF RANDLE COTGRAVE.

[We are indebted to the courtesy of MR. W. CAREW HAZLITT for the opportunity of printing in our columns the following interesting letter from Randle Cotgrave, the well-known author of the French and English Dictionary, to Mr. Beaulieu, who, as we learn from the superscription ("To my worthy friend Mr Beaulieu, Secretarie to The Lo. Ambassador of Great Brittain at Paris. These . . ."), was addressed to one well calculated to assist him in the work on which he was then engaged. The first edition of Cotgrave's Dictionary, which is dedicated "to the Right Hon: and my very good Lord and Maister Sir William Cecil, Knight, Lord Burghley, and sonne and heire apparent unto the Earl of Exeter," and in which he thanks his Lordship for "so often dispensing with the ordinary attendance of an ordinary servant," contains no allusion to Cotgrave's obligations either to Monsieur Limery, or Monsieur Beaulieu.

The English ambassador at the court of France to whom M. Beaulieu was secretary, was, we presume, the well-known Sir Thomas Edmondes, as we find from Mrs. Green's Calendar of State Papers, 1611-1616, p. 415, that Chamberlain, in a letter to Carleton, dated December 21, 1616, says, "Sir Thomas Edmondes has arrived in London with his Frenchman, Beaulieu." Clement Edmondes, mentioned in the letter, afterwards Sir Clement Edmondes, was, we believe, his son.

There is appended to the letter a seal bearing the arms of Cotgrave: gules, a chevron indented ermine, between three bugle horns sable.]

"Sir—I have at severall times this month received from You two letters, and with them all the papers You had of mine from H to the end of O. The first 2 quieres in effect I lost, being past them before I had them; of the rest I shall make double use both in the gaine of the time I should have spent in re-collecting them and in respect of the light which You have given me by some of them: The rest which I cannot get interpreted here by your means (for I will account that help yours which your friends afford me) shall be preserved for a second edition, if God grant me health and time to publish it over again. About a weeke before Christmas I shall have need of my P; then they will serve me if they be well furnished; otherwise the sooner You send them the greater favour You shall doe me, that I may have time enough, before hand to communicate them with Mr Limery to whom I am in this business exceedingly beholden. Those of R I shall be able to spare a fortnight or three weeks longer. More I will not at this time trouble You with, for though I know your love would make You willing enough to bestow time on them, yet I must in good manners have respect both unto mine own small deservings of You and to your many much more weightie ymplements. The meanes You may have to send the first of this (if the partie be readie or should the condition fitt) will be by the youth of whom You writt unto me in your first. My lo. hath little occasion to use him as I ghesse both by the proportion of his familie at this time and by this that (reminding me in a late letter, to give You, from him, many thanks for those You have sent him; and to intreat You to accept of such an acknowledgment from one that living in a still barren and homely country hath little or no meanes to requite You) he made no mention of that youth. And therefore having dealt with all such my friends and acquaintants here as were likelie to be able to place him, I have at length obtayned from one of them thus much, that because our noblemen doe the more willinglie intertayne one whom they may see beforehand, if You please to send him, his dyet and lodging shall be freely allowed him untill he may be with some conveniencie provided for. And yt may be we shall not need to bestow him elsewhere; but that as my friends you and the youth agree. This gentelman, (that I may deal freely with you is Mr. Clement Edmondes, who willed me not to name him unto you, and therefore I pray you take no notice of him at this time, but direct the youth unto me. For your Cachet Volant I thank You, and pray You to continue yt, though now I deserve it not, both because I have little time, but especially because I know that M^r Limery and others doe not suffer You to want any intelligence that the Season affords. And so in some haste I bid you farewell, as

"Your most affectionate
"frend and servant,
RAN. COTGRAVE."

"27 Nov. 1610.

BIMS.—The natives of Barbadoes call themselves "Bims," but for what reason I have never yet met one of those islanders who could tell me; and, therefore, I am at liberty, I suppose, to suggest the following explanation:

The mythical island of Bimini, and supposed locality of the Fountain of Youth, or rejuvenescence, was almost as much sought for by the adventurers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, in the New World, as was "El Dorado."

Ponce de Leon failing to find it, stumbled upon Florida in 1512 (hence the name given to an American substitute for Eau de Cologne).

The Barbadians, with their noted partiality for their own little island, may have at an early period compared it to the fabulous Bimini, and adopted for themselves the name of Bims. SP.

THE HATHWAY FAMILY.—The following is copied from an old Latin Bible of the date of 1527. The style of writing is evidently of the period to which the document refers. Possibly it may allude to some branch of the family of Shakespeare's wife; though there is a slight difference in the spelling of the name, which, however, was a trifle in those days. And it is observable, that these Hathways resided in an adjoining county. At any rate, this scrap of family history may be interesting to some of your west-country readers:—

"Francis Hathway, married to Anne Austen the Thursday before St. Paul's day, An. Dom. 1629. To whom was borne their eldest sonne—

"1. Francis Hathway, July the xjth, An. Dom. 1631, being Munday betweene 12 and one of the clocke, but died at 12 at noon. Whose witnesses were M^r John Trotman, Henry Blagrove, and Elizabeth Hathway, one the Friday that next followed, in the Parish Church of Cam, in G^torshire.

"2. Robert Hathway was borne Feb. 3, An. Dom. 1632, being Sunday betweene two and three of y^e clocke in the morning; whose witnesses were M^r Anthony Hathway, M^r John Edwards, and his grandmother M^{rs} Mary Hathway; one y^e Sunday next following in y^e Parish Church of Cam, in G^torshire.

"3. Anne Hathway was borne May 4, A. D. 1634, being Sunday, a little after 9 in the afternoone; whose witnesses were Tho. Belcher, Elizabeth Edwards, Jane Blagrove; one y^e Thursday senight next following in Churcham Church, in G^torshire.

"4. Mary Hathway was borne the 22^d of November, 1635; being Sunday, about 5 of y^e clocke in y^e morning; whose witnesses were her grandfather M^r Richard Hathway, M^{rs} Elizabeth Ashburne, M^{rs} Martha Smalwood; the Munday senight next following, being St. Andrew's day, at Churcham Church, in Glos^{rs}hire.

"5. Margaret Hathway was borne the 6th day of february, 1636; being Munday, about 8 of the clocke in the morning; whose witnesses were Rowland Greene, her aunt Mary Hathway, and Susanna Paine; on y^e Sunday following, in Churcham Church, in Gloucestershire.

"6. Sarah Hathway was borne Jan. 7, 1638; being Munday, about 9 of y^e clocke in the morning; and baptized, Jan. 13, in the p^rish church of Churcham; whose witnesses were M^{rs} Sarah Browne, M^{rs} Hesther Harris, and M^r John Browne of London.

"7. Child still borne, being a sonne."

J. S.

BURNING OF LIBRARIES.—It would greatly interest the lovers of literature to read some authentic particulars of the loss involved in the late lamentable fire at Messrs. Sotheby & Co.'s auction rooms. The Catalogue of Mr. Offor's matchless library is now before me: treasures that were to occupy eleven days' sale, and now nearly all destroyed! To-day I hear that Mr. Hartshorne's library perished at the same time; also a third collection, belonging to a nobleman. An enumeration of some of the choicer curiosities of these collections would be of great interest. Mr. Offor's collection of Bibles, Testaments, and Psalters was, I suppose, unequalled in the world. His hobby was Bunyan, and the "Bunyaniana" alone extended to 500 Lots. Mr. Hartshorne's collection, I should fear, contained many MS. treasures—charters, deeds, pedigrees, &c. Was such the case? I am sure it can benefit no one to hush up disasters such as these; and the readers of "N. & Q." would gladly see some authentic record of what has taken place. JAYDER.

TRUNDLE BEDS.—Mr. Halliwell gives a description of what trundle beds, or rather bedsteads, were, in a note to Sir Simonds D'Ewes's Life (vol. i. p. 86, edition of 1845), from which we may conclude that they are now obsolete in England. They are not so in this country. They are about a foot in height, and are used by young children sleeping in the same room with grown persons. Their legs being mounted on castors, they are rolled under the larger bedsteads when not in use. UNEDA.

Philadelphia.

THE ADMIRABLE CRICHTON.—The following notice of Crichton does not appear in Mr. Tytler's Life of Crichton. It occurs at p. 52 of "Epitaphiorum Dialogi Septem. Auctore Bartholomæo Burchelato, Tarvisino Physico. Ad illustriorem Tarvisii civiumque memoriam," 4to, Venice, 1583:—

"O felicem memoriam, quam certè admiror, cum ea retineas omnia, quæ tibi unquam, usquamve, ut audio, contigerit lectitare: neque istud admiror, ut impossibile sit omnium meminisse, quo divino munere, si usquam alius nunc potitur juvenis ille Jacobus Critonius Scotus, quem Venetiis et Tarvisii, sicut alii ubique locorum, non semel sumus experti: cujus, præter alias plurimas, professio ea est celebris, se nullarum rerum, verborum, litterarum, operum, nullorum voluminum, quotquot innumera legerit, seu viderit, oblivione, neque hæsitazione vel minima detineri."

T. A. C.

Queries.

THE COUNTESS MARSHAL AND HER SONS.

Mary de Ros, second wife of Thomas of Brotherton, was married three times—to William de Braose, to Sir Ralph Cobham, and to Earl Thomas. At least so say all authorities—Sir Harris Nicolas (Test. Vet. i. 86), Speed (p. 564), Sandford (p. 206), and others. But of these three husbands, which respectively stood first, second, and third, is a point upon which few writers can agree. Burke gives them (p. 426) Braose, Thomas (not naming Cobham); Dugdale and Sir H. Nicolas—Braose, Thomas, Cobham; Speed—Cobham, Thomas, Braose; Morel—“Breuves,” Thomas (not naming Cobham.) In the MS. additions to Dugdale's Baronage, published in Collectanea Topographica et Genealogica, vi. 75, Dugdale more cautiously says that Mary, on her marriage with Braose, was widow, or afterwards wife, of Ralph de Cobham. Your correspondent B. seems to me to have proved conclusively from documentary evidence that the true order in which the three stand is, Cobham, Braose, Thomas (3rd S. iv. 198.)

But the children of the Countess Marshal are a far greater puzzle than her husbands. B. says, “Ralph died 19 Edw. II., his son and heir, John, being a year old.” Cobham, then, died in 1325-6, and John Cobham was born 1324-5. Mary, therefore, could not have married Braose before 1326, at the earliest. But Dugdale (MS. additions, Coll. Top. et Gen. vi. 75) tells me that the children of Braose and Mary were—1. Richard, who died s. p. in or before 22 Edw. I. [1293-4]; 2. Peter, who died 5 Edw. II. [1311-12], leaving a son Thomas, who was found heir of his grandmother Mary at her death; 3. William; 4. Margaret. B. states, from the Inquisition for Norfolk, that “John de Cobham was her son and heir.” There is surely some strange blunder here. The countess herself died in 1362; and if her eldest son were born in 1290 (supposing that he died in childhood), Mary must have been about ninety when she died, and above fifty at the birth of her son John Cobham, to say nothing of the backward chronology which makes the son of her first marriage about thirty-five years younger than the eldest child of her second alliance.

Again, by turning to Dugdale's original Baronage (i. 420) we find mention of William de Braose, son of John de Braose and Margaret, daughter of Llywelyn Prince of Wales. This William left at his death a widow Mary, and two sons, William and Richard. William came to an agreement with “Mary his father's widow” respecting her dower lands. He left three sons—William, who left two daughters; Peter, who died childless; and Thomas, who died 35 Edw. III. [1361] having married Beatrice, daughter of Roger Mortimer. Now this Thomas is manifestly the same who, according to the same writer, was returned as Mary's heir, and who is also recorded to have married Beatrice Mortimer; therefore, “Mary his father's widow” must be the Countess Marshal. But proceed a little further, and Dugdale is found stating that “This Mary died in 19 Edw. II.” [1325-6] the date of death of her first husband, Sir Ralph Cobham. Moreover, the expression, “his father's widow,” seems tacitly to imply that she was not the mother of this William; and, if this be so, he must have been, not William the third son of Mary, but William the eldest son of De Braose by his first wife, Isabel de Clare. Therefore, Thomas his son being the grandson of Isabel, was not the grandson of Mary. How then came he to be returned her heir? and how were both he and John Cobham found her heirs?

Can the truth be disentangled from this Gordian knot?

A few words more concerning the Cobhams. Who was Ralph de Cobham? I find no mention of him in the pedigree of Cobham of Kent, either in Dugdale or Burke. Was he a Cobham of Sterborough? and, if so, was Eleanor Cobham, Duchess of Gloucester, a descendant of the Countess Marshal?

I find in various Issue Rolls mention of “John de Cobham, son of the Countess Marshal,” but none give any biographical particulars concerning him, except that on Oct. 13, 1363, certain lands were bought from him for the king, for which 100*l.* were paid. On the 20th of the same month, 366*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*; and on the 6th of Nov. following, 73*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* more. I at first imagined him to be identical with another of the same name, who appears on the Rolls under the various epithets of John Cobham, John Cobham, Knight, John de Cobbeham, Banneret, and John Lord of Cobbeham; but I now find that the latter must be the son of Henry de Cobbeham, who died in 1330, and he himself in 1407—“a very old man,” says Dugdale, quoting Thomas of Walsingham.

The latest notice which I have yet found of the John Cobham, who is distinguished as “the son of the Countess Marshal” occurs under the date of March 1, 1367 (Issue Roll, Mich. 41 Edw. III.)

HERMENTAUBE.

CHASSEURS IN THE ENGLISH ARMY.—Can any of the readers of “N. & Q.” furnish me with any information as to the two regiments of “Chasseurs,” which appear in the English army lists at the end of the old French war—the Chasseurs Britanniques and York Chasseurs? or refer me to any work where information as to their equipment, uniform, &c., particularly those of the latter corps, may be found?

MILES PEDITUS.

DODD FAMILY.—Wanted some information regarding the arms and origin of the Northumbrian family of Dodd. It is frequently mentioned in old county histories as possessing considerable power and influence in the fifteenth or sixteenth centuries; and I am informed that some gentleman is contemplating writing a history of the family. Perhaps some of your correspondents could indicate where I may obtain any information.

J. DODD.

Edinburgh.

"THE ENGLISH MARCH" AND JOHN RUDD.—Where can I find information respecting "The English March," or about John Rudd, who presented the following petition; probably (judging from the handwriting) to Charles I.? Rudd was perhaps connected with Capt. Thomas Rudd, the engineer, who has been already inquired about in your pages (2^d S. viii. 496):—

"To the King's most excellent Majestie.

"The humble petition of John Rudd, one of your Majestie's drummes: Sheweth, That it formerly pleased your Majestie to give command 'The English Marche' should be practized, and truly taught to be beaten in and throughout this Kingdome, whereby the severall Traine bandes might be furnished with able drummes. There is complaint made in sundrye places that such your Majesties directions cannot be observed, by reason there is want of skillfull persons to undertake that service, soe as the Traine bandes are unfurnished with understanding men, nether can your Majestie bee supplied with sufficient drummes (upon any occasion) unless some course be tymely settled to breed up men to perfection in this waye.

"Wherefore, the petitioner humbly beseecheth your Sacred Majestie, That yee wilbe graciouslie pleased to direct your Royall lettres to the severall Lordes Livetenautes of every Sheire within this Kingdome, whereby the petitioner and his sufficient Deputies (who will undertake the same) may have the teachinge of all such persons as are desirous to learne truly to beate the English March as your Majestie hath commanded, and the petitioner and his deputies shall stand to the voluntary curtesie of the Country to be rewarded for their paines and charges to be taken and expended in this service, And as in duty bound ever praye for your Majestie," &c.

J. B. THE ELDEST.

SUFFIX "-HAY," ETC.—In the westernmost part of Dorsetshire, but chiefly in Marshwood vale, are to be found several farms and hamlets named after their ancient possessors, with the suffix -hay: as Bewshin's-hay, Blundel's-hay, &c. Is this the same as the "haia" of the Domesday Book, i. e. a fenced enclosure?

It may also be found in the map of Devonshire, particularly between Axminster and Ottery; but here always in the plural, -hays, -hayes, or -hayne. The prefix is generally the name of a family that once held the place; but sometimes otherwise, as Easthay, Hamhay, Millhays.

A. S. ELLIS.

Brompton.

HERALDIC QUERY.—There is a piece of mural sculpture built into the east end wall of the south aisle of Stroud parish church, that has excited much curiosity. It, or part of it, seems to have been originally an altar-piece or a monument, into the centre of which has subsequently been inserted a single large sculptured slab of a later style, and another man's work. There are slight traces of letters on both of the parts, but nothing intelligible. On the sinister end of the central slab is an esquire's helmet, and on the dexter side is a shield, with a coat of arms on it, both carved in high relief. The arms on the shield are three griffins rampant, looking towards the sinister side; but there is not, nor ever could have been, any chevron between them.

Part of this work is thought to be of early, and the other part of late, Elizabethan workmanship. In the hope of some clue to an explanation of it by the arms, I shall be greatly obliged if any correspondent of "N. & Q." will say to what family those arms belonged.

P. H. F.

Stroud, Gloucestershire.

JEWISH LETTERS.—Who was the writer of a book entitled—

"Jewish Letters: or, a Correspondence Philosophical, Historical, and Critical, betwixt a Jew and his Correspondents in different Parts. Tome III. Newcastle, 1741"?

I believe only one volume was ever given to the world. I have seen two copies of tome iii.; but I have never seen a copy of tome i. or ii.

E. A.

JOSEPH MABERLY.—This gentleman was author of the following work, published anonymously:—

"The Print Collector; an Introduction to the Knowledge necessary for forming a Collection of Ancient Prints, containing suggestions as to the Mode of commencing Collector. Remarks on the Ancient and Modern Practice of the Art, and a Catalogue raisonné of Books." Lond., 4to, 1844.

His collection of engravings was sold by auction by Messrs. Sotheby & Wilkinson in 1851, and realised 3500*l.*—a little less than the actual cost (Art Journal, 1851, p. 201). Further information respecting him is solicited, and the date of his death, will particularly oblige S. Y. R.

AGNES PEARSON.—Can you give me any information regarding Agnes Pearson, author of The Illustrious Exile, &c., a volume of poetry (printed at Birmingham), 1815?

R. I.

PLYMOUTH.—In the British Museum is an engraved plan of the Naval Hospital at Plymouth, built about 1758-64. The name of the engraver, and any other that may have been appended to it, are cut away. I wish to know these names, and have been unable to find another impression of the plate. Has any collector of such prints a copy of it?—for I expect it has been issued as a print, and not in a work. WYATT PAPWORTH.

QUOTATION WANTED.—

"Mysteriis sacris repleat nos Dea Johannis."

This line occurs on many mediæval bells in Devon. It is supposed to be a quotation. Can any learned reader of "N. & Q." assist in the inquiry and oblige H. T. ELLACOMBE.
Clyst St. George.

RALEIGH.—Can any correspondent oblige me with the arms of a family of Raleigh that lived at Beaudport, co. Devon, in the fourteenth century, and afterwards at Combraleigh in the same county? W. D. HOYLE.

ROBIN HOOD BALLAD.—In one part of that fine old ballad, entitled A Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode, where the brave outlaw is directing Little John, Scathelocke, and the Miller's son, to go and keep watch in the forest for "some unketh guest," this passage occurs:—

"And walke up to the Sayles,
And so to Watlynge-Strete."

This evidently cannot be the Watling Street properly so called; and Mr. Ritson (vide footnote, Allingham's Ballad Book) understands Erming Street to be here meant, though I am at a loss to know how the former name could ever have been applied to the latter road: since they commence at different places, and, after meeting at London, gradually diverge in different directions—Watling Street to the north-west, and Erming Street to the north by Lincoln and York. Robert of Gloucester, in his rhyming history, alludes to these old highways:—

"From the South into the North takith Erminge-strete,
From the East into the West goeth Ikeneld-strete,
From South-est to North-west, that is sum del grete,
From Dover into Chestre goeth Watlynge-strete.
From the South-west to North-est into Englonde ende,
Fosse men calleth thilke wey that by mony town doth wende."

How is this difficulty to be explained?

I wish also to ascertain the situation of "the Sayles;" and shall be greatly indebted to any reader of "N. & Q." who will give me the desired information, or refer me to some source from whence I may draw for myself. A. H. K. C. L.

"TROIS SAINTS DE GLACE."—It is an article of popular faith in some parts of the Continent, that a very marked depression of temperature takes place on the 11th, 12th, and 13th of May—days dedicated respectively to SS. Mammertus, Pancratius (Pancras), and Servatus; who have, in consequence, received the name of the "Trois Saints de Glace." Does a similar superstition exist in this country? It appears to be a well-ascertained fact, that certain depressions of temperature, of sufficient importance to have attracted the attention of meteorologists, do take place in the month of May. They were attributed by Firmian to the interposition of asteroids between the sun and the earth. M. Claire-Deville, however, in a paper read before the French Academy a few weeks back, says that the recorded temperatures show that the "Saints de Glace" sometimes bring cold, sometimes heat, and, in some years, that they have no influence whatever. R. B. PROSSER.

25, Southampton Buildings, W.C.

TURNERS OF HALBERTON, DEVON.—The arms of this family as recorded in the Heralds' Visitation of 1620, are—"A chevron ermine between three Fers-de-Moulin. On a chief argent, a lion passant; and for crest a lion passant, with a branch in his right paw." Similar arms to these are used by Sir Gregory Page Turner, the Turners of Warwickshire, and by Lord Winterton and others of the same name.

Will any one kindly inform me if these are branches of the same family, and which is the elder stock? DEVONIENSIS.

ARTHUR TYTON.—At p. 166, of Mr. Bartlett's History of Wimbledon, is the following passage:—

"Near the present site of Heathfield, on the northern boundary of the parish, was the residence of Arthur Tyton, Esq., solicitor of the Customs. He collected very valuable materials for a 'History of Surrey,' in compiling which, he spared neither time nor expense. He had an experienced draughtsman always in his service; and, accompanied by him, Mr. Tyton often made a tour in the country for a week or ten days, taking provisions with him. He collected in this way some beautiful sketches of churches and places of note. On Mr. Tyton's death, his MSS., as well as his fortune, came to his nephew Arthur Blackiston, Esq.; who sold the 'History of Surrey' for a trifling sum. It has never been published. Mr. Tyton lies buried in Merton churchyard."

As Mr. Bartlett does not give the date of Mr. Tyton's death, I presume he does not know it. Can the information be supplied by any of your correspondents? S. Y. R.

WRITTEN ROCKS.—I am about to visit the North of England, and I shall be greatly obliged if you or any of your correspondents will tell me exactly where to find the rocks which bear upon them certain mysterious inscriptions, which have been much discussed lately, and which are supposed to be prehistoric. I believe that they are to be found among the Cheviots, or at any rate some where in Northumberland; but I shall be glad of more precise information as to their whereabouts. I hope to make drawings of them, tracings, if that be possible. C. W. BARKES.
7, Paulton's Square, Chelsea.

Queries with Answers.

HOLKHAM MS. LIBRARY.—In the Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature, vol. ii. part II. p. 352, there is a notice of a MS. Library at Holkham, in Norfolk, in which it is stated that at the time the article was written a catalogue was in preparation. Can any one inform me if it was completed and published, and when? CLUTHA. Edinburgh.

[Mr. Edwards, in his Memoirs of Libraries, ii. 154, has furnished the following notices of the famed Holkham library: "Early in the last century, an accomplished member of a famous family, Thomas Coke, Lord Lovel, and (afterwards) Earl of Leicester, collected, during his lengthened travels on the Continent, and more particularly in Italy, a choice collection of MSS., on vellum, of the Latin classics, of Dante and Boccaccio, and of the mediæval Chroniclers; and also some valuable printed books. When they reached Holkham, some casualty seems to have prevented their proper arrangement. A century later, William Roscoe paid a visit to Holkham, and found himself in presence of a series of the finest MSS. he had ever beheld. The Classics belonged to the Italian revival. One of the many fine MSS. of Livy had been the gift of Cosmo, Pater Patriæ, to Alfonso, King of Naples. Another volume which he had eagerly disinterted contained a series of original drawings by Raffaele, of the architectural antiquities of Rome. Here lay the vivid historical and controversial MSS. of Paoli Sarpi; there, the elaborate treatise of Leonardo da Vinci on the movement of water, illustrated with drawings by his own hand.

"Roscoe undertook an elaborate descriptive catalogue, and carried it far towards completion. But he had under-estimated the amount of labour which such a work entails, and it ultimately had to be completed (in 1827) with the help of the eminent attainments in such matters of Sir Frederic Madden. 'I am now,' wrote Roscoe, at the date last-named, 'revising for the last time the Catalogue of the MSS. at Holkham, with Mr. Madden's numerous additions, which have more than doubled the size of the work, so that instead of being comprised in one or two quarto volumes, it appeared that if printed it would extend to five or six.' Sir Frederic Madden, it seems, dissuaded Mr. Coke from giving the work to the public by printing it. Although Roscoe doubtless regretted this conclusion, he bore emphatic testimony to 'the great learning, industry, and ability with which Mr. Madden had executed his task. It will make an inconceivable addition to the value of the manuscripts.' Amongst the English part of these manuscripts, are some important papers of Sir Edward Coke." Consult also the Life of Roscoe, ii. 86-95; 256-264; 370-373.

Mr. Edwards's account of the Holkham Catalogue, however, is not perfectly correct. The fact is, Mr. Roscoe only completed the Italian portion of it; the other classes were entirely described by Sir Frederic Madden. The illustrative plates for the work had been engraved, and it was a great disappointment to Sir Frederic Madden that Mr. Coke should have altered his intention of printing the Catalogue. So far from Sir Frederic having "dissuaded Mr. Coke from giving the work to the public by printing it," he subsequently made a proposal to that gentleman to have the Catalogue printed at the expense of Mr. Henry G. Bohn (who had authorised the offer), but this proposal was also declined.]

"TO RUN AMUCK."—In a work recently published, Adventures among the Dyaks of Borneo, by Frederick Boyle, F.R.G.S., the meaning and origin of the above phrase are explained. At p. 18, et seq. he says:—

"Perhaps the most striking character of the Malay nature is the strange madness called 'amok.' . . . He snatches up the first weapon that meets his eye, and dashes to the nearest frequented spot, where he cuts and thrusts at every living thing until shot down like a mad animal. . . . An instance occurred some years ago of a sailor who ran 'amok' in a vessel in the harbour, and forced all the crew to jump overboard for their lives."

TRETTANE.

["I have learned," says Malone, "that a-mocca, or a-muck (for so the word should be written) is used in the Malay language adverbially, as one word, and signifies, if we may so write, killingly." The epithet Indian which Dryden gives to the word muck, is clearly allusive of some eastern custom:—

"Frontless, and satire-proof, he scowrs the streets,
And runs an Indian muck at all he meets."

The Hind and Panther.

An illustration of this phrase will also be found in Sir George Staunton's Embassy to China, i. 264, where we read that "the slaves (at Batavia) when determined on revenge, often swallow, for the purpose of acquiring artificial courage, an extraordinary dose of opium, and soon becoming frantic, as well as desperate, not only stab the objects of their hate, but sally forth to attack, in like manner, every person they meet, till self-preservation renders it necessary to destroy them. They are said in that state to be running a muck, and instances of it are not more common among slaves, than among free natives of the country, who, in the anguish for losing their money, effects, and sometimes their families, at gaming, to which they are violently addicted, or under the pressure of some other passion, or misfortune, have recourse to the same remedy with the same fatal effects." For other illustrations of this Indian custom consult The Gent. Mag. xxxviii. 283, and the European Mag. xxxvii. 110.]

SCEPTRE-BROAD.—

"1729, Oct. 25. Received of Jno. Wingfield, Esq. a Sceptre-Broad, as a legacy left me by M^{rs} Johanna Sleigh, deceased; 1*l.* 5*s.*

"I say rec'd per W^m Wildeman."

What is this coin?

ESLIGH.

[The following notices of the sceptre pieces, temp. James I. occur in Martin Folkes's English Gold Coins, 4to, 1763, pp. 7, 8: "Sovereigns or units of crown gold, commonly called Sceptre pieces, at ea; with d le

NOTES AND QUERIES.

, British crowns, and half-crowns. Weight 154·8 Value 25s. 1d. farthing." Also, "Units, or shilling pieces, commonly called Broad pieces, e crowns or ten shilling pieces, and British crowns
e shilling pieces. Weight 140·5 grains. Value
9d. half-pennie. All these have the king's head eat." George II. issued a proclamation, dated Feb.
1732-3, forbidding all persons in future to receive or er, by tale, any of the gold coins of 25s. or 23s., com-only called Broad pieces, or their half or quarter. The ins thus prohibited, consisted properly of the sceptred aits of crown gold of King James I., which weighing riginally almost 154 grains, had been for a great while urrent at 25s. each; of the laureat 20s. pieces of the same king, and those of Charles I. and Charles II., which having formerly weighed above 140 grains, had been long current at 23s. each.—Folkes's English Silver Coins,
p. 133.]

HERVEY'S MEDITATIONS AND HARVEY'S SAUCE.
Can you oblige me with the epigram on the above, of which the following are two lines? I believe the last two, but am not sure, neither can I guarantee their accuracy:—

"The one is good for frying soles,
The other saves souls from frying."

A. COWPER.

Museum Street.

[This epigram, entitled "Grimm's Ghost," is by James Smith, one of the authors of The Rejected Addresses. See his Miscellanies, ii. 48, edit. 1840:—

"Two Harveys had a separate wish
To please in separate stations;
The one invented Sauce for fish,
The other Meditations.

"Each has his pungent powers applied
To aid the dead and dying:
That relishes a Sole when fried,
This saves a Soul from frying."

Harvey, the inventor of the sauce, kept the Black Dog Inn at Bedfont, about three miles beyond Hounslow, where formerly the Four-in-Hand Club used to drive dull care away at his famed table d'hôte. Harvey was much esteemed and patronised by the late Sir Henry Peyton and the "Whips" of his day. Byron in Beppo recommends—

"The curious in fish sauce, before they cross
The sea, to bid their cook, or wife, or friend,
Walk or ride to the Strand, and buy in gross
Ketchup, Soy, Chili vinegar, and Harvey,
Or, by the Lord! a Lent will well nigh starve ye."

We have never been able to discover the date of Harvey's death.]

"ANIMALI PARLANTI."—In William Stuart
"on and condensation of Casti's ento ii. stanza vi.:—

do not know the allusion in "Albracca's star;" perhaps it is in the Orlando, but I do not think it is in the Gierusalemme, with which I am moderately familiar.

QUISQUIS.

[Webster, in the new edition of his valuable Dictionary
(p. 1546) seems to afford a clew to the allusion in the passage quoted above. He says "Albracca is a castle of Cathay to which Angelica, in Bojardo's Orlando Inna- morato, retires in grief at being scorned and shunned by Rinaldo, with whom she is deeply in love. Here she is besieged by Agricane, King of Tartary, who resolves to win her, notwithstanding her rejection of his suit."]

THE SCOTS OF IRELAND.—The Marquis of Lothian, in his work on The Confederate Secession, states the word Scotus formerly meant an Irishman as well as a native of Scotland. Ducange, in his Glossary, quotes passages to the same effect from Bede, Radulphus de Diceto, and other medieval writers. Claudian in "I. Consulatum Stilichonis" uses the words Caledonius, Scotus, and Ierne. At what period were the Irish first called Scoti, and how long did they retain that appellation?

THOMAS E. WILKINSON.

Stanford Court, Worcester.

[The name Scotia does not appear to have been applied to Ireland till about the end of the third century, from which time to the beginning of the eleventh it continued to indicate that country exclusively. The authorities which show that Scotia was an island distinct from Britain, and the same as Hibernia, or Erin, have been collected by Camden (Epist. p. 360, edit. 1691, 4to), and afford the fullest proof of his proposition.]

"CONVEYANCING."—Is there a Latin word for
"conveyancing"?

D. M. M.

[For "conveyancing," as it implies the practice, business, or profession of a conveyancer, there is no Latin word that we can recommend. For "conveyancing" as it implies the act of conveyance, or the legal transfer of property in any single instance, we beg leave to name Abalienatio. Alienatio is also admissible. Law Latin has such barbarisms as conveiancia, conveio, &c.]

Replies.

VOLTAIRE.

(3rd S. vii. 490; viii. 53.)

MR. BATES asks if it is not inconceivable that, with or without examination of half a dozen passages cited by him from Voltaire's Letters, "men can be found in the present day to pervert their obvious sense with such diabolical malignity."
These passages are adduced by him to show that the grand object of Voltaire and his associates was only "the ab and destruction of anna-often used by Voltaire in his letters, "écrasez l'infame." It is true that he did not confine its meaning to Christ and Christianity; but occasionally—as in the extracts referred to—employed it to designate what he chose to consider the superstitions and the fanaticism of religion; but it is also true, and easily proved, that the epithet was usually directed against Christ himself and his holy religion. He employed it also to mean things connected with Christianity, its mysteries, its morality, and its ministers. Now for the proofs:—

In writing to the Marquis D'Argence, March 2, 1763, he signed himself "Christoque," and in other letters he speaks of the "superstition Chriscôle;" meaning, in fact, everything connected with the worship of Christ. In his letter to Frederick II. of April 5, 1767, he congratulated him for being wise enough to know that for seven centuries, "la secte Chrétienne n'avoit jamais fait que du mal." In a letter to D'Alembert, June 20, 1760, he seeks to animate the zeal of his followers by reminding them of the answer he had given thirty years before to M. Herault, who told him he would never be able to destroy the Christian religion. His answer was: "C'est ce que nous verrons." Can any one doubt who was the grand object of Voltaire's attacks, when he says what he wrote to D'Alembert, Sept. 23, 1763? He congratulates himself especially in that letter, that "à Genève, dans la ville de Calvin, il n'y a plus que quelques gredins qui croient au Consubstantiel." Yes: it was the Almighty himself against whom he directed his daring impiety. He wrote thus to D'Alembert: "Dans vingt ans, Dieu aura beau jeu." This blasphemous prediction he penned on the 25th of February, 1758. "God is not mocked," says the great Apostle: and on the 25th of February, 1778, twenty years after to a day, Voltaire was struck with that vomiting of blood, which brought him in a short time to his grave.

But were not all Voltaire's intimate friends and enemies to Christianity? They could not have mistaken what he meant by l'infame, and they employed the same horrid expression in his own sense. Condorcet, indeed, declares positively that Voltaire had sworn "d'écraser le Christianisme" (Vie de Voltaire): and Mercier says, "d'écraser Jésus Christ" (Lettres de Mercier, No. 60). Frederick of Prussia employs the term in the same sense:—

"C'est à Bayle, votre précurseur et à vous sans doute que la gloire est due de cette révolution qui se fait dans les esprits. Mais disons la vérité: elle n'est pas complète: les dévots ont leur parti, et jamais on ne l'achevera que par une force majeure. C'est du gouvernement que doit partir la sentence qui écrasera la tête de l'infame."—Lettre de Voltaire, 1775.

Voltaire was the head of a deadly conspiracy against Christianity; and his secret instructions to his associates continually inculcate zeal in pursuing their grand object:—

"Confondez l'infame le plus que vous pourrez" (Lettre à D'Alembert, Mai, 1761). "Je vous recommande l'infame" (à Helvétius, Mai 11, 1761). "Que les philosophes véritables fassent une confrérie, comme les Franc-maçons. . . . Mais chacun ne songe qu'à soi, et on oublie que le premier des devoirs est d'écraser l'infame" (à D'Alembert, 1761).

It cannot be truly said that the work contemplated was "unquestionably the abasement and destruction of superstition and fanaticism," that is, of certain things peculiar to the Catholic religion, which its enemies are fond of designating by those epithets: for we find Voltaire extending his attacks to every denomination of Christianity. He ridicules Calvinism as "les sottises de Jean Chauvin" (Lett. à Damila, Août 18, 1766). He announced the fall of the Church of England by extolling the deistical sentiments of Hume as "vérités Angloises" (Au Mar. D'Argence, Avril 28, 1760): and by writing to D'Alembert, that "dans Londres le Christ étoit baïonné" (Sept. 28, 1763). Could there be a stronger proof of whom he meant by l'infame?

Indeed Voltaire, and his detestable associates rejoiced at their success in Protestant countries. He wrote to the King of Prussia, that England and Switzerland were full of men "qui haïssent et méprisent le Christianisme comme Julien l'apostat le haïssoit, le méprisoit" (Nov. 15, 1773). Again, to D'Alembert, "qu'il n'y avoit pas actuellement un Chrétien de Genève à Berne" (Fev. 8, 1776). And Frederick announced to Voltaire that they got on faster in Protestant countries: "Dans nos pays Protestans on va plus vite" (Lettre 143). Talk of superstition and fanaticism, were Catholics alone fools and fanatics in the eyes of Voltaire? Let him speak for himself. He declared that the Huguenots, or Calvinists, "n'étoient pas moins fous que les Sorbonni-queurs," ou les Catholiques; that they were even "fous à lier" (Lett. à Marmont, Août 21, 1767). Again he says, that he saw "rien de plus atrabilaire, et de plus féroce que les Huguenots" (Au Marquis D'Argence de Dirac, Mars 2, 1763).

Much more might be added to prove that the real meaning of l'infame, in the mouths of Voltaire and his followers, was Christ, Christianity, and revealed religion in general. That they sometimes used it when declaiming against peculiarities of the Catholic religion, which they chose to call superstition and fanaticism, will not be denied; but the evidence of its primary and principal application is overwhelming. That Voltaire should have occasionally written in favour of Christianity, is not to be wondered at in a consummate hypocrite and professed liar, as he undoubtedly was. Witness his boasts of his orthodox faith, his going to mass, and receiving the Holy Communion, in his letters to the Countess D'Argental in general, marking as they do the manners and prices of those times.

I also send them with a view to my obtaining information on one or two points underneath recorded:—

1611.		£	s.	d.
Thos. Green, the Bearward		0	6	8
William Kelsall, the Bearward		0	5	0
Bearward and Bullward at the Wakes, Bender's diet given them		0	15	0
Mr Carter, Quarter's Wage for Church and School		8	6	8
1613
Paid John Wardle for saying service three weeks in the Chapel		0	18	4
To Cappe, Curate, 3l. 15s. per Quarter		3	15	0
Thorley, Schoolmaster		2	10	0
W= Hardern, to fetch Shelwerdine again with his Bears, 1s. 8d. at Whitsuntide, as then the Cocking was		0	1	8
He refused to come, and Brock the Bearward came, who was paid		0	6	8
Feaching the Bears to the Wakes, 1s. more, 2s. 6d.		0	8	6
For fetching 2 more Bears, 1s.; Bearward, 15s. 3 Gallons of Claret Wine at the Great Cock-fight, 9s.; the Warden Master, 3s. 4d.		0	12	4
To the Bearward at the same time		0	8	0
To Mr Thorley, Curate, his Quarter's Wage		3	0	0
Town Clerk's Wage, per Quarter		0	6	8
For the Earl of Essex when he went through the Town, White wine and Claret 2 gal.		0	5	4
Sugar, $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. 8d.; Sack a gal. 4s. 8d.		0	5	4
Meat and Beer for his Gentlemen		1	0	0
Lord Brian, a Gallon of Sack, and another of Claret		0	6	8
The Bells were now hung in horseleathern thongs.
1615.
Claret Wine bestowed on Sir J. Savage		0	17	10
Ordered a Bushel of Malt to be brewed against his next coming.
Wine for the Communion, 6 Quarts		0	8	0
Bread for the same		0	0	6
[This is the first for that purpose.]
Mr Cappe, Curate, his Quarter's Wage		7	10	0
[He is said to be the first that had orders in my MSS.]
Griffin, Schoolmaster and Reader		5	0	0
I pass on now to—1621.
To the Prince's Players		1	0	0
To the King's and Earl of Derby's		1	8	4
Lady Elizabeth's Players		0	10	0
Mr Redman, the Preacher of God's Word and Schoolmaster, his Quarter		5	0	0
Thorley, the Reader, his Quarter		2	10	0

It is impossible to avoid noticing the frequent mention of money ^{was} for sporting purposes, as for the cocking, bear-baiting; and one cannot help wonder where the bears were supplied from to furnish a country place in these times, as the middle of the reign of King James I.

One notes again the large quantity of wine ordered for the communion—viz. six quarts in 1615; and, again, the curate said in that year to be the first that had orders. Does this, then, lead to the supposition that those who officiated previously were laymen, and did so merely under a license from the bishop? In 1621 another title is again given, that of "Preacher of God's Word."

I append one or two queries. In 1611, What is the meaning of "Bender's diet" given to the bearward and bullward? In 1613, if the bells were hung in horseleathern thongs, how were they rung? And in 1621, who were the King's, Earl of Derby's, and Lady Elizabeth's Players alluded to?

The last item of a payment to the bearward was in 1663, when he received the sum of 1l. 8s.

OXFORD.

"FIVE WOUNDS OF CHRIST."

(3rd S. viii. 48.)

"The Five Wounds of Christ. A Poem. From an Ancient Parchment Roll. By William Billing. Manchester: Printed by R. and W. Dean. MDCCLXXXIII."

The little book, of whose title-page the above is a copy, will be the one alluded to by your correspondent: it was printed for Mr. Wm. Yates of Manchester, the owner of the ancient parchment roll, and was edited by Mr. Wm. Bateman, of Derby. Only forty copies were struck off: the one lying before me is illustrated with very fine coloured drawings in fac-simile of the original. The poem itself is a very curious relic of devotional literature, and commences:—

"Cometh nere ye folkes temtyd I dreynes,
Wyth the drye dust of thys erthly galle;
Resorte anone wyth all your vyzynes,
To the V streemes flowen over alle.
With pcus payment for us in generale,
Make no delay who lyst en nere and drynke,
And fylle all your hertys up unto the brynke."

This is the proem; then follows lines to the Well of Mercy:—

"In the ryght hande pted so rewtfully; the Well of Pity—

Dygged in the ryght fote so pytably; the well of everlasting life—

Thorow launced so sharre w'yn my lordes syde; the well of grace—

In the Kynges left hand, set of jerusalem; the well of comfort—

Ffte the lyfte fote boylyng of ours most soleyne."

The whole concludes with the following exhortation:—

"At hygh neme when the helle dothe tyll,
In mynde of crytye byttur passen;
Say then a pater lowde or style,
And in hym have thy contemplanen"

"The greater number of the ancients reported these prodigies merely as hearsays; but what are we to think of St. Augustine, the most enlightened of the early Christians, who affirms that he saw, in the Lower Ethiopia, men who had but one eye in the middle of their foreheads, and to whom he was so happy as to preach the Gospel!"

Well may he add,—

"It is not easy to comprehend how he could contrive to catechise beings who certainly never existed in Lower Ethiopia, or any where else." (Selections from M. Pauw, with Additions, by Daniel Webb, Esq., Bath, printed by R. Cruttwell, and sold by C. Dilly, Poultry, &c., 1795, p. 49.)

Before we decide "what we are to think of" the saint who could tell such a monstrous deliberate lie as this, would it not be well to ascertain (as might be done, either positively or negatively, by the very ample Index to his works in the Benedictine edition), whether he ever did so, and if not, what could probably have deceived such a critic as Pauw into imagining that he had? Has any ancient writer attributed this assertion to St. Augustine?

PHILALETHES.

CLIMATE AND LANGUAGE (3rd S. viii. 27, 59).—The proof of the effect of climate in modifying speech, is most strikingly exhibited in the pronunciation of Hebrew by Jews of various nations: the pronunciation of Arabian, Spanish, and Italian Jews is soft and delicate, like pure Italian, without its deep intonation. By the Polish and German Jews the pronunciation of Hebrew is most harsh, unmusical, and even offensive to the ear. By the Chinese, Hebrew is converted into sing-song; more like the uncertain intervals of intonation among birds, but without their usually delicious melody. They pronounce the Hebrew word Berishith, and it is their nearest possible approximation, Pe-ci-o-shit-ze.

T. J. BUCKTON.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

Lauchet of the Laik: a Scottish Metrical Romance (about 1490—1500 A.D.). Re-edited, from a Manuscript in the Cambridge University Library, with an Introduction, Notes, and Glossarial Index, by the Rev. W. W. Skeat, M.A. (Early English Text Society.)

The poem, here re-edited by Mr. Skeat from a manuscript in the Cambridge University Library, is a loose paraphrase of not quite fourteen folios of the first of the three volumes of the French romance of Lauchet du Laik, as reprinted in Paris in 1513, in three volumes, thin folio, double-columned; but with a new Prologue, the author having set aside the French one, and afterwards translated and amplified that portion of the romance which narrates the invasion of Arthur's territory by "le roy de outre les marches nomme galchault" (in the English, Gahlot), and the defeat of the said king by Arthur and his allies. The work is incomplete, which is the more to be regretted as Mr. Skeat informs us that, "at the point where the extant portion of the poem ceases, the author would appear to be just warming with his subject, and to be preparing for greater efforts." The poem was printed for the Maitland Club in 1839, under the editorship of the Rev. Joseph Stevenson; who, in his preface, stated that "it was printed with such errors of transcription as have crept into it by the carelessness of the scribe;" and others, as Mr. Skeat states, for which the transcriber was not responsible. The present edition will be very useful for philological purposes. The text is printed with great care—the more uncommon words are explained in the glossary; and, in the marginal abstract and in the notes, the editor has endeavoured to remove minor difficulties by explaining sentences of which the construction is peculiar, and words which are disguised by the spelling. Copious extracts from the French romance of Lauchet du Laik, and an Index of Names, gives completeness to this useful volume.

THE EXHIBITION OF NATIONAL PORTRAITS, proposed by Lord Derby and sanctioned by the Committee of Council for Education, has been ventilated (to use a phrase of the day) at an influential meeting of noblemen and gentlemen; and is obviously so well started, that its success may be considered certain. From the extent and variety of portraits, of which the loan has been already promised, it is clear that the Exhibition must be divided into two; the first to take place in 1886, and the second in the following year.

THE SURVEY OF JERUSALEM by the Royal Engineer from the Ordnance Survey, has been completed; and Henry James is about to publish, under the authority of the Lords of the Treasury, the plans, sections, &c., in which, as well as some photostereographic copies about 100 photographs of the most interesting places included within the area of the survey. It is impossible to over estimate the value and importance of this work.

Notices to Correspondents.

A. H. A. L. The title Clarence is derived from the honour of Clarence, the first Duke was Lionel Plantagenet, third son of Edward III. S. "N. & Q." 1st S. viii. 565; ix. 221; x. 255.

W. P. The lines have been attributed to J. P. Kemble; but common "N. & Q." 1st S. iv. 21, 72, 391; vii. 192; and S. vii. 176; viii. 37.

CHARLES CROSS. The second edition of Beaton's Political Index published in 1788, in 2 vols. 8vo.

THIS IS. Newmarket, or, an Essay on the Turf, 2 vols. 1771, is a parody between the Newmarket race and the Olympic games, and a satire on Swift's ironical strain of mock panegyric, on the extravagant attachment of fashionable circles to the diversion of the horse course.

J. WYTHFIELD. "To drink tobacco" was formerly a common phrase for smoking. See Nares's Glossary for several examples.

W. M. T. Mr. Thomas Turner in a communication to "N. & Q." 1st S. iii. 276, informs us that the fact of Mr. Mathus being the author of The Pursuits of Literature was secretly made a secret by his friends after he went to Italy. Mr. Turner further stated, "that he would any time be happy to give a public demonstration of the fact by the production of the letters addressed to the Anonymous Author of The Pursuits of Literature," accompanied in some cases with his own answers. (i. R. for Charles's tale to the Society has been translated into English.) W. M. T. and published at Brighton in small sheet 4to [1861?]

EDWARD MARSHALL. There is an engraved portrait of Dr. John Thomas, successively Bishop of Peterborough, Salisbury, and Winchester, c. 1780, in the robes of the Garter, (France's Catalogue of Portraits, p. 311.) There was also another Dr. John Thomas, successively Bishop of Lincoln and Salisbury, ob. 1706. — Evans also had an engraved portrait of Col. Francis Hawker, 4to, 1660.

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d. or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 8d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STAMPED COPIES, for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 11s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. SMITH, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all Communications for the Editor should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 5, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 188.

NOTES:—Daniel Defoe, on Assassination of Rulers, 101 — Earl of Leicester's Library, 103 — Old London Identities, 104 — Plume's Life of Bishop Hacket: New Edition, 105 — Lieut.-Gen. Walsh's Tablet — Duty of Policemen — Bosh — Edmund Waller, 105.

QUERIES:—Anatolian Folk Lore — Anglo-Spanish Families — Browne, Viscount Montague, of Cowdray Park, co. Sussex — Caiaphas' Day — County of Cork, Ireland — De Wilde — Major-Gen. John Downing — Sir Godfrey Kneller — Lieut. F. C. Laird; George Howard — Meyer's "Letters" — John Rice of Furnival's Inn — Sheriffs of Oxfordshire — Prince Charles Edward Stuart — Salmon and Apprentices—Tennyson's Poem of "The Captain"—Garrison Orders: Andrew Wilson, 106.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Sir John Perrot — St. Helen's, Bishopsgate — l'Anson Baronetcy — The River Jordan — St. Michael's Mount, Cornwall — Quotations — Friedrich Rückert, 108.

REPLIES:—The Purgatory of St. Patrick, 109 — Second Sight, 111 — Memoirs concerning the Affairs of Scotland, 1714, 112 — "Herba Britannica," 116 — Cue, 113 — William Molyneux's Monument, 116 — "A Copy of your Countenance" — Rogers and Byron — Caraboo — Trundle Beds — Tomats — "Græcum est, non legitur" — Market Harborough — Thomas Dineley — Ben Jonson — Objective — Johnsonians: "Solution of Continuity" — Coutance — Kar, Ker, Cor — "Extremes meet" — The Old Maids' Song Cuddy — "Pereant qui ante nos" — "Bene cospicue est dimidium facti" — Sir Samuel Clarke — Kilpeck — St. Augustine's Monsters — Quotations wanted — Anonymous Hymns — Town Clerks — Surnames — Derwentwater Family — Sydney Postage Stamps — Guildford Family — Coneygarth — Lyon, Lord Glamis and Earls of Strathmore — Explanations wanted, 114.

Notes.

DANIEL DEFOE, ON ASSASSINATION OF RULERS.

[SECOND ARTICLE.]

In the former ["N. & Q." 3rd S. viii. 21], I perhaps carried too far a desire to let Defoe speak for himself; and adverted only, in my introductory remarks, to the external circumstances which induced him to write on this subject. After reading his Letters in your columns, I think I ought to have premised,—that Applebee's Original Weekly Journal, in which they and the following appeared, was a Tory Paper,—that the arrangement between Defoe and the Government was, that he should "seem to be on that side," and should "rally the Whigs,"—and, with such qualification, I might then have reiterated my statement in p. 246 of your last volume,—"I have not found that he actually wrote in any Tory journal anything contrary to the liberal principles he had always professed." Defoe was a great constitutional patriot. No man could be more truly loyal than he was. Here, he is the same loyal patriot as ever, but we see him behind a Tory mask.

As a mere acquaintance, Defoe is now perhaps chiefly known by the distorted, and discoloured caricature of Mr. Walter Wilson, who has portrayed him as a bigoted, antichurch, radical Dissenter.

Those, however, who have thoroughly studied his writings know him to have been always a liberal Conservative in politics; and, although a Dissenter, yet a firm supporter of the Church of England. Moreover, few men have been throughout a long life so consistent in politics and religion. These Letters on Assassination of Rulers were written after he was sixty years of age; but all the same doctrines, opinions, and sentiments are to be found in his Reviews, and still earlier Essays.

Apologising for this long preface, the next Letter is from Applebee's Journal, December 30, 1721:—

"Sir,—I find you have given us two very pertinent Answers to the King-Killing Principles of the London Journal, and to their falling upon the Reverend Dr. Prideaux for censuring the Murderers of Julius Cæsar. Admit me, I entreat, to put in a Word or two upon that way of Writing, and of that known opinionated Writer, who would celebrate his Pen at this Time, by recommending the Murder of Princes, and the villainous Practice of Assassination, which Doctrine if it be receiv'd no Christian Prince can be safe, no, not in his Bed-chamber. It must be confess'd, that as this Writer is call'd a Whig, and a Commonwealth's Man, it is no great wonder that he is in favour of the King-Killing Doctrine; but that Herd of People had ordinarily more Policy than to profess openly the very Murdering Principle itself; they rather disguis'd themselves with a Mask of Moral Virtues, the better to conceal the hellish Liberty they took, and that they might put it in Practice with safety to themselves.

"But let us enquire into the knavish Disguise of their Writing in this London Journal, and you will find an evident contradiction between their Writings and their Designs; and, that what they aim at, and what they pretend, stand opposite to one another, as directly as the Evening and Morning, as Light and a Depravity of Light, which we call Darkness.

"They pretend to write against Rogues, but with the very Spirit of a Rogue; they justify the horrid Principle of Murdering Princes, and yet at the same time pretend to support the Authority of Princes.

"They write against Tyranny with a Spirit of Tyranny, condemning assum'd Power to Rule, and yet justify an assum'd Power to Kill and Destroy.

"They write against Persecution, with a Spirit of Persecution, for they tell us of the Superiority of Conscience; and yet, against all Conscience and Honour, prompt the World to commit Parricide and Murder, and to Assassinate their Rulers.

"They write against invading Liberty, and yet rob men of the liberty of professing just Principles, in opposition to Atheism, Deism, Free-Thinking, and Irreligion.

"They write with a pretence of Religion and Morality, and yet justify Self-Murder, the worst of all Immoralities, and inconsistent with the very essentials of Religion, namely, Resignation to the Will of Heaven.

"They write with a loud pretence of Obedience to lawful Princes, and yet give up the greatest Part of all Obedience, namely, the Obedience to the Laws of their Country.

"They plead for the Conduct of Brutus, Cassius, Cato, and Others, who, according to the brutal Notion of Liberty, took the Liberty to be their own Murderers; having said something very faintly to excuse them, bringing it in as a corroborating Evidence, that the People in these Christians Times do the same. Men in Fight defend a Town to the last Extremity, of Murthering Princes? Wherefore do they applaud the Murtherers? Wherefore do they justify the Assassination itself? And wherefore plead for the Liberty of doing such Actions, but to prepare the Minds of Men to relish the like Villainy, tho' it were to be practis'd upon the King, or upon any of his Ministers of State? Why the Justice of the Nation forbears to punish the Publishers of such dangerous Tenets as these, is best known to those who have the Power thereof in their Hands, and who best know when to strike: But it is the Duty, in the meantime, of every loyal subject to enter his Protestation against Murtherers, against Men claiming Liberty for a Cloak to Licentiousness, and against Men publishing murderous Principles; and therefore (as before) you cannot do your Country better Service than to shew your Detestation of those Things, and more especially of the wicked knot of Men concern'd in propagating them. It is evident what these Men aim at, and that they are carrying on a Conspiracy against the Monarchy, and against the Government of Great Britain; and albeit the Conspirators are known to be Men of base Characters, and of vile Principles, meriting the Contempt of all good People; yet as we see nothing is more catching than an evil Example, so, I think, therefore nothing calls for more speedy correction: In evil Examples it is observ'd, that, like the Plague, the highest and best Person, whether for Quality or Character, is capable of receiving Infection from the contagious Breath of the meanest Beggar. Evil Examples are Infectious in the most intense Degree of Infection; for they infect the mind, corrupt and poison the Principles; and they do it in these Ages of Vice with but too much Success; and the Conspirators in the case before us are not ignorant thereof, and are the more adventurous in spreading their evil Morals and evil Principles in this Part of the World.

"It is true that the Conspirators are known to be Persons whose Names are Infamous, being Men whose practice has long been to sow Divisions and Disaffection among the People in Civil Matters, and profane and blasphemous Principles in religious Matters: Nay the Conspiracy itself is form'd to represent us to ourselves as born free from the Government, either of God or the King, spinning their Notions of personal Independency, which they call Liberty, to so fine a length as to bring Men to claim a Liberty to rebel against their Maker, and to murder their Sovereign.

"To this End, the Conspirators represent the most execrable Murder of the gallantest Man who was at that Time in the World, and the boldest of all Assassinations, as a lawful Zeal arising from a Love of Liberty; and to support it the Conspirators run out into their old Republican Topicks of lawless Force, Tyranny, and the Abuse of Power, which Cæsar, they say, was guilty of: I shall finish my Letter with referring your Readers to the Judgment of our Saviour himself, concerning that very lawless Power of Julius Cæsar and the Conspirators; could they blush for themselves, they may see their bloody King-Killing Principles condemn'd, and Obedience recommended, even to that lawless Force, which, they say, may be opposed with Force.

"Render to Cæsar the Things which be Cæsar's, are the Words of our Blessed Lord, who order'd his Disciples to pay Tribute for him: Now it is manifest, that all the Cæsars, whether Augustus, Nero, or Tiberius, or any of them, exercis'd the same lawless Force as did Julius, and founded their Empire upon the Ruins of the Roman Liberty, as he did, and therefore might as lawfully be assassinated and murder'd; but notwithstanding all that, our Lord calls the Tribute Cæsar's Right, and, as such, causes it to be paid. Submitting in all things to the Government of those Tyrants, which these Conspirators say might lawfully be murder'd and assassinated by private Hands:

Let the Example of JESUS CHRIST, and, after him, of his Apostles and Servants, be opposed to the Tenets published by the Conspirators, and then let every indifferent Man judge whether they give us right Notions of Liberty, or whether they have not merited to be detested of all honest Men.

"Your Friend and Servant."

If we consider that when Defoe wrote these four Letters he had the responsibility of several other newspapers; and that in the latter part of the same year, and the beginning of 1722, there issued from his restless pen—within about four months—Moll Flanders, The History of the Plague, Religious Courtship, and Colonel Jague, we have strong proof that his loyal spirit was greatly excited by the treasonable doctrines against which he found time to write so much.

The same considerations will account for the repetitions, and evident want of time to correct his manuscript, particularly in the last Letter of the four.

Daniel Defoe was not a poet. In supposing himself so he was mistaken. He was fond of writing verse, and in that form his sentiments are invariably just, and clearly expressed. His lines are mostly rough, but often terse and forcible; and it has been well said that some of his poems constitute as fine doggerel as can be found in the English language. When his mind was much stirred upon political subjects his thoughts had a tendency to run into verse by way of climax; and, as the following is the only sonnet I know of his composition, I give it to your readers from the same newspaper as the last preceding letter:—

"Cæsar the Great, the Generous, the Brave,
Who conquer'd to set free, and fought to save;
Travers'd the World, subdued it by his Name,
And humbl'd Empires bow'd beneath his Fame.
No man beyond his Mercy could offend,
A clement Enemy, a faithful Friend:
But who can vile Ingratitude dispute?
He fell a Sacrifice to Brutal Brute,
From whom our King-Destroyers take their Name;
Brutal their Crime, and Brutish is their Fame.
CÆSAR and CHARLES, two martyr'd Heroes, live,
Their Fame shall time and History survive:
While Cato's cowardice his Glory stains,
And nothing but his want of Fame remains."

With this I conclude, for the present, my contributions from the hitherto unknown writings of Daniel Defoe, feeling that "N. & Q." has done him ample justice for the injury attempted against his character and memory in the London Review.

W. LEE.

EARL OF LEICESTER'S LIBRARY.

Is there any account to be found relative to the library of this celebrated man? Many years ago I saw at a book sale, at Edinburgh, a copy of Littleton's Tenures; evidently bound at the time of publication, with the Earl's device, the bear and ragged staff, stamped on the side. It had

PLUME'S LIFE OF BISHOP HACKET: NEW EDITION.

In looking over this edition of an old biographical favourite, which I am glad to see republished in a portable size, I notice the following points which may deserve the attention of the editor.

Page 8. "Could not presently tell what countryman Mr. L. was." I do not think the Mr. L. referred to was "Hamon L'Estrange" as queried in the note to this passage. The L'Estranges (extraneorum nobilis propago) and their birthplace were well known, and Hamon L'Estrange, though a learned man, was scarcely, I submit, a scholar in the exact sense intended. "The great Hebrician and chronologer, Mr. Lively" (see p. 13), is more likely to have been the person meant.

Page 122. "Lord Lyttelton thus describes Hacket." This is clearly a mistake. The passage is not applicable, as will easily be seen on reading it attentively, to Hacket. It is the character of Bishop Hough. See Lord Lyttelton's Works (edit. 1774, 4to.)

Page 111 —

"He condemned not other churches that allowed it otherwise (to marry again after divorce, the other living), but preferred our own caution before them, and for this he wanted not many more reasons than were wrote in a hasty letter to a gentleman, his neighbour, and published (without leave) after his death, together with his own answer, but it is no credit to conquer the dead, says the old proverb."

On this passage of Plume the editor has no note, nor does he afterwards mention where this production of Hacket is to be found in enumerating his work, nor has it been noticed elsewhere that I am aware of. The bishop's remarks will be met with in a little book, entitled —

"The Case of Divorce and Remarriage thereupon, discussed by a Rev. Prelate of the Church of England and a private Gentleman, occasioned by the late Act of Parliament for the Divorce of the Lord Rosse." Lond. 1673, 12mo. (155 pp. inclusive of title-page, and address to reader.)

The first part to p. 49 is written by the private gentleman (Sir Charles Wolseley.) Then follow "Animadversions upon the foregoing Discourse" from p. 51 to p. 73 by the Rev. Prelate (Bishop Hacket), and the "Answer to the Animadversions" (by Sir C. W.) extends from p. 75 to the end of the book. It is a curious and interesting volume.

Note at bottom of p. 219 :—

"Page 151. He (Bishop Hacket) did not write Christian Consolations." (See A. O. Fasti, i. 368.) This is too positively stated. Anthony Wood I know attributes this work to Robert Hacket, but he speaks of a portrait of him prefixed to the book. Now it contains nothing of the kind. My impression is that Anthony was mistaken, and that the Christian Consolations is by the bishop.

In the lists attached to other works printed for the same publishers it is distinctly styled "Bishop Hacket's Christian Consolations." In vol. i. of Eden's edition of Jeremy Taylor's Works (8vo, 1854), p. vii. the editor observes :—

"The Contemplations on the State of Man and the Christian Consolations are both omitted from the present edition of Taylor's Works. The second is from the pen of Bishop Hacket, as was suggested to the editor by the Rev. James Brogden, and is now proved beyond dispute."

Are we never to see a republication of Bishop Hacket's Sermons and Life of Williams? It is a real disgrace to the age that these two most delightful old folios have not been reprinted.

JAS. CROSSLEY.

LIEUT.-GEN. WALSH'S TABLET.—In the year 1761 a tablet was erected in Westminster Abbey to the memory of Lieut.-General George Walsh, who was buried in the Abbey. The following copy of the contract, and also of the Dean and Chapter's charge for the funeral, may interest some of our readers :—

"Erected by Mr. Thomas Stephens of the parish of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, and agreement made with Richard Wilson, Esq. of the Parish of St. James's, Westminster: the tablet to be statuary marble; the cornice to be veined do.; the 'Trophys of War' and Tablet to be of statuary marble. To carve a crest and blazon the arms, and to cut an inscription, and pay the Dean and Chapter 10*l.* 10*s.* The whole to be done for 55*l.*"

"Fees for the Funeral of Lieut.-General George Walsh, in the East Cloyster of Westminster Abbey.

	£	s.	d.
The Ground - - - -	-	5	18 0
The Chantor - - - -	-	0	5 0
Sacrista and Virgers - -	-	0	13 4
4 Bellringers - - - -	-	0	10 0
Clerk of the Works - - -	-	0	13 4
Mason - - - - -	-	0	5 0
6 Bearers - - - - -	-	0	15 0
Two porters - - - - -	-	0	7 6
Pall - - - - -	-	0	10 0
Leaden Coffin - - - - -	-	3	0 0
		12	17 2
Tolling the bell - - - -	-	0	6 8
		12	24 0

"October 29th, 1761.

"Recd. then of Mr Stephenson the full content of the above Bill by me.

"Sd John Merest Recd to the Dean and Chapter of Westminster."

General Walsh was Colonel of the 49th Foot; he was a younger son of Richard Walsh of Ardagh House, co. Louth, Esq., and of an ancient Anglo-Irish family. There is extant a fine portrait of him by Sir Joshua Reynolds.

One of his brothers, Joseph Walsh, was a "Lieutenant in the regiment lately commanded by Colonel Allnutt." He made his will Oct. 3, 1708; administration, Dec. 15, 1709. In it he says his death was "really occasioned by some."

MAJOR GEN. JOHN DOWNING is stated, in a petition by his sons Alexander, Robert, and Francis to Charles II., to have lost his life and estate in his Majesty's cause. Can any person tell me in what battle or siege he was killed, or give me any particulars respecting him? FITZ.

SIR GODFREY KNELLER.—In Easter Term, 1 James II., William Mountague of St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, Esq., Dorothy Danvers of Chichester, spinster, and Godfrey Kneller of Westdeane, in the county of Sussex, Gent., were charged with enticing Jane, the wife of John Lewkenor, Esq., of Westdeane, to elope from her husband, and to live with Mountague in adultery. The indictment or information, which is curious, is given in Tremaine's Placita Corona, 200. Was the Godfrey Kneller there named the famous painter?

S. Y. R.

LIEUT. F. C. LAIRD: GEORGE HOWARD.—The following works were published under the name of George Howard, Esq.: Lady Jane Grey and her Times, Lond., 8vo, 1822; Wolsey the Cardinal, and his Times, Lond., 8vo, 1824. The real author is said to have been the late F. C. Laird, Lieut. R.N. (Lowndes's Bibl. Man., ed. Bohn, 1127). I desire to know when he died, and what Christian names these initials represent.

S. Y. R.

MEYERS'S "LETTERS."—In Letters and Essays, by the late George Meyers, M.A., London, 1804, I have found some things which need references, and are sufficiently out of the way to induce me to ask for them. From a brief notice prefixed, it appears that the author was a young man from whom much was expected; but that his health failed, and he died at the age of twenty-seven. His friends thought what he had printed and left in manuscript worth collecting, in a volume of 228 pages.

"Widrington, who fought upon his stumps, was not to be compared with Cuniger, who held a ship by his teeth; Wall only ordered what Achilles did; and Pyrrhus is gravely recorded to have struck a mightier blow than ever was feigned of Ruggiero."—P. 116.

Cuniger? Wall? The blow?

"Mecenas advised Augustus to treat with the utmost severity all innovators in religion; not only that he might retain the favour of the gods whom he defended from insult, but because every change in religion tends to a change of laws, and produces plots and seditions which are likely to overthrow the monarchy."

From what history is this taken? J. M. R. Malvern.

JOHN RICE OF FURNIVAL'S INN.—Placita Corona, collected by Sir John Tremaine, Knight, Serjeant-at-Law, was published, Lond. fol. 1723. The work is stated on the title-page to have been digested and revised by the late Mr. John Rice of Furnival's Inn. Information respecting him is solicited.

S. Y. R.

SHERIFFS OF OXFORDSHIRE.—Who were sheriffs of Oxfordshire in the years 1642-5-7-8; 1655-7; 1659-65? The ordinary sources of information in the British Museum, Bodleian, and Sion College Libraries do not supply the names.

EDWARD MARSHALL.

PRINCE CHARLES EDWARD STUART.—Is there anything known of the portraits of Prince Charles Edward, which will identify one which I have as follows? There is a white rose in the bonnet, the tartan dress, with the orders of St. George and St. Andrew; half or three-quarters size, representing him as he would be about 1737.

EDW. MARSHALL.

SALMON AND APPRENTICES.—Your correspondent Mr. JOHN BOOTH, Jun., of Durham, has intimated (3rd S. vi. 13) that there are good grounds for questioning the superabundance of salmon in former times; and has indeed proved, that Severn, Wear, and Tweed salmon, were of considerable value in the fourteenth century. I take it, however, that the "salmon clause" of indentures is alleged of a much more recent period—and as another of your correspondents, MR. CUTHBERT BEDE, speaks (Medley, London, s. a. p. 78), apparently with more than a hearsay knowledge, of the existence of a stipulation in the indentures of Bridgnorth apprentices, "not more than half a century ago," limiting salmon dinners to "three times a-week"—I take the liberty of asking that gentleman to produce his proofs for the satisfaction of the many readers who are interested in the question.

A. CHALLSTETH.

1, Verulam Buildings, Gray's Inn.

TENNYSON'S POEM OF "THE CAPTAIN."—This poem appears for the first time in the recently-published selections from Tennyson (Moxon's Miniature Poets). Is it founded on any known historical incident, as the author seems to imply?

D. BLAIR.

Melbourne.

GARRISON ORDERS: ANDREW WILSON.—

"Edinburgh Castle, 16th August, 1822.

"The following Gentlemen Artists have been possessed of tickets of admission into the Castle, which they are to be permitted to retain at the gate for their future admission as suits their convenience—viz. Mr. David Wilkie, R.A.; Mr. Wm. Collins, R.A.; Mr. J. M. Turner, R.A.; Mr. Andrew Geddes, R.A.; Mr. Andrew Wilson.

"By Order of the Lt.-Governor.

(Signed) "J. S. LINDESEY.

"Brigade-Major.

"Act. Sert.-Major."

With reference to the foregoing copy of a document in the old order books in the castle, will any of your readers kindly say whether the last-mentioned gentleman was an R.A., and afford any information regarding him?

B. W. RAMSAY, Major.

Edinburgh.

"For with this is now concluded,
The historic legend told us
By Dionisius, the great Carthusian,
With Henricus Salteriensis,
Cesarius Heisterbachensis,
Matthew Paris, and Ranulphus,
Mombrius, Marolicus Siculus,
David Rothe, and the judicious
Primate over all Hibernia,
Bellarmio, Beda, Serpi
Friar Dymas, Jacob Sotin,
Messingham, and in conclusion
The belief and pious feeling
Which have everywhere maintained it."

Mr. Macarthy acknowledges that he was doubtful of some of the more obscure names, and taking into consideration that he was trammelled by the necessities of rhyme, he has certainly made an admirable translation. I may, however, be pardoned for throwing a ray of light on the darker points. I need scarcely observe that Ranulphus is an allusion to Higden's Polychronicon; Mombrius was the author of Della vita de Santi, and the "judicious Primate over all Hibernia" was Peter Lombard, author of De Regno Hibernie, Sanctorum Insula, Commentarius, who treats of St. Patrick's Purgatory in that work. Friar Dymas Serpi is a little known author on saintly subjects, and Jacob Sotin is better written in the original as Jacobo Solin, for if a comma had been placed between the two words, they would refer, as no doubt originally intended, to Jacobo, a Genoese dominican, who wrote a Vita de S. Patricio; and to the much better known author, Solinus, who particularly notices the Purgatory of St. Patrick in his curious work, Della cosa maravigliosa del Mondo.

As to the date of the Purgatorio we have pretty close evidence afforded by Hartzzenbuch, in his Cronologia de las Comedias de Don Pedro Calderon, published in Auribau's Biblioteca de Autores Españoles, who places the Purgatorio among some other dramas, Escritas antes de 23 de Noviembre de 1635, en que el maestro Jose de Valdivieso firmó la aprobacion del primer tomo de Calderon, donde se hallan impresas.

Henry, a Benedictine monk of the Abbey of Saltrey in Huntingdonshire, first broached the story of the Knight about the middle of the twelfth century. And Henry's legend was subsequently incorporated in that part of the history of Roger of Wendover which is generally, though erroneously, ascribed to Matthew of Paris. There are two English metrical MS. versions of Owaine, the Knight, one of which has been printed under the able editorship of the late Mr. Turnbull. There are three French MS. metrical versions of the same story in the British Museum, one of which, by Marie of France, the celebrated Anglo-Norman poetess, has been printed by M. Roquefort. See also Mr. Wright's valuable essay on St. Patrick's Purgatory, and The Legends of Purgatory, Hell, and Paradise current during the Middle Ages. There are also a series of papers on the "Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern History of St. Patrick's Purgatory," written by Mr. W. Pinkerton and published in the fourth and fifth volumes of the Ulster Journal of Archaeology. There is yet a more popularly-written paper on the same subject, published in that most valuable miscellany, Chambers's Book of Days (vol. i. p. 725). To these I would refer MR. DALTON for complete information, whence Calderon derived the sources of his drama.

See also the Dublin copy of the Annals of Ulster under the date A.D. 1407, where may be read as follows:—

"The Cave of St. Patrick's Purgatory in Lough Dearg was destroyed about the Festival of St. Patrick this year by the Guardian of Donegal, and by the representative of the Bishop in the Deanery of Lough Erne, by authority of the Pope, the people in general having understood from the History of the Knight and other old books, that this was not the Purgatory, which St. Patrick obtained from God, though the people in general were visiting it."

It was the inordinate rapacity and extortion of the clerical custodians of the Purgatory, particularly exhibited in the case of a Dutch mendicant friar, that induced Pope Alexander VI. to order the destruction of the place. The whole story of the Dutch friar, which is by no means unamusing, will be found in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists (March 17.) It is most difficult, however, to root out ancient superstitions. Long after the Purgatory had been condemned by the Pope, the Office of St. Patrick, containing the following lines, continued to be chaunted:—

"Hic est Doctor benevolus, Hibernicorum Apostolus,
Cui loca Purgatoria
Ostendit Dei Gratia."

Space will not permit me here to follow the history of St. Patrick's Purgatory further. It is still a place of pilgrimage, and seemingly a not unprofitable one to the parties concerned, the attendant priests paying no less than three hundred pounds per annum rent for the barren three roods of ground forming Station Island. This is amply repaid by charges for ferryage, masses, absolutions, &c.; the resort to the "Station" being so much a matter of traffic as to be advertised in a Belfast newspaper, in this present year of Grace, as follows:—

"LOUGH DERG.*

THE STATION, AS IT IS USUALLY called, of the celebrated Sanctuary of Lough Derg, to which the Holy Apostolic See has annexed the fullest Plenary Indulgence, will open this year, with the sanction of the Most Rev. Dr. Donnelly, Lord Bishop of Clogher, on the 1st day of June, and close on the 15th of August.

"The JUBILEE MONTH marked out by his Lordship for the ISLAND, will be that between the 15th July and the close of the Station.

"April 22, 1865.

3874."

[* The copy of this advertisement is a printed cutting from a newspaper.—ED.]

Possibly there are more things in Heaven and Earth, and in Purgatory, too, than are dreamt of in MR. DALTON'S philosophy. Carleton, in his Tales of the Irish Peasantry, describes a pilgrimage he made to the "celebrated Sanctuary," and the penances and penances inflicted on him there. The penances consist principally in crawling over rough series of stones, called "saints' beds," on the bare knees. I have seen those penances performed, and I have also seen the Hindoo penances, termed hook-swinging, practised in Bengal, about which our missionary societies write and say so much. But I must confess that the Irish penance is ten times more painful and degrading to the devotee than the Indian one.

EXPERTO CREDE.

The old legend of the origin of St. Patrick's Purgatory runs thus:—

"St. Patrick went into Ireland and preached: but the people would not amend their lives. Then he spoke thus to our dear Lord God: 'Show me here some miraculous token, by which I may bring this people to reformation and repentance.' Then was a place made known to him by God; and God said to him: 'Go in there, and make a circle with thy staff.' Which when he had made, the ground within it sunk down; and a voice said to him: 'Patrick, behold here a miracle: this is a severe punisher: whoever of his own accord goes in here, will never suffer any other punishment.' This he proclaimed to the people, and many went in: and some came out again, and some remained there. And those who came out, told where they had been, and afterwards fell sick, and died happily."—Passionnel, Lubeck, 1507.

This does not appear in any authenticated Life of St. Patrick; but it seems to have led to the commencement of the place called St. Patrick's Purgatory at Lough Derg in the eleventh century. The island on which it is placed is but an acre in size, and the Purgatory itself is a cave 16 feet long by 2½ broad. Though suppressed by the Pope, and demolished in 1497, this cave was afterwards restored. It is mentioned in a former article in "N. & Q." (1st S. viii. 178) that it was a second time suppressed by the Lords Justices of Ireland in 1633; but it was again resorted to as a place of pilgrimage, and continues to be so, in some degree, to the present day. F. C. H.

SECOND SIGHT.

(3rd S. viii. 65.)

Your correspondent, F. C. H., is evidently a man so amiable and worthy, so full of excellent lore, and so willing to communicate it, that none of your correspondents would desire to say anything that could possibly annoy him; but I must ask your permission to make one or two comments on his contribution in one of your late numbers under this title. And first as to "second sight." Do the facts stated constitute a case of second sight? By

"second sight," to use the words of Dr. Johnson, "things distant or future are perceived and seen as if they were present." Things "distant," that is things actually existing, but existing at a place distant from the pretended seer. In this case it does not appear that what the old shepherd stated that he saw, was the thing which actually existed. He thought he saw the priest, in his ordinary health, walking in a garden, and conning his breviary; instead of that being the case, the priest was lying ill a-bed and dying. It was clearly therefore not an instance of "second sight." What then was it? Returning home towards sunset about Michaelmas time, old John thought he saw, what he had probably seen on several previous occasions, the priest walking up and down in some sheltered shady alley in the garden, holding his book of offices before him. John's politeness would restrain him, under such circumstances, from over-curious or very particular observation, but that is what he thought he saw. It is clear from the state of things existing at the time that he could not have seen what he thought he saw. He was mistaken. Has nothing of the kind ever happened to any of us? Have we never mistaken a tree for a man; a bough shaken by the wind for a moving garment? If we have been thus mistaken, why not John? But the good writer of the paper in question never dreams of mistake. John "saw a priest"—of the facts there can be no doubt; the clergymen who were the writer's informants were incapable of deception. Grant it all. What more could the clergymen tell, than that John said he saw? They could not tell what he actually did see, or that he might not be mistaken in his assertions as to what he saw. John had not the least idea of the affair being anything supernatural. But your correspondent concludes it was so, and thinks that "perhaps" it was intended as a serious warning to him, and considers it "remarkable" that he died of an accident shortly after. Pray intreat your venerable correspondent to reconsider whether old John's idea of the affair was not the most rational. J. B.

This, in all parts of Ireland, is the well-known superstition (if I may be allowed the expression) of the Fetch, and which is the foundation of the sweetest and most touching poem in the English language, by Banim, in one of his exquisite novels. The Irish belief is, that when a person is about to expire, the ghost or spirit—if such can be so called, whilst the person is still in the flesh—of that person appears to some one at a distance from the place of residence of such person, and it would be physically impossible that he could be at the time. When I was a boy I saw a very remarkable case, which bears a strong resemblance to that quoted above. In 1820 end of the county of Wexford, adjoining Wicklow, a gentleman of veracity asserted that, one evening, just at dusk, he saw a neighbouring gentleman walking rapidly towards a church yard, which was about four miles from where he resided. The observer made haste to overtake his friend, but failed, as the other ran out of his sight in a moment. On his way home he called at the house of his neighbour, and found to his horror that the man had died a short time before, after a few hours' illness; but at the time of the alleged apparition, the man was alive, so that it was his fetch that had been seen. This story was credited by high and low in the district, and created a vast sensation for a long time, and is still remembered in the locality. S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

MEMOIRS CONCERNING THE AFFAIRS OF SCOTLAND, 1714.

(3rd S. viii. 64.)

Your correspondent, W. LEE, in his article upon this anonymous publication, remarks that, "In any case it will be admitted that the authorship of these Memoirs is now settled." This is a fact that none will dispute who are at all acquainted with Scottish history. Allow me to explain that in 1714 there appeared three, if not four, different editions of these memoirs, some of them said to have been "surreptitiously printed." However, one of them contained the following intimation:—

"The author's intention that these memoirs should not be published until after a considerable lapse of time was frustrated by his lending the manuscript to a particular friend, who (though under the strictest promise of secrecy) was so faithless and imprudent as to get it transcribed by a common mercenary scrivener at London, who in turn deceived his employer, and gave copies of it to others; and thus it was for the first time published in 1714."

The "third edition" contains "A Key" to the names of the characters mentioned therein, and "An Introduction, shewing the reason for publishing these memoirs at this juncture," which was afterwards discovered to have been written by Sir David Dalrymple, Advocate (afterwards Lord Hailes), one of the "Squadroni, or Scotch Whig party."

In 1817 there was edited and published by Anthony Aufrere of Hoveton, Norfolk, the brother-in-law of Charles Count Lockhart of Lee and Carnwath, a collection entitled The Lockhart Papers, in two volumes, 4to, consisting of a valuable and interesting series of documents pertaining to the history of Scotland from the year 1702 to 1745. In this work will be found reprinted the "Memoirs" with the author's name prefixed, "By George Lockhart, Esq., of Carnwath," and "An additional preface left for publication by the author, never before printed, in answer to the Introduction by Dalrymple. Now, after all this, I humbly conceive that the authorship of these memoirs will not be hereafter disputed.

T. G. S.

Edinburgh.

[MR. LEE, in his article above referred to, mentions that "an able writer under the signature of 'A Lover of Honour and Justice,' had replied in the London Review proving that Defoe was not the author of these Memoirs. In the controversy between that "writer" and the Reviewer, we think all the points stated above were elicited. However, we gladly insert this contribution in our own columns as a sequel confirmatory of what has already appeared therein. One slight correction is necessary: the third edition contains the Preface and Introduction (pp. xxx.), Memoirs, and an Appendix of eight leaves (pp. 420), and was "printed and sold by J. Baker, at the Plack Boy in Pater-Noster Row, 1714." The "Key to the Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland" is an entirely distinct publication of twenty-three pages, "Printed for J. Moor, in Cornhill, and sold by the Booksellers of London and Westminster, 1714. Price 6d." It may, therefore, be frequently included in any edition of the Memoirs.—Ed.]

HERBA BRITANNICA.

(3rd S. viii. 10.)

It has been well observed that the vague descriptions of ancient writers render the attempt to identify the animals and plants mentioned in their works, "a gigantic system of guess work." The Herba Britannica forms no exception to the rule. Pliny, in his 25th Book, describes it in these words:—"Folia habet oblonga nigra, radicem nigram;" and his account of its virtues are in much the same terms as those of the pseudo-Apuleius. He says that it was found in the neighbourhood of the camp established by Cæsar Germanicus near the mouth of the Ems, and proved efficacious in counteracting the injurious effects on the teeth and joints produced by the water used by the soldiers. Lipsius thought the name derived from the locality: the marshy tracts "haud procul Amisia flumine inter Lingam, Weddam, et Coërvordam," being to this day called by the inhabitants "Bretaniæ uligines, Bretanoche heyde." Heinrich Cannegieter, however, considers Lipsius unacquainted with circumstances indicated in the title of the following work:—"H. C. dissertatio de Brittenburgo, Matribus Brittiis, Britannica Herba, Brittiia Procopio memorata, Britannorumque antiquissimis per Galliam et Germaniam sedibus . . . Hagæ-Comitum, 1734, in 4to." In certain appended "notæ atque observationes ad Abr. Muntingii V. C. dissertationem historico-medica de vera antiquorum herba Britannica," Cannegieter also dissents from the identification of the plant given by Munting, the Dutch botanist, whose work with the above title was printed at Amsterdam in 1681, and again in 1698, 4to.

Munting considered it the Hydrolapas niger of ancient authors. This is a description of water-dock, possibly the grainless water-dock (Rumex aquatilis) with which it has been identified by the modern writers, Sprengel and Desfontaines. Fee thought it the Imula Britannica, a kind of elecampane. It has also been considered a description of scurvy-grass (Statice) and the Polygonum persicaria. In addition to the writers mentioned in this article, your correspondent should consult the works of Du Molin, Fraas, Billerbeck, Lenz, and Dierbach, among the French and Germans who may possibly have essayed the identification of this particular plant. I know of no English writers who have devoted their special attention to this by no means unimportant subject, but trust that the Professor of Rural Economy at Oxford will eventually extend his researches, and follow up his recently published Essay on the Trees and Shrubs of the Ancients, by one on their plants and flowers.

A. CHALLSTETH.

1, Verulam Buildings, Grey's Inn.

CUE.

(3rd S. vii. 317, 427.)

The note of A. A. on this word escaped me, and as the author refers to my note, it calls for a rejoinder. He writes thus:

"It is your cue. The phrase is clearly not confined to the entrance of an actor, for every separate speech has its cue."

He cites no authority for this assertion, and seems to rely on Peter Quince and his associates—whom our poet has been pleased to exhibit as no better than a nest of ninnies. Now, I cannot admit the evidence of such witnesses. I must appeal to certain accredited writers of the seventeenth century, and have made such a choice, that they may be fitly described as the glossarial representatives of the metropolis and the two universities:

1. "Antiloquy. A term which stage-players use, by them called their cue."—Henry COCKERAM, The English Dictionary. The 11th edition. LONDON, 1658. Sm. 8°.

2. "Q. A note of entrance for actors, because it is the first letter of quando = when, shewing when to enter and speak."—Charles BUTLER, M.A. The English Grammar. OXFORD, 1684. 4°.

3. "Antiloquy. The turn observed by stage-players in speaking their parts commonly called their cue."—John BULLOCKAR, M.D. etc. An English Expositour. The 4th edition. CAMBRIDGE, 1667. 12°.

I attach peculiar importance to the testimony of Butler. He was the contemporary of Shakespeare; and, as an academic, might be familiar with plays. Wood records him as "an ingenious man, and well skilled in various sorts of learning." His works are in much request. Ob. 1647.

Here it was my intention to withdraw, but a further examination of some early texts has led me to the conviction that the word cue, in its technical sense, was never used in the time of Shakespeare except by clowns—the handicraft actors in the most lamentable comedy of Pyramus and Thisbe.

In the Othello of 1623, as published by Mr. Lionel Booth (Tragedies, p. 312), we read, "Were it my cue to fight"; but in the quarto of 1622, as edited by Steevens in 1768, we read, "Were it my qu to fight."—In the Hamlet of 1623, as published by Mr. Booth, we read, "Had he the motive and the cue for passion" (Tragedies, p. 264); but in the Hamlet of 1611, as edited by Steevens, we read, "Had he the motive, and that for passion." In the Lear of 1623, as published by Mr. Booth, we read, "My cue is villainous melancholly" (Tragedies, p. 286); but in the Lear of 1608, as edited by Steevens, we read, "Mine is villainous melancholy." In the two latter cases, the Q or Qu must have been misread. The most explicit evidence could scarcely be more forcible.

BOLTON CORNEY.

WILLIAM MOLYNEUX'S MONUMENT.

(3rd S. vii. 417.)

William Molyneux was buried in the ancient church of St. Audoen, Dublin, in the vault of the Usher and Molyneux families, who, connected by marriages, were still more kindred by congenial pursuits and attainments. The monument was erected above this vault in the part of the church now roofless and fast passing on to ruin. The second Sir Capel Molyneux, Grand Nephew to Wm. Molyneux, visiting St. Audoen's a few years before his death, found the monument so dilapidated, and the epitaph so illegible, that he had it taken down and sent to a marble yard for repair. Illness and family afflictions visited the old gentleman soon after, and it is supposed the matter passed from his mind. At his death, in the same vault, the monument was noticed, and upon his death, Sir Capel's executor, upon enquiry, ascertained the monument had been sent; but from the proprietor, the property had passed through many hands, that the fate of the monument had remained a mystery. Had not an old cutter, hearing the story, come forward and working up a slab possibly there were the rubbish of the two or three ably bore port strange misadventure who revered the author of The Case of Ireland as family and country, should Hudson Lowe, vol. i. p. 245. Now the pretended arrival of Caraboo, and her presentation by Sir Hudson Lowe to Napoleon, are placed in the summer of the next year, 1817. But the whole account is overdone, inconsistent, and full of absurdities. Who could believe that any amanuensis in the State Paper Office would so far commit himself, as to forward a letter from Sir H. Lowe to a newspaper? Or who could imagine that shrewd governor likely to be imposed upon by Caraboo, or that Napoleon, of all men, would be fascinated by so sorry an impostor? F. C. H.

TRUNDLE BEDS (3rd S. viii. 85.)—These, though perhaps less common than formerly, are by no means obsolete in England. I have seen them in Norfolk, very much corresponding with the description of UNEDA. I have admired them as ingenious and useful contrivances, and recommended the adoption of them in poor families straitened for room in their chambers. They are rolled under the regular bedsteads in the day time; and so leave more space in the room, and greater facility for moving about and working.

F. C. H.

TOASTS (3rd S. viii. 74.)—"Breeks and Brochan (brose)," is, I am afraid, one of the many inaccuracies which slightly detract from the value of Dean Ramsay's delightful brochure. In the above form the meaning could only be something similar to the more modern toast "A clean shirt and a guinea," but it wants terseness and point. The correct version undoubtedly is, "Breeks and Breacan," i. e. Breeches and Plaids, Lowlands and Highlands. The following toast, which I have heard frequently given at cattle-show dinners in the Southern Highlands, does not, to my recollection, occur in the Dean's collection:—

"Green hills and waters blue, Grey plaids and tarry woo."

GEORGE VERE IRVING.

At an agricultural dinner:—

"May the labourer's thumb never touch bread."

Intelligible enough to any one who knows how Hodge deals with a two-inch stratum of pork, when he can get it. JOSEPH RIX, M.D.
St. Neots.

"GRÆCUM EST, NON LEGITUR" (3rd S. viii. 30.) The following anecdote will show, if not the origin of this saying, at least an occasion when it was popularly used. The story is taken from Vita et Martyrium Edmundi Campiani Martyris Angli e Societate Jesu, Auctore R. P. Paulo Bombino. Antverpiæ, 1618.

Campian was the first Jesuit who suffered death in England. In the year 1580 he was a prisoner in the Tower, awaiting his trial on the capital charge of being a Jesuit. Here he engaged in a public dispute on religion with Nowell, Day, and a large circle of ministers. One quoted a passage from the Greek Testament, and handed the book to Campian; who, after a glance, laid it aside. Convinced that their adversary had betrayed his ignorance, the ministers taunted him with "trium in nostram inscitiam proverbium: 'Græcum est, non legitur.'" At a later stage of the dispute, Campian was able to show that he had learned something of Greek; and that the slight attention he gave the volume was attributable, not to ignorance but familiarity. S. J. H.

MARKET HARBOROUGH (3rd S. vii. 441; viii. 59.)—In ancient documents and letters patent in my possession, relating to the united manors of Great Bowden and Market Harborough, and probably submitted to Mr. Nichols when writing their history, the name is spelt Herberbur', Harberbur', Haverberg, Haverbrowe, and Harborough.

Mr. Nichols proves the title of Harborough to Roman antiquity, but I am disinclined to adopt the conjecture of MR. J. C. HAHN.

An inspection of the early deeds and letters patent will be readily afforded to CLARICE.

H. M. VANE.

74, Eaton Place, S.W.

THOMAS DINELEY (3rd S. viii. 45.)—My satisfaction with MR. NICHOLS's interesting communication is mingled with regret that the Notitia Cambro-Britannica is for private circulation only. It is probable that some to whom, like myself, the work would be useful, will have no means of obtaining a copy.

The following remarks made fourteen years since, with reference to another work printed for private circulation, are apposite:—

"We had thought that the rage for exclusive printing had gone by, and that books produced at so large an expense as this work appears to have been, would no longer owe their principal value to such adventitious causes as have rendered even the most contemptible works objects of interest to those who prefer that which is scarce to that which is intrinsically good. This volume is of too much interest not to demand a much wider circulation."—Art Journal, 1851, p. 183.

I cannot forget that MR. NICHOLS has himself once offended in this kind. His Literary Remains of Edward VI. is a valuable and important work, which ought to have been made accessible to the public generally, for it is indispensable to the historical student. S. Y. R.

BEN JONSON (3rd S. viii. 27.)—A communication from your correspondent ERIC as above, states that he has reluctantly come to the conclusion that "Johnson" is the correct spelling of the poet's name; and that he has arrived at it from an inspection of a collection of The Masques, printed in 1617 and 1621, published in the author's lifetime, and some other works of his published after his death, in which the J appears.

Now we know that in those days orthography, especially of proper names, was not much attended to: and that a person often wrote his own name differently. But I have in my possession an edition of the poet's Works, published by himself in 1616, soon after his appointment as laureat, and which I believe is the first collected edition of his works.

In the title-page the name is without the h. In the six laudatory addresses to him by others, which immediately follow the title-page, the h is omitted from his name. In the dedications by the author himself, of his plays and poems, to Mr. Camden, The Inns of Court, The Court, Mr. Richard Martin, Lord Aubigny, The Universities, Sir Francis Stuart, Lady Wroth, and two to the Earl of Pembroke (ten altogether); the name representing his signature is also without the h.

These facts, coupled with the almost universal spelling of the name up to this day without the h, may induce ERIC to alter his opinion.

It may not be uninteresting to add, that to each of the plays is given a list of "The principal Comedians:" in two of which, namely, Every Man in his Humour and Sejanus, the name "Will Shakespeare" appears.

Exeter.

DRACO.

OBJECTIVE (3rd S. vii. 474; viii. 16.)—That what is termed the German idea of objectivity was known in England before the time of Coleridge, is clearly shown by a passage from Watts's Logick, quoted in Johnson's Dictionary under the word "OBJECTIVE":—

"Certainty, according to the schools, is distinguished into objective and subjective. Objective certainty is when the proposition is certainly true of itself: and subjective, when we are certain of the truth of it. The one is in things, the other in our minds."

The first edition of Watts's Logick appeared, I believe, in 1725.

MELETES.

JOHNSONIANA: "SOLUTION OF CONTINUITY" (3rd S. vii. 6, 42.)—The expression, "solution of continuity," is found in The Questyonary of Cyrurgyens, translated from the French by Robert Copland, and printed in 1541:—

"The solucyons of continuyte be more dangerous in the lyver than in the mylt."—Sig. I. iij. recto.

It was a recognised English phrase in Bacon's time, and is used by him in his third Essay.

W. ALDIS WRIGHT.

Cambridge.

COUTANCES (3rd S. vii. 494; viii. 19, 37.)—There is no doubt that the islands of Guernsey and Jersey were formerly under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Coutances. But the passage quoted from Fuller does not show how or when they were annexed to the Bishopric of Winchester. Can any of your correspondents supply the deficiency? Upon these points the histories referred to by Mr. WALCOTT do not give any satisfactory information.

MELETES.

KAR, KER, COK (3rd S. vii. 336; viii. 55.)—The origin of this root is traced under the word Tzar, in "N. & Q." (1st S. viii. 226); and I am inclined to think correctly, as I have not seen it controverted.

T. J. BUCKTON.

"EXTREMES MEET" (3rd S. viii. 21, 76.)—Does not the following passage in Euripides contain an exactly synonymous expression to this short but pithy proverb, with one illustration out of many in the moral world, of extremes meeting? Hecuba, v. 846, where the Chorus give utterance to these sentiments:—

δεινόν γε, θνητοῖς ὡς ἅπαντα συμπίπτει, καὶ τὰς ἀναγκὰς οἱ νόμοι διόρισαν,
φίλους τιθέντες τοὺς τε πολεμιστάτους,
ἐχθροὺς τε τοὺς πρὶν εὐμενεῖς ποιούμενοι.

A. H. K. C. L.

THE OLD MAIDS' SONG (3rd S. viii. 68.)—I have been haunted for years with the tune and such scraps of this notable ballad as I can recollect. subjoin them, and should be as much pleased as your correspondent if any of your readers could supply the missing lines. I believe those which have written down are correct as far as the go:—

"Threescore and ten of us, poor old maidens!

Threescore and ten of us, poor old maidens!

Threescore and ten of us,

Without a penny in our purse,

Lame and blind, and what is worse,

Poor old maidens!

"We are of the Danish crew, poor old maidens!

We are of the Danish crew, poor old maidens!

We are of the Danish crew,

We are old and ugly too,

Dressed in yellow, pink, and blue,

Poor old maidens!

"We petitioned George the Third, poor old maidens!

We petitioned George the Third, poor old maidens!

We petitioned George the Third,

Our petition it was heard,

was preferred,

Poor old maidens!

"George the Third said we must rest, poor old maidens!

George the Third said we must rest, poor old maidens!

George the Third said we must rest,

Every thing was for the best,

Poor old maidens!

"We are of a willing mind, poor old maidens!

We are of a willing mind, poor old maidens!

We are of a willing mind,

Would young men but be so kind

As to help the lame and blind,

Poor old maidens!"

The tune is a most doleful one; and the song, when given out with due regard to the sentiment, and with perfect gravity, is absolutely irresistible, convulsing the audience with laughter. I suppose that the allusion to the "Danish crew" means, that these unfortunate single ladies had red hair.

A. T.

A correspondent, who happily, is "NOT ONE OF THE OLD MAIDS," has favoured us with a different version of this mournful overture:—

"Threescore and ten of us,
Poor old maids!
Threescore and ten us,
Without a penny in our purse,
Something must be done for us,
Poor old maids.
"We'll petition George the Third,
Poor old maids;
We'll petition George the Third,
And our petition shall be heard;
Each must have a mate prepared,
Poor old maids.
"We all on crutches came,
Poor old maids;
We all on crutches came,
For some were blind and all were lame,
Hoping soon to change our name,
Poor old maids.
"George the Third unto them said,
Poor old maids—
George the Third unto them said—
'You've got a maggot in your head,'
And much he wished we all were dead,
Poor old maids.
"And when we turned to come away,
Poor old maids;
And when we turned to come away,
'Tis said that some were heard to say
They wished that they had stayed away,
Poor old maids."

Truth obliges me to say that the last two words altered from the original, as I used to hear when I was a child. It is thought those now are better suited to the propriety of the sting "Old Maids of Leamington."

CUDDY (3rd S. vii. 53.)—The similarity may be traced between this and the Hindustani word for ass, guddha. W. T. M.

"PEREANT QUI ANTE NOS" (3rd S. vii. 141; i. 77.)—Though I am not prepared to say where above phrase occurs in the works of St. Augustine, or whether he wrote them at all, they cannot from the writings of either of the Saints Donatus, honoured by the Catholic church, as neither those holy bishops is known to have left anytings, if we except a Rule for Nuns, drawn up St. Donatus of Besançon. F. C. H.

BENE CŒPISSE EST DIMIDIUM FACTI" (3rd S. 148; viii. 77.)—W. T. M. writes from Hong-kong to inform MR. MACKENZIE, who is in doubt, that this maxim was "penned" by Horace "four hundred years before Ausonius." This is true, probably not in the sense intended by your respondent. The proverb, in its Greek form, καὶ ἡμισυ πάντος, is used by Plato and by Aristotle (Morals, bk. i.; Politics, bk. v.); is quoted by Plutarch from Sophocles; by Suidas from one Marinus; and by Lucian is attributed to Hesiod. Thus we step back thrice "four hundred years before Ausonius." (See Erasmus.)

A. CHALLSTETH.

1, Verulam Buildings, Gray's Inn.

Lucian twice gives this proverb in substance, in his "Dream, or Life," as Ἀρχὴ δὲ τοῖς ἡμῖν πάντος, and again, in nearly the same words, in "Hermotimus," where he shows his belief in its then very ancient Greek origin, by ascribing it to Hesiod. His correctness, however, in thus ascribing it is questioned in an elaborate note upon the former instance of his use of the proverb (Hemsterhuis and Gesner's Lucian, p. 5, edit. 1743, Amsterd.). The note, however, seems to overlook the circumstance that the probability might be perhaps greater that Hesiod had in fact given this proverb, but in some work of his, in Lucian's time extant, since lost, than that Lucian should have misquoted some other proverb in Hesiod, or else mistaken it for this one. At all events, the note referred to seems, from its references, to establish a very respectable Greek antiquity for the proverb. Among others quoted, Polybius, who lived before Horace, and upwards of two thousand years ago, speaks of it as used by the ancients, οἱ μὲν γὰρ ἀρχαῖοι τὴν ἀρχὴν ἡμῖν τοῦ πάντος εἶναι φάσκοντες.

J. KYNASTON EDWARDS.

SIR SAMUEL CLARKE (3rd S. viii. 28, 60.)—I have examined his will in the Prerogative Court without obtaining the information required, and from further researches I am doubtful if he is the Sir Samuel Clarke wanted, as I find that about 1675 the marriage with a daughter of Sir Samuel Clarke that I am endeavouring to trace took place, therefore it could not have been one of the family of Sir Samuel Clarke knighted in 1712. Can any one assist me in ascertaining what other merchant of this name resided in London in 1675. He was what was formerly termed a Turkey merchant. GEORGE PRIDEAUX.

Lusan House, Highbury New Park.

KILPECK (3rd S. vii. 476; viii. 39.)—I am obliged to MR. ALLEN for the information he has been so kind as to give in answer to my inquiry about Kilpeck. But when he speaks of the Pye family as having possessed the castle from the time of Henry I., I presume he only means that the Pyes were lineally descended from the original owners. If so descended, it must have been through a female line, and I would therefore like to inquire what was the alliance that first brought the property into the Pye family. P. S.

ST. AUGUSTINE'S MONSTERS (3rd S. viii. 99) This is an old story, palmed off in certain old books, such as Cronicarum, Nurembergæ, 1493, where I have seen not only the pretended descriptions, but the same illustrated with the most extraordinary cuts. What St. Augustine has really said is as follows:

"Quaritur etiam utrum ex filiis Noë, vel potius ex illo uno homine, unde etiam ipsi extiterunt, propagata esse credendum sit quedam monstrosa hominum genera, quæ gentium narrat historia: sicut perhibentur quidam unum habere oculum in fronte media, &c."

The saint goes on to describe a variety of monsters, and then prudently concludes as follows:—

"Quapropter ut istam questionem pedetentim cauteque concludam: aut illa, quæ talia de quibusdam gentibus scripta sunt, omnino nulla sunt, aut si sunt, homines non sunt: aut ex Adam sunt, si homines sunt." (S. AUG. de Civitate Dei, l. xvi. cap. 8.)

Thus, instead of St. Augustine's affirming that he had seen these cyclopes, he merely relates what fabulous histories had reported of them in his time, and is very far from considering such accounts credible. F. C. H.

QUOTATIONS WANTED (3rd S. viii. 88.)—There is no reason to suppose the line to be a quotation. It is merely a jingling bell inscription in the usual style, of which very many examples could be easily quoted. But what does it mean? As given in "N. & Q." it runs thus:—

"Misteris sacris repleat nos Dea Johannis."

The only difficulty is about the penultimate word. I suspect that it has not been copied correctly, and recommend a revision. It has very often been my fortune to recover a right reading, by a similar recommendation, in bell and other inscriptions. But if Dea be the real letters, they may be contracted for Decantata, and thus the meaning of the line may be this:—

"May the praises of St. John fill us with holy mysteries" (or graces).

F. C. H.

"Que vobis mentes," etc. (3rd S. viii. 40), is from Ennius, and quoted in Cicero, De Senectute, ii, § 16.

P. J. F. GANTILLON.

ANONYMOUS HYMNS (3rd S. vii. 438, 487; viii. 8, 77.)—In answer to the inquiries of C. P. L. and R. L., allow me to add to the information already given by ST. SWITHIN the following notes:—

No. 4. of C. P. L.'s list is a translation of "Ex quo salus mortalium," in the Parisian Breviary.

No. 5 is altered from a hymn by G. H. S. in the Penny Post, vol. vi. No. 3.

No. 9 is not, I think, a translation of "Agnoscat omne seculum," as stated by ST. SWITHIN, but of "Exultat cor præcordiis," in the Sarum Breviary. The English words are by J. D. Chambers.

Of those respecting which R. L. inquires, No. 114 of the "Ancient and Modern" Collection is a translation of a Latin hymn beginning "Finita jam sunt prælia," and 132, of "Ave, colenda Trinitas," in the Anglo-Saxon Hymnarius.

Of those the authorship of which KATINKA is desirous of knowing, No. 17 is by Faber, 53 by the Venerable Bede, 139 by Lyte, and 151 is altered by Logan from Dr. Watts. D. Y.

The communication of your usually well-informed correspondent G., Edinburgh, is only another evidence of how hard it is to kill a long-lived lie. He assigns the hymn—

"Where high the heavenly temple stands," to the Rev. John Logan; but since 1837, when Dr. Mackelvie issued his edition of the Poems of Michael Bruce, "with a Life of the Author from original sources," the appropriation by Logan of Bruce's MSS. has been held established; while in the edition of the Works of Bruce recently published by the Rev. A. B. Grosart of Kinross (Olliphant & Co., Edinburgh), the whole controversy has been re-argued and fresh evidence adduced of Bruce, not Logan, having been the author of the "Ode to the Cuckoo," and of the above and other eleven hymns. Let G. and all interested in a touching story, consult Mr. Grosart's beautiful volume. The evidence against Logan seems to us, in common with former correspondents of "N. & Q." overwhelming and incontrovertible.

SCOTTS.

Surely the Easter Hymn must be less known in America than here, or your correspondent UNEDA could scarcely have confused it with the entirely different (and I suspect more modern) hymn, "Christ the Lord is risen to-day." The authorship of the Easter Hymn appears to remain unknown.

While on this subject, allow me to add a "note" on the subject of the "Christmas Hymn." What is the Christmas Hymn? Call upon the "waits" in the southern counties of England to sing "the Christmas Hymn," and they will at once strike up—

"Hark! the herald angels sing, Glory to the new-born King."

Make the same request in Lancashire or Yorkshire, and the unhesitating response will be—

"Christians, awake, salute the happy morn, Whereon the Saviour of the world was born."

I should be glad to know if there be any Christmas Hymn among the American Episcopalians, and what it is. Perhaps UNEDA could kindly gratify my curiosity on this point.

HERMENTRUDE.

TOWN CLERKS (3rd S. vii. 130, 191.)—The use of the surname only appears to be adopted by some foreigners. I believe that professors of German Universities occasionally use it. Thirteen years ago I observed its use in the United States Custom House of San Francisco, California.

J. M'C. B.

Hobart Town.

SURNAMES (3rd S. iv. 122; v. 443.)—Much information upon the origin of names will be found in the History of the Names of Men, Nations, and Places in their Connection with the Progress of Civilisation, from the French of Eusebius Salverte, by Rev. L. H. Mordacque, M.A., Oxon, London, 1864. 2 vols. 8vo. Also, in Mark Antony Lower's Essay on Surnames; in the History of Christian Names by Miss Yonge, 2 vols. 8vo, London, 1863, and in a similar work by Miss Sewell, (?) 1864. J. M'C. B.

Hobart Town.

DERWENTWATER FAMILY (3rd S. v. 402.)—About the year 1846, two brothers, or father and son, named Radclyffe, earned a poor, though honest livelihood, at "Whirlpool Reach," on the river Tamar between Launceston and George Town, Tasmania (then Van Diemen's Land), who were said to be the lineal male representatives of the Derwentwater family.

At the time that it was proposed to restore the "forfeited titles 1715 and 1745," these people were urged to return to England and prosecute their claims, but want of means deterred them.

J. M'C. B.

Hobart Town.

SYDNEY POSTAGE STAMPS (3rd S. iv. 384; v. 184.)—The first postage stamps issued in Australia were 1d., 2d. and 3d., bearing the representation of the Great Seal of the Colony of New South Wales. The penny stamp was affixed to newspapers, and was issued in January, 1850, and is much sought after by collectors. Subsequent stamp issues did not bear the same design. An engraving of the seal (as well as those of other colonies), will be found in plate 2 of the History of the Colonies of the British Empire, by Robert Montgomery Martin, ed. London, 1843, large 8vo. The seals are granted with the Charter of the Supreme Court, and are affixed to all grants of land. They are held by the Colonial (Chief) Secretary. See 4 George IV. chap. 96, passed 19 July, 1823. J. M'C. B.

Hobart Town.

GUILDFORD FAMILY (3rd S. vi. 455, 543.)—The Camden Society publications contain vol. li. Pylgrimage of Sir Richard Guyldeford to the Holy Land, A.D. 1506, ed. by Sir H. Ellis in 1851, in which is a pedigree of that family brought down to a late date, which may afford some information.

J. M'C. B.

Hobart Town.

CONYGGARTH (3rd S. viii. 48, 78.)—Coneygarth is another word for rabbit-warren, more usually written Coneygore, and -gore I take to be a corruption of garth (an inclosure.) In an Extent of the manor of Crowhurst, co. Sussex, taken 8 Edw. I., I find "et cunnygora valet p. ann. xxv.s." (Gale's Regist. Honor of Richmond, App. p. 44.)

And thus Gale in "Observations on the Appendix" (p. 257): "Connygora, Anglica, a Connygree vel Conny-warren, cuniculorum vivarium."

It is often an isolated and intrenched hill, property that would be almost useless for other purposes, as at Portbury, county Somerset. The term seems to be confined to the south of England.

A. S. ELLIS.

Brompton.

LYON, LORD GLAMIS AND EARLS OF STRATHMORE (3rd S. viii. 48.)—If your correspondent H. could get access to the recently compiled history of the Lyons of Glamis and their estates (2 vols. MS., in the library at Glamis Castle, Forfarshire, based on the family charters), I think he would find all he inquires after.

A. J.

[Our correspondent H. may also consult a work entitled Glamis, its History and Antiquities, published by A. & C. Black, Edinburgh. The author of this work had access to the MS. in the library at Glamis Castle.—ED.]

EXPLANATIONS WANTED (3rd S. viii. 9.)—HERMENTRUDE is welcome to the following elucidations of her puzzling items of mediæval accounts:—

Armilausa is in Ducange as an article of dress, but not of female dress, as this seems to have been with its embroidery of harebells.

Barehides. Halliwell's Glossary and authorities there cited, a kind of covering for carts; lect' may be for lecticâ, a litter, not for lecto, a bed.

Four cloths of gold, or gilt? bawdekyn d'outremer. May not this last word be the true reading of doncrem?

Amarlat', probably one of the many forms of the Low Latin word corresponding to the English enamelled.

Ad calathio being false Latin, is probably a misreading.

Duas pelves æneas, two brazen basins, and one brazen chafer (chauffour).

Et pro duobus paribus lynthiaminum, and for two pairs of sheets. The spelling of lintheamina is not uncommon. The c and t in the older handwriting are sometimes impossible to be distinguished from each other without an independent knowledge of the word intended.

Marpie, when extended, will be Marperie; so probably, through false spelling or misreading, for Maperie, napery. Mappa and nappa seem interchangeable. See Ducange, 175 ells of canvas.

Eighteen pairs of bracers (armour for the arms) of leather (cuir-bouilli).

One Male-saddle (for luggage or mails). See Halliwell under "Male-pillion."

Two pack-saddles, saddles for burdens (somes), or for sumpters (bêtes de somme).

Pro poudre should be pro ponder', for the weighing. What the articles of silver gilt, entitled scissage may be, I cannot say.

For the mending of my Lady's cup (ciphi not ciphre?).

And for the ruling of one skin of parchment (pgamen' not ptanem?) for noting music upon.

A "trussable collar" must be a travelling chest. See Halliwell, Trussingbed. C. S. P.

NEWTONS OF WHITBY (2nd S. xii. 237, 352, 444; 3rd S. i. 17, 97.)—The gamekeeper of Sir Hugh Cholmley, Lord of the Manor of Whitby, seized a greyhound belonging to Isaac Newton, gent., commonly called Captain Newton, and took it to Whitby Abbey, where it was hanged. The captain thereupon affixed to Whitby bridge a writing in the following terms:—

"He that sent for Captain Newton's Greyhound to Whitby Abbey, and since caused him to be hanged, is a base cowardly Rascal, and was not worthy of the Honour to be Topman to such a Dog. Whitby Men, beware of these People, who one Day may have no more Esteem for you than they now have for Dogs; you are advised by your assured Friend

"ISAAC NEWTON."

An information for a libel on Sir Hugh Cholmley was exhibited against Captain Newton in the Court of King's Bench, 1 James II. This is printed in Tremaine's Placita Corona, 69. The result of the proceeding is not there stated.

C. H. & THOMPSON COOPER.

Cambridge.

"LA CLOMIRA DI G. MAGAGNATI" (3rd S. viii. 48.)—The new edition of Brunet's Manuel, &c., contains the following notice respecting Magagnati and his works:—

"MAGAGNATI (Girolamo), Capitoli Burleschi; aggrontati il giardiniero di Cesare Orsini. In Norimbergh, per Joseph Stamphier, 1642, in 12.

"Ce poëte était marchand de comestibles et paraît avoir eu une certaine célébrité. Ses lettres à Galilée ont été en partie imprimées.

"L'édition citée est rare, et un exemplaire rel. mar. citr. par Bedford a été vendu 7 liv. Libri, en 1859. Il est vrai qu'il était réuni à un opuscule non moins rare, et ayant également la rubrique de Norimbergh, 1642, sur son titre que le Catal. Libri, 1859, No. 1439, rapporte ainsi:—

"BOARDILLO (Nicola), La Mercede, Stanze in lodi della stanza della real villa di Madrid al molto illust. sig. Barbato Boccaccio da Dentone.

"On a du même G. Magagnati, La Vita di S. Longino aurifere carolee Mantovane, descritta in Verso Scioto (Scioto), Vinegia, 1665, pet. in-4, et aussi, La Chimera feroce pastorale, Vinegia, Pinelli, 1613, in -8, avec une gravure à chaque acte."

J. MACRAY.

Oxford.

POST MORTEM INQUISITIONS (3rd S. viii. 68.)—I fear HERMENEUDE has no alternative but to consult the Inquisitions themselves. In Cooper's Public Records, i. 338, is this note:—

"Mr. Hunter (in his South Yorkshire, preface, vol. iii.) observes that the Commissioners of Public Records committed a fatal error by ordering that Calendars should be printed, and not that concise Abstracts of the Inquisitions themselves should be prepared for the press. The most curious and important information in every Inquisition, he alleges, is thus entirely withheld from the public, namely, the names and ages of the heirs."

Another note follows this, p. 339, alluding to a proposition of Sir Harris Nicolas for supplying this deficiency, as far at least as regards information respecting the heirs, by a work to be called Hereditum Calendarium, containing their names and ages. This, however, although a most important one, would yet be but a partial remedy for the defects of the present Calendars, the findings in the Inquisitions giving, it appears, very varied information, and nothing short of the "Concise Abstracts," spoken of by Mr. Hunter, would fully meet the requirements of the case.

J. KYNASTON EDWARDS.

LORD ASTON OF FORFAR (3rd S. viii. 98.)—In a book published about thirty years since, professing to advocate the claims of a person named Alexander, who claimed the title of Earl of Stirling, it was stated that the then Lord Aston had been appointed by that designation a justice of the peace for Worcestershire, though his claim, like that of the claimant to the Earldom of Stirling, had been rejected at the election of the Scotch peers to parliament.

I know Standon, Herts, well, where the Astons formerly held the property which descended to them from the Sadliers. (See Chancery.) The story of the title descending on a man cook, and afterwards on a watchmaker, was current in my youth.

J. H. I.

WILLIAM ITCHENER, D.D. (3rd S. vii. 450.)—He was rector of Christian Malford from 1705 to 1730, when the living was vacated by his death.

Notices to Correspondents.

We are compelled to postpone our usual Notes on Books.

E. SANKOM is requested to say where a letter will reach him.

T. W. BAZZAN, M.D. The practice of licensing Lay-Precursors in English Churches has been discussed in "N. & Q." 1st S. vi. 284; 2d S. vii. 314, 334; 3d S. i. 132, 212. Consult also Nelson's Rights of the Clergy, p. 47, edit. 1879.

G. EDINBURGH. Demetrius' Remarks upon Cato, a Tragedy, was published as a pamphlet in 1713, 4to.

CHARLES CROSS. The earliest edition we have been able to trace of New History of England by Question and Answer is the third, published in 1736. This edition is in English and French.

H. F. H. SELL on Walden. The anonymous Life of Benn Nash, two 1782, is the one to which.

SEAKOKE. The Bells of Ouseley is a corruption of the Bells of Ouseley, a book famous for its bells. It was here that Great Tom originated passed its infancy.

R. ISLES. There are no dramatic pieces in Hulbert's Wisdom, and other Poems, 1818, or in Spenser's Plagues of Egypt, &c., 1831. The only translations from the Greek, Latin, Italian, and French, in H. H. Hulbert, is in the book.

ZERA. The New Monthly Magazine commenced January, 1814. A complete list of its contents is published in January, 1831.

QUERNEY has published three articles on the Symbol of the Sower in our 2nd S. ix. 102, 229, 230.

W. D. His article on the authorship of "Dies Irae" appeared in our 1st S. x. ii. 311, and 1879.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d., or free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 6d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STRAIGHT COPIES for Six Months commences direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) at 12s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order payable to the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. BARR, 21, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all Communications for the Editor should be addressed.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 12, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 189.

NOTES:—The Assassination of the Duke of Buckingham; with some New Facts from Contemporary Sources, 121—The Law Manuscripts, 122—John Weeks, 123—Shakespeareans: Shakespeare's Birth-place, Museum, and Library at Stratford-upon-Avon—The Prices of the Shakespeare Quartos—Shakespeare Family—"Blanket of the Dark"—"Hamlet"—Passage in "Othello," 124—The Old Danish, or Old Northern Tongue, 126—Mortmain—Scenting of Books—Curious Names—Odd Fellows—Inn Sign, 127.

QUERIES:—Bathurst Family—"Booke in Meeter of Robin Conscience"—Paul Branchaletti—Carthaginian Galleys—Colours of Flowers—Croaking Soles—Eskelby in Yorkshire—Heraldic—Irish Funeral Customs—"The Ocean Cavern"—St. Michael's, Crooked Lane—Silver Cup—Sphinx Stellatarum—Thackeray's Song—"Theatre d'Amour"—Voltaire—White of Fittleford, Dorset, 127.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Dakin Family Motto—"Acta Domini Johannis Pastolfe"—"As Thick as Inkle-Weavers"—Bonaparte in London—Cheshire and Lancashire—"The Centaur not Fabulous"—Tresham, the Gunpowder Conspirator—Deuce, 130.

REPLIES:—Men of Kent and Kentish Men, 131—Charterbury of Whalley Abbey, 132—Duchesse d'Abrantes, 133—Nursery Rhyme, ib.—Chasseurs, 134—Red Facings, ib.—Kemble's "Ode on the American War"—Household Tales—Enigma—Second Sight—Written Rocks—Dodd Family—Cure and Prevention of Toothache—Boteler of Wemme—Cuban Use of Spanish Words—Phaer's "Æneid of Virgil"—Origin of the Name Thoday—"Trois Saints de Glace"—The Term "Pretty"—"Echo and Silence"—Plymouth—Dragon in Heraldry—"Pereant qui ante nos," &c.—Curious Epitaph, &c., 135.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

THE ASSASSINATION OF THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM; WITH SOME NEW FACTS FROM CONTEMPORARY SOURCES.

Relating in his Life of Sir John Eliot, the dramatic incidents attending the assassination of the Duke of Buckingham—and the description is a master-piece of graphic colouring and effect—Mr. Forster observes, in allusion to the research which distinguishes his account:—

"On the day preceding Felton's attack, there had been a mutiny among the seamen at Portsmouth, of which the stir had not yet subsided. For a remarkable notice of this mutiny, and of the part taken by the duke therein, see Rous's Diary (Camden Society, 1856), p. 27. The only other notice I have found of it is in an unpublished letter of Nethersole's respecting the murder, in which he says: 'At Portsmouth, the day before, a sailor was certainly killed in a kind of mutiny there; some say by a servant of the duke, others by his own hand.'"

Another notice would have been found by Mr. Forster in Sir Anthony Weldon's Court of King Charles I., published by Sir Walter, then Mr. Scott, in his Secret History of the Court of James I. (p. 44. vol. ii.); and the quotation is valuable as adding another to the many instances which under-research has discovered of the substantial truth and accuracy of this vigorous old chronicler, whom, with some superficial writers on the time, it is the fashion, and a most unjust one, to vilify and deprecate.

The account which Rous's Diary gives from a letter of the captain of the guard, to whose custody Felton was committed after killing the duke, is very vivid and life-like:—

"The day before the duke was killed, being the 22nd of August, a sailor that had affronted him a seventhnight before was by a martial court condemned to die; after which, he being carried to our prison by myself with our whole guard, the sailors in great multitude drew together with cudgels and stones, and essayed with great fury to take him from us, insomuch that there fell out a great mutiny amongst us, so that I was enforced to let fly our muskets, though not with intent to kill (because I had no order), but we received blows with stones and cudgels, and had much to do to keep our prisoner. But the captains of the fleet came up to us and drew upon the sailors with great fury, and banged and slashed them dangerously, by which time the duke himself, with a great company on horseback, came fresh upon them too; where there were 200 swords drawn, and where the duke behaved himself very nobly and bravely, and drove all the sailors on the port point, and made them all fly on ship-board, wherein many were dangerously hurt, and two killed outright. He retired within the town again, and himself in person saw the first mutineer carried with a guard to the gibbet, where he was hanged by the hands of another mutinous sailor, who himself was saved for that good office. The other had not died if they had not mutinied, for the duchess had begged his life."

Ill paid, cozened into enterprises abhorrent to all the feelings of the time, and disgraced by his ignorance, obstinacy, and incapacity as British sailors had never been disgraced before, Buckingham's ruthless severity to his revolted followers is characteristic of the despotic temper that pervaded his career, and his gratuitous brutality in personally superintending the execution of the man who had merely "affronted him," and who could have had no part in the subsequent outbreak, confirms the account which Weldon gives of his remorseless nature, even to the last, and the all-pervading hate which attended him throughout England:—

"He did so stink in the nostrils of God and man, that God made one Felton his instrument to take such a monster (as he was indeed), from his longer domineering amongst men, by a blow as fearful as strange, after which he had not time to say Lord have mercy on him, a just judgment on him that forsook God to seek to the devil by witches and sorcerers in his life, one whereof was Doctor Lamb (who was his great defensive preserver as he thought him), whose fate it was to be brained by a shoemaker's last when he least looked for it; the other was stabbed the next morning after that night he had caused a fellow to be hanged (not suffering him to have that night's respite after his sentence and offence, whatever it was, to repent him of his sins), with this vow that he would neither eat nor drink until he saw him die. God in requital of his merciless cruelty would neither suffer him to eat nor drink before he died by that dismal stroke of a poor tenpenny knife of the said Felton's setting home."

In his account of the expedition to the Isle of Rhé and Rochelle, Mr. Forster has exposed and commented with deserved severity on the hollow and hypocritical nature of Buckingham's pi sympathy with, and his treacherous betrayal of, the Huguenots. But what is to be thought of the morality of the frigid and outwardly decorous Charles who, with the full consciousness that Buckingham's licentious conduct in each kingdom had made his name a byword of equal infamy at Whitehall, in Paris, and at Madrid, selected him as the chosen champion of the Protestantism of England, and sent him forth as the representative of his own and his people's religious sympathy with the suffering professors of the reformed faith?—the duke, as he knew, for it was a public scandal, unblushingly proclaiming his adulterous passion for the Queen of France as his main object in the expedition, and publicly exhibiting her portrait in his cabin, surrounded with all the emblems accorded to the Virgin in the worship of the Church of Rome. "In spite of all the power and weight of France," said the haughty and audacious favourite at a banquet at Whitehall, alluding to the threat that his re-appearance at Paris would expose him to the dangers of assassination, "I will see her fair Queen again." And he acted with all the extravagance expressed in the boast.

"In his galley was exhibited a yellow and black banner, the colours of Anne of Austria, and her cipher was everywhere displayed with equal ostentation. The chief cabin was dedicated to her charms; it was draped with yellow silk damask; at one end il y avait une espèce d'autel, containing a life-size portrait of the Queen, shrouded by superb curtains of cloth of gold, before which golden candelabra were placed, holding lighted tapers of white wax."—Tullemant des Reaux, Vie de Richelieu, quoted by Miss Freer in her Married Life of Anne of Austria.

The charitable suggestion that a long course of unbridled power, and not less unbridled profligacy, had produced insanity in Buckingham, as his sudden affluence and elevation had engendered madness in his brother, Purbeck, is the only solution that can be offered in explanation of this almost incredible profanity and grossness. "The tardy hand of heavenly retribution" was but unworthily represented in the individual vengeance of Felton, but there can be little doubt—considering his manifold treasons against her fame and welfare—that had Buckingham evaded or survived the attack of his assassin, the long-defied justice of England would, at no distant period, have consigned him to the executioner, as it eventually did his royal patron and accomplice, the faithless and despotic Charles.

"The avenging Fates creep on with feet of wax,
But strike with iron hands to punish men."

C. R. H.

THE LAW MANUSCRIPTS

In some of the previous numbers of "N. & Q." I had occasion to make several communications relative to the celebrated Manuscripts of John Law, in which I endeavoured, contrary to the fashionable modern practice of genealogical embellishment, to place his origin on something like a solid foundation. I have since been unable to carry the family from which he sprang further back than the individual, whose "business account" indicated his calling. But let it always be remembered that in his time trade was not in the Lowlands looked upon with that degree of contempt with which in more modern times it has been regarded, and that younger branches of good families often betook themselves to commercial traffic.

Recently I found in my library a singular catalogue, printed in the year 1724 at Edinburgh, 12mo, "of curious and valuable manuscripts" contained "in 101 volumes folio," which appeared from the title-page to have been the property of Mr. James Law of Bogie, and had been formed by "an express warrant and commission" of James VI. and his son Charles I. "for clearing the superiorities and revenues of the principality of Scotland."

This gentleman is described as "grandfather to John Law of Netherurd." On the title there is the following interesting statement:—

"In carrying on these laborious and expensive collections, the said Mr. James Law did contract great debts upon his own estate, by paying of servants, and by posting five several times to court, and staying there sometimes a whole year on his own charges expecting to be reimbursed and rewarded by his majesty, of which he had been frequently assured; but by reason of the difficulties of the times, and that king's misfortunes, was disappointed."

The volumes were to be sold by auction on July 16, 1724, in the West End of the Royal Exchange, Edinburgh: and were exposed to public view every Tuesday and Thursday, from June 1 to the time of auction, from 3 o'clock in the afternoon to 5.

The sale was advertised in the Caledonian Mercury of June 8, 1724; but nothing has been traced further, and the fate of the MSS. is a mystery. The first article was a volume containing "Charters in the Reigns of the Kings Alexander, William the Lyon, James II., and others."

The second is apparently the original confirmation of "King Malcolm and Margaret his spouse to the Abbey of Dunfermling of the lands therein contained. As also a confirmation of two infeftments granted to the Abbey of Haddington, together with the Gift of Q. Ada, fundatrix of the said monastery."

The way in which the catalogue, consisting of eight leaves, was recovered is curious. James Anderson, the editor of the Diplomata Scotie, had the management prior to his final departure for England of the affairs of Heriot's Hospital. By reason of this he had his place of business there, where he also superintended the affairs of the Duke and Duchess of Argyle, Sir Alexander Murray of Stanhope, Campbell of Calder or Caw-dor, and other equally excellent clients. From his well known attachment to antiquities, he received from all quarters catalogues of book sales both in England and Scotland, copies of papers, original charters—and less valuable then, but now equally precious—funeral elegies, verses of all kinds, &c. &c.

These were all left in his office when he took his departure for London to attempt a satisfactory arrangement of his claim against government. He died there of a broken heart, and his magnum opus did not come before the world till after his death. The place where he kept his papers in the hospital continued to remain intact until some five-and-thirty years ago, when it happened that the accidental visit of one of the under-librarians of the Faculty of Advocates, led to the discovery of this miscellaneous and interesting collection of odds and ends. Dr. Irvine had his attention immediately called to the fact, and without delay application was successfully made to the governors of the hospital, and the Anderson Papers were transferred to the Faculty Library, where, so far as worth preserving, they were put in order and bound. Amongst other curious articles was the Catalogue of Law's MSS. in a perfect state, and one imperfect which Dr. Irvine gave me, and which I completed in MS. These copies are, I suspect, the only ones in existence.

That so large a collection should entirely disappear is singular enough. Some of your readers may nevertheless be able to throw light on the subject. There was an estate called Bogie in Fifeshire which came into the possession of the family of Wemyss, one of whom was created a baronet of Nova Scotia. The title, which was to heirs male whatsoever, still exists, but the lands have gone elsewhere.

It might be conjectured that the Financier's more remote ancestry might have been in this line, for as the Laird of Bogie embarrassed himself in forming the collections exposed to sale in 1724, it is by no means improbable that the junior branches of his family betook themselves to mercantile pursuits.

Nisbet derives the descent of the Laws of Bogie from Law of Lawbridge, in Galloway. He states that Bogness, the original name, was in the sheriffdom of Elgin. Possibly this might be so, and the Laws may have had no connection with the Fifeshire Bogie; but it is odd enough that at one period they were located in the south, and at another in the north, and that latterly the representative should have set himself down in Peebleshire as the Laird of Netherurd, an estate well known by that name at present.

All these speculations are of little moment, the principal thing being to find out the resting place of the manuscripts, if in existence. Anderson was much patronised by the two first Earls of Oxford, and bought curious books both in print and manuscript for these accomplished noblemen. He also used to cater in a similar way for Lord Hay (Earl of Kinnoull), who formed a valuable library, which perhaps still exists. It is likely enough that he would communicate the intended sale to one or both of these peers. The first Earl of Oxford died in May, 1724, before the sale was advertised; but his son and his son-in-law (Kinnoull) continued collecting.

Can these MSS. form any part of the Harleian collection now in the British Museum? J. M.

JOHN WEEKS.

Over the entrance to the cloisters against the west wall of the south transept of Bristol Cathedral, is a marble tablet bearing a medallion portrait of this gentleman, who was the well known landlord of the Bush Hotel in this city towards the close of the last century. Beneath the portrait is the following inscription:—

"Sacred to the memory of Mr. John Weeks late of this city, who departed this life on the xviii. day of June in the year of our Lord mdcclxix. aged lxxiv. years. He was justly esteem'd for his Loyalty to his King, his Patriotism for his Country, and his Generosity to the Poor."

The situation of "The Bush" was opposite the Exchange until a few years ago, when it was transformed into offices, shops, &c. It still retains its ancient name of the "Bush" Chambers, and when a tavern under the management of Mr. Weeks, it was as much celebrated for the abundance of good cheer provided for its visitors, as the landlord was for the liberal and patriotic spirit with which he catered for the public. He succeeded Chatterton's friend, Matthew Mease (whose sister he married) as "mine host" of the "Bush," and it was in an office on the first floor of this building that the poet himself passed a portion of his apprenticeship; indeed, until his indentures were cancelled, and he proceeded to London.

Mr. Weeks had learned, as a corporal in the Bristol Volunteer Cavalry, to observe the strictest punctuality in his business, and visitors to the hotel were sure to have every attention paid to their wants by their obliging landlord. Of this there is upon record the following memorable instance. When Lord Rodney returned to England after his great triumph over the French fleet on April 12, 1782, he landed at Bristol, and proceeded to "the Bush," to refresh himself before pursuing his journey to London. On calling for his bill, he was told "There is nothing to pay—nothing for Lord Rodney to pay." Wishing to proceed at once to Bath, his lordship, stepping into a carriage, requested to be driven to that city with all the expedition possible. To this, the person who rode the leading horse, pulling out his watch, replied, "As your lordship said to the Gov-error of Eustatia," (alluding to the time allowed for capitulation) "in an hour—in an hour, my lord." He reached Bath within the time specified, well pleased with the punctuality of the leader of the team, who had so expeditiously conveyed him to that city. On turning to compliment that functionary on his attention to his visitor, his lordship recognised in him none other than the patriotic landlord of "the Bush." * GEORGE PRYCE.

City Library, Bristol.

Shakspeariana.

SHAKESPEARE'S BIRTH-PLACE, MUSEUM, AND LIBRARY AT STRATFORD-UPON-AVON. — Having recently visited Shakespeare's birth-place to see what had been done by the care and enthusiasm of his tercentary admirers for the purpose of bringing together, in one most appropriate abiding-place, whatever could be collected in illustration of the poet's life and works, it was most gratifying and delightful to find so rich an assemblage of objects connected with the memory of the immortal dramatist. A Brief Guide to the Shakespeare Museum and Library was just published when I was there (July 12), "with notices of some of the chief objects of Shaksperian interest in the locality." The articles in the museum are described in this Guide, but there is no list of the books in the library, an omission which should be rectified in a new edition, more particularly as "Shaksperian books," it is stated in the Guide, "will be thankfully received for the use of the museum." But how can it be widely and at once known what books to send when there is no catalogue in general circulation of those already in possession? As visitors to Shakespeare's birth-place are drawn to it from all countries, and to every spot around it, this little Guide will prove a welcome companion to a locality now become more attractive than ever. J. MACRAY.

Oxford.

THE PRICES OF THE SHAKSPEARE QUARTOS. — The unexampled prices which have been recently obtained for copies of the early quarto editions of the plays of Shakspeare, and for some other plays of extreme rarity, must excite the curiosity of the public to ascertain what was the cost of such pieces at the time of publication. I shall therefore expose the small amount of my information on that point with the hope of receiving some additions to it.

In 1650 William Leake, of the Crown in Fleet-street, advertised The merchant of Venice, Othello, and seven other plays, without the prices; and in 1651 Humphrey Moseley, the publisher of many important works, advertised the first folio of Beaumont and Fletcher, and more than thirty separate plays, without the prices. In 1672 William Crook, of the Green Dragon without Temple-Bar, advertised Vittoria Corombona, or the white devil, quarto, price 1s., and Loves Kingdom, octavo, price 1s. So much for printed prices.

* We regret not being able to find space for the glorious "Bill of Fare," provided by the spirited host of "The Bush," at the joyous season of Christmas.—Ed.

I must now have recourse to a manuscript authority. A copy of A trick to catch the old-one, a comedy by Thomas Middleton, printed in 1606, has been entrusted to me by a friend of histrionic note. It contains two title-pages, and on each I observe, "Johna Webbe, præliu. 44." The writing is very minute: the first specimen in secretary-hand, and the second in lettres pattées. The latter specimen exactly corresponds with that set forth by John de Beau Chesne and John Baildon in 1570. I am confident the autographs are genuine; believe them to have been written at the time; and can testify that the volume which contains the play has been for many years in private hands.

BOLTON CORNER.

SHAKESPEAR FAMILY (3rd S. vii. 498.) — Mr. Louch, of the firm of Reed, Louch, & Co., the present proprietors of the Rope Factory, Love Lane, Shadwell, has kindly favoured me with the following information, which I forward to you, hoping it may prove useful.

About thirty years since, the head of their house was Mr. Shakespear Reed, and the firm was styled Shakespear Reed & Co., Shakespear being Mr. Reed's Christian name, and not standing for another person, as T. C. N. has made it appear. Mr. Shakespear Reed died about 1835. He was the son of a Mr. Reed, a well-known dramatic author, but in no way connected with the poet's family.

A Mr. Shakespear, about fifty years ago carried on a rope manufactory in Love Lane, Shadwell, on a portion of the ground included in Messrs. Reed, Louch & Co.'s present more extended premises. Mr. Shakespear's residence was at or near Leytonstone.

Mr. W. Hytton Dyer Longstaff, of Newcastle, would most likely be able to give Lieut.-Col. J. D. Shakespear some useful information, as he (Mr. Louch) has reason to believe that he is well acquainted with the pedigree of the Shakespear family on account of some connection between Mr. Longstaff's family and that of the great poet. W. S. J.

The following entries respecting the family of a Thomas Shakspeare, innkeeper, are copied from the Parish Register of St. Mary Magdalene, Oxford. The volume from which they are taken commences in the year 1602, and is the earliest now remaining in the parish chest. In the days of Ant. A. Wood, the register for some thirty or forty years previous was in existence, as he has preserved, in one of his MSS. [D. 5.] some extracts of marriages from 1574; baptisms from 1579; and burials from 1574 (with one entry of 1565), adding the following memorandum:—"Note that this register, which is in paper, and much decayed, I transcribed into Dutch paper, and bound it up at mine owne charge, and gave it to the parish, 1667." Unfortunately, neither the decayed original, nor the fair transcript, are now to be found among the parochial archives. The rolls of churchwardens' accounts commence (with an incomplete series) at the year 1561; a few extracts from some accounts of the Reformation period, which are now lost, are printed in Peshall's History of Oxford. For those of your readers who are curious in Christian and surnames, I may mention that a butcher, yclept "Adventuris Shirt," is twice commemorated in the register, while a boy was lately living in the parish who answers to the unique Christian name of Date:—

"Thomas Shaxspere, the sonne of Thomas Shaxspere, was baptized the xixth day of August, 1628.

Marie, the daughter of Thomas Shaxspere, was baptized the xvth daye of Aprill, 1630.

Elizabeth, the daughter of Thomas Shaxspere, was baptized the xxixth of June, 1632.

Robert, the sone of Thomas Shaxspere, inkeper, was baptized Sept. the 24th, 1634.

Thomas Shaxspere, the sonne of Tho. Shaxspere, was buried the viith of Januarie, 1630.

Robert, the sone of Thomas Shaxspere, buried November the iijth, 1642.

Thomas Shaxspere, inkeper, buried No. the xth, 1642.

Ellinor Shaxspere was buried May the second, 1643."

W.D. MACRAY, Curate of St. Mary Magdalene, Oxford.

I extract the following paragraph from an able and amusing paper entitled "Life at the Workhouse," in The Birmingham Daily Gazette, July 24, 1865:—

"In leaving this wing of the building we passed through an old men's sick ward. An old fellow was calling loudly on 'Shakspere!' He meant no invocation of the immortal bard. His exclamation will be intelligible when it is known that a 'mute, inglorious' Shakspere is employed as a pauper-nurse at the workhouse."

The workhouse herein referred to is that of Birmingham. A Shakespearean student in this building is thus described:—

"Going into one of the rooms, we were accosted by a young man, who informed us that he was a very clever reciter, and begged that we would honour him by listening to him. We assented, and he forthwith struck an attitude, and with a tragical air began:—

"Man's life's a tragedy, from his mother's womb, Wherefrom he enters the attiring room;
The country in which he lives, the theatre and the stage.
To be, or not to be, that's the question:
Oh that a man should put an enemy in his mouth
To steal away his brains.

Thus, like the gentle rain from heaven,
Conscience makes cowards of us all.
Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The cricks and corns of flesh, and hair, too,
Or to take harms against our sea of troubles,
And, by proposing, hend them.
For in that sleep what dreams may come.
Must give us purse, with proud man's contumny.
Oh that we served God, as we serve kings:
When He himself a shy at us might take
With his bare bodkins!'

"Thus he went on, jumbling quotations together and making nonsense of the lines."

CUTHBERT BEDE.

"BLANKET OF THE DARK" (3rd S. vii. 52).—Had Shakespeare written either blankness or blankest, the subtle verbalists of the day would, I think, have laughed him out of retaining for the extreme of blackness a word derived from blanco, white. But I do not think that Shakespeare's own verbal subtlety would have allowed him to write either of these phrases. For my own part I cannot dissociate blanket from peep for any word yet proposed, and the word pell and the line—

"Pall thee in the dunnest smoke of hell" appear to me to have led up to the expression—

"Peep through the blanket of the dark."

Just now also, while cutting the leaves of "N. & Q.," and reading Mr. Jessopp's suggestion, a suggestion and query occurred to me which may be worth inquiring about. I have almost forgotten a book I saw but casually, but accompanying a religious poem or poems, founded, I think, on texts from the Song of Solomon, were emblematic pictures, doubtless most piously intended and accepted, but to our age pitifully ludicrous, and but for the text, blasphemous.*

In one the Deity is a potter at a potter's wheel fashioning the bust of a man; in another, illustrating chap. iii. v. 1 of the song, a figure risen from bed is seeking with a candle, while our Saviour (known by a glory) is lying hidden on the ground by the side of the bed, like a child playing at hide-and-seek. Others are as ludicrous, but one, illustrating some such text as, "My beloved had withdrawn himself, I sought him but could not find him" (chap. v. 6), is perhaps the most absurd of all. In it the human figure is on one side of a dividing curtain, and the Deity on the other as behind an arras; nor could I resist the idea that He was about to look through. The date of the book, a well-printed one, was 17—something, but the crude ideas involved in the engravings seemed to me much older; and what I would inquire is, whether any engraving or emblem is known which might have suggested Shakespeare's phrase? At all events, such engravings prove that such materialistic similes did not appear to our forefathers in the same ludicrous light that they do to us.

* The book above-named is "Pia Desideria; or, Divine Addresses. Written in Latine by Herm Hugo. Englished by Edm. Arwaker, M.A. Printed for Henry Bonwicke, at the Red Lion in St. Paul's Churchyard, 1702." It is the "Third Edition corrected" and illustrated with 47 copper-plates.

BENJ. EASY.

"HAMLET" (3rd S. vi. 410.)—It can hardly, I think, be doubted by any diligent reader of Shakespeare, and of the literature of his day, that the reading of A. E. B. in "N. & Q." 1st S. v. 210, is the true one:—

"Astres [star-meteors] with trains of fire and dews of blood;

Disastres [quasi dis-astres, dis-stars, something different from stars, that is blotches or spots] in the sun."

When, in Antony and Cleopatra, Shakespeare wrote—"To be called into a large sphere and not to be seen to move in't, are the holes where eyes should be which pitifully disaster the cheeks" (ii. 7)—he purposely chose disaster that the word-mongering fashion of the day might admire that happiness of choice which implied not merely to disfigure or do damage to, but to dis-astre, take the lustre or light out of the cheeks. If the reader will call up Gloster's face, or even look at a skull, he will at once understand all that Shakespeare meant to convey.

It is to be wished that some one would undertake the labour of piling instance upon instance (there are enough to put an Ossa on Pelion) until even the most running reader of our old literature should see two things—first, that it was the fashionable mania of Shakespeare's day to make the language more literate and more obscure to the profane vulgar by coining words and altering etymologies and meanings, even if the etymologies were like mollis aer=mulier. And, secondly, that the iteration of the same word in the same or in different senses, or of similar sounds, or the contrast of contrast words were among the most fashionable tricks of speaking. Even that acute critic Sidney Walker has collected (Criticisms on Shakespeare, vol. ii. art. xliii.) a host of passages where the repetitions are pronounced to be wrong, though the mere number of the instances show them to be mere mannerisms, not printers' errors. When—"To seek thy help by beneficial help" is allowed to be Shakespearian, then many a weary line will cease from being troubled.

BENJ. EASY.

PASSAGE IN "OTHELLO," Act I. Sc. 1 (3rd S. viii. 80.)—No, do not alter Shakespeare, and make him more obscure when unnecessary. I have never had a doubt about his meaning in this passage, which really seems clear enough. Iago wishes to show that Cassio's weakness goes beyond even that of a woman,—“A fellow” of so soft a character, that a similar disposition would be “almost damned in a fair wife.” In fine, Cassio is so weak a creature, that had you a fair wife of that sort, you would condemn her. The very lines that follow shows Iago's intent in assimilating Cassio to a female:—

“Nor the division of a battle knows
More than a spinster.”

A

Your second correspondent on this passage is undoubtedly right in his emendation, but not, I think, in insisting on unity of idea. The strife is not that of the battle-field, but of the election:—

“... But he, sir, had the election;
And I... must be be-lee'd and calm'd
By debtor and creditor, this counter-caster;
He, in good time, must his lieutenant be,
And I (God bless the mark!) his Moorship's ancient.”

Thus we have intelligible continuity:—

“And what was he? Forsooth...
A fellow [who would have been] almost damn'd
In a fair strife.”

BIBLIOTHECAR. CHEETHAM.

THE OLD DANISH, OR OLD NORTHERN TONGUE.

The language spoken in the most ancient times in, and by him on his arrival (seventy years before Christ) in the North of Europe, was spread not only over Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, but over Northern Germany (Saxland), and over a part of England and Scotland. With the colonists from these countries it was also transplanted to Iceland, where the flourishing historic literature of the north was formed and developed. This language was called in all the northern lands, from the earliest ages down to the close of the thirteenth century, “the Donish tongue” (Donsk tunga), the appellation being derived from the river Don, in the vicinity of the Black Sea, from the borders of which river the Scandinavian tribes most probably came. It even bore the same appellation in Normandy; and Saxo Grammaticus, the famous Danish historian of the twelfth century, calls them “Vaeringer” in the life-guard of the Emperor of Constantinople, a body which was also strengthened by English free-lances, “Donish speaking men” (Homines vocis Donice.) The name “Donish tongue” (Donsk tunga) is thus carried back to the immigration of the Aser, the name of Odin's followers, into the north. A vast multitude of passages in the old Northern or Icelandic writings testifies to the wide-spreading of this language, and of this its usual appellation. Such ones occur in the Icelandic law-books, Gragas of 1118, A.D., and Jonsbok of 1280, A.D. No one in Iceland could be empannelled in a jury unless he had spoken “Donish” from his infancy, or had at least been three years in the country.

The Icelandic priest, Eystein Argreinson (earlier a Norwegian friar), who, in 1360, wrote his famous poem Lilja (the lily) says therein:—

"The men of old, who understood the ancient and wise teachings of the pagan books, praised their great chieftains and dauntless sea kings in songs curiously composed in 'the Donish tongue' (Donsk tunga); much more than any of them am I bound to repay to the Almighty King of the firmament his grace towards me by singing from my heart a poem with loving words in the same speech, my mother tongue."

It is this tongue (Donsk tunga) in which are written the Runic inscriptions, and the literature written and still preserved in Iceland. At a later period this language or tongue was called "Nor-roent mal," i. e. the Northern speech; the word "norroent" signifying the north wind, and the word "mal" signifying speech. But instead of this we now employ the expression "Old Northern tongue," whereby we are reminded of the use of this tongue over the whole north, and whereby even the English nation gets its fair and due share in the northern language, and the invaluable literary performances therein produced.

PAUL C. SINDING.

Denmark.

MORTMAIN.—The following curious note deserves a niche in the pages of "N. & Q." Nicholas Clenardus wrote to the Abbot of Tonguloën:—

"I hear in Brabant and another the dominions of the Emperor without Spain, that it is impossible to have serfs, for they at once became freedmen, even against the lord's will."

Albero, Bishop of Liège, brother of Godfrey, Duke of Louvain, abolished within his diocese the service of mortmain. For of old, as the Chronicle of Liège states, when a husbandman died, his right hand was cut off and offered to his lord, to signify that his service was past. Albero utterly abolished this redemption within his own lands. (Molanus, lib. iii. c. xxxv.)

MACKENZIE E. C. WALCOTT, B.D., F.S.A.

SCENTING OF BOOKS.—The following extract from a description of Queen Elizabeth's Progresses points to a curious custom in bookbinding which prevailed during some part of the sixteenth century:—

"After one or two removes, she reached Audley End on the 26th of July, where, by arrangement, a deputation from the University of Cambridge waited on her. They had previously announced to Lord Burghley, their chancellor, their desire of doing so, wishing to hold a deputation before her, and to present her with a book; to which he assented, but added, 'that they must have regard that the book had no savour of spyke, which commonly bookbinders did seek to add to make their books savour well; for that her Majesty could not abide such a strong scent.'"

Did her Majesty's dislike to "such strong scents" put the custom wholly out of fashion?

GEORGE VICKERS.

Hartest, Suffolk.

CURIOUS NAMES.—Amongst the curious coincidences of names, or names and trades given in "N. & Q.," I have not noticed the following:—A few years since a Mr. Lemon was an orange merchant, I think in Thames Street; and Latimer & Ridley were in partnership as boot and shoemakers, in Bishopsgate Street, but they have recently removed into Leadenhall Street.

J. RICHARDSON.

ODD FELLOWS.—According to John Charles Hall, M.D., Grand Master of the Sheffield Provincial Grand Lodge of the Nottingham Imperial United Order of Odd Fellows, the body thus derived its name:—

"Fifty years ago it was so uncommon a thing for a working man to be provident, and look after his wife and children, and provide for a rainy day, that those sensible men who formed the Society probably called themselves 'Odd' Fellows to distinguish themselves from the common run who were not so provident."—Vide Odd Fellowship, a Lecture, p. 85.

• ST. SWITHIN.

INN SIGN.—The following is a copy of a poetical invitation on the sign of "The Beehive," an old inn at Abingdon, kept by William Honey:—

"Within this Hive we're all alive,
Good Liquor makes us funny;
If you are dry, step in and try
The flavour of our Honey."

ANAX.

Queries.

BATHURST FAMILY.*—1. George Bathurst of Howthorp, co. Northampton, married Eliz. Villiers, and died, 1656, having had thirteen sons—viz. George, Edward, John, James, Ralph, Henry, Henry, Lancelot, Thomas, Samuel, Moses, Joseph, and Benjamin. Six of these brothers are said to have been killed in the service of Charles I. in the Civil War. I can account for all but the following, whom I conclude to have been these six. Can any one tell me when or where they were killed (or died), where they are buried, or give me any information about them? Their names were George, James, Lancelot, Thomas, Samuel, and Joseph.

2. Of the above brothers, (1) John, a barrister, died 1656. (Query, was he ever married, and date of his birth?); (2) Henry died infant (when?); (3) Henry, Attorney-General of Munster, and Recorder of Cork. Query, ever married, and dates of birth and death.

3. Villiers Bathurst, Judge Advocate of the Navy, temp. Charles II., and Queen Anne.

* See also 3^d S. VIII. 67.

the above Samuel. Who was his mother, and when was he born? Was he ever married?

4. Sir Francis Bathurst, fifth bart. of Lechlade, co. Gloucester, emigrated to Georgia with General Oglethorpe, and died about 1738. Sir Lawrence, sixth bart., resided in Georgia. Can any one give me any information respecting him or any of his descendants?

5. Captain Walter Bathurst, Royal Navy, killed at Navarino. Who was he?

6. Lancelot Bathurst of Franks, co. Kent. Had he any brothers or sisters? HENRY BATHURST.

8, West Cliff, St. Laurence,
Isle of Thanet.

"BOOKE IN MEETER OF ROBIN CONSCIENCE."

This is reprinted from the copy in the Bodleian in Mr. Halliwell's Contributions to Early English Literature, 1849, 4to. There is a second copy in the collection of the Duke of Devonshire, or, more properly speaking, a fragment of one; it is of a different and older impression than the copy at Oxford. But the latter is defective in two places, at the commencement and in the middle: the title-page, however, being there. The Devonshire fragment supplies what is deficient in the other to the extent of the second lacuna about the middle of the poem, some half-dozen stanzas; but the beginning, which would be contained on the leaf following the title, is still a desideratum. Now, it is my intention to include this remarkable composition in the third volume of Remains of the Early Popular Poetry of England, of which a first instalment was published last summer but one, and if any of your correspondents could help me to the yet missing portion of the poem, he would render no inconsiderable service to me, and so, in a way, to literature.

W. CAREW HAZLITT.

Addison Road, Kensington.

PAUL BRANCHALETTI.—In Beckmann's History of Inventions, Discoveries, and Origins translated by William Johnston into English, there is an account of "Secret Poison," and in it is as follows:—

"It was remarked at Rome, by accident, that lemon juice and the seed of lemons are, in some measure, counterpoisons; and a physician named Paul Branchaletti, respecting whom I can find no information, wrote a book expressly on this antidote to these poisons."

I have referred to several Biographical Cyclopædias on the subject, but have found out nothing concerning this man. I should therefore feel exceedingly glad if you could give me some information concerning him. THOMAS F. DYER.

CARTHAGINIAN GALLEYS.—Can any one inform me as to the manner in which the Carthaginian galleys were managed? They are described as having six or more banks of oars; but as the oars of each bank must have been increased six or seven feet, to allow it to pass the one beneath, the length would become too great to allow a man of ordinary height to row it.

MARCHMONT.

COLOURS OF FLOWERS.—Is it or is it not a law of Nature that flowers of the same species may have varieties of red and yellow, or red and blue, but not of blue and yellow, and not of red, blue, and yellow? Roses are red and yellow, but not blue; salvias are red and blue, but not yellow. I know of none which are blue and yellow, or which show blooms tinted with the three primitive colours. C. W. BARLEY.

7, Paulton's Square, Chelsea.

CREAKING SOLES.—We are told that "de minimis non curat lex;" but if the law cares not for trifles, it is no reason why a philosopher should not. And if, as Shakspeare says—

"There was never yet philosopher,

That could endure the toothache patiently,"—

we need not be surprised if those, who are less than philosophers, be impatient of the householder's annoyance of creaking boots and shoes. Most of your readers will be familiar with this really vexatious betrayer of their comings and goings. In my case I have exhausted the appliances of saturation with water, neat's-foot oil, &c., in vain—"tamen usque recurrit," it returns as soon as the moisture is evaporated.

Tarquin, no doubt, put off his creaking boots when he took the peculiar strides described by Shakspeare. We shall not be suspected of having his purpose in view when saying, we should be glad to pass through the world with quiet paces; and as the artificers of this offending part of our dress possess no specific against the fault in question, I am induced to invite, through your widely-circulated medium, the communication of any means of permanently removing this, both to ourselves and all near us, very disagreeable accompaniment of our pedestrian action. O.

Sunderland.

ESKELBY IN YORKSHIRE.—In "N. & Q." 3rd S. vol. iii. 408, occurs the following statement under the heading of "Leeming or Leming":—

"In the British Record Commission, vol. i. p. 203, is the inscription after death on the estate of Johannes de Leming, anno 1366, who, among other properties, owned land at Eskelby in the parish of Burneston."

I presume the place alluded to is the village now called Exelby. Perhaps some of your readers can inform me if such is the case, about what date the change in the orthography of the name took place, and also from what it is derived? W. H.

HERALDIC.—I am curious to know to whom belong the quarterings in a shield at the bottom of a rare print I possess (by Loggan, after Flax-

Colonel Thomas Sanders, of Ireton, in ity, one of old Noll's Ironsides:—

a, a chev. erm. betw. 3 bull's-heads cabossed, of (Sanders.)

a double-headed eagle displayed sa. charged rescutcheon or. (Salomon?)

a sword and sceptre in saltier. (Collenden of or Odworth?)

3 lioncels passant in pale sa., armed and langued sinister canton point a crescent, for difference.

pale, gu. and erm. a saltier of the field counter-
(?)

3 eagles displayed gu. (De Courcy?) rterly, arg. and gu. (Say, baron S. of Devon;
d 1313.)

3 snakes coiled [vert?] (Savernake?) out of a maunch erm. a dexter-hand holding a s. (Mohun.)

a cross engrailed sa. (Mohun, of Boconnock, all? or Gifford?)

ré az. and arg.; a fesse chequy arg. and gu.
(?)

two bends wavy or. (Brieure, baron B. of
e.)

pale or and vert. a lion ramp. gu. (Marshall, mbroke.)

a bend lozengy or. (Marshall, ancient coat.)
3 chev. gu.; a label of 5 points azure. (De ri of Pembroke, Hereford, &c.)

5, on a chief az. 3 crosses patée, fitchée, of the troubow, Earl of Pembroke.)

3 garbs arg. (Macmorrough, King of Leinster.)

a cross-flory arg.; over all on a bend azure 3

upped. of the second. (?)

a chev. betw. 3 owls argent; a mullet for dif-
(Sleigh, of Little-Ireton.)

1st quartering. (Sanders of Ireton.)

JOHN SLEIGH.

ridge, Bakewell.

FUNERAL CUSTOMS.—In the rural dis-
Ireland funeral processions always halt roads whilst the psalm, "From the
(the De profundis) is said by a couple of cessionists; the psalm is repeated at the nd when the latter is covered in, a spade ovel are thrown across the top, the bearer h the coffin had been carried is broken und the people depart after a silent prayer.
course refers to Roman Catholic funerals.
a custom known elsewhere, and what is 1?

S. REDMOND.

ool.

OCEAN CAVERN.—Can any one inform re and when a poem, entitled "The Ocean a Tale of the Tonga Isles," was published?
nber just four lines in the poem, which
e—

ere Tonga maids from infancy ere taught to brave the swelling sea;
furl the sail, and wield the oar, ad guide the bark from shore to shore."

is published in a pamphlet form, and I etween the years 1800 and 1820. Noto.

St. MICHAEL'S, CROOKED LANE.—The church of St. Michael, Crooked Lane, where the first Sir John Leman was buried in 1632, has been taken down. He had been Lord Mayor of London in 1616; and I possess his portrait in full robes. I believe he was the founder of the family. Can any one inform me what became of his and other monuments when the church was taken down in 1831, for the construction of the new streets in that neighbourhood? G. O. L.

SILVER CUP.—I have an old silver cup, holding rather more than a pint. In relief, on one side, are four Amazons with bows and arrows ready to shoot. On the other is a river in which three crowned heads appear just above the water, and four centaurs are on the bank. The beard of the first is turned back, and flows over his shoulders; his mouth is opened to an impassable width, and the bow-string is drawn considerably beyond the ear. These excesses are intentional, as the drawing of the rest is good. Under the crowned heads, respectively, are "A. D. O." I shall be obliged by an explanation. Various implements and emblems of archery are engraved on other parts of the cup, but badly done, and I have no doubt subsequent to the reliefs. G. O.

SPHINX STELLATARUM.—The English humming-bird, or fly-bird, abounds more this year than I have ever before known it to abound.
Instead of two or three in a season, I have them daily, and often two or three together, in my small garden in Somersetshire. I do not write, however, so much to note this fact, as to query
the meaning of the Linnean name—stellatarum,
"of the starred ones." The starred what? I do not find, in any botanical book, the adjective stellatus used in the feminine at all. In the neuter plural I find it applied to the noun folia. It would, nevertheless, seem that Linné had intended to describe this sphinx as frequenting (as in truth it does) star-shaped flowers (a. g. jasmine). Query, Is corollarum the substantive with which stellatarum agrees? Or what is the etymology or meaning of the name? W. P. F.

THACKERAY'S SONG.—Can any one inform me where to procure (or else kindly supply me with) the curious sing-song music, to which poor Thackeray used to sing his inimitable verses, beginning—

"There were three sailors in Bristol city?"

F. G. W.

"THEATRE D'AMOUR."—Is anything
a very rare and beautiful volume of bearing this title? It is in imperial 8vo.
consists of twenty-eight v. finely plates emblematic of love, but from those of Otho Venius. The inferior tape was from the Low Countries, persecutions of the sixteenth century. The rried on by a few foreign weavers, who kept ong themselves, and being of one trade, lan- dition, they of course became staunch fami- or, as Burns describes his twa dogs, "Unco ck together." Hence it is now said of per- ndly, "They are as thick as inkle-weavers."]

TE IN LONDON. — Mr. Timbs states f London, iii. 172), on the authority the bookseller of the Strand, that, in 2, Bonaparte resided for five weeks in et—one of the streets of York Build- here any contemporary evidence in his statement? U. O. N. r Club.

ion was asked in our 1st S. xi. 366, and, as ected, elicited no reply. In the year 1791 aer of Bonaparte was only just commencing, likely that he was personally seen by Ma- kseller, or any one else, in the streets of correspondent has overlooked the fact, that ho cuts us all up) has aptly entitled his ance of London.]

: AND LANCASHIRE. — The family mansions of the Cheshire and Lan- res tried and acquitted at Manchester 694, on the information of Taaffe and Secretary of State, Trenchard, are Macaulay, who chronicles their trial, 19-23.

me cognizant of what must be well se who take either an antiquarian or st in these countries supply the de- NOEL RADECLIFFE.

gentlemen who were tried at Manchester in were Caryl Lord Molyneux; Sir William Sir Rowland Stanley, Bart.; Sir Thomas William Dicconson, Esq.; Philip Lang- holomew Walmsley, Esq. of Dunkenhall; m Blundell, of Crosby. See The Jacobite chester in 1694, edited by William Bea- he Chetham Society, 4to, 1853.]

TAUR NOT FABULOUS." — Will the orrespondent, kindly inform me who or of this work, published rather iddle of the last century, and de- prove the age"? CECIL.

ted satire on the vices of persons in high dward Young, the poet, and was printed cited much attention at the time of its d is said to have produced a marvellously the Court of the second George, and on s influence, whose morals are generally ave been as dissolute and relaxed as those of Charles II.]

TRESHAM, THE GUNPOWDER CONSPIRATOR. — Is there any known portrait of Tresham? I do not find him mentioned in Granger or Bromley, but you have correspondents who are acquainted with the history of the Tresham family. Perhaps they could direct me to some unengraved picture.

JOHN BRUCE.

[Musgrave, in his Adversaria (Addit. MS. 5728), states that a picture of Francis Tresham is in Hendlip House, co. Worcester, the property of the Abingdons.]

DEUCE. — May not this inelegant word be derived from the Latin Deus, the pronunciation of the latter in the service of the Romish Church being not unlike deuce. I find that in the Italian language there is an interjection, Domine! which is translated in the dictionary I have, as the deuce!

CHARLES STEWART.

27, Highbury Place.

[The Portuguese say diacho for diabo, just as we say deuce for devil. May not deuce be from diacho? We owe many words to the Portuguese. Consult also an article on the origin of this word in our 2nd S. ii. 331.]

Replies.

MEN OF KENT AND KENTISH MEN.

(1st S. v. 321, 615; 3rd S. vii. 324, 423; viii. 92.)

Should this doughty discussion respecting Kentish Men and Men of Kent once establish itself in the columns of "N. & Q.," it will be no easy matter to get it out again; and, presuming that the pages of "N. & Q." were not originally designed to be made the arena of controversy, especially of controversy in its very nature interminable, I venture to suggest that the present controversy has precisely that character.

For how stands the case? The man of West Kent says to the man of East Kent, "I am the Man of Kent; you are only a Kentish Man." The man of East Kent politely replies, "Excuse me. You, on the contrary, are the mere Kentish Man; I am the true Man of Kent." Having lived many years in East Kent, and about as many more in West Kent, I can speak to both sides of this picture from personal knowledge. But hear your own correspondent, at p. 92. "The men of West Kent," he says, "are undoubtedly Men of Kent, while those of East Kent are only Kentish Men." Exactly so. But why? "Being myself a native of that division of the county" [West Kent], "I feel jealous of its rights and usages, which I am always prepared to defend." Your correspondent may rest assured that East Kent contains its hundreds and its thousands who feel equally "zealous for the rights and usages" of "that division of the county," who are equally prepared to do battle for them, and who have the strongest conviction that they, the East-enders, are the true Men of Kent, while the West-enders are only Kentish Men.

No! says a third party; you are both wrong. It is "no question of East and West Kent" (see vii. 423). "I have always understood the Men of Kent to be those born in the Wæald of Kent." And why so? For the best of all possible reasons: he was born there himself.

Is it not fair, then, to ask the question, What prospect is there that adverse opinions, held on such highly satisfactory and conclusive grounds, can ever be reconciled by argument?

Permit me, however, in conclusion, to offer two suggestions. First, Is it not possible that the two appellations, Men of Kent, and Kentish men, were originally employed indifferently? In that case, the squabble for the exclusive possession of the former of these equivalents would be of later origin. Without pretending to have gone deeply into the subject, I venture to mention that I have noticed some things which seem decidedly to favour this view. The two appellations, in their original sense, were convertible.

Secondly, East Kent is plucky; so is West Kent; both, if need be, combative. Hence the idea just thrown out, as doing away with all grounds for a free fight, may prove equally unsavoury to one party and to the other. Why not bring the question, then, to a fair trial of manly skill? A cricket-match, a rifle-match, a match with great guns, might determine annually, triennially if preferred, to which party of competitors, up to the contest next ensuing, should belong a silver shield frosted with a white horse, and bearing for a legend, MEN OF KENT.

SCHIN.

CHARTULARY OF WHALLEY ABBEY.

(3rd S. vii. 177, 376, 508; viii. 36.)

With regard to my query on the phrase in factum, as found in the Chartulary of Whalley Abbey, I have since discovered an elucidation: not indeed from Cowell, but from another source, which has satisfied me that the expression is correct. I nevertheless beg to thank BIBLIOTHECAR. CHETHAM, for his quotation from Cowell, which confirms the explanation I have already met with; and whatever I have said on that point, touching the editorship of the Chartulary, I beg leave to retract. But I still keep to my opinion respecting the general editorship of the work. From a simple perusal of the volumes, any one at all familiar with monastic charters will be able to correct numerous errors of an obvious character without reference to the original MS. They are errors which cannot exist there, or if they did (which is not at all probable), editorial notes would have been absolutely necessary to correct or explain the reading. I will now state—ment by reference to the fac-simile at p. 186 of vol. i. There, in one page, are found several mistakes. Where does the editor get the word duplex? There is not the slightest approach to it in the fac-simile. In the second line conquestum has the proper contraction over the final u; but the print has post conquestu, which is nonsense. Viris religiosi is converted into viris religionis. In Eadwardus, the first a is ignored. In Lincolū (which occurs twice) and Rothelāi, the final contractions are also ignored.

Further than this, I commenced the compilation of a table of errata; but after a short time, I found that it swelled to such dimensions that it would be impracticable to include it within the limits of an ordinary letter. I, therefore, confine myself to a few general remarks.

The verb quietumclamo, in all its forms, is always printed quietuclamo; and such contracted words as Robto, Riço, Roço, Jote, and the like, always omit the mark of contraction, thus making nonsense. Any one familiar with charters, knows perfectly well what is meant by a phrase like this, Jote capello; but that is no reason why the text should be needlessly disfigured. Instances of omitted contractions are to be reckoned by the hundred.

The common phrase pro manibus is often corrupted either into the ungrammatical form of per manibus, or the unmeaning form of pro manibus. Vide pp. 25, 55, 59, 102, 103, 108, 109, 110, 132, 134, 156, 166, 342, 347, 352.

The contraction p is often substituted for p.

"Ut igitur hec mea donatio imppetuū (!) firma et stabilis perseveret" (p. 27). What is perseveret supposed to mean? Perseveret is more like the truth. The editor here seems scarcely able to realise the distinction between an active and a passive verb. At p. 30 (line 6 from the bottom), the same verb is tortured into perseverent. Vide also pp. 339 and 340.

At p. 133 (line 6 from bottom) for communicare read communicare. P. 168 (line 6) for Apostolorum read Apostolorum. P. 201 (line 19) for summa read summonita. The editor is evidently unacquainted with the common form of finis.

At pp. 345, 349, 360, viculus is converted into the absurd word vinculus.

I cannot agree with BIBLIOTHECAR. CHETHAM, in his observation, that "there are few similar publications that are more entitled to the praise of accuracy than this work." Inaccuracies abound throughout; and I have no hesitation in saying that, if I had the opportunity and leisure to collate the four volumes with the original MS., my list of errata would be rather startling. In making this assertion, I have no other object to serve than that of justifying my original statement, that the work "is full of editor's blunders." MONASTICUS.

DUCHESS D'ABRANTES.

(3rd S. viii. 28, 78.)

Marie-Louise-Léonie, duchesse d'Abrantès ex-Lady of Honour to H.I.H. the Princess Marie-Clotilde, is the widow of Adolphe-Alfred-Michel, duke d'Abrantès, youngest son of Marshal Andoche Junot, first duke, and of Laura de Permon, the authoress of the piquant and amusing, but often untruthful Memoirs of herself, who died in great distress during the year 1838, leaving two daughters named Joséphine and Constance; the first of which, who now and then styles herself Duchesse d'Abrantès without any right, as I am officially informed from Paris, was married to M. James Amet; and the second, known in the literary world under the name of Constance Aubert, to M. N. Aubert; and two sons, Napoléon, and Adolphe, the husband of the present duchess, who died both a few years ago childless, consequently the title is now extinct.

Démétrius Comnenus, or rather Démétrius Stephanopoulos, a captain in the French army, a Greek by birth, and maternal uncle to Laura, first Duchess of Abrantès pretended, on the authority of some insignificant and valueless birth and marriage certificates, written in very bad modern Greek, and pompously called authentic documents, to be descended from Nicephorus, one of the sons of the last Greek Emperor of Trebisond, David Comnenus, whose life, according to him, was spared by Mohammed, and who took refuge in Maina of Peloponnesus; whence his descendants, called no more Comneni but Stephanopouli, with three thousand followers, came to Genoa during the year 1676, and thence to Corsica, where they remained until the present century. One of these emigrants, named Kalómeros, is said to be the founder of the Buonaparte family.

The parentage and name, to the surprise of every one acquainted with Byzantine history, and in a position to examine critically the assertions of the pretender, were recognised in 1782 by letters patent of Louis XVI. King of France, who however did not allow him the right to use the title of Prince.

Fallmerayer, in his standard work Geschichte des Kaiserthums von Trapezunt, says that the claims of Démétrius Stephanopoulos will hardly stand a critical examination, notwithstanding many so-called authentic documents, which he published in a rather curious and very rare work, entitled —

“Précis historique de la maison Impériale des Comnènes, ou l'on trouve l'origine, les mœurs, et les usages des Maniotes; précédé d'une filiation directe et reconnue par Lettres Patentes du Roi, du mois d'Avril 1782, depuis David, dernier Empereur de Trebisonde jusqu'à Démétrius Comnène, actuellement Capitaine de Cavalerie en France; à Amsterdam, 1784, in 8°.”

If your learned correspondent, HISTORICUS, will read this pamphlet, he will come to the same conclusion as Fallmerayer, who considers the pretensions of Laura d'Abrantès and of her uncle Captain Démétrius to be descended from the ancient House of Comnène imaginary, and without the least foundation. It is true their ancestors came from Greece, as the name of Stephanopoulos (son of Stephen) shows; but it does not follow that they were of imperial blood.

It may be noted that the Annuaire de la Noblesse de France, a book of authority, edited yearly by the well-known archivist and palæographer, M. Borel d'Hauterive, and similar to Burke's English Peerage, in the historical and genealogical notice of the ducal house of Abrantès, says — without making any mention whatever of the imperial house of Comnène.

“Il (Andoche Junot) avait épousé Laure de Permon, connue sous le nom de Madame d'Abrantès, rejeton d'une famille de Languedoc.”

Adolphe-Alfred-Michel Junot, third and last Duke d'Abrantès, when married in 1853 (Jan. 10) to Marie-Louise-Léonie, the present duchess, was the widower of Marie-Céline-Elise, daughter of Baron Lepic, whom he married in 1845 (April 2), and who died in 1847 (June 6).

RHODOCANAKIS.

Higher Broughton.

NURSERY RHYME.

(3rd S. vii. 462.)

From the quotation you have given of this piece of rhyming, your readers will probably presume that the two verses comprise the whole of it. Having lately met with what I suppose to be the real original of the song, I enclose a copy of it, as perhaps not even the authority you quote (MR. HALLIWELL) may be aware of it. There is no prefix to the lines. The reference to a former volume of “N. & Q.” furnishes only the first verse: —

“The queen of hearts,
She made some tarts,
All on a summer's day,
The knave of hearts
He stole those tarts,
And with them ran away:
The king of hearts
Call'd for those tarts,
And beat the knave full sore;
The knave of hearts
Brought back those tarts,
And said he'll ne'er steal more.

“The king of spades
He kiss'd the maids,
Which vex'd the queen full sore;
The queen of spades
She beat those maids,
And turn'd them out of door:
The knave of spades
Griev'd for these jades,
And did for them implore;

The queen so gent
She did relent,
And vow'd she'd ne'er strike more.

"The king of clubs
He often drubs
His loving queen and wife,
The queen of clubs
Returns him snubs,
And all is noise and strife:
The knave of clubs
Gives winks and rubs,
And swears he'll take her part;
For when our kings
Will do such things,
They should be made to smart.

"The diamond king
I fain would sing,
And likewise his fair queen,
But that the knave,
A haughty slave,
Must needs step in between.
Good diamond king,
With hempen string
This haughty knave destroy,
Then may your queen,
With mind serene,
Your royal bed enjoy."

European Magazine, 1782, vol. i.
p. 252.

WYATT PAPWORTH.

CHASSEURS.

(3rd S. viii. 86.)

The Chasseurs Britanniques were raised originally from amongst the French émigrés, and subsequently recruited from prisoners, deserters, &c., without much inquiry about their country or political leanings. The regiment did good service in the early part of the Peninsular War, especially at Fuentes d'Onoro. They were riflemen, and, I believe, dressed and equipped like the Rifle Brigade, with black facings. The York Chasseurs were dressed and equipped like the 60th Rifles, with red facings, and were raised for service in the West Indies. There were many foreigners, principally Germans, in the ranks, deserters, prisoners, &c., who had no wish to be recaptured, and were glad to serve out of Europe. The native element was originally not of a high standard, but as it was eliminated or improved, the regiment was renamed "Royal York Rangers," and became a very efficient and well-conducted corps.

An old general, long since dead, told me that when a captain in 1794, he raised men for a majority, and then offered for general service to get his lieutenant-colonelcy. "And they took me at my word, and gave me the 'Royal Africans'! A precious time I had with them for the next two or three years on the coast of Africa! They were the sweepings of every parade in England, for when a man was sentenced to be flogged he was offered the alternative of volunteering for the Royal Africans, and he generally came to me. They were not a bad set of fellows when there was anything to be done, but with nothing to do they were devils incarnate."

The York Chasseurs were originally raised in a similar manner, but after recruiting of this description was stopped, the regiment was started afresh as "Royal York Rangers," and became, as I have already remarked, a well-conducted and efficient corps. STEWART.

Chasseurs Britanniques, or "Independent Foreigners," were employed on the coast of America in the war of 1813-14, on board the fleet under Admiral Sir T. Hardy (Ramillies, 74, flag-ship), which blockaded the northerly ports of the republic. They were chiefly deserters and refugees from the French and other continental armies. They made several descents on the coast, on which desultory operations from the fleet were of frequent occurrence: such as storming of batteries, cutting out, capture of merchandise, &c. Complaints were made to the British government of their behaving with rather unwonted severity to the inhabitants on the American seaboard, and to the females. I believe they were not employed again on that service, but sent away elsewhere in consequence, from the coast. At a place called Craney Island, where our seamen were repulsed by the precision of the batteries on shore, they appear to have come rather to grief, not being able to land from their boats by reason of the shallowness of the water and the deep mud. There were more corps than one of York Chasseurs and Rangers.

BREVIN.

RED FACINGS.

(3rd S. viii. 69.)

George Colman's witticism on the facings of a volunteer corps is well known, where he speaks of "Lieutenant Grains the brewer, in a smart scarlet jacket, tastily turned up with a rhubarb coloured lapel." (Poor Gentleman). Some persons have absurdly conjectured that the regiments bearing scarlet facings have for some misconduct before the enemy or otherwise, been deprived of their original facings as a disgrace.

"Facings," says James, in his Military Dictionary, "signify the lappels, cuffs, and collar of a military uniform, and are generally different from the colour of the coat or jacket." These facings originated with the regiments clothed in red having a lining of serge of different colours, which being turned over at the collar, lapels, and cuffs, formed the facings. The 33rd, 53rd, 60th, and 78th, are, I think, the regiments of regular infantry having scarlet facings. To these may be added the Sussex militia, when commanded by , third Duke of Richmond, but which became a royal regiment has now blue facings. 56th foot, styled the Pompadour regiment, in 1755, has a facing of a reddish blue; but it is named from that colour, or from the de Pompadour, is not certain. The 97th has also a French grey, or very light grey.

The Light Dragoons there was a regiment by General Russell Manners (the 26th) had facings of blue, the identical colour of regimental jacket, and which is the only one so distinguished. The regiments connected with the county of Kent had facings of sky-blue, such as the New Romney Light Dragoons ("N. & Q." 2nd S. xii.) and the East and West Kent militia regiments whose facings are styled in the Army List, grey.

Of the different coloured facings of the regular British Infantry, yellow is by far the predominant, it being borne by about half of the whole number. It has a clean appearance, and is not liable to fade even in the East. When soldiers are viewed either individually or collectively, they have always a neat and elegant appearance.

PRO ORNAMENTO.

Facings were formerly worn by all regiments at half pay (if I may so speak) for no collars were used on the military coats—that is, the facing came close up to the neck, and a cravat or necker was worn, and never were a mark of distinction. In fact no facings at all prevailed in the forces till a later period, and any one looking at the prints of Marlborough's campaigns, of Minden, Culloden, Minden, or Quebec, will recognize facings at all as prevalent, only rather in the cuffs; e. g. look at Gen. Wolfe's statue in Palace Street.

The 41st Regiment, in which the sire of the correspondent was a field officer for many years, and in which he fell in action in 1813 at the Battle of Lake Erie, in Ohio, America, never had other facings till of late years; now they are all blue.

The corps is metamorphosed into the regiment of foot, with the Prince of Wales's. Instead of being disgraced, the corps was long time known as the "41st Invalids," and appears on most of the old Army Lists. In the reign of George II. they distinguished themselves in Germany, and were long known as the "41st Regiment." The Gent. and London may be consulted thereon.

In America in 1812-15 they greatly distinguished themselves at Queenstown and Detroit under Sir Isaac Brock, and subsequently at the Raisin and the capture of Fort Niagara (by their flank attack). Red breeches and white linen gaiters above the knee prevailed in the army in Germany, Flanders, at Culloden, Quebec, the Seven Years' War, &c. The 34th had light or yellow cuffs and spatterdashes or gaiters, as will be seen by the engraving in their Regimental Record.

Gen. Wolfe invented a plan to save the clothing, which was a working dress for the private men composed of a red gilet or jacket with sleeves, over which the red coat (of course without sleeves) was slipped on when on parade or on active service, but not at other times. BREVIS.

KEMBLE'S "ODE ON THE AMERICAN WAR" (3rd S. viii. 48.)—Perhaps no books are less trustworthy than those composed of Green-room gossip. Take half-a-dozen, and you will find the same story, with large or small variations, told of half-a-dozen actors. Sometimes, as in the present case, there is an outlying bit of truth. John Kemble did not write, but recited the ode, which is preserved in Poems chiefly by Gentlemen of Devonshire and Cornwall, 2 vols. Bath, 1792. It is entitled "Manchester, an Ode." A note says:—

"This ode was written to promote the spirit that, in the author's opinion, so gloriously displayed itself in the town on receiving authentic intelligence of General Burgoyne's defeat by the American rebels. A resolution was formed to raise a regiment for the crown at the expense of the town and neighbourhood," &c.

"Among other expedients used to excite and diffuse a proper spirit, was the present ode; which was spoken in the playhouse by Mr. Kemble, now manager of Drury Lane Theatre, and then an actor of considerable eminence in the town." (Vol. ii. p. 74.)

The ode contains eight stanzas. One will suffice as a sample, and I choose the third, because the author, the Rev. John Whitaker, rector of Ruan Lanihorne, repeats it as the eighth, for which reason I infer that he thought it the best:

"But Britain, in this race of fame,
Which of thy daughter-towns may claim
The greatest share of glory for the whole?
'Tis Manchester that claims the share,
'Twas Manchester that urged the war,
'Twas Manchester that waked the British soul."

I saw John Kemble in Cato. Though very young then, my memory as to how he did it is still fresh, and I left the theatre with the impression that I had seen, not only a great actor, but a good play. So I have no difficulty in believing that, when recited by him, the Ode passed for poetry. FITZHOPE.

Garrick Club.

HOUSEHOLD TALES (3rd S. viii. 82.)—The story which MR. BARING-GOULD relates under the title of "The Rose Tree," is evidently a variety of the fiction called "Orange and Lemon," which is, I believe, very popular in Lincolnshire nurseries. The version which my fickle memory best retains gives a daughter named Orange to the cruel step-mother of little Lemon, and the boy her brother. The dreadful supper having been served up to the father, the boy buries his sister's remains, and the song of the bird is as follows:—

"My mother killed me,
My father picked my bones,
And my little brother buried me
Under the cold marble stones."

As a child this story used to make my flesh creep, and I am therefore surprised that I have only such a misty recollection of it. I know I always thought that the—

"Here comes the candle to light you to bed,
And here comes the hatchet to chop off your head,"

with which we supplemented the song

"Oranges and lemons, said the bells of St. Clement's,"

(in the game called Oranges and Lemons), had reference to the shocking tragedy in the nursery tale. ST. SWITHIN.

ENIGMA (3rd S. vi. 497.)—The answer to the enigma beginning "Himself he stood beside himself," is "a Neddy and an eddy." There is a solution in rhyme, but I am not in a position to quote it. I wish some one would unriddle the other curiosity set forth (3rd S. vi. 497), "Man cannot live without my first." ST. SWITHIN.

SECOND SIGHT (3rd S. viii. 65, 111.)—The occurrence related by me under the above heading may not be strictly what is understood by second sight; and I am not anxious that it should be so: but I think it still deserves to be treated with some respect, and not put off as an ordinary incident, such as may have happened to any of us. J. B. misrepresents my statement. When I said that of the facts there could be no doubt, I did not mean to assert that the shepherd really saw Mr. Austin walking in the garden; but that he did relate the vision, did believe firmly that he saw it, and did not invent a story to impose upon others. J. B. passes over the most remarkable fact of the case. Any of us may at some time have mistaken a tree for a man, or a shaken bough for a moving garment; but John's vision was followed immediately by the arrival of a messenger, announcing that the very man, whom he had just declared that he had seen in the garden, was lying on his death-bed, several miles off. This coincidence was very striking; and when coupled with the fact that the dying man had long laboured in vain to bring poor John to a sense of religion, may very rationally be considered as a last admonition to the old shepherd. And when, very shortly after, he was suddenly called out of life without repentance, it was the conclusion, I know, of grave and sensible persons at the time, that it was a supernatural warning:

and I must say that I prefer their judgment to the mere animal ideas of an ignorant sensualist such as the old shepherd was. F. C. H.

WRITTEN ROCKS (3rd S. viii. 88.)—Mr. G. Tate, F.G.S., of Alnwick, Northumberland, has lately published a book containing all that is known with respect to the above rocks in this neighbourhood. The book is entitled The Sculptured Rocks of Northumberland. WM. LYALL.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

The Written Rocks respecting which C. W. BARKLEY inquires are probably those called Helbeck-Scar, near Bampton in Cumberland, described by Camden, who gives a view of the rocks and a reading of the inscription, and also mentions similar inscriptions on native rocks at Crawdendale, near Kirkby Thor in Westmorland. These remains are also treated of by Horsley, and in the county histories. Another is described in the Archæologia (date 1766) as existing at Shawk, near to Rose Castle, the seat of the Bishop of Carlisle. A. C. G.

Bebington.

DODD FAMILY (3rd S. viii. 87.)—The name of this family seems derived from the old English or Celtic word dodd = a rush, or flag. (See Camden's Remaines, &c.) BREVIS.

CURE AND PREVENTION OF TOOTHACHE (3rd S. vii. 433.)—I had heard of many curious cures for the toothache, but that quoted I had never heard. The following perhaps is as curious, and I have actually known it to have been practised in one instance in Dublin. I may remark the operation was not successful. The person affected was to proceed, at an early hour in the morning, to some graveyard, and procure a sharp pointed piece of wood, a skewer, and with the aching tooth push it into a newly covered grave, and the pain would cease. I could not learn the origin of this piece of foolery. S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

BOTELER OF WEMME (3rd S. viii. 47.)—The Lordship of Wemme came into the family of Boteler by the marriage of Ralph Boteler with Maud, the daughter and heir of William Pantulf. William Boteler, described by Mr. DORSET as the first Lord Boteler of Wem, was the issue of this marriage. His ancestors on the father's side are to be found in the line of the baronial house of Boteler of Oversley, those on the mother's side in that of Pantulf. P. S. C.

CUBAN USE OF SPANISH WORDS (3rd S. viii. 28, 99.)—I am able to explain some of the Spanish expressions which COLON Y LUCCO failed to find in his dictionaries.

Aguijones con casquillos de hierro, goads with iron heads; used instead of the common goad armed with a nail, when extraordinary exertion is required of the plough oxen, especially on the periodical renewal of the sugar plantations.

Agujas salmeras (is not jalmeras an error?), large packing-needles used for sewing the bags in which the raw sugar is brought to market, and for tying the petacas or baskets in which the sugar is carried from place to place on the plantation.

Alcayatas, nails or pins.

Ardes, hoops of a butt or barrel.

Arcilla, clay used for the construction of the moulds for the loaves of sugar, and also in the process of refining. When the sugar in the mould is perfectly cool, a layer of finely-powdered clay is spread upon it, and covered with water; the impurities of the sugar are carried away by the gradual percolation of the water.

Balometros (= barometros?), barometers.

Barrenas llamadas pasadoras, augurs, called by sailors "fids," used to open the strands of ropes which are to be spliced together.

Catres de maderá con tijera, field-beds, supported like camp-stools by two pairs of cross-beams. The name con tijera is taken from the motion of the cross-beams, like that of scissors.

Fallebas, iron bars or other instrument to fasten doors and windows.

Gatos o hienes de hierro, jack-screws.

Hacha de viento, a flambeau or torch.

Escantillones, the verb escantillar means to trace lines on walls; escantillones, therefore, are probably the instrument used for doing this.

Hibillones con sus pasadores, buckles covered with a brooch or ornament.

Huacal, crate for crockery or fruit.

Machiembrados: Machiembrar means to dovetail wood.

Jeringas de candelero, syringes.

I suspect that many of the words in your correspondent's list are wrongly spelt; others seem to be Indian words, or expressions used perhaps only on one plantation. The whole catalogue looks as if taken from a list of pedidos or necessities, for which some farmer of the back settlements of Cuba or South America has sent to his agent in Europe. Many have no particular connection with the sugar manufacture.

A. DE R.

Pastrano. "Hieroglyphics in the Pastorean style" would be a translation. Pastrano means belonging to Pastrana in Guadalajara, and a Spaniard would write the word with a small p. It has evident allusion to some well-known story.

U. O. N.

Westminster Club.

PHAER'S "ÆNEID OF VIRGIL" (3rd S. viii. 46.) Your correspondent O. T. D., writing on Phaer's Æneid of Virgil, cannot make out the two words periculum karmerdini, which occur in a memorandum appended to the fifth book. I believe the meaning is simply that, on his way down to Kilgerran, in Pembrokeshire, Phaer had incurred some danger (the nature of which we cannot ascertain) whilst passing through the town of Caermarthen,—may be in crossing the river Towy there. Caermarthen, in Latin, is Maridunum; and in Welsh, Caerfyrddyn. We find the word distorted into all sorts of forms by old English writers.

K. B.

ORIGIN OF THE NAME THODEY (3rd S. vii. 115.) In 1311, 5 Edw. II., Roger, son of Elias Thodey, granted to the prior and convent of St. Neots the wood called "Thodey Wood," in Wiboldiston—a hamlet of the parish of Caton Sour, in which the name Thodey still lingers. By another charter (cir. 1230), Christiana, daughter of William Hodierna, granted lands to the same priory.

JOSEPH RIX, M.D.

St. Neots.

"TROIS SAINTS DE GLACE" (3rd S. viii. 88.)—I am not myself aware of any English tradition respecting the "marked depression of temperature" to be expected on the days of SS. Mamertus, Pancratius, and Servatus (11th, 12th, and 13th May), who are termed in French, according to your correspondent MR. PROSSER, "Les trois Saints de Glace." But I know that, in North Germany, they are popularly termed "Die Drei Gestrenge Herren" (the Three Severe Lords—a common German title of respect for judicial and other authorities); and that it is the received doctrine among gardeners, that nothing is safe from frost until those three days are over.

JEAN LE TROUVEUR.

THE TERM "PRETTY" (3rd S. viii. 7, 57.)—

"From S. Neotes to Stoughton Village by sun enclosed ground a 3. miles, it is in Huistenduneshir. Ther hard by the chirch is a pretty house of Olyver Leders," ["N. & Q." 2nd S. v. 96], "and pratie Commodities about it."—Itinerary of John Leland, vol. i. p. 1. Oxford, 1710.

JOSEPH RIX, M.D.

St. Neots.

"ECHO AND SILENCE" (3rd S. viii. 61.)—As one of the objects of "N. & Q." is to form a reliable collection of facts, I beg to mention that the authorship and translation of Sir Egerton Brydges' sonnet, so correctly explained by MR. BATES, had already been explained, to the same effect, in the New Monthly Magazine for September, 1863.

W. M. T.

Cheltenham.

PLYMOUTH (3rd S. viii. 87.)—I have a print called "Plymouth Royal Hospital," and underneath, "South-west View, M. Blackamore del., J. Taylor sculp. The plate is marked 21, and is evidently taken from some work. It shows the different blocks of building to which references are made underneath, and I consider it is one of the same series to which your correspondent refers. I have been for some years a collector of views and portraits of Plymouth and Plymouth people, but have been unable to trace from whence this print was taken.

GEORGE PRIDEAUX.

DRAGON IN HERALDRY (3rd S. vii. 418, 449; viii. 55, 79.)—F. C. II. has referred very particularly to a work of Dr. Milner; but such work has not been found in the British Museum, although I have been kindly aided in the search by the author of the Bibliotheca Britannica. As this work was addressed to the Society of Antiquaries, I have searched, among their fragments, for Milner on St. George, but it may be inferred that the Society did not conceive such a work fit for public notice by them, as it is not to be found in the Archæologia. Dr. Husenbeth appears to be nearly of the same opinion, for he has mentioned very slightly this work in his Life of Milner, from whom he differed, if we may judge by his edition of Butler's Saints. Gibbon was most certainly an infidel, and for that very reason more trustworthy than Milner, who held a special retainer to bewilder where he could not prove. If great capacity for the reception of falsehood be a merit, Milner may be regarded as the least possible infidel, for he believed in the miracles of Hohenlohe, or, as Dr. Badelay writes it, Hohenlohe (Milner's Life, by Husenbeth, p. 460). St. George of England is identified with George of Cappadocia by Alban Butler and Husenbeth (Saints, i. 490, April 23). He is so identified also by Pusey (Arianism, 88 k, 134 f), who mistakenly calls him a fraudulent pork contractor; he should have said bacon contractor, as every soldier knows it could not be pork.

F. C. II. will oblige by giving a short résumé of Milner's answer to Gibbon, as I am anxious to see how the Romish priest proves a negative. F. C. II. must not expect perfect prudence and immaculateness in the popes and patriarchs of the age of George of Cappadocia and of St. Athanasius, for both come under this category, the latter as a trinitarian and St. George as a unitarian. As for St. Athanasius, Baronius, Valesius, and Tillemont, not being able to justify conduct which we may call indelicate ("not to put too fine a point upon it"), have settled not to answer this charge, on the ground that it is unworthy of Athanasius's character, which is the very reason, I submit, why he as a saint should be proved to be such against the devil's advocate. Of these two saints it may be said with truth, par nobile FRATREM.

T. J. BUCKTON.

P.S. Since the above was written, a Deus ex machina, or one initiated into the mysteries of Museum Catalogues, which I have been unable to effect after twenty-five years' use of them, has found the much desiderated book; and individually I have no wish to press my application to F. C. II. for a résumé. Even Milner identifies St. George with George of Cappadocia (p. 45). Ohe! jam satis est.

The Orthodox Apostolic Eastern Church acknowledges and worships four Georges as martyrs, of which the most glorious is St. George of Cappadocia, a military tribune, who suffered martyrdom in the year of grace 296, who is represented always as a handsome young officer, on horseback, killing a dragon, exactly in the same manner as on the sovereign of King George IV., and who, I have not the slightest doubt, is the same one mentioned by Gibbon as the Patron of England.

RHODOCANATHI.

Higher Broughton.

"PEREANT QUI ANTE NOS," ETC. (3rd S. viii. 77, 117.)—The authority for ascribing the above words to Ælius Donatus, the commentator on Terence and Virgil, may be found in the following extract from Jerome's Exposition of Ecclesiastes, i. 9:—

"Quid est quod fuit? ipsum quod erit". . . . Hic quid simile sententiæ et Comicus ait: Nihil est dictum quod non dictum sit prius.* Unde præceptor meus Donatus, cum ipsum versiculum exponeret; Pereant, inquit, qui ante nos nostra dixerunt."

The remark alluded to by Jerome does not appear in the extant commentary of Donatus.

J. E. S.

St. John's Coll., Cambridge.

It was Ælius Donatus, the grammarian, I alluded to, though by a lapsus penæ I put Saint to his name, probably being misled by the fact that he was tutor to Saint Jerome.

As to the grammar of the quotation, I am not sufficiently instructed to compete with Donatus, whose name, all through the mediæval period, was the proverbial appellation of a profound grammarian.

WILLIAM PINKERTON.

CURIOUS EPITAPH (3rd S. viii. 66.)—The epitaph referred to by MR. LEE, and stated, on the authority of the British Journal, Dec. 29, 1725, to be on a stone laid upon the grave of "Captain Tully," at Coventry, is in the old graveyard of St. Catherine in the city of Gloucester, where I have often seen it, and is, to the best of my memory, as follows:—

"Here lies old MR. RICHARD TULLY,
Who lived a hundred and three years fully:
He did the sword of the City bear,
(So many) years before the Mayor.
He had six wives, and here they lie,
Expecting heaven's eternity."

The epitaph is printed in most of the local histories.

P.

* "Nullum est jam dictum quod non sit dictum prius."
Terence, Eun. Prolog. 41.

S AND THONGS (3rd S. viii. 93.)—In reply to ONIENSIS, about "Bells hung in Horse-thongs," the expression, no doubt, means clappers were suspended by such thongs; of bawdricks of "Whyte Lether,"—often met with in old churchwardens' s.

H. T. ELLACOMBE.

LETON ACCOUNTS: PLAYERS (3rd S. viii. Of the queries of OXONIENSIS, one relates to items of payments at Congleton in 1621, to the Prince's Players, 1*l.*; To the King's Earl of Derby's, 1*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.*; Lady Elizabeth's, 10*s.*" He asks, who were these? The following is derived from a long "Players and Plays" in Harland's Household Accounts of Shuttleworths of Gauthorpe (London Society's Publications), pp. 885—897:—

508 (1st James I.) a lease under the Privy Seal, sent under the Great Seal, authorised a Company to enact comedies, tragedies, &c., when the plague shall decrease, within their usual house 'The Globe,' as also within any town-hall, &c., of town, &c. This Company, which in Elizabeth's time had been styled 'The Lord Chamberlain's Comedians,' became 'The King's Players.' In 1603 it included amongst its associates, Lawrence Fletcher, Shakspeare, Richard Burbage, Augustine Phillips, Thomas Winge, Henry Condell, Wm. Sly, Robt. Armin, and others, &c.; but Shakspeare, and some others, were expelled in 1621. In 1621, the 'Prince's Players' were merely of Prince Henry, but for 1615 of Prince Charles. Before her marriage to Frederick, Prince of Palatine of the Rhine, the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of James I. (afterwards titular Queen of Bohemia) had a company of players, styled 'The Lady Elizabeth's Servants.' In August, 1612, in the Accounts at Congleton, is an entry—'Given to my Lord Darbie his players, 8*s.* 8*d.*;' in the December of that year another to the same company of 7*s.* 4*d.*; and Sept., 1618, another of 8*s.* 4*d.* These were the players of Willem Earle, who was probably the first of his family to have a company of players his name and badge. He died in 1642. There were two classes of itinerant players: one used by the royal family, by nobles and others; and those of cities and towns. In 1589 two companies arrived at Knowsley (Lord Derby's seat) at the same time; and on the Sunday following the arrival, the rector of Standish preached in the afternoon, and the Queen's players acted in the afternoon, and of Essex's at night. (Stanley Papers, Part II.)"

CRUX.

ISH LETTERS" (3rd S. viii. 87.)—The first of the above Letters does not appear to be

The edition we have in our library here is of 1746. It consists of four volumes; contains a portrait with the inscription:

"John Baptist de B,

Marquis d',

Born the 24th of June, 1704.

"R. Parr sculpt."

The same volume has another engraving, representing "Isaac Onis, Aaron Monceca, and Benito, presenting their Jewish Letters to Don Sancho Pancha, and Master Nicholas the Barber." The whole book consists of 200 Letters.

WM. LYALL.

Literary and Philosophical Society,
Newcastle-on-Tyne.

CLIMATE AND LANGUAGE (3rd S. viii. 26, 59.) Is it not probable that Thomas Moore spoke from an imperfect remembrance of the theory actually propounded by Volney, which was, that climatic influences, and especially temperature, have much to do in determining the physical characteristics of the various races of mankind? He says:—

"J'observe que la figure des nègres représente précisément cet état de contraction que prend notre visage lorsqu'il est frappé par la lumière et par une forte réverbération de chaleur. Alors le sourcil se fronce; la pomme des joues s'élève; la paupière se serre; la bouche fait la moue. Cette contraction des parties mobiles n'a-t-elle pas pu et dû à la longue influer sur les parties solides, et mouler la charpente même des os? Dans les pays froids, le vent, la neige, l'air vif, opèrent presque le même effet que l'excès de lumière dans les pays chauds: et nous voyons que presque tous les sauvages ont quelque chose de la tête du nègre, &c."—Voyage en Egypte et en Syrie, 12mo, 1828, tom. i. p. 78.

Volney then goes on to speak of the effect of national costume upon physical conformation. The subject is also taken up by Dr. N. C. Pitta, in his work, Treatise on the Influence of Climate on the Human Species, and on the Varieties of Man resulting from it, &c. London, 8vo, 1812.

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

ARMS OF THE SEE OF WELLINGTON (3rd S. viii. 69.)—The authorities of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, 79, Pall Mall; or the Rev. Canon Hawkins, Westminster Abbey; or the Rev. E. Coleridge, Eton College, might perhaps furnish this.

LYTTLETON.

They are to be found [engraved] in Gilbert's Clergyman's Almanack.

SEWELL.

THE HATHWAY FAMILY (3rd S. viii. 85.)—In the Register of Llangynwyd parish occur the following entries:—

"Sarah Filia Josias Hathway de Bristol et Susanna Nichols baptizata fuit 26^o die Aprilis, 1706.

"Jane Filia Josias Hathway de Bristol et Susanna Nichols baptizata fuit, 25^o die Aprilis, 1706."

The above names are quite alien to this purely Welsh parish; and it is strange how they got into a place so out-of-the-way as it must, at that date, have been.

R. M.

ANDREW WILSON (3rd S. viii. 107.)—Andrew Wilson, A.R.S.A. died, 26th or 27th Nov. 1848, æt. sixty-eight. As to him, see Art Journal, 1848, p. 66; 1851, p. 85; Genl. Mag. N.S. xxxi. 323.

C. H. & THOMPSON COOPER.

Cambridge.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

The History of Clerkenwell. By the late W. J. Pinks, with Additions by the Editor, E. J. Wood. (Pickburn.)

It is related that when Dr. Pridcaux offered for publication his celebrated work, The Old and New Testaments Connected, the bookseller said "it was a dry subject, and he could not undertake to print it, unless the learned divine would enliven it with a little humour." The editors of The History of Clerkenwell, we find have not only complied with the suggestion of this facetious bibliopole; but have presented the public, in a super-royal octavo volume of 800 pages, with a valuable storehouse of pleasant reading and delightful memorabilia of Merrie Old England. The record of the events with which this parish stands associated as a suburban district of London—at one time its Belgravia—renders its history both entertaining and instructive. The portion of the work which is most curious, and perhaps we may even say most interesting, is that contained in the chapters devoted to the history of the Priory of the chivalric Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem—the Nunnery of St. Mary—the performances of the Parish Clerks—the notices of the Red Bull Theatre—the Bear-baiting at Hockley-in-the-Hole; but more especially the History of Sadler's Wells Theatre, which is most complete. The volume is an excellent specimen of typography and well-executed pictorial illustrations, accompanied with a map of the parish from a recent actual survey, and enriched with a complete Index of forty closely-printed columns. In short, the work is one of general and permanent interest, and must take its place among the standard literature of English history on the shelf of every private and public library.

Notes on Mental and Moral Philosophy; with an Appendix containing a Selection of Questions set at the India Civil Service Examinations between the Years 1856 and 1861, and References to the Answers in the Text. By H. Coleman, B.A. Oxon. (Harrison.)

The present little volume is the result of a difficulty experienced by the author in procuring any work in the English language suitable for the instruction of his pupils in Mental and Moral Philosophy according to the requirements of the India Civil Service Examination. It consists of extracts from the great writers on these subjects, which the Compiler was originally led to make for his own use, in lecturing to his pupils, supplemented with such remarks as are necessary to connect them and give them completeness. Having been found very useful by Mr. Coleman in preparing Candidates for the India Civil Service and other Examinations, the work is now published in the hope that it may prove useful not only to the student reading for any special object, but to that portion of the general public who may desire to obtain some knowledge of Mental and Moral Philosophy.

Essays on the Indian Mutiny. By John Holloway, Civil Service, late a Non-Commissioned Officer in Her Majesty's 32nd Light Infantry. (Dean & Son.)

The author of the present volume looks upon the annexation of Oude, and the indifference exhibited for the spiritual and moral elevation of India, as the origin of that great national calamity which forms the subject of his book. His object, however, is not to discuss the origin of the Mutiny, but rather to furnish a series of sketches of events which preceded and occurred during that awful period; and, as these sketches are interspersed with many personal anecdotes of the actors in those eventful scenes, the declaration of Lady Inglis (to whom the volume is by permission dedicated) that "she had read it with great interest," will probably be echoed by many other readers.

Fragments of the Early History of Tain from its Origin to the Middle of the Sixteenth Century. By the Rev. William Taylor, M.A. (R. Douglas, Tain.)

Originally delivered as a lecture in the Court House at Tain, and published at the request of those who listened to it, this sketch of the early history of that ancient town (for it has existed upwards of 800 years) has been so carefully compiled as to render it a most instructive and interesting guide to those who may find themselves in that far-off quarter of our island.

The Herald and Genealogist. Part XV. (Nichols.)

This new number of our useful and instructive contemporary opens with an interesting paper by the editor, Mr. J. G. Nichols, "On the Institution and Early History of the Dignity of Baronet," which is followed by a variety of pleasant articles, not the least amusing among them being "The Coulthart Arnoriais."

We have received from Messrs. Marion & Co. of Soho Square one of the photographic copies of Turner's "The Old Téméraire going to her Last Berth." The copy before us is a beautiful specimen; and, by whatever process it has been obtained, is highly suggestive of the original. The photograph is 14 ins. by 10.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Particulars of Price, &c., of the following Books to be sent direct to the gentleman by whom they are required, and whose name and address are given for that purpose:—

HOLY BIBLE (BARNES'), 1578. Folio.
HOLY BIBLE (BARNES'), 1591. Small folio.
BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, 1591. Folio.
1639. 4to.
1660. 4to.

Wanted by Rev. J. C. Jackson, 5, Chatham Place East, Hackney, N.E.

Notices to Correspondents.

SENEX. Consult the articles on the Clarence Dukedom in our 1st, 8th, 565; 1st, 85, 324; 2d, 73, 255.

F. G. W. The first edition of The Government of the Tongue was published in 1667, 12mo. This is one of the productions of the author of The Whole Duty of Man, who has not as yet been discovered.

SENEX (Stoke Newington.) We know of no asylum for demented merchants but that of Morley's College; but consult Low's Charities of London, chap. viii., and the London Post Office Directory for 1855, p. 1595.

CERIL. Ep. Francis Hare's Difficulties and Discouragements which attend the Study of the Holy Scriptures in the way of Private Judgment, was published in 1715; the eighth edition in 1721. See also the Bishop's collected Works, 4 vols. 8vo, 1746, 1755.—There are several English translations of St. Basil's Conjunction des Epiques (conjunction of the Epistles), the best is that of 1770, small 8vo.—John Aveling was a civilian and divine who embraced the Reformed religion in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. (Bayle's Dictionary.) There are two English translations of his Stratagems of Satan, 1648, 1651.—Our Correspondent must apply to some bookseller for the cheapest edition of Epistolæ Discrepantes Virorum.

G. L. M. (Woolwich.) Walker makes the e in Bonadiah short.

ENQUIRER. For the origin of Morganic Marriages consult "N. & Q." 1st S. ii. 7, 125, 231, 361; and 2d, vi. 237, 304.

ERRATA.—3rd S. viii. p. 98, col. i. line 3, for "affine" read "affricate;" line 34, for "that" read "those."

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 6d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for SEVEN CENTS for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly INDEX) is 11s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. SMITH, 22, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all Communications for the Editor should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 19, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 190.

NOTES:—The last great Literary Forgery, &c., 141—General Literary Index: Index of Subjects, 142—Elizabeth, Landgravine of Hesse Homberg, third Daughter of George III., 143—Sir James Turner: Battle of Pentland, &c., 144—Difficulties of Chaucer, 145—Folk Lore: Bayeux Superstitions—Dorsetshire Folk Lore—Norman Folk Lore—Cure of Warts—Charms—St. Swithin—May Kittens—Biting Babies' Nails, &c.—Beckford's "Thoughts on Hunting," &c.—Levina Bynnynech, or Terelinc—Brunetto Latini: Monthly and European Magazines—The Northmen—Bosh, 146.

QUERIES:—Barrow Family, 148—Anonymous—Banca cava—Balfour Family of Burleigh—Berwickshire—Dr. Bliss's Library of Oxford Books—Mrs. Cursham—Identity of Arms—"Grave Maurice"—George Meyers, M.A.—Murder by a Bishop—"Pheander, the Maiden Knight"—Birth-place of Cardinal Pole—Quotation wanted—The Earl of Poverty—Regimental Medal—Stonehenge—The Templars in Scotland, 149.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Births of Great Painters—Irish Legend—John de Trevisa—Lieut.-Col. Thomas Nash—William Alexander, Esq.—Gloucester Cross—"A Welsh Main"—"Esop Naturalized"—Old Finger Ring, 151.

REPLIES:—Dragon in Heraldry: St. George, 153—Bell Inscriptions, 154—Kitty Fisher, 155—Cue, &c., 156—Second Sight, 156—Longevity, 157—Andrea Ferrara—"Ditos moi ça, n'en quel pays"—Robin Hood Ballad—Chartulary of Whalley Abbey—Browne, Viscount Montague—Countesses: Channel Islands—Sir Samuel Clarke—Prince Charles Edward Stuart—Rev. Edward Ford—Toasts—"Leading Apes in Hell"—Daughter pronounced Dafter—Caraboo—Beest—Symbolization of Colours in Heraldry, &c., 157.

Notes.

THE LAST GREAT LITERARY FORGERY:

THE FABRICATED CORRESPONDENCE OF MARIE ANTOINETTE.*

Notorious for its concoction of literary forgeries, it is remarkable that the latest fabrication with which the Continent has favoured us—a set of spurious letters from Marie Antoinette to her mother Maria Theresa—should have been at once received by the critics of the principal literary journals in England as of indisputable authenticity: valuable alike for the light it casts on the individual character of Marie Antoinette herself, and on the principal political movements of her time! A stranger instance of literary gullibility it would be difficult to imagine. So illiterate, that her letters are described by Lady Morgan, who had seen them, as, "in writing and spelling, worthy of some grisette of the Rue St. Denis." Marie Antoinette, in these transparent clumsy forgeries, is represented as a writer of no ordinary pretensions; conducting a voluminous correspondence with her mother, who, with equal ignorance and absurdity, is depicted as a model of maternal tenderness and devotion. This correspondence, on the queen's part, being full of the shrewdest and most perspicuous views; not only of her own position, but of the most prominent political characters, and the most momentous incidents of the Revolution!

In what school of history can these blundering forgers, and their equally blundering critics, have learned that these were the characteristics either of the mother or the daughter?

"Marie Antoinette," says Miss Kavanah, in her able and amusing work, Woman in France during the Eighteenth Century, ii. 72, "has very erroneously been represented as a learned and accomplished princess. She frankly confessed to Madame Campan that she had never understood one word of the Latin harangues she uttered in Vienna, and had not ever touched the beautiful drawings sent to France by Maria Theresa as her daughter's productions. The courtiers were somewhat mortified at the queen's evident ignorance, which all her tact and grace could not disguise. . . . She read little, and only light literature. Serious conversation she disliked, and excluded it whenever it appeared. She possessed little conversation of any kind: her quiet friend, Madame de Polignac, had none,—'For,' as the envious courtiers never failed to remark, 'the royal favourites were all commonplace women.' This was true, and it confirmed the report that, notwithstanding a few happy repartees, Marie Antoinette was not herself very clever or intellectual."

"All that Marie Antoinette ever really learned," observes the Edinburgh Review, July, 1841, "was Italian, and a taste for the Italian poets, and this was from Metastasio. Of music she was naturally fond; but so well aware was she of the deficiency of her reputed knowledge of it, that on reaching Paris, when La Garde was appointed her music-master, she was so afraid of betraying her ignorance, that she put off his attendance for some months in order to take lessons in secret, saying, with naïveté: 'Il faut que la Dauphine prenne soin de la réputation de l'Archiduchesse.'"

Always plotting, and always blundering in the concoction of her plots and the agents she selected to accomplish them, Michelet justly remarks, that nobody contributed more directly than she did to the ruin and death of her unfortunate husband; and the account he gives of her inconceivable folly and insane mismanagement of the fatal journey to Varennes—"a miracle of imprudence," as he correctly calls it—effectually disposes of the halo with which Carlyle, and others of his school, endeavour to invest her as a tactician and a diplomatist. The laurels that were made only for the distaff, as Mrs. Hutchinson remarks of Henrietta Maria, are never wisely employed in the management of the sceptre; and Marie Antoinette's unfortunate interference in politics affords a bloody commentary on the correctness of the text.

For the tenderness of her parental instincts, Maria Theresa is as much indebted to the inventive faculty of the forger of her daughter's correspondence, as Marie Antoinette is herself for the apocryphal accomplishments with which it has invested her—facts "of imagination all compact" in both instances.

"Marie Theresa," says the Edinburgh Review, from which we have before quoted, "had the reputation throughout Europe of being an excellent mother. When foreigners of distinction came to Vienna, they found her surrounded by her family, and living in the simplest and most unostentatious manner. The delighted stranger exclaimed on his return home: 'What an admirable mother! what simplicity, and how well brought up a family!' But when the foreigner was gone, the Empress would not see her children for a whole week. Von Swieten, the physician, visited them daily, and reported to the Empress that they were well; while the governesses and tutors went through a course of pretended education—a pretence to which the Empress habitually lent herself. . . . Like that of many other respectable dowagers, Maria Theresa's ruling passion was to make great matches for her daughters. She hoped thus to strengthen her own interests, and those of Austria. This passion, to which she sacrificed her children's happiness, and occasionally her own dignity, was exemplified in her conduct towards her daughter, the Archduchess Amelia, who was betrothed to the Prince of Naples. The Emperor Joseph's wife having died of smallpox, Maria Theresa bade her daughter, who was then on the point of departing for Naples, descend to the family vault, and there offer up her prayers for the prosperity of her family and her native land. The Archduchess objected that her sister-in-law's remains had just been deposited there, and that she dreaded the infection. The mother insisted: the daughter obeyed, caught the smallpox, and died. Maria Theresa substituted her next sister Caroline, who became the too well-known Queen of Naples."

[* See "N. & Q.," 3rd S. vii. 416.]

With these facts, patent and familiar to every reasonably well-informed student of the eighteenth century, that the critics of the Athenæum, the Saturday Review, and The Times, should have passed current the correspondence in which they are utterly ignored and traversed, reflects but little lustre on the scholarship and acumen of the journals in which such criticism could have found admission.

C. R. II.

GENERAL LITERARY INDEX: INDEX OF SUBJECTS.*

OPHIR AND TARSHISH: continued from 3rd S. v. 440.

"Dr. Dee, that famous mathematician, hath written a very large discourse of that argument which I have seen with Mr. Hakluyt, much illustrating what the ancients have written of those seas and coasts, and concludeth that Havila is the kingdom of Ava subject to Pegu, and Ophyr is Chryse or Aurea before mentioned [Borneo] first possessed by Ophir mentioned Gen. x. that golden name eating up the former of Ophir."—Purchas's Pilgrimage, p. 756. Cf. Costard's History of Astronomy, pp. 57-62, and Herbert's Travels, p. 368.

"The first volume of Purchas appeared in 1613; and in the year 1646 Bochart condensed and brought the above ideas of our countryman more to a point in his valuable work on sacred geography, entitled Phaleg and Canaan. He there demonstrates with equal ability and reason that Ophir was the great island Taprobane, since called Zeilan or Ceylon; which produces gold, ivory, precious stones, and peacocks."—Clarke.

* Continued from 3rd S. viii. 26.

"A great deal has been written," observes Max Müller, "to find out where this Ophir was; but there can be no doubt that this was in India. The names for apes, peacocks, ivory, and algum-trees are foreign words in Hebrew, as much as gutta percha or tobacco are in English. If therefore we can find a language in which names which are foreign in Hebrew are indigenous, we may be certain that the country in which that language was spoken must have been the Ophir of the Bible. That language is no other but Sanskrit." (Lectures on the Science of Language, p. 202.) Compare "the Sanscrit word Kastura, expressing a most useful product of farther India," whence the Greek Κασσίτερος, see Humboldt's Cosmos, quoted in "N. & Q." 1st S. ix. 111. But Sir G. C. Lewis remarks ("N. & Q." 2nd S. vi. 4), that Movers, Das Phönizische Alterthum, rejects the theory of an ancient trade in tin between Tyre and India, which has been founded on this resemblance.

Hadrian Reland, in his Dissertation De Ophir (in Ugolini, vii. 447-400), follows Purchas more closely than Bochart, and thinks that Ophir should be placed in the country where the city of Oupara or Soupara, Ophir or Sophr was situated in the Indian Chersonesus. (Clarke.) The same opinion was held by Vitranga and other commentators mentioned by Calmet and Riccioli suprà.

In his valuable work on Ceylon, part viii. ch. i. Sir James Emerson Tennent adopts the opinion sanctioned by Josephus that Malacca was Ophir. Bochart was the first, he remarks, who conjectured that Ophir was Kondrameli on the north-west of Ceylon, and that the eastern Tarshish must have been somewhere in the vicinity of Cape Comorin. Bochart, Geogr. Sacr. Phaleg, lib. ii. c. 27, forte ad promontorium Cary. Ibid. Canaan, lib. i. c. XLVI. . . . Subsequent investigations have served to establish the claim of Malacca to be the golden land of Solomon. Malacca is the Aurea Chersonesus of the later Greek Geographers, and Ophir in the language of the Malays is the generic term for any golden mine (1 Kings, x. 11, and 2 Chron. ix. 21), and Tarshish, which lay in the track between the Arabian Gulph and Ophir, is recognisable in the great emporium of Ceylon. In favour of India are mentioned in Smith's Dict., Lassen, Ritter, Bertheau, Thenius, and Ewald. The fullest treatise on the question is that of Ritter in his Erkunde, vol. xiv. To these may be added Sir Tho. Browne in his Enquiries into Vulgar Errors. If in his identification of the ancient Taprobane with Malacca, Sir Thomas may be supposed to have included the adjacent islands of Sumatra, Borneo, and Java, which is extremely probable, his opinion is supported by the high authority of Sir T. Stamford Raffles, though other modern geographers have considered it to be Ceylon. One of the most recent and perhaps most probable hypotheses is that of Mr. C. T. Beke, who supposes it to have been situated at the northern extremity of the Persian Gulph. See his Origines Biblicæ, vol. i. p. 114. (Wilkins' note in loco, p. 300.) Cf. Penny Cyclopædia, s. v. Ophir.

7. "Gosselin, in his late publication, Recherches sur la Géographie systématique et positive des Anciens, 2 vols. 4to, 1798, after reciting the greater part of the above authors, favours an opinion, in some measure exploded by Bochart; and wishes to place Ophir at Dofir on the Arabian side of the Red Sea below Saba, the capital of Yemen; in about 15° 30' of north latitude."—Clarke.

Michaelis, Spicilegium, ii. 184, Niebuhr the traveller, Description de l'Arabie, p. 253, and Vincent, Hist. of the Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients, ii. 265-70, also place it in Arabia. It is stated in Smith's Dict. that Winer, Furst, and Knobel are in favour of Arabia, as are also Forster, Geogr. of Arabia, i. 161-67; Crawford, Descriptive Dictionary of the Indian Islands, s. v., and Kalisch, Comment on Gen. chap. "The Genealogy of Nations." Ortelius, in his Thesaurus Geographicus, s. v. Ophir, observes: "Eupolemus, auctor apud Eusebium, lib. ix. c. iv. Præpar. Evangel. Ὀφρην ὀφρην appellat, et dicit insulam Maris Rubri esse," &c.

Of other distinguished geographical writers, Bochart, Phaleg. ii. 27, admitted two Ophirs, one in Arabia and one in India, i. e. at Ceylon; while D'Anville... equally admitting two, placed one in Arabia and one in Africa. Rennel, as has already been stated, and Calmet, suppose there were two distinct kinds of voyages performed by these fleets; that to Ophir from the Red Sea, and to the coast of Guinea from the Mediterranean. Cf. Calovii Biblia Illustrata, ad iii. Reg. cap. x.

In our own days the discussion has been continued by Gesenius, who in articles on Ophir in his Thesaurus, p. 141, and in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopædie, s. v. stated that the question lay between India and Arabia, assigned the reasons to be urged in favour of each of these countries, but declared the arguments for each to be so equally balanced that he refrained from expressing any opinion of his own on the subject. On the whole, remarks E. Twisleton, there is reason to believe that Ophir was in Arabia; there does not seem to be adequate information to enable us to point out the precise locality which once bore that name. (Smith's Dict. of the Bible.)

This article is already so extended, that with regard to Tarshish I can only add that the learned Dr. Daig supposes that it was the ancient Bætica (Andalusia) in Spain, and that Ophir lay somewhere to the W. of the Cape of Good Hope. See Dr. Smith's Dict. of Anc. Geogr. s. v. Tartessus, and "N. & Q." 2nd S. v. 101. Clarke gives the writers cited by Gosselin, who have considered Tarshish as a commercial mart; or who, like Bochart, have imagined there were two of the same name, situated in different quarters of the globe. Purchas, in his first volume, p. 44, has given a dissertation on this subject, and cites the authors of a new and more rational opinion, that by Tarshish was meant the Sea in its most extensive signification. BIBLIOTHECAR. CRETHER.

ELIZABETH, LANDGRAVINE OF HESSE HOMBERG, THIRD DAUGHTER OF GEORGE III.

Through the kindness of a friend, I have been favoured with the loan of the Book of Common Prayer that belonged formerly to this Princess. It has bound with it, at the commencement and the end of the book, many pages of prayers and meditations of her composition, and in her handwriting; and throughout the psalms, under the proper day of the month, are many entries of occurrences in her family and relating to herself.

Having permission from the owner of the book to make use of the MS. matter it contains, I have arranged these events chronologically; and, although most of them are well known, I believe the record of them in "N. & Q." in the words of one of our most worthy Princesses will make them highly interesting.

She was the third daughter (seventh child) of George III.; born May 22, 1770; died Jan. 10, 1840; having married April 7, 1818, Frederick Joseph Louis, Prince of Hesse Homberg.

Opposite the title-page of the book, she writes:—

"This Prayer Book was given to me by Genl Goldsworthy in 1786 during my great illness, and has ever proved my truest and most comforting friend in all my trials and distresses. The consolation of Religion has been the certain and sure Balm; wonderfully and mercifully has God supported me, and most grateful do I feel for the many blessings I possess."

I find, beside a prayer for the King during his illness in 1810:—

"A prayer made by the King the day of His Accession when he went to bed at night:—

"O Gracious and Good God, keep me from hidden and unknown enemies, silly and unguarded friends, make me to look up to Thee for all things, for the sake of Thy Son Jesus Christ. Amen."

The following is the chronicle of events above alluded to:—

"18 October, 1813. My beloved Fritz wounded at the Battle of Leipsick in the leg."

[This entry, evidently made after her marriage, refers to her husband.]

"Battle of Waterloo, 1815, 18 June."

"14th February, 1818. Saw the H. P. of Hesse Homberg for y^e 1st time at the Queen's House."

"My Wedding day, 7th April, 1818. I was married at y^e Queen's House."

"13 July, 1818, made my public entry into Francfort, and saw the Landgrave and Landgravine the 1st time."
 "Made my public entry into Hombourg July 14th, 1818."

"17th November, 1818, at Kew, my beloved mother closed Her respectable and valuable life."

"Hombourg, November 24th, was informed of my dear and ever to be lamented mother's death."

"The dear old Psa. of Antrecht Schaumbourg died at ten in y^e morning, 21st Jan. 1819."

"Hombourg, Friday, March 19th, 1819, Louisa brought a bed of a little Girl $\frac{1}{2}$ past four o'clock, evening."

"Hombourg, Gustave's little Girl christened, 25 March, 1819; named Caroline Amelia Elizabeth."

"At half-past eleven at night the dear old Landgrave breathed his last, 20 January, 1820."

"23 of Jan^y, 1820, died my brother Edward, at Sidmouth."

"My Angel Father ended his exemplary life on y^e 29th of Jan^y, 1820, $\frac{1}{2}$ past 8 o'clock evening, at Windsor Castle."

"1820, Sunday, 6th February, in y^e morning I heard of the death of my adored and dearest Father."

"Sunday, 6 of Febr, 1820, received the account of my beloved and most excellent Father's death."

"The Dowager Landgravine, died at a little after eight o'clock [morning], 18th September, 1821."

"The Landgravine was buried early in the morning, 25 September, 1821."

"Louisa brought a-bed of a Girl, the 30th Sept^r, 1823, 5 in the evening."

"Gustave's little Girl christened 30th October, 1823, by the name of Elizabeth Louisa Frederica."

"My dear Brother Frederick died in Arlington St, January fifth, 1827, at 20 minutes after 9 o'clock in the evening."

"Received the melancholy news of Fred's death at Hombourg, 10th Jan^y, evening, 1827."

"My dear and Beloved Sister of Wurtemberg, died at $\frac{1}{2}$ before 2 o'clock, y^e 6th of Oct^r, 1828."

"[Sister of Wurtemberg,] Charlotte, Princess Royal of England.]

"2nd of April, 1829. It pleased God to inflict me with the greatest of all blows. My adored Husband died at $\frac{1}{2}$ past ix. in the evening."

"The dear King George the 4th, my beloved brother, died at 3 o'clock in the morning, the 26th June, 1830."

"Anthem that was sung at Amelia's burial."

[Psal. xvi. 9—12. Princess Amelia, youngest child of George III., died Nov. 2, 1810.]

"My Father's favourite Psalm [exxxix.]."

TRETANE.

SIR JAMES TURNER: BATTLE OF PENTLAND, ETC.

Sir James Turner, whose memoirs were published by the Bannatyne Club, and who is said to be the prototype of Sir Dugald Dalgetty, was examined as a witness on the trial of Colonel James Wallace and others, Feb. 26, 1667. He was then "aged fiftie or thereby:—"

"He saw Colonel Wallace, Lermouth, Barsecob, Smith, and Welsh at Drumfries, Aire, Lanark, Collingtoun, Pentland, or at some of the said places; Depones that they had all pistols and swords, both the three Commanders, and Smith and Welsh ministers: That they were all at Pentland in armes in the Rebels armie."

Two other witnesses testify to the two ministers appearing in arms. (See Sampson's Riddle, or a Bunch of bitter Wormwood bringing forth a Bundle of Sweet-smelling Myrrh, p. 108.)

This very curious and extremely rare work contains the trials of the unfortunate persons concerned in these unhappy affairs, and most of the dying speeches.

The following is a list of part of the forfeitures of land in the west:—

"General Thomas Dalzell got a grant of Mure of Caldwell's estates situated in Air, Renfrew, and Lanark."

"Lieut.-General William Drummond of Cromlix (Lord Viscount Strathallan, 6th September, 1686), got a gift of the lands belonging to Robert Ker, laird of Kersland, in the parish of Dalry, Airshire."

"William Blair of that ilk got Kersland's lands of Over-toun, in the parish of Reeth in the same county."

"William Hamilton of Woulehaid (Wishaw) obtained Major Joseph Leomouth's estates in Lanark and Peebles."

This gentleman was the ancestor of Lord Belhewe.

"John Hamilton Younger of Halcraig had all the lands belonging to William Porterfield of Quarrelltoun in Renfrewshire."

William Welch, in the parish of Kilpatrick, one of the Pentland rebels, was, with John Grier in Fairmarkland, sentenced December 14, 1666, in a justiciary court held at Ayr, to be taken upon Wednesday, the second day of January, 1667, to the Market Cross of Dumfries, "and there betwixt two and four houres, in the afternoone, to be hanged on one gibbet till they be dead, and their heads and right hands to be cut off, and to be put on the posts and most publick places of the said toune of Dumfries."

This sentence was carried into effect; their bodies were interred in St. Michael's churchyard of Dumfries. In 1814 the Kirk Session ordered their tombstones to be repaired, when the following inscriptions were made legible:—

"Here lyes William Welsh, Pentland Martyr for his adhering to the Word of God; And Appearing for Christ's Kingly Government in His House, and the Covenanted work of Reformation, Against Perjurie and Prelacie. Execute Jan. 2, 1666(7). Rev. xii. 11."

"Stay, Passenger, Read,
 Here interr'd Doth ly
 A Witness 'Gainst poor
 Scotland's Perjury,
 Whose Head once Fix'd upon
 The Bridge-Post, Stood
 Proclaiming Vengeance
 For his Guiltles Blood."

That on Grier (or Grierson), also a Pentland rebel, is as follows:—

"Under this Stone lo here
 Doth Ly
 Dust Sacrificed To Tyranny,
 Yet Precious in Immanuel's Sight,
 Since Martyr'd For His
 Kingly Right:

When he Condemns
These Hellish Druges
By Suffrage Saints
Shall Judge Their Judges."

J. M.

DIFFICULTIES OF CHAUCER.

"WADES BOTE."

"They connen so moch craft on Wades bote."

The Marchantes Tale.

The Marchante, tendering advice on the subject of matrimony, recommends a young wife in preference to an old one; and then adds, proceeding to state his special objection to old widows, that "They connen so moch craft on Wades bote."

This passage has not hitherto received any full or clear explanation; and Tyrwhitt's remark is, "The allusion in the present passage to Wades bote can hardly be explained, without a more particular knowledge of his adventures, than we are now likely ever to attain."

Wade was a distinguished personage of northern mythology; and it was probably his practice, like that of some other eminent characters of mediæval superstition, warlocks, heroes, witches, &c., to go out in his boat alone. Hence, I would suggest, appears the peculiar force and import of the Marchante's allusion to Wade's boat. Widows are sometimes still called "lone women"; and what the Marchante would intimate is simply this: that, living alone, widows acquire craft as the consequence of their lone condition, which he signifies by saying "They connen [learn or study] so moch craft on Wades bote," i. e. in solitude.

SCHIN.

Folk Lore.

BAYEUX SUPERSTITIONS.

When any one dies in a house, a black rag must be suspended on the bee-hives, otherwise the bees will die within nine days.

Asses have a cross upon the back, because Christ rode into Jerusalem on the back of one of these animals.

Cattle have a conversation among themselves on Christmas Eve.

On Christmas Eve apparitions are most frequent, and it is then when witches have the greatest power.

Upon a portion of the yule-log some holy water is sprinkled, and then it is preserved throughout the year to guard the house against thunder.

There is a stoppage of the bowels called carreau, to which children are liable. In spite of the Revolution, a family of Bayeux retains the privilege of curing this malady by a simple touching: they are called carreau-touchers, and some quacks pretend to be in possession of the special gift because they belong to the family of St. Martin.

The head of the stag-beetle, carried in the pocket, brings luck.

The bite of a dog is cured by one of his hairs applied to the wound.

Misfortune attends the house towards which a dog comes howling.

Owlets hooting over a house presage the death of one of its inhabitants in a short time.

When a pig dies a natural death, the presage is sinister.

To own a halter by which one has been hanged, brings luck.

Toads are reputed venomous, and much in request for witchcraft purposes. In some parts of Normandy the people confer upon the toad the title of "Man's Friend," in the persuasion that the animal gives warning to people who sleep in the woods of the approach of serpents.

To find a horse-shoe, brings luck.

Shooting-stars are dying persons.

The woman with child who acts as a god-mother will die within the year, or the child called after her.

Fever is cured by carrying on the breast for nine days a living spider, enclosed in a nut-shell. Fever is also cured by means of certain mysterious words: as, "In the name of St. Exuperus and St. Honorine, fall-fever, spring-fever, quartian, quintian, ago, super ago, consummatus est,"—then say three Paters and three Aves. If, however, the fever still resists, the words must be written on virgin parchment, and bound round the left wrist of the patient; who must wear it for nine days, and then he will be entirely cured.

If the eyes of a young swallow are picked out, the mother goes and finds a small stone on the sea-shore with which she restores the lost sight. The one who is fortunate enough to find this stone in the nest, possesses a miraculous remedy.

Cock eggs bear serpents.

Parsley breaks glass. Sown in the shade, it turns to hemlock.

The hen that imitates the crowing of a cock, crows the death of her master or her own.

To spill salt betokens bad luck.

Mice, given to children, cure the whooping cough.

If on a certain day of the moon one stuffs his hand into a mole-skin, with that hand he can cure certain maladies of men and animals. Children are to be seen wearing a mole-skin round the neck to favour teething.

Four-leaved clover renders one invisible.

Friday is an unlucky day, and thirteen an unlucky number. Where thirteen sit down to table, one is sure to die before the year is out.

Crickets bring luck to a house.

To cure lameness, gripes, and other diseases in horses, you have only to pronounce these words: "St. John, St. John, St. John of Nicodemus, in the name of Elizabeth, I conjure thee that this beast may suffer no more than the holy Virgin suffered when she gave birth to Our Saviour Jesus Christ." Then five Paters and five Aves must be said. J. KESSON.

DORSETSHIRE FOLK LORE.—I saw in a cottage, the other day, a very small toy-loaf hanging over the chimney-piece; and, on inquiry, I was told that it had been baked on Good Friday. And, if it were carefully preserved, would prevent the good wife's bread from being "reamy," i. e. stringy, during the whole year. C. W. BINGHAM.

NORMAN FOLK LORE.—It is stated, in Life in Normandy (Edmonston and Douglas, 1863, vol. i. p. 14), that the young girls there have a superstition that such of them as do not assist at the annual Fête-Dieu, have no chance of being married for a twelvemonth. A. O. V. P.

CURE OF WARTS.—The following is practised in all parts of Ireland, and is believed by even the more intelligent classes, to be an effectual cure for warts. I have seen it done hundreds of times in the south-east of Ireland:—Take a small stone, less than a boy's marble, for each wart, and tie them in a clean linen bag, and throw it out on the highway. Then find out a stone in some field or ditch, with a hollow in which rain or dew may have lodged (such stones are easily found in rural districts) and wash the warts seven times therein, and after this operation whoever picks up the bag of stones will have a transfer of the warts. S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

CHARMS.—In A Book of Dreams, and other Things useful to know, printed for C. Halliday, Birmingham, 1784, are the following charms. I do not find them elsewhere, and wish to know whether they are current in Warwickshire or elsewhere? They do not look like mere inventions:—

"To rescue a House from Fleas.—When you first hear the cuckoo, take some of the earth or dust from the place on which your right foot is standing. Lay it on the threshold of your outer door, telling nobody, and neither fleas, earwigs, or beetles will cross it."

"A badger's tooth sewn within the waistcoat, brings luck at cards."

"If one be a drunkard, put a live eel in the liquor that he likes best; kill it there, and give him some to drink, and he will hate it ever after."

J. M. K.

Malvern.

ST. SWITHIN.—In the Huntingdonshire parish wherein I passed St. Swithin's Day, 1865, we had not a drop of rain. A cottager said to me, "It's a bad job for the apples that St. Swithin ha'n't ruined upon 'em." "Why so?" "Because, unless St. Swithin rains upon 'em, they'll never keep through the winter." CUTHBERT BEDE.

MAY KITTENS.—"A May kitten makes a dirty cat," is a piece of Huntingdonshire folk-lore quoted to me in order to deter me from keeping a kitten that had been born in May. CUTHBERT BEDE.

BITING BABIES' NAILS.—My niece tells me that, in conversation with a poor woman in a village near Bath, mention was made of the inmates of a neighbouring reformatory. The poor woman assigned as a reason for their propensity to pilfer and steal, that their mothers must have cut their nails before they were a year old. She always bit her babies' nails, otherwise they would turn out thieves. THUS.

BECKFORD'S "THOUGHTS ON HUNTING," ETC.—Some time ago I picked up a slender volume entitled—

"The Art and the Pleasures of Hare-Hunting, in Six Letters to a Person of Quality," by John Smallman Gardiner, Gent. London, 8vo, 1750, pp. 56.

Within is the book-plate of Charles Clark of Great Totham, and a long MS. note, probably in his writing, to the following effect:—

"This is the origin of Mr. Beckford's Thoughts on Hunting, which he has copied into his book, without having principle enough to acknowledge the obligation. This pamphlet is so very scarce that Mr. Barker of Covent Garden asks ten guineas for a copy; this scarcity is supposed to arise from its being bought up prior to Beckford's publication."

Now, I have always entertained a high respect for the Thoughts on Hunting by Peter Beckford, looking upon it as a classical treatise not unworthy to rank with the prose Cyngetica of Xenophon and Arrian, and the poetical ones of Nemesianus and Faliscus. Beckford, too, was a scholar; and, if not to be regarded as the Euclid of the venatory art, was, according to the Retrospective Review (vol. xiii. p. 230, part II.), the most accomplished hunter from the time of Nimrod to the present day;—one who "could bag a fox in Greek, find a hare in Latin, inspect his kennels in Indian, and direct the economy of the stable in excellent French." Such a man could hardly need to filch from an obscure tractarian; and I was pleased to fail in detecting the slightest plagiarism or imitation, or indeed any evidence that the later writer had seen the humble work of his predecessor. Having satisfied my mind as to this I replaced the books on the shelf, but was still at fault to account for the MS. note. The other day, however, on looking over another book on a similar subject entitled—

"Cyngeticon; or, Essays on Sporting, consisting of Observations on Hare-Hunting, &c., by William Blane, Esq." 8vo (N. D.)

I found the "Six Letters" are printed entire, among the treatises of which this volume is composed. The author's name is not given; but Blane can hardly be charged with the dishonest appropriation of which the MS. note makes mention, as he styles himself merely the "editor" of the volume, and states in his preface that one of the essays in his volume was received from a gentleman, who had transcribed it from a printed pamphlet which was very scarce, and which was given to him as "a singular curiosity."

This note will at least supply the name of the author of the "Six Letters," in Mr. Blane's volume, which, from the alleged rarity of the original pamphlet, might not be otherwise discoverable.

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

LEVINA BYNNYNCH, OR TEERLINC. — Mr. J. G. Nichols, in his Notices of the Contemporaries and Successors of Holbein (p. 39), writes thus of this celebrated painter in miniature: —

"She was the daughter of Simon Benich, of Bruges, also a miniaturist; who passed some time in England, and her husband appears to have been an Englishman."

Permit me to avail myself of your columns to rectify some errors in this paragraph. Levina's family name was Bynnych. I have met with her father's signature six times in the archives here, and once only has he signed his name otherwise—Byenyne. Levina's husband, George Teerlinc, was a burgess of Blankenberghe, a small seaport town between Ostend and Sluys. He was the second son of George Teerlinc by his third wife, Margaret van Ardoeye.

The latest proof I have found of George and Levina's being in Flanders, is an act passed by them before the burgomaster and sheriffs of Bruges on the 4th of February, 1545, when the mortuary accounts of George Teerlinc the elder were closed. They probably left Flanders for England shortly after, as Levina's name figures in the Household Accounts for the Midsummer term, 1547. The Teerlinc family arms were: Azure, a chevron or, accompanied by two dice; on a chief or, a star between two roses gules. George Teerlinc returned to Bruges, and died here in 1580. His property was inherited by his only surviving grandson, George, son of Mark.

What proof is there that Simon Bynnych "passed some time in England"? At the commencement of the sixteenth century (1514, 1516, 1517), he was living in Antwerp. He visited Bruges in 1508, 1512, 1516, and 1517; and settled here in 1518. There is proof of his being constantly here from then until 1555. When was he in England? Before 1517, or between June, 1555, and his death, which occurred before November, 1561, apparently at Bruges. The documents I have discovered concerning the Bynnychs are far too long for your columns; but if any of your readers are interested in those artists, they will find them given at length in the first of a series of papers on Flemish miniaturists in the Beffroi, vol. ii. pp. 298 to 320 (Barthes & Lowell, London, 1865). I should be glad to know if any of Simon or Levina's miniatures are known to exist in England, besides the Portuguese genealogies in the British Museum?

W. H. JAMES WEALE.

Bruges.

BRUNETTO LATINI: MONTHLY AND EUROPEAN MAGAZINES. — In the early volumes of the Monthly Magazine are a variety of interesting original documents. Amongst these are extracts from the portfolio of "A Man of Letters," which, if genuine, are well worthy of being reprinted. For instance, certain letters, said to be translated from "Brunetto Latini," who is asserted to have been in England in the reign of Henry III., and who had an interview with Roger Bacon, in which a variety of discoveries were communicated, such as the mode of making gunpowder, the virtues of the magnet, &c., &c. All this is assuredly curious, if true. Some of your contributors will be able, no doubt, to enlighten my ignorance on the point, and tell who "the Man of Letters" really was. But irrespective of this, a very valuable miscellany might be made of original letters and papers contained in this Magazine, which at the present period would be received with pleasure by the reading public. But the most valuable of these periodicals is the European, which I have understood was for a long time edited by Isaac Reed, in every number of which will be found an infinity of original papers of deep interest and value. I had the good fortune recently to purchase for a very small sum a complete set of this miscellany, in the finest condition, and elegantly bound, the plates in the best possible state; and on going through the volumes I was astonished at the mass of out-of-the-way information it contained, portions of which, I cannot help thinking, might also be turned, by an enterprising publisher, to account.

J. M.

THE NORTHMEN. — The dwellers in the North of Europe are in England and by English writers nearly always correctly called "Northmen," signifying the ancient inhabitants of the three Scandinavian kingdoms, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. In France they are termed "Normands." Nevertheless, the word "Norsemen," used with the same signification, is also now and then to be met with amongst English writers. This is, however, not only incorrect but erroneous, the word "Norsemen" denoting only the Norwegians, the inhabitants of the kingdom of old Norway, but by no means those of Denmark and Sweden. The word "Norse" was in ancient times used to signify that patois which the Norwegian colonists spoke in the Orkney isles, and in the county of Caithness (Scotland); and the appellation "Norse" can therefore correctly be applied only to that language which the Norwegian commonalty then spoke; while "the Northmen," spelled North, not Norse, comprise as an aggregate all the ancient dwellers of all Scandinavia, those hardy mariners whose prowls graced on the New England shores five centuries before Columbus (whose correct name, however, was Colon, Columbus being merely a barbarous perversion) saluted Guanahanie.

The great antiquaries, C. C. Rafer of Copenhagen, and Jacob Grimm of Berlin, caution against all heedless commixtion of "North" and "Norse."

PAUL C. SENDING.

Denmark.

BOSH. — In The Slang Dictionary, 1864, p. 81, is the following passage: —

"BOSH, nonsense, stupidity. — Gipsy and Persian. Also pure Turkish, 'Bosh Lakerdi,' empty talk. A person, in the Saturday Review, has stated that bosh is coeval with Morier's novel, Hadjji Baba [Hajji Baba] which was published in 1828; but this is a blunder. The term was used in this country as early as 1760, and may be found in the Student, vol. ii. p. 217."

The "person" thus spoken of by the compiler of The Slang Dictionary was the writer of an able critique upon an earlier edition of the work, and is undoubtedly correct as to the way in which the word bosh first came into popular use in this country. In the year 1828 I was pretty well up in slang, and I can testify that to me, and to all my acquaintances, the word was then perfectly new. I remember my first reading of Morier's novel as vividly as if I had read it but yesterday. Everybody quoted it; and not only bosh, but several Persian phrases, also occurring in the work, at once took the fancy of the public, and have ever since been more or less naturalised with us—such as, "To eat dirt," in the sense of being humiliated; "May your shadow never be less," &c. The word bosh still betrays its literary origin in being more or less confined to the educated classes. One does not hear it among the true slangy population of the streets.

What is The Student so curtly mentioned by the dictionary writer? Can any correspondent of "N. & Q." verify the reference which is said to prove that bosh was in use, as a slang word, in 1760?

JAYDEE.

[The Student, or the Oxford and Cambridge Monthly Miscellany, 2 vols. was published 1750-1. The word bosh does not occur at p. 217 of the second volume.—ED.]

Queries.

BARROW FAMILY.

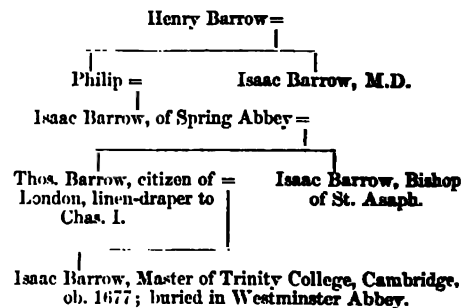

In 1 Richard III. Thomas Barowe was made Master of the Rolls, and subsequently received other appointments (Foss's Judges, iv. 485). He died circa 1497, and his will is in the Prerogative

Court of Canterbury. He had a brother Richard, a merchant of the Staple of Calais, who died in 1505, and to whom (with his wife Beatrix) there is a brass in the church of Winthorp, near Burgh, Lincolnshire. In 16 Edw. IV. there was a grant of arms by J. Yrlande, King of Arms, to Thos. Barowe and his heirs: "A schochune of sabil, a row [roe] of silver in his kynde, a barr of gold, in chief too flour-delyse of y^e same" (Harl. MS. 1820, 71^b and 60.)

In 11 Hen. VII. there was a grant to Thos. Barowe, his brother Richard and Richard's issue, to beare: —

"Quarterly, 1. Sabul, two swords (y^e poyntes upward) crossed, pomelled-hylted and fretted sylver, between foure flour-de-lyse golde, a bordure sylver and purple. The 2nd quarter, Sabul; in the base parte a roo passant in his own kynde sylver, a bar, in y^e chefe two flour-delyse golde."

In 3 & 18 Chas. I., Maurice Barrowe was sheriff of Suffolk. His arms (given by Fuller) were: Sa. two swords in saltire arg. hilted, between four fleur-de-lys or, within a border compoy of the second and purple. Isaac Barrow, M.D. (brother of Philip, the great grandfather of Isaac the Master of Trinity), was buried at All Saints' Church, Cambridge. On his monument were the arms: Sa. two swords in saltire arg. hilts and pummels or, between four fleur-de-lys of the third. From the above, we may suppose the Master of Trinity to have been a descendant from Richard, buried at Winthorp; who in his will, made in 1502, names three sons—Thomas, John, and Richard. The following genealogy is culled from the brief memoir prefixed to the Works of Isaac Barrow: —

If Richard Barowe, of Winthorp, was the progenitor of the Master of Trinity, can any of your readers fill up the hiatus in the genealogy? The family and the arms of Barrow are mentioned in "N. & Q." 1st S. ii. 247; 2nd S. vi. 288. B. Lincoln.

ANONYMOUS.—1. Who is the author of a volume of Moral Tales, &c. published at London in 1820, with the title, Friendly Advice to Poor Neighbours.

This little book, which possesses considerable merit, was, if I mistake not, the composition of a lady.

2. Who is the English translator of Madame de Genlis's Memoirs, in 8 vols. 1825?

3. Who is the author of a juvenile work having the following title—Dialogues between three little Girls, calculated to facilitate their progress in Knowledge and Virtue. London, 1821?

R. INGLIS.

BANCA CAVA.—What is the Banca cava of the Inquisition, as mentioned in Kingsley's Westward Ho?

MARCHEMONT.

BALFOUR FAMILY OF BURLEIGH.—It is stated in a note to the 44th chapter of Sir Walter Scott's Old Mortality (Abbotsford edit. vol. ii. p. 673), that the family of Balfour of Burleigh yet exists in Holland or Flanders. We are told that "the Brussels papers of 28th July, 1828," speak of Lieutenant-Colonel Balfour de Burleigh as "Commandant of the troops of the King of the Netherlands in the West Indies."

I am anxious to know whether the connection with the Scottish Balfours can be proved.

K. P. D. E.

BEEWICKSHIRE.—Are there any collections for a history of this county in existence? F. M. S. 229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

DR. BLISS'S LIBRARY OF OXFORD BOOKS.—It would be interesting to learn whether the unrivalled collection of books printed at Oxford belonging to Dr. Bliss (as sold by Messrs. Sotheby & Wilkinson, August 9—12, 1858) included the whole of the Oxford books in his possession; or whether, as I have heard, the Curators of the Bodleian Library had the opportunity of obtaining any they did not previously possess before the sale? And further, whether the Bodleian had the same privilege as to his general library? Booksellers are accustomed to add, by way of recommendation, "Not in Dr. Bliss's Collection of Oxford Books;" which would justly be esteemed an indication of great rarity (especially as to the early examples) if all were publicly sold.

DR. H. COTTON'S remarks in "N. & Q." (3rd S. vii. 432), shows how readily bibliographical errors may arise; and when attention is called to them, be explained or contradicted.

The authority and value of this Catalogue (and there are few better) would, I conceive, be somewhat increased by a satisfactory reply to the above queries; and impartial testimony to the rarity of books is of much importance. Should any have been thus purchased for the Bodleian, a list of them would be an acceptable contribution to "N. & Q." and an indispensable supplement to the Catalogue, as indicating with tolerable correctness the rarities. EDWARD RIGGALL.

Baywater.

Mrs. CURSHAM.—Can you give me any information regarding Mrs. Cursham, authoress of Martin Luther, a poem, 1826, another edition, 1828; Sacred and other Poems, 1833? Has this lady published any other work? R. INGLIS.

IDENTITY OF ARMS.—In the following instances I find the same arms borne by more than one family:—

1. Gules, three nests or: by Robert de Caen, Earl of Gloucester, and Granville, Earls of Bath.

2. Or, three torteauxes: by Courtenay, and the Counts of Boulogne.

3. Chequy, or and azure; by Vermandois and Warrene.

4. Gules, four fusils in fesse, argent: by Danbeney and De Carteret.

5. Gules, four fusils in fesse, argent, each charged with an escalop sable: by Newmarch and Cheyney of Pinhoe.

How, in each of these cases, is the identity to be accounted for? P. S. O.

"GRAVE MAURICE."—Can you tell me what historical character is known as "Grave Maurice." Is it Maurice of Saxony, temp. 1521, or Maurice of Nassau, the son of William the Silent. A picture of a man in armour, bearing such a ruff as worn in the days of Elizabeth, has this inscription: "Grave Maurice." Can any of your readers oblige me by saying who this may be? N. R. Leicester.

GEORGE MEYERS, M.A. (3rd S. viii. 107).—J. M. R. seems to possess a book of which I can find no account in Watt, Lowndes, or elsewhere. Will he oblige your readers with a short account of the author and the date of his death? S. Y. R.

MURDER BY A BISHOP.—Can any one inform me if an English bishop was ever known to commit a murder, and bail accepted to the amount of 5000*l.*, but at the time of the trial he was not forthcoming, and that he being a bishop was allowed to forfeit his bail? Noto.

"PHEANDER, THE MAYDEN KNIGHT."—Of this work, ascribed to Henry Roberts, who is the known author of several others of a similar kind, only three editions have come as yet under my notice: the first of 1596, 4*to*; another in 1617, 4*to*; and a much later one in 1661, 4*to*. Can any reader of "N. & Q." add to this list? There can be little question that there were other impressions. W. CAREW HAZLITT.

BIRTH-PLACE OF C. I. F. I.—To the Romanist Archbishop of York, by Lord Macaulay as the 'R' I find no fewer than three 1. Leland (Itin. vii. 25) says. Sturton Castel (Stafford), it

Pole lay at it by licens, and there Cardinal Pole was borne." 2. Beccatelli, in Vita Reg. Poli (1st edit., Venet., 1663), asserts that London was the place of his nativity. Beccatelli was Archbishop of Ragusa, and Pole's contemporary; in a second edition of his work, however (London, 1690), it is observable that the word "London" is omitted by the editor. 3. Dallaway (Hist. of Sussex, i. 195) maintains that there is a fair presumption that he was born at Lordington (Sussex): an opinion which Mr. Longcroft has fortified in a recent pamphlet, The Valley of the Ems. It is remarkable that Parker, Pole's successor in the primacy, in his account of the Cardinal's life, makes no mention of his birth-place. With respect to Lordington House, a part of which still remains, it is certain that it once belonged to Geoffrey, the Cardinal's brother; and that it was erected by his father, Sir Richard Pole, is probable. We may dismiss the tradition which yet lingers there of a lady apparition, with neck encircled by a blood-red stain; but the horrible circumstances of his mother's execution, at the instance of Henry VIII., appal every reader of English history. The tragical end of Margaret, Countess of Salisbury, doubtless caused much terror at Lordington, where, on the balustrade of the oaken staircase, the dragon cognisance of the house of Tudor may now be seen. Six miles from Lordington is South Harting: to this rectory, at the age of twenty-six, Reginald Pole was appointed by the patron, his brother Henry—an additional circumstance which connects him with this vicinity. Almost every writer since Camden has implicitly followed the statement of Leland. Can any reader of "N. & Q." furnish me with documentary or other evidence in support of this, or afford me any information on the subject?

F. H. ARNOLD.

Chichester.

QUOTATION WANTED.—On the tombstone of a clergyman in Golcar Churchyard are the following lines:—

"Lay me down kindly in my mother's lap,
Her own green mantle spread above me:
There let me rest.
As I came forth, so I return to dust,
And mingle with the grand old earth again:
Tomb of my ancient line."

Where are the above lines taken from?

GEORGE LLOYD.

Thurstonland.

THE EARL OF POVERTY.—Can you oblige me with any information as to the authority on which it is stated that the title of Earl of Poverty was assumed by John Paslew, the last Abbot of Whalley, during the rebellion called "The Pilgrimage of Grace?" The historian of the abbey, Whittaker, does not mention it, and James Clarke, in his Survey of the Lakes (1789), says that the title was borne by one of the leaders in that rising who was a fisherman at Hawkshead. H. C. G. Bebington.

REGIMENTAL MEDAL.—Can any old 87th man inform me if the Regiment had a regimental medal, like the 5th Foot, and a few other regiments? I have been told that the Regiment (87th) wore a medal:—Ob. Bust of William III.; "The glorious and immortal memory." Rev. The royal arms; "King and constitution." Which medal, I believe to be a political one; and, therefore doubt its ever being sanctioned to be worn by any regiment. L. N. O.

STONEHENGE.—Bishop Gibson contends that Stonehenge could not have been erected by the Danes, "as for many other reasons so particularly, because it is mentioned in some manuscripts of Nennius: who, as everybody knows, wrote almost 200 years before the Danes were masters of any considerable part of this island." Nennius, in the Historia Britonum, mentions the treacherous massacre of the British chiefs; but I do not find any mention of Stonehenge. Can any one inform me where Stonehenge, by any of its names, is mentioned by Nennius? J.

THE TEMPLARS IN SCOTLAND.—In a recent work, The Arnold Historical Prize Essay for 1895, by A. P. Marras, B.A., there occurs a statement drawn from Eckert, Die Heidenkirche, which perhaps some correspondent of "N. & Q." can elucidate. The passage in the essay runs thus:—

"It is scarcely possible that all the traditions of so powerful an Order can have been swept away at once; indeed, the modern French 'Templiers' pretend to have kept up the succession of Grand Masters unbroken, and consider themselves the direct descendants of the Order of the Knights Templars, of which some remains can perhaps be traced in Scotland (Eckert says, Heidenkirche, p. 364, that the Knights who escaped assembled in one of the Hebrides, and there reorganised their Fraternity), and in Germany, where, instead of strange and Eschmotic rites, a kind of mysticism mingled with Alchemy and Cabalism arose, that of the Rosicrucians."

It is to be supposed that Mr. Marras was satisfied that Eckert had authority for his assertion of the reorganisation of the Knights Templars in the Hebrides, but I confess so bare and unsupported a statement seems to want confirmation. I should be glad to know whether any traces of the Order of the Temple really were discovered in Scotland after its public abolition by the Pope; and what, if any, was the authority followed by Eckert in stating the discovery.

Many places in Scotland bear names that associate them with the Templars; e.g. Templelands, near Dundee; Temple, St. Boswell's; several Templehalls, and also Templetons; a Templehouse, near Inverness, another near Stewarton; a Tem- plesland, near Falkland; and Temples, near Eaglesham by Glasgow. Probably these all indicate seats of the Order in olden time. Is there any good account of the Temple establishments in Scotland during the Early Middle Ages, before the Hospitallers succeeded to their lands? Is the list of its chief officers in Scotland to be found in any accessible work? A valuable tract, entitled Templaria, gives a good list of lands that had belonged to the Order. C. H. E. CARMICHAEL.

Queries with Answers.

BIRTHS OF GREAT PAINTERS. — I should feel exceedingly obliged if you or some of the correspondents of "N. & Q." could tell me when the following celebrated painters were born. I have given the dates of some of their deaths, thinking it might facilitate the means of finding out their births: —

1. Pellegione da Modena; he resided at Rome. [Born about 1585.]
2. Biagio Pupini Bolognese.
3. Maturino; he resided at Rome; died, 1527. [Born at Florence, 1490.]
4. Battista Franco; he resided at Rome; died, 1561. [Born at Venice, 1498.]
5. Ugo da Carpi. [Born at Rome, 1496; died, about 1530.]
6. Piero Ligorio; he resided at Naples; died, 1573. [Born at Naples, 1493.]
7. Bartolomeo Passerotto; he resided at Rome. [Born at Bologna about 1540; died, 1595.]
8. Ventura Salinbena. [Born at Sienna, 1557; died, 1613.]
9. Benedetto del Castiglione, a Genoese; he travelled in Italy. [Born at Genoa, 1616; died, 1670.]
10. Giacomo Cortesi. [Born at Franche-Comte in 1621.]
11. Abraham Diepenbeck. [Born at Bois le Duc, 1607; died, 1675.]
12. Filippo Lauri. [Born at Rome, 1623; died, 1694.]
13. Ciro Ferri. [Born at Rome, 1634; died, 1689.]
14. Nicolas Mignard; he resided at Paris; died, 1668. [Born at Troyes, 1608.]
15. Laurent de la Hire; he resided at Paris; died 1668. [Born at Paris, 1606.]
16. Francis Chaveau; he resided at Paris; died, 1674. [Born at Paris, 1613.]
17. Nicolas Loyer; he resided at Rome; died, 1679. [Born at Antwerp, 1625.]

THOMAS T. DYER.

IRISH LEGEND. — In Lecky's Rationalism in Europe, the author, referring to the French Revolution, has written in a passage of more than ordinary beauty and eloquence —

"The history of the movement was like that of the enchanted well of the Irish Legend, which lay for centuries shrouded in darkness in the midst of a gorgeous city, till some careless hand left open the door which had enclosed it, and the morning sunlight flashed upon its waters. Immediately it arose responsive to the beam, it burst the barriers that had confined it, it submerged the city which had surrounded it, and its resistless waves, chanting wild music to heaven, rolled over the temples and over the palaces of the past."

What legend is here alluded to? W. K.
Sehore, Central India.

[There are many Irish legends, varying in some respects, which account for the existence of the lakes of that country; but all have one common source—the neglecting to close the entrance to an enchanted fountain, which caused an inundation, and covered, in a single night, fair and fertile fields, and houses and palaces, with water. Six centuries ago Giraldus Cambrensis (Topography of Ireland, chap. ix.) favoured us with an account of a great lake in Ulster which originated in the following remarkable manner: "The land now covered by the lake was inhabited from the most ancient times by a tribe sunk in vice, and more especially incorrigibly addicted to the sin of carnal intercourse with beasts more than any other people of Ireland. Now there was a common proverb in the mouths of the tribe, that whenever the well-spring of that country was left uncovered (for out of reverence shewn to it, from a barbarous superstition, the spring was kept covered and sealed), it would immediately overflow and inundate the whole province, drowning and destroying all the population. It happened, however, on some occasion that a young woman, who had come to the spring to draw water, after filling her pitcher, but before she had closed the well, ran in great haste to her little boy, whom she heard crying at a spot not far from the spring, where she had left him. But the voice of the people is the voice of God; and on her way back, she met such a flood of water from the spring that it swept off her and the boy, and the inundation was so violent that they both, and the whole tribe, with their cattle, were drowned in an hour in this partial and local deluge. A confirmation of this occurrence is found in the fact, that the fishermen in that lake see distinctly under the water, in calm weather, ecclesiastical towers, which, according to the custom of the country, are slender and lofty, and moreover round; and they frequently point them out to strangers travelling through those parts, who wonder what could have caused such a catastrophe." Consult also Hall's Ireland, its Scenery, Character, &c. i. 191.]

JOHN DE TREVISA. — The above named personage is said by Bale, &c., to have lived both the Old and the New Testament era. Is it known on what authority he is named? This assertion? Mr. John Lewis, in History of the Translations of the Bible (p. 50, London, 1818), seems to be confident Bale was mistaken. But I have seen Usher, and Wharton, as well corporation to have desired contributions towards the work. You will judge of the workmanship from hence,—that King Charles I. was represented as a stout corpulent man. The whole was thought to be done in so ill a taste that it is not to be erected again; and the materials have been already in part applied to other uses." (Addit. MS. 6210, p. 12, Brit. Museum.) Thomas Ricketts's drawing of the cross was engraved by George Vertue for the Society of Antiquaries in 1751.]

"A WELSH MAIN."—I have recently met with this phrase, designating a sport or pastime, in Southey's Omniana. What is its meaning?

D. BLAIR.

Melbourne.

[A Welsh main was connected with the barbarous pastime of cock-fighting. It consists of a certain or given number of pairs of cocks, suppose sixteen, which fight with each other until one half of them are killed; the sixteen conquerors are pitted a second time in like manner, and half are slain; the eight survivors, a third time; the four, a fourth time; and the remaining two, a fifth time: so that thirty-one cocks are sure to be inhumanly murdered for the sport and pleasure of the spectators. Vide Mr. Pegge's Memoir on Cock-fighting in the Archæologia, iii. 182, and Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, edit. 1845, p. 282.]

"ÆSOP NATURALIZED."—There is an old and humorous translation of Æsop's Fables, in familiar verse, under the title of Æsop Naturalized. The title-page is wanting; but the first line—

"A cock upon a dunghill bred,"— will indicate the work I mean. Can any of your readers tell me who is the author? It is not mentioned by Watt or the usual authorities.

W. M. T.

[This work is entitled, "Æsop Naturalized: in a Collection of Diverting Fables and Stories from Æsop, Lockman, Pilpay, and others; with useful Morals and Reflections, in easy and familiar verse. Adapted to all capacities, and intended principally for the Entertainment and Instruction of the Youth of both sexes. The Seventh Edition, with the addition of above Fifty New Fables. London, Printed for C. Bathurst, in Fleet Street, 1771." We cannot discover the name of the Editor.]

OLD FINGER RING.—Some time ago a massive silver ring was found in a field near Cokerkmouth, bearing the following inscription (inside) in an old italic hand,—"As I deserve soe I desire," and the hall-mark, E.D. Is this the hall-mark of Edward VI.? and is there any published work explanatory of old hall-marks?

HENRY T. WAKE.

Cokerkmouth.

[See three interesting papers "On the Assay Marks on Gold and Silver Plate," by Octavius Morgan, Esq., M.P., in the Archæological Journal, Nos. 24, 25, and 26, and since republished in an octavo volume.]

Replies.

DRAGON IN HERALDRY: ST. GEORGE.

(3rd S. viii. 55, 79, 138.)

How any one could assert that Dr. Milner identifies St. George with the "infamous" George of Cappadocia, when the express object of his Historical and Critical Inquiry, &c., is to prove the contrary, is more than I can conceive or attempt to characterise. I say the same of the assertion that St. George of England is so identified by Alban Butler and Hussenbeth. As to the latter, he merely edited an edition of Butler's Lives without altering the text, but omitting the notes, and less important lives. But can any one who has read Alban Butler's account of St. George seriously assert that he identifies him with the "infamous" George? There is not a shadow of truth in such an assertion. It is true indeed that Butler states from Metaphrastes that St. George was born at Cappadocia; and so far, but certainly no farther, may each be styled George of Cappadocia. But why is Mr. Butler's decisive note altogether ignored? It suffices to settle the question; and is as follows:—

"Certain ancient heretics forged false acts of St. George, which the learned Pope Gelasius condemned in his famous Roman Council in 494. Calvin and the Centurians call him an imaginary saint: but their slander is confuted by most authentic titles and monuments. Jurieu (Apol. de Reform. t. i.), Reynolds, and Echard blush not to confound him with George the Arian, usurper of the see of Alexandria, the infamous persecutor of St. Athanasius and the Catholics, whom he endeavoured to drag into Arianism by butchering great numbers, banishing their bishops, plundering the houses of orphans and widows, and outraging the nuns with the utmost barbarity, till the Gentiles, exasperated by his cruelties and scandalous behaviour, massacred him, under Julian. The stories of the combat of St. George with the magician Athanasius, and the like trumpery, came from the mint of the Arians, as Baronius takes notice: and we find them rejected by Pope Gelasius and the other Catholics, who were too well acquainted with the Arian wolf, whose acts they condemned, to confound him with this illustrious martyr of Christ: though the forgeries of the heretics have been so blended with the truth in the history of this holy martyr, that, as we have it, there is no means of separating the sterling from the counterfeit. See, in Dr. Heylin's History of St. George, the testimonies of writers in every age from Gelasius I. in 492, downwards, concerning this holy martyr."

How could any one, who had seen this in Alban Butler, assert that he identifies St. George the Martyr with George the infamous Arian? Why even Gibbon, the sneering infidel, did not venture to affirm positively that the infamous George had been transformed into the renowned St. George; but adds in his note, "This transformation given as absolutely certain, but as a fable." Pity that the "solemn verbon, bent as he was upon "a creed" of Christianity, should so the sound observations of a

NOTES AND QUERIES.

The word dēā, about which F. C. H. doubts, is a common abbreviation for dicta, and the line is evidently an hexameter belonging to a time when the false quantity in the second syllable would have been of small account. C. G. PROWERT.

Is not the right reading of the line —

"Misteriis sacris repleant nos dicta Johannis,"

"May the words of St. John fill us with sacred mysteries"? By this reading the line will scan, which would not be the case if we read "decan-tata." A. A.

Poets' Corner.

KITTY FISHER. (3rd S. viii. 81.)

Since my notes on Kitty Fisher appeared in your columns, I have been favoured by the Rev. W. J. Edge with the following communication, written by a lady in his parish, who remembers the particulars from hearing, when a child, her mother talk about Mrs. Norris: —

"Kitty Fischer, the wife of John Norris of Hemsted, was buried in the family vault in the chancel of Benenden Church, where her husband rests by her side. She was a good wife, and greatly beloved by the village poor. She was a celebrated horsewoman. She used to accompany her husband in his rides over the estate and neighbourhood. It was well known she allowed no gates to be opened for her, but cleared them with ease and grace. She rode a beautiful high-spirited blood mare, as black as jet. Mrs. Norris lived only a few years after her marriage. When she died, the favourite was given to my grandfather. Kitty, for that was her name, lived to be old; and was buried in one of my fields, I do not know where.

"Catherine Wynne was a beloved companion of Miss Norris, sister to John Norris. She was a clergyman's daughter of good family, and highly respected by all who knew her. Miss Norris had her friend buried in Benenden churchyard, and placed a stone slab over her remains, enclosed by an iron railing.

"I have an engraving by Houghton of Sir J. Reynolds's portrait of Kitty Fischer. Unfortunately, it has been much injured.

"S. C."

Mr. Edge also tells me that he is informed that the cause of Mrs. Wynne's tomb having the inscription confined to one half of its slab, was that the other half was to have recorded the death of Miss Norris, who wished to be buried by the side of Mrs. Wynne. G. W. J.

It has been said of Sir Joshua Reynolds, he was so pure-minded a man that he could never recognise an impure expression in the countenance of any that sat to him for their portraits; and that so "when he painted Nelly O'Brien and Kitty Fisher, who were rampants w——s, he made them both angels of purity and virtue." In the engraving of the latter celebrated lady, by Richard Purcel in 1759, from one of Sir Joshua's pictures, there is certainly no expression of the most severe taste in his delineation of a woman who must have been a very pretty and fashionable woman. I have never seen an original portrait of her by him, now in the possession of John P. Mache, Esq., M.P. of Peckforton, Cheshire, which she is represented in the character of a patra dissolving the pearl. Whatever may have been her vices or her virtues, there can be no doubt, from what I have heard, of her having proved herself a most useful wife to Mr. Norris. He, by a course of dissipation and extravagance, had involved his estate to such an extent, when he married Kitty Fisher, that nothing but ruin was imminent; but she, by the influence she had acquired over him, by her good sense and prudent management, so redeemed the state of his affairs, that had she not been prematurely off by smallpox, she would have completely succeeded in retrieving his broken fortune. She was his second wife; and after her death he married for his third, a French actress. John Norris, Esq., was for twelve years M.P. for Rye, a borough in that time in the patronage of the Lamb family. There are at Brickwall two large-sized half-length black profiles of John Norris and Kitty Fisher which were presented to Thomas Frewen, Esq., by the late G. Augustus Lamb, D.D.

W. W. S.

Being on a visit to the pleasant but little known village of Brixton, Isle of Wight, as "N. & Q." cannot be missed, it has followed me here. As another proof of the wide-spread fame of Kitty Fisher, I send the following lines, which two female relations tell me were current some fifty years ago in the girls' schools of this island and of Hampshire: —

"Lucy Locket lost her pocket,

Kitty Fisher found it:

The deuce a farthing was there in 't —

Only the binding round it."

J. A. G.

CUE.

(3rd S. vii. 317, 427; viii. 113.)

With all due respect to your correspondent A. A. and MR. BOLTON CORNEY (clarum et venerabile nomen), I cannot help thinking that their remarks, in re "cue," are as the words that darken counsel. Any theatrical prompter will tell these gentlemen, that the cue is simply and literally the tag or tail end of the speech to which the actor interlocutor has to make reply. The shorter the cue, the better the player will retain it in his memory. Thus, if A has to say to B "I am glad you have returned to town, and am delighted to see you," the proper cue would be "delighted to see you," shorter still, "to see you." The first, and actors afterwards adopt the principle which, I am told, obtains in the army. To the civilian, "Shoulder arms!" is a command which the soldier at once obeys. The professional miles, however, divides the direction into two parts. "Shoulder" only puts him on the alert; but "arms"—or rather "humph"—is the real command which causes him to shoulder his musket. It is his cue, in fact. The etymology of cue is, I think, transparently obvious. It is nothing more nor less than queue—tail, or end. A pigtail is a queue; and a billiard-ball propeller is a cue, and the butt-end of a speech is a cue or queue.

GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA.

The word cue, like most short ones, has many meanings. In the theatrical sense of the end words of the previous speech, which an actor has to commit to memory as well as his own part (role), the French do not use the word queue. The following are the terms used by the French, corresponding to the various meanings of our word cue. The hair-dresser's queue: the tail of hair of various designations, pig, &c. In the sense of the part a man is to play or recite in his turn, they say role; but this is not precisely what we mean by cue theatrically, for which I cannot find the exact equivalent in French. In the sense of end, they use la fin, le bout d'une chose quelconque, and replique. The stick in billiard-playing is queue. In the sense of hint, it is signe, mot. In the sense of humour, it is humeur, veine. The name queue is also given in France to the liard = quadrans = the fourth part of an as. It is of kindred derivation with the Latin cauda, and the Italian and Spanish coda. Although the French do not, I believe, use any word precisely as we do for the actor's cue, the German has the exact meaning in ende (end) and stichwort (stitch-word). Cue is well explained in Danish, as enden af en ting (end of a thing).

It may be convenient to point out all the passages in Shakspeare where this word cue occurs: Merry Wives of Windsor, Act III. Sc. 2, 3; Much ado About Nothing, Act II. Sc. 1; Midsummer Night's Dream, Act III. Sc. 1 his; Act IV. Sc. 1, Act V. Sc. 1; Henry V., Act III. Sc. 6; Richard III., Act III. Sc. 4; Lear, Act I. Sc. 2; Hamlet, Act II. Sc. 2; Othello, Act I. Sc. 2.

T. J. BUCKTON.

SECOND SIGHT.

(3rd S. viii. 65, 111, 136.)

F. C. H. and myself shall probably never agree in this matter; but before I quit it, allow me to explain my meaning a little more precisely.

Cases of the kind under consideration consist of several parts. For example, in this instance there are, 1st. The presumed apparition or vision; 2nd. An event coincident with the apparition, but not connected with it by any known law of nature; that is, the illness and death of the person who was the subject of the apparition; and 3rd. Another event which followed at a little interval; that is, the death of the witness of the apparition. And the point to be determined is, whether there was any kind of connexion, natural or supernatural, between these several circumstances.

Of these events, only the first is claimed to be supernatural. The second and third lie within the range of ordinary experience, and are of the kind that can easily be established by proof. The first falls without that range, and is not easy of proof, and yet the conclusions to be drawn from the whole matter depend entirely on its being proved. If it be not established, the presumed chain of sequences is broken.

The proof of the first point rested with the old shepherd. He alone saw the apparition, or whatever it was. He knew not only all the facts of the appearance, but the state of his own mind, and of his own powers of observation at the time. He knew the precise spot where the apparition was seen, and whether, in the dimness of a Michaelmas evening, he was likely to have taken one man for another, or to have fallen into some other blunder.

Now the case was dealt with in the way of judgment by two parties. On the one side by certain gentlemen, who concluded from what the shepherd had stated that the appearance was that of the dying man, and consequently that it was supernatural. They drew also certain other conclusions which appear to me to be very extraordinary, but it is not necessary to enter into them. The case must stand or fall upon the establishment of the first point.

The gentlemen, as I have stated, determined that the apparition was supernatural. But the case was also judged by the old shepherd himself, the man who knew all the circumstances with a familiarity which no one else could possess. What did he think of it? He had "not the least idea of the affair being any thing supernatural." How he explained the matter we are not informed. Whether he was stupid enough to believe that a man could be in two places at once, or wise enough to think that he had made some mistake about the matter, does not appear. All that we are told is, that the gentlemen drew certain conclusions from a presumed fact which they judged to be supernatural, and that the only person who knew of his own knowledge anything about that fact judged it not to be so.

They who think this was satisfactory, may agree with F. C. H. I do not think so, and must therefore beg to be allowed to differ from him. J. B.

LONGEVITY.

PARR AND JENKINS (3rd S. viii. 64.)—I am sorry to find that the Editor's invitation for references to hitherto unknown contemporary allusions to these patriarchs has not succeeded in calling forth any such notices. I have recently met with two statements in an article on "Longevity" in Good Words of July last, for which the writer, Andrew Wynter, M.D., will perhaps be good enough to furnish his authority. The value of his paper is very much reduced by the absence of all reference to the sources of his information. As a member of the medical profession, Dr. Wynter, I feel assured, would not have advanced any such remarkable statements as those I am about to refer to, except upon what he believed to be sufficient evidence; and therefore I trust he will supply that evidence to the readers of "N. & Q."

At p. 493, when treating of Henry Jenkins and speaking of the value of testimony of contemporaries, Dr. Wynter says:—

"If, however, sceptics must have documentary evidence of a circumstance which was patent to the whole country side, we have the best of all such proof in the fact that the Registers of the Court of Chancery prove that he gave evidence ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY YEARS BEFORE HIS DEATH."

The Registers of the Court of Chancery is a very vague reference. I hope Dr. Wynter will supply some further particulars of volume, page, name of suit, or something which will enable the curious to procure a copy of Jenkins's evidence from the Public Record Office.

At p. 495, Dr. Wynter says: "The great-grandson of Old Parr died at Cork only a few years ago at the age of 103." Will Dr. Wynter kindly state on what authority this statement is founded?
L. P. J.

MARY DOWNTON (3rd S. vii. 154, 508, &c.)—I presume that the following instance will be acceptable to your readers. For the first two years after my ordination, while curate of Allington, near Bridport, I was a weekly visitor to a bedridden woman (a parishioner) named Mary Downton. She died November 4, 1860, at the (generally supposed) age of 106 years, retaining all her mental faculties except sight, which she had gradually lost some years before I became acquainted with her. I can recall many a pleasant conversation with this "oldest inhabitant." Strange to relate, the earliest incident of her life which she could recall to memory was being carried out, "within an inch of her life," from her father's burning cottage at the age of four years. JUXTA TURRIM.

[By a subsequent communication, we learn that our correspondent has kindly undertaken to investigate this case, feeling with ourselves that, after what has occurred with respect to Miss Mary Billings, no small caution is required in accepting statements of alleged longevity, which are so often made upon very insufficient grounds.—Ed. "N. & Q."]

ANDREA FERARA (1st S. iii. 62; x. 224, &c.; 2nd S. i. 73, 411.)—Queries and articles respecting the age and country of this celebrated sword-maker have, from time to time, appeared in the columns of "N. & Q." I beg, therefore, to refer all such readers as are interested in the subject to a valuable paper on "Andrea Ferara," in the August number of the Cornhill Magazine; in which the writer shows, that he was an Italian, on the authority of a passage which occurs at fol. 62 of Giovan Matteo Cicogna's Trattato Militare (4to, Venice, 1583), where the author (in treating of the most renowned swordmakers of Italy in the sixteenth century) says: "in ciudad di Bellun sono gli ingegnosi Maestro Giovan Donato et Maestro Andrea de i Ferari, ambidue fratelli, i quai stanno alle fusine di Maesser Giovan Battista detto il Barcelone;" that is to say: "In the town of Belluno are the ingenious Masters Giovan Donato and Andrea of the Feraras, both brothers, of the foundry of Master Giovan Battista, called 'The Barcelonian.'" The result at which the writer of the article in question arrives, is, that Andrea Ferara was born about the year 1555; that he was of a family of armourers which had existed in Italy at least two generations before that time; and of whom the first, like Giovanni di Bologna, Leonardo da Vinci, Paolo Veronese, and a crowd of mediæval artists, derived his nomination from the place of his nativity—the ducal city of Ferrara.

J. W. T.

"DITES MOI OÙ, N'EN QUEL PAYS" (3rd S. viii. 30, 78.)—I have before me four editions of the poems of François Villon: the first printed in Paris, July 20, 1532, by Galliot du Pre; the second edited by Clement Marot, 1533, by the same printer; the third, Paris, 1728, by Courte-lier; and the fourth, "with remarks by several persons," printed at the Hague, 1742.

The first edition is without preface, note, or comment; and contains merely the title-page and the text of Villon, to which are added, as in the subsequent editions, "Le Monologue du franc Archer de Baignollet," and "Le Dialogue des Seigneurs de Mallepays et Baillument." The text and punctuation differ from that quoted by MR. GUYARD Masson, and the other editions under my eye:—

"Dites moy se en quel pays,
Est Flora, la belle Romaine;
Archiprêta ne Thais,
Qui fut se cousine Germaine?
Echo, parlant, quant bruit on maine,
Dessus rivièrre ou sur estang,
Qui besuiste est plus que humaine,
Mais ou sont les neiges d'antan?"

see of Winchester, 1499-1500; this, however, was not effected until 1565. (See Warner's Collections, iv. 159, 195-6; and Rymer, xii. 740, and Magna Britannia, ii. 891.) In 1578 the Archbishop of Canterbury held a Visitation. (Strype, Annals, II. ii. 344; Soames' Elizabeth. Hist. 203; 2 Zurich Letters, cvi.)

MACKENZIE E. C. WALCOTT, B.D., F.S.A.

SIR SAMUEL CLARKE (3rd S. viii. 28, 60, 117.)—Your correspondent asks for information respecting the name of Clark, "Merchant, 1675." I find, upon referring to an old list of merchants of that date, the name occurs as follows: Sir Samuel Clark, Throgmorton Street; Mr. Clark, Pudding Lane; Mr. Clark, Laurence Poultney Lane; Mr. Clark, Kingsland; Mr. Clark, by the Horseferry, Westminster; Sam. Clark, Bartholomew Close.

T. GLADWELL.

PRINCE CHARLES EDWARD STUART (3rd S. viii. 107.)—There is at Beaufort Castle, near Beaulieu, the seat of Lord Lovat, a small full-length of this Prince, attired in a close-fitting tartan vest or jacket, with breeches of the same and silk stockings; and with, if I remember, a white rose in his highland bonnet. It was sent by the exiled family to Simon, Lord Lovat; and, I have understood from the present Lord Lovat, that other portraits of the Prince were similarly sent over to other adherents of the family. This picture, which has a foreign look, represents the Prince as he might be about 1737—like that mentioned by your correspondent EDW. MARSHALL. I am quite sure that the courteous owner would willingly give any farther information in his power, if applied to by your correspondent.

NORTH BRITON.

REV. EDWARD FORD (3rd S. vii. 459, 504; viii. 99.)—The following is the account of this incident in the Gentleman's Magazine for March, 1734, p. 164:—

"The Rev. Mr. Edward Ford, M.A., Jun. Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, being shot by the Schollars, having rendered himself unacceptable to them, tho' a very pious man. One night they broke his windows; and he firing upon them, they returned it, and killed him on the spot. A reward of 300*l.* has been offered by the Lord-Lieutenant for apprehending Mr. Dee, or any of the persons concerned in the said murder. The Provost and Fellows of Trinity College have also offered 150*l.* for the like purposes."

This differs much from the story of the "Murdered Fellow" in the Dublin University Magazine for March, 1835.

J. C. S.

TOASTS (3rd S. viii. 74, 115.)—I am glad to see that my suggestion has met with approval. Permit me to add that, in Ireland in 1808, when aid from France was expected by the disaffected, a popular toast was—"The feast of the Passover."

I may refer those interested in toasts to "N. & Q.," 1st Ser. vii. 105, 220, 355. Can any correspondent give a correct version of the Orange toasts—"The glorious, pious, and immortal memory," and "The Pope in the pillory"?

CYRIL.

"LEADING APES IN HELL" (3rd S. viii. 77.)—The song quoted by UNEDA, "Oh, no, no, I never will marry," &c., is a sort of imitation (hardly a translation) of the Spanish "No, no, no, no quiero casarme," which last contains no allusion whatever to "leading apes in Hell." Neither have I ever seen the phrase used by any Spanish author.

NOELL RADECLIFFE.

DAUGHTER PRONOUNCED DAFTER (3rd S. viii. 18, 56, 78.)—Dafter for daughter is not unfrequent in parish registers, more especially during the Commonwealth, when the entries were usually made by the parish clerk or some other uneducated person. I have occasionally met with entries like the following, which are copied from a register accessible to me—

"1650 Sept. 18. Marey, dafter of Henery Tallson.

Ann, dafter of William Cooke.

October 14. Elizabeth, daff. of Richard Crouch and Cobbler."

JUXTA TURRIM.

CARABOO (3rd S. viii. 94.)—The maiden name of this woman was Wilcox; she was born at Witheridge, near Exeter. Her father was a shoemaker. Baker was her name after marriage. I have the full particulars of her career in my notes from newspapers of the day, and shall be happy to furnish any further particulars. I have also a facsimile of her writing, and can furnish your correspondent with a tracing, if he will send his address.

WILLIAM TUCK.

15, Milsom Street, Bath.

BEEST (3rd S. viii. 79.)—Biestings or beestings, colostra, the milk that first comes from the cow after calving, is from A.-S. beost, byst, or bysting. This is an old Germanic word, found in a great many of the Germanic dialects, e.g. Old High Ger. piost; Mid. H. G. biest; Low Ger. Beest; Dutch, biest; Fris. bjast, bjüst; Bavar. biest; in Switzerland, biest, biemst, biemst, briest, briesch, briemst; Mod. Ger. biest or biestmilch. In the present German we also find: Biestbutter, butyrum e colostra; Dutch, biestboter, and Biestkäse, caseus e colostra. Vide Deutsches Wörterbuch, von Jacob Grimm und Wilhelm Grimm.

J. C. HAHN, Ph. D.

Heidelberg.

SYMBOLIZATION OF COLOURS IN HERALDRY (3rd S. vii. 64, 159.)—Your correspondent D. P. has shown that Wilson de la Colombiere's clue to the invention of tricking is inadmissible; it no means follows that Petra Sancta's title is good.

Indeed, I am now prepared to show that Mene-strier's statement, "Que l'on en voit aussi la pratique en quelque endroit avant le P. Petra Sancta" is perfectly correct. A learned antiquarian friend of mine, the Count de Limburg Stirum of Ghent, has drawn my attention to an armorial chart of the Duchy of Brabant, published at Louvain in the year 1600, with the following title:—

"Briefue Description du très ancien, noble, et riche Duché de Brabant, qui maintient encores le tiltre très illustre du memoirable Duché de Lothier ou Lotrycke,
&c."

At the end is the engraver's name, A. Rinclt and this legend: "Excudebat Jo. Baptista Lan-grius cum gratia et priuilegio. Lovanij anno 1600.
Signavit J. de Busschere." In all the shields of this chart the tinctures are indicated by dots and lines in exact accordance with the system employed by Wlson and Petra Sancta, and since universally adopted. Not only this, but an oval figure, immediately beneath the title, divided into six compartments, serves to explain the system.
Beneath it is this note: "Les marques représentées en cette ovale démonstrent la distinction des métaux et couleurs des armoiries."

As this chart was published thirty-four years before Petra Sancta's De Symbolis Heroicis, the claim on his behalf must be abandoned. The question to be resolved now is, whether Langrius invented the system or not. I may trouble you with a further communication on this point later, but I have not leisure at present to pursue my investigations. W. H. JAMES WEALE.

Bruges.

WILL O' THE WISP (3rd S. viii. 60.)—This luminous meteor, in Latin Ignis fatuus, which is often seen in summer nights over morasses, grave-yards, &c., and which is now supposed to be caused by the spontaneous inflammation of a gaseous compound of phosphorus and hydrogen resulting from the decomposition of animal or vegetable substances, has a variety of names. Besides Will o' the Wisp, we find Will a' Wisp, Will with a Wisp, William with a Wisp, Will with the Wisp, dank Will, Kitty with a Wisp, Kit with the Canstick (i. e. candlestick), Jack with a Lanthorn, Jack w' a Lanthorn, Friar's Lantern, in Milton's L'Allegro, the Wat, &c.

Wisp is a little twist of straw or kind of straw torch, and the above names had no doubt their origin in the appearance of the meteor, as if Will,
Jack, or Kit were going about with lighted straw torches in their hands. In German, Will o' the Wisp is called Irrwisch, a wandering wisp, from irren, to err, to wander, and wisch, a whisk or wisp. For a full account of this phenomenon, vide Brand's Popular Antiquities, revised by Sir
Henry Ellis. J. C. HAHN, Ph. D.

Heidelberg.

COLD HARBOUR (3rd S. viii. 71, &c.)—A farm in a high and bleak situation in the hundred of Wirral, Cheshire, is called Windy Harbour. This circumstance may be of some value as supporting the views of DR. HAHN, MR. G. VERN IRVING, and others, who hold that cold harbour means simply a cold place of shelter, residence, or habitation,— a definition which seems so obvious as to render deeper investigation unnecessary. A. C. G.

Miscellaneous.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Particulars of price, &c., of the following book to be sent direct to the gentleman by whom it is required, and whose name and address are given for that purpose:—

Recon's Longueo de Mandet. Vol. I. 4to. [The address required of the person who reported a copy of this.]

Wanted by Rev. Alfred Gatty, Ecclesfield Vicarage, Sheffield.

Notices to Correspondents.

WM. PRICE (Abergavenny.) The work inquired after was simply a reprint (for private circulation) of the articles which appeared in "N. & Q." vol. I. on the Life and Literary Labours of William Oldis.

B. (Junior United Service Club.) We are assured by an eminent Devonshire genealogist that the arms of the Parson family of Black Turrington are unknown.

J. MARSHALL. The recticulum of the late George Offor's library has been sold as salvage to an American agent for $20.

K. R. C. The quotation, "To party gave up what was meant for mankind," is from Goldsmith's "Retaliation," line 51.

K. B. The remark, "Amicus Socrates, amicus Plato, sed magis amicus veritas," is Aristotle's; but the name has been said of Homer by Plato himself. See "N. & Q." 1st S. iii. 454.

R. E. E. W. The origin of the expression, "No great shakes," may probably be traced to the custom of shaking hands, the shakes being estimated according to value set upon the person giving it.—"Nack or nothing" is a racing phrase used when a desperate effort is made to gain the prize.

R. INGLIS. The little volume, The Banks of the Wye, and other Poems, 1856, is by J. H. James.

ERRATUM.—3rd S. viii. p. 140, col. ii. line 30, for "Marion & Co." read
"Marion & Co."

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Bookellers and Stationers.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Bookellers and Stationers, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 6d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STRAITS COPIES for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 11s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. SMITH, 25, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all COMMUNICATIONS
FOR THE EDITOR should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

WANTED ENGRAVED PORTRAITS of the following persons connected with the county of Norfolk.—Prices to be sent to A. D. 66, St. Giles,
Norwich:—

Alden, Martha, of Attleborough, executed, 1807.
Astley, Sir Edward, ob. 1533.
Astley, Sir Jacob, ob. 1733.
Astley, Sir Jacob, ob. 1733.
Astley, Rhoda (De la Val), ob. 1757.
Barker, Mrs., wife of the Rev. S. L. Barker of Yarmouth, ob. 1833.
Bayly, Rich., Dean of Salisbury, ob. 1657.
Blomfield, Ezekiel, Dissenting Preacher at Mundham, ob. 1818.
Coward, Nathan, of Darlington, glover and poet, ob. 1848.
Crosse, Rev. Henry, M.A., native of Stoke Ferry, living 1667.
Cusson, Humphrey, of Stanhoe, ob. circa 1650.
Dewy, Rev. Charles, of Tynemouth, ob. 1797.
Evans, Grace, daughter of Sir Ralph Freake, West Hilley.
Garrard Sir S., Lord Mayor of London 1716, ob. 1738.
Goddard, Catherine (Shouldham), ob. 1664. (Cough.)
Greenmore, James, executed 1837. Also his victim Hannah Brown.
Hamond, Rev. Robt. Saffron, ob. 1821.
Littleton, Sir Thom., M.P. for Castle Rising, 1798, ob. 1798.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 26, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 191.

NOTES:—Bishop Thomas Percy of Dromore, 161—The Fertility of Lope de Vega's Genius, 162—Peter Peace, 163—The Countess of Albany: Alfieri's Sonnets, 164—Difficulties of Chaucer—Death of Chancellor Dumfermline—Lyly's "Euphues" and "Euphues and his England"—Bramah's House: "Jenny's Whim"—Slips of Authors—Hymn of the Pays de Vaud—Jeremy Taylor: Reparties—Cattle Plague—The Great Bed of Ware—Old Joke—Longevity: Joseph Cain—A Centenarian Voter: Mr. James Hartnell—Mary Plinn, 164.

QUERIES:—Anonymous Hymns, 168—Hannah More, and the Blagdon Controversy, Ib.—Rev. Charles Annesley—Artillery—Author noticed by Locke—Jonathan Birch—Bishops' Lawn Sleeves—Browne of Montagu—Chaffing—Dickens and "Pickwick"—Short Drinks—Thomas Falconer—Flemish Goldsmiths—The Rev. Edward Groves—"Joseph and Benjamin"—G. M. Mather—Arms of the Medici—Nuremberg German Catechism—Carved Pulpit—Quotations, &c., 169.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—"Whom the Gods love, die young"—Pretended Resuscitation—Harrogate in 1700—Memline—Thomas Cromwell—Priors of Wenlock, 171.

REPLIES:—Colours of Flowers, 172—Salmon and Apprentices, 174—Second Sight—"Memoirs concerning the Affairs of Scotland"—Carthaginian Galleys—The New Testament: its Division into Verses—Inn Signs—Curious Names—"Les Trois Saints de Glace"—Roman Intolerance—Bathurst Family—Captain Bathurst—Kilpeck—Mercer—Church Desecration—"Lord Stafford mines," &c.—Kar, Ker, Cor—St. Augustine's Monsters—Bells and Thongs, &c., 175.

Notes on Books.

Notes.

BISHOP THOMAS PERCY OF DROMORE.*

Feeling assured that any particulars relative to this excellent man, and industrious pioneer in the literary field, will prove of interest to your readers, I send a few notes of a second visit paid to Easton Maudit, for so long a period his quiet and retired home. It is a village which has apparently undergone but few changes since Percy discharged in it unostentatiously, but faithfully, the duties of a parish priest, devoting his leisure hours to literary labours, the fruits of which have been prized by so many. Had "N. & Q." existed in his time what a contributor he would have been, and how highly he would have valued its stores of antiquarian and folk lore.

A pleasant ride of about five miles from Olney, once the abode of Cowper and John Newton, partly through fields, took me to Easton Maudit, where, owing to the kindness of the present vicar, the chance was given of inspecting the church, the vicarage, and also the register, upon which Percy bestowed so much pains,—much more carefully than on my visit there last year.

Just in front of the chancel three of Percy's children lie buried, and on inquiry I found that the lions now depicted on the encaustic tiles covering the vault, and precisely resembling that on the exterior of Warkworth Castle, Northumberland, were on the original stone, and were transferred and copied from it to the tiles. This would seem, prima facie, as if Percy claimed connection with the ducal house from his adoption of their badge. The following are the dates of their decease:—

"Anne Cleveland Percy, died 18th Nov. 1770.

"Charlotte Percy, died 10th Jan. 1771.

"Hester Percy, died 19th Feb. 1774."

From the churchyard a charming glimpse is obtained of Castle Ashby, the noble seat of the Marquis of Northampton, owing to whose kindness and liberality, Easton Maudit entirely owes its beautifully-restored church.

The vicarage is on the southwest side of the church, divided from the churchyard by the road, and part of it is still in existence as when the abode of Percy, and honoured by a visit from his friend Dr. Johnson in 1764. In the garden a terrace is still shown called Dr. Johnson's Walk, and the little study no doubt often echoed to his sonorous tones. Here, too, it was that the Reliques were compiled by Percy, and the ballad written which will most likely outlast them all:—

"O Nanny wilt thou gang with me,
Nor sigh to leave the flaunting town;
Can silent glens have charms for thee,
The lowly cot, and russet gown?
No longer dress'd in silken sheen,
No longer deck'd with jewels rare;
Say, can'st thou quit each courtly scene,
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?"

It is said to have been addressed by her husband to Mrs. Percy on her return from court, where she held an appointment as nurse to one of the royal family. In fact, Charlotte, her daughter, who died in 1771, was foster-sister to his Royal Highness Prince Edward, afterwards Duke of Kent, and father of her present Majesty. A portrait of her is still at Ecton House, near Northampton, the seat of her grandson, Mr. Isted, holding in her hand a scroll, on which is inscribed this beautiful ballad. Her name was "Anne," but to this day "Nannie" is a very common diminutive of it in the counties of Northampton and Buckingham.

The old register contains many records of different events, and seems in numerous instances to have done duty as a common-place book. On one page is an epigram on St. Luke:—

"Lucas Evangelii et medicinæ munera pandit;
Artibus hinc illinc Religione valens.
Utilis ille labor, per quem vixere tot ægri;
Utilior per quem tot didicere mori."

Percy has thus chronicled his own introduction to Easton Maudit in the same book:—

"Thomas Percy, A.M. of Xt. Church College, Oxon, was instituted to this Vicarage (vacant by the cession of Enoch Markham, the last Incumbent), by the Right Rev^d Father in God Dr John Thomas, L^d Bp of Peterborough, on Tuesday 27 of November, 1763, and on Saturday the 15th Dec^r following was inducted thereunto by the Rev.

* Vide 3rd S. vi. 261, 338; vii. 181.

Mr Bennett, Vicar of Earl's Barton; and on Sunday, Decr 16th following, went through the services of the Church, Articles, &c."

He thus makes a note of his own marriage, though it was solemnised in another church:—

"Thomas Percy, Vicar of this Parish, was married April 24th, 1753, at the Parish church of Desborough, near Rothwell in this County, to Anne, daughter of Barton Gutteridge of Desborough, Gent., and of Anne (Hill) his wife, daughter of Mr Joseph Hill of Rothwell aforesaid."

I must not, however, trespass more on your valuable space, but before concluding, observe, that there can be but little doubt of Percy's claiming in his own lifetime connection with the house of Northumberland, and as little doubt of their admitting the claim, perhaps as very remote indeed.

In Gilfillan's edition of the British Poets, Edinburgh, 1858, in the sketch of Percy's life prefixed to vol. i. p. ix. is the following:—

"He boasted,* it may be mentioned, of being the last male descendant of the ancient house of Percy, and it was fitting that he should have edited Otterbourne and Chery Chase."

The late Mr. Hartshorne, however, one of our most noted antiquaries and genealogists, was distinctly of opinion, though with the greatest respect for the memory of the good bishop, that he had no connection whatever with the great and noble house of Percy. Mr. Hartshorne looked upon him with feelings of regard, expressing in this case the ideas of many a reader of your periodical, as having been the first to draw attention to the interesting ballad literature of England, and rescuing from oblivion many a relic of antiquity.

OXONIENSIS.

P.S. Dr. Percy had as his successor in the living of Easton Maudit another eminent man in the republic of letters, Robert Nares, M.A., student of Ch. Ch. Oxford, and subsequently Archdeacon of Stafford. This nook and corner of old England was indeed highly honoured in its vicars.

THE FERTILITY OF LOPE DE VEGA'S GENIUS.

Lope de Vega not only far surpassed his rivals, amongst whom was Cervantes himself, in the excellence of his Plays and Comedies: but above all, in the prodigious number which he is said to have composed. There must, however, be some exaggeration in the accounts which Montalvan and Lord Holland, &c. have left us respecting the number of lines which the poet actually wrote and had printed. Thus, Lord Holland's statement appears almost incredible:—

* "He boasted," &c. When, where? What published record is there of this?

"As an author Lope de Vega is most known, as indeed he is most wonderful, for the prodigious number of his writings. Twenty-one million three hundred thousand of his lines are said to be actually printed; and no less than eighteen hundred plays of his composition to have been acted on the stage. He nevertheless asserts in one of his last poems—

'Que no es minima parte, aunque es exceso,
De lo que está por imprimir, lo impreso.'

(The printed part, though far too large, is less Than that which yet unprinted, waits the press.)

"It is true that the Castilian language is copious; that the verses are often extremely short, and that the laws of metre and of rhyme are by no means severe. Yet were we to give credit to such accounts, allowing him to begin his compositions at the age of thirteen, we must believe that upon an average he wrote more than nine hundred lines a-day,—a fertility of imagination and a celerity of pen which, when we consider the occupation of his life as a soldier, a secretary, a master of a family, and a priest, become not only improbable, but absolutely, and one may almost say, physically impossible. As the credibility, however, of miracles must depend upon the weight of evidence, it will not be foreign to the purpose to examine the testimonies we possess of this extraordinary facility and exuberance of composition. There does not now exist the fourth part of the works which he and his admirers mention; but yet enough remains to render him one of the most voluminous authors that ever put pen to paper," &c. (Life of Lope de Vega, vol. i. p. 96-7, ed. London, 1817.)

The statements of Lord Holland rest principally upon the authority of Montalvan, the Spanish biographer of Lope de Vega, whose Fama Póstuma appears in the Madrid edition of Lope's Works, and also in the Parnaso Español. But though many writers accuse Montalvan of having grossly exaggerated the number of lines composed by the poet, yet Lope de Vega himself, in his Elogue to Claudio, says quite sufficient to fill us with amazement at his fertility, and the rapidity of his composition. These are his words:—

"Pero si ahora el numero infinito
De las fabulas comicas intento,
Diras que es fingimiento:
Tanto papel escrito,
Tantas imitaciones—tantas flores
Vestidos de rhetoricas colores."

"Mil y quinientas fabulas admira,
Que la mayor el numero parece:
Verdad, que desnerece
Por parecer mentira,

Pues mas de ciento en horas viene quatro,
Pasaron de las musas al teatro."

(See The Spanish Drama, by G. H. Lewes, London, 1846, p. 69.)

The following wonderful circumstance, quoted from Montalvan by Lord Holland, deserves to be recorded in "N. & Q.":—

"Montalvan declares that Lope de Vega wrote in metre with as much rapidity as he wrote in prose; and in confirmation of it, he relates the following story. He wrote a comedy in two days, which it would not be very easy for the most expeditious amanuensis to copy out in the time. At Toledo he wrote fifteen acts in fifteen days, which make five comedies. These he read at a private house, where Maestro José Valbibleso was present, and was witness. But because this is variously related, I will mention what I myself know from my own knowledge. Roque de Figueroa, the writer for the theatre at Madrid, was at such a loss for comedies that the doors of the theatre de la Cruz were shut. But as it was in the Carnival, he was so anxious upon the subject, that Lope and myself agreed to compose a joint comedy as fast as possible. It was the Tercera Orden de San Francisco; and is the very one in which Arias acted the part of the Saint more naturally than it was ever acted on the stage. The first act fell to Lope's lot, and the second to mine. We dispatched these in two days, and the third was to be divided into eight leaves each. As it was bad weather, I remained in his house that night; and knowing that I could not equal him in the execution, I had a fancy to beat him in the dispatch of the business; for this purpose I got up at two o'clock, and at eleven had completed my share of the work. I immediately went out to look for Lope, and found him very deeply occupied with an orange-tree that had been frost-bitten in the night. Upon my asking him how he had gone on with his task, he answered: 'I set about it at five, but I finished the act an hour ago; took a bit of ham for breakfast; wrote an epistle of fifty triplets, and watered the whole of my garden, which has not a little fatigued me.' Then taking out the papers, he read me the eight leaves and the triplets—a circumstance that would have astonished me, had I not known the fertility of his genius and the dominion he had over the rhymes of our language."—(Life of Lope de Vega, p. 98.)

This account, if it can be depended upon, records indeed a marvellous feat in the rapidity of poetic composition. Bouterwek, however, relates something still more wonderful, viz., "That Lope de Vega sometimes wrote a play in the short space of three or four hours!" But as to the exact number of plays or dramas which he wrote, I suppose it is very difficult to arrive at any positive data. Several writers have made calculations, some estimating the number at fifteen hundred, while others raise it to eighteen hundred, exclusive of his Autos Sacramentales, &c.

The extraordinary popularity which the poet enjoyed during his life, is an evidence of great talent. To see but little merit in his works, is strangely to misunderstand the noble Spanish people who applauded them, whether they were Comedias de Capa y Espada,* or Comedias historiales, or Comedias de Santos, which latter were so called because they were plays, the chief materials of which were taken from the lives of such popular Saints as San Francisco, San Pedro de Nolasco, Santo Tomás, San Julian, San Isidoro de Madrid, San Nicolas de Tolentino, Santa Teresa, &c. No one indeed supposes that Lope attained perfection in any one department; but in spite of criticism, he will ever remain one of the most extraordinary and voluminous writers in the annals of Spanish literature.

J. DALTON.

Norwich.

* These dramas were so named from the circumstance that the principal personages belonged to the respectable members of society, who were accustomed to wear "the cloak and sword."

PETER PEACE.

The individual alluded to in a quotation (1st S. v. 412) was by trade a brushmaker, which business he followed for many years in this city. He was one of the old-fashioned tradesmen of the last century—consequential, pompous, pedantic, and as full of an ostentatious littleness as any man of his time. In the Bristol Directory for 1793-4 his name appears as "Peter Peace, Brush-maker, 88, Castle Street," where he kept a shop which was singular as being the only open or unglazed one for the exposure of goods for sale in Bristol, long after every other tradesman had adopted the method of closing them. This business was established by Mr. Peace's father in the year 1724. Very soon after commencing business himself, the brushmaker appeared in a new character, and assumed airs of importance before unknown among his brother tradesmen in Castle Street; and it became whispered that the veritable Peter Peace was, by some mysterious agency, endowed with the gift of healing spontaneously—that, in fact, he was born a Doctor. As time wore on, his more intimate friends dubbed him "Doctor" by way of compliment, and the vain old man felt pleased about it, especially when the compliment was extended in the city so as to become general, for then he actually had his name preceded by a capital "D." cut on his gravestone in St. Peter's church in this city, which reads thus: "D. Peter Peace's Burial Ground, 1795."

At first the letter "D." appeared designed to mislead the careless reader, and perhaps was so, as if any but such could possibly mistake its purport; for it is repeated on the same gravestone—once on the death of his daughter, and also when it records that, "The above-mentioned D. Peter Peace, who devoutly loved his Church and King, died on the 27th of November, 1827, aged 73."

The singularity of these inscriptions induced me to make some inquiries respecting the eccentric individual it chiefly commemorates, especially the meaning of the cipher "D." placed before his name. Peter Peace I find was the seventh son of a seventh son, and being, according to tradition, endowed by nature with the gift of healing, he had preceded his name with the cipher referred to without any other claim to it whatever. Having been informed that he was baptized with the same singularity of name, I examined the registers of baptism at his parish church (St. Peter's) for several years, but could find no record of such a circumstance. In 1793, however, occurs the following entry of the birth and baptism of one of his children, probably his eldest:—

"January 8, Peter, son of Doct^r Peter and Cecilia Peace, born 28th Jan^y, 1791." [And the following is a copy of the register of the burial of the "Doctor" himself]:—"1827. Doctor Peter Peace, Castle Green (where he had resided), Dec^r 4, aged 73.—Joseph Green, Curate."

The "Doctor," who was a "Colston's Boy," and in the Hospital with Chatterton, was for many years a Member of the Committee of the Grateful Society. On the occasion of a general illumination to celebrate the peace in 1814, this would-be-great, but eccentric old gentleman, had a transparency placed over his shop door in Castle Street, beneath which were the following lines written by his daughter:—

"May Heaven's Almighty hand
Our blessings still increase;
And ever guard the native land,
Of Doctor Peter Peace."

GEORGE PRYCE.

City Library, Bristol.

THE COUNTESS OF ALBANY: ALFIERI'S SONNETS.

There were two oil portraits of this Princess in the Art-Treasures Exhibition; and there are two miniatures of her among those which are now being exhibited in the South Kensington Museum. A third miniature was shown at the latter place in 1892. In four out of these five portraits the colour of the eyes is a pale blue. The fifth (one of those now at South Kensington) gives the eyes brown.

In the Vita di Vittorio Conte d'Alfieri, scritta da esso, the count informs us (vol. ii. p. 67) that the earliest sonnet which he wrote to the Countess of Albany is the one numbered, Sonnet XIX., commencing, "Negri, vivaci, in dolce fuoco ardenti." He adds, that all his subsequent sonnets are addressed to her, or descriptive of her. The sonnet of which Mr. Jesse, in his Lives of the Pretenders, has given so elegant a translation (p. 373, ed. Bohn), being the fifth of Alfieri's sonnets, is therefore not addressed to Louise at all. Let us turn to the subsequent ones, and see what colour he gives to the eyes where he is really describing her:—

"Negri, vivaci, e in dolce fuoco ardenti, Occhi, che date a un tempo e morte e vita."

Sonnet XIX.

"Adulto appena, alla festiva reggia
Mi appresentai dell'immortale arciero
E un biondo crin fu il laccio mio primiero."

(By comparing this sonnet with passages in the autobiography, we recognise this as a description of the English lady of title, whom the count elsewhere calls Penelope.)

"Merè il gran Dio che il mondo signoreggia,
Quindi, negli anni in cui più non vaneggia,
Feci mio dolce ed unico pensiero
Altra beltà dell'occhio ardente e nero."

(This, then, must be the nameless lady to whom the fifth sonnet is addressed.)

"Senza uscir pur dalle volgare greggia,
Sperava io poi d'ogni servaggio il fine;

Nol volle Amor, e mi additò costei,
Che negro ardente ha l'occhio, ed auro il crin,
Mostrolla, e disse, 'In questa amar tu dei,
Più che il bel volto, le virtù divini,
Ch'io per bearti ho tutte accolte in lei.'"

Sonnet XXII.

The eyes of Louise, then, according to Alfieri (than whom no man had closer or more frequent opportunity of observing them) were black. Are we then to conclude that these four several painters (to all of whom I presume she must have sat) had united in a conspiracy to represent her eyes as pale blue? Had the eyes some chameleon power of changing their colour at pleasure? If the colour were definite and invariable (as is the case with most eyes) who shall we believe, Count Alfieri or the painters? HERMENTAUBE.

DIFFICULTIES OF CHAUCER. —

"The whiche fortened crese."

Rom. of the Rose, 4875.

No satisfactory explanation of "fortened crese" has yet been given.

Chaucer's argument, which commences sixty-five lines before, is to the effect that illicit pleasures tend to diminish the population. Such, also, appears to be the import of the clause now before us. For "fortened crese" read "forten decrease," i. e. "further decrease."

The emendation here proposed views forten as the third person plural of the old English verb "forthe," to forward or further. As the corresponding Danish and Swedish is fort, not forth, I would let forten stand as it is, and not substitute forthen.

The passage then will run thus:—

"For ther desire is for delite;
The whiche forten decrease," &c.

That is, the parties referred to, whose desire is only for delight, contribute, by their vicious indulgences, rather to the decay of the community than to its augmentation—they further decrease; a fact fully established by what some modern physiologists and statisticians have had occasion to note. Montesquieu says significantly: "Les conjunctions illicites contribuent peu à la propagation de l'espèce" (Esprit des Loix, xxiii. 2); and adds, more expressly, at the conclusion of the same chapter: "La continence publique est naturellement jointe à la propagation de l'espèce." Of all the eminent writers of France, Montesquieu is regarded as the deepest thinker; but Dan Chaucer lived before him. SCHIN.

DEATH OF CHANCELLOR DUMFREMLINE. —

This letter* may be from the pen of John, afterwards eighth Earl of Mar, but as there is no satis-

* Balfour's Letter and State Papers (MS.), in the library of the Faculty of Advocates, Edinburgh.

ternal evidence of relationship, this is ter of conjecture, and it might have been action of some of the other members of y, of whom there were very many legiti- illegitimate. The eighth earl having e in 1620 an Extraordinary Lord of Ses- as very natural for him, if he was the inquire who was to succeed the Earl of line. His father was the schoolfellow of VI. when under the rule of George I, and the monarch evinced in after life, by acts of kindness, his affection for the as- his youth. James with many vices had t of regarding those who had been his ns whilst a boy. The seventh earl died g, December 14, 1634, and was buried at erson to whom the letter was addressed ie Murrays of Cockpool, now represented arl of Mansfield, who is Viscount Scone and. He was first Viscount Annand, Earl of Annandale; but having no heir he body his title became extinct, and the le peerage was conferred on the Johnston

Mar does not appear to have made any- Lord Dunfermline's death, for the chan- was given to Sir George Hay, afterwards Kinnoul, and the Holyrood parks passed after into the hands of the family of ton.

WORTHY SERVANT,—I am sory att my hart, d's pleasure, to have this occasion to advertis e death of my Lord Chancellor, who deceased ing betuixt sax and seaven. I pray God direct de to take the best cours for the estaytt of this rdome; for itt will be fownd thatt ther will be ming of him thatt is gone. I know my Lord :ten to yow, as one whome he doth repose in. is desyrous to have his Majesties favour to keping of the Abbey and the Park, the rather regard to his continuall attendance heir in his service, and thatt none will so willingly un- : occasions as do concerne the honor of the entertainment of strangers, when itt sall fall ay uther occasions of his Majesties service. So ow to give your best assistance in this, and thatt do me the favor as to lett me know what cowrs tie is to take both in his service for appoynting : Chancellor, as lykways in this other particular rk and the Abbey. So, wisching yowrself and fellow all happines, I rest

"Yowr assewerd friend

"to serve you,

"J. ERSKINE.

rud, this 16
ne, 1622.

rday his Majesties letter was rede in the Cession, rding to his Majesties desyr in itt, my Lord did renunce all claime to the Eridome of Dowglas, after sett his hand to itt as the Lordes desyred.

very loving freind on Murray, in jesties bedchamber."

J. M.

LYLY'S "EUPHUES" AND "EUPHUES AND HIS ENGLAND."—It is strange that neither Ames nor any other bibliographer (that I have met with) should have seen the earliest editions of these once popular performances. The first part, entitled Euphues, was licensed on December 2, 1578, to Gabriel Cawood, who paid a shilling for the consideration, as shown by MR. COLLIER'S Extracts, ii. 75. In consequence of this entry, Cawood published Euphues with the date, and probably in the commencement, of 1579. It was the first appearance of the book, and the impression, curiously enough, has never been described. The copy which I have seen unluckily wanted the title-page, but on the last leaf occurred the following colophon:—

"¶ Imprinted at London by Thomas East, for Gabriell Cawood dwelling in Pauls Churchyard, 1579."

Subsequently to the publication of his work, Lyly saw reason to introduce important revisions into the text. He condensed some passages, omitted others, and pruned the whole text with an unsparing hand; and Euphues, so amended and improved, was ushered for the second time into the world without any date on the title-page or any colophon. At the foot of the title, however, was this imprint: "Imprinted at London for Gabriell Cawood dwelling in Pauls Church-yard," and on the last page East the printer (though he did not put his name this time) introduced his device of a horse.

Of the undated impression by Cawood there is a copy among Malone's books at Oxford, hitherto, but erroneously, supposed to be the editio princeps.

Euphues and his England was licensed to the same stationer as the "second part of euphues," in July, 1580, and was immediately published by Cawood. I subjoin the title-page entire, as it has never been given before, I believe:—

"¶ Euphues and his England.
Containing

his voyage and adventures myxed with sundry pretie
Discourses of honest
Love, the Discription of the Countrey, the Court, and the manners of that Isle.

"Delightful to be read, and nothing hurtfull to be regarded: wher-in there is small offence by lightnesse giuen to the wise and lesse occasion of loose-nesse proffered to the wanton.

"¶ By John Lyly, Maister of Arts.

"¶ Imprinted at London for Gabriell Cawood dwelling in Pauls Church-yard,
1580."

W. CAREW

BRAMAH'S HOUSE: "JENNY'S WHIM."—It is deserving of record in the pages of "N. & Q." that within the first fortnight of this present month of August two of the most interesting buildings in Pinlicko have been levelled with the ground to make way for modern "improvements." The first was the small house in Belgrave Street, South, in which Joseph Bramah, the engineer, lived and died, together with the factory behind it, occupied until a few years back by his firm; and the second, the remains of the once celebrated "Jenny's Whim" Tavern. The former has been removed for the purpose of projected alterations on the Marquis of Westminster's estate, and the latter for the enlargement of the railway leading from Victoria Station across the Thames.

W. H. HUSK.

SLIPS OF AUTHORS.—Under this head may I note the following?—

1. Pope's "Messiah":—

"Oh thou my voice inspire,
Who touched Isaiah's hallowed lips with fire."

Surely touchedst is required.

2. Byron.—Putting aside the well-known "there let him lay," in the Address to the Ocean, see the motto to "The Curse of Minerva":—

"Pallas te hoc vulnere, Pallas immolat."

Here the Trojan chieftain is evidently mistaken for the Grecian goddess; unless Byron intended a comic pun on the name—a supposition not justified by the nature of his subject.

3. Thomson, "Rule Britannia":—

"The nations, not so blest as thee, Must, in their turns, to tyrants fall."

Thou, by all the rules of grammar.

4. Prior:—

"For thou art a girl as much brighter than her,
As he was a poet sublimer than me."

5. Chapman's Homer:—

"For not a worse of all this host came with our king than thee,
To Troy's great siege."

6. There is an epitaph in the Temple Church on Lord Thurlow, said to be written by the late President Routh, in which occur the words: "Vixit Annis 65, Mensibus x." (see Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors, vol. v. p. 63). Should it not be annos and menses, duration of time requiring the accusative?

7. Some time back (July, 1859), a writer in the Westminster Review made a curious blunder in quoting the well-known line:

"Bella gerant alii; tu, felix Austria, nube."

With him it assumed the unmetrical and less elegant form of—

"Armis crescent alii," etc.

W. T. M.

Hongkong.

HYMN OF THE PAYS DE VAUD.—The vignerons, or labourers at the vine, in the Pays de Vaud, have a sacred chorus to the air of "God save the Queen," of which I made a copy many years ago when in Switzerland. It would add to its interest were I able to state when it was written:—

"O Dieu! dont les bienfaits

Ne se lassent jamais,

O Dieu de paix!

Pour louer tes présents,

S'unissent tes enfants,

E'coute leurs accents

Reconnaissants!

"Tu gardes nos berceaux,

Tu donnes le repos

A nos hameaux!

Tu bénis nos travaux,

Tu nourris nos troupeaux,

Tu couvres nos coteaux

De fruits si beaux!

"Pour combler tes faveurs,

O Dieu! rends nous meilleurs,

Garde nos cœurs!

Nous voulons te servir,

Nous voulons te bénir,

Et mettre à t'obéir,

Notre plaisir."

SCOTT.

JEREMY TAYLOR: REPARTIES.—In the Liberty of Prophecy (§ xviii. ad 3 and 13, vol. v. p. 502, lin. ult., Eden's edit.), occur the words "the title reparties." Being engaged some time since on an edition of Taylor's Works, I came to the above words, and must confess I could make nothing of them: nor could Dr. Routh, Dr. Bandinel, or Dr. Bliss (all well read in the terminology of that period) assist me. To the kindness of the Rev. T. Cole, of Heavitree, I owe the suggestion that the words should stand—"the little reparties;" or, as we now write it (less correctly I imagine), "repartees." In this conjectural emendation, Mr. Cole tells me he now finds he was anticipated in one of the later issues of that which was called Heber's edition (1829, he believes). I am much taken with the suggestion: only I must add, that the words stand as I have printed them; not only in the edition of 1652 put forth by Taylor himself, but also in that of 1674, put forth after his decease; in which one would imagine any notable errors would have been corrected.

C. P. EDEN.

CATTLE PLAGUE.—Fracastorius's description of the cattle-plague of Italy, as noticed by himself, seems to bear a strong resemblance to our own visitation:—

"Vere autem (dictu mirum) atque restate sequenti

Infirmas pecudes halantumque horrida vulgus

Pestis febre malâ miserum pene abstulit omne . . .

Nonne vides, quamvis oculi sint pectore anhelos

Expositi mollesque magis, non attamen ipsos

Carpere tabem oculos, sed sese immergere in imum

Pulmonem?"

Syphilis, lib. I.

JOHN HENNING.

THE GREAT BED OF WARE.—Remembering to have seen some months ago a newspaper paragraph to the effect that this Shakesperian relic was about to be sold by auction, I was about to apply to "N. & Q." to ascertain what has become of it. This, however, has been rendered unnecessary by my having just met with the required information in the notes to Mr. Rye's recently published work, England as seen by Foreigners, p. 212. As it is desirable that the fact should be recorded in "N. & Q.," I append a portion of Mr. Rye's note:—

"In September, 1864, this famous Shakesperean bed was sold by auction, and purchased for 100 guineas for Mr. Charles Dickens, and is now, we believe, at Gad's Hill, a famous Shakesperean locality."

WILLIAM KELLY.

Leicester.

OLD JOKE.—

"Σχολαστικὸς οἰκίαν πωλῶν, λίθον ἀπ' αὐτῆς εἰς δαίγμα περιφέρει."—Hieroclis Facetiae, xi. edit. London, 1673, p. 400.

Probably the above is as old, and has been as often repeated, as any existing joke. It allows few variations. The following is now going the rounds:—

"A young writer in Charivari, with a large stone under his arm, was stopped the other day on the Boulevard by a friend, and asked what he was doing with the stone. He replied that he wished to sell his house; and had, therefore, got a sample of it with him, in case he should accidentally come across a buyer."—Birmingham Journal, Aug. 12, 1865.

On its next revival it will be told of another person, with a brick instead of a stone.

FITZHOPEKINS.

Utrecht.

LONGEVITY.

JOSEPH CAIN.—The question of longevity has been much discussed in the pages of "N. & Q.," and it is probable the following petition, which was received last year at the War Office, may be of interest to those who are investigating the subject:—

"The prayer of your petitioner humbly sheweth that he was born 10th July, in the year 1745, in the Island of San Domingo.

"At the age of 23 years I enlisted in the Regiment of the Guerriers du Nord, and served with them throughout the whole campaign in war against the Republic, from 1795 to 1798. I wear a medal for the battle of Milbally, fought in the year 1797. At the conclusion of the war the English troops were disbanded, but were shortly afterwards raised again under the title of West India Regiments. The Guerriers du Nord were numbered 5th West India Regiment, and were stationed in British Honduras. I served with this regiment 19 years, and passed through the grades of promotion until I became Quarter Master Serjeant in 1811. In 1810 the Left Wing of the Regiment in which I was left Honduras, and we were stationed in Jamaica until 1814. We were ordered on the expedition to New Orleans, and I was present at the attack on that town. We returned from America in 1815 to Jamaica, from which station we proceeded to Nassau, New Providence, in 1816. In 1817 we were again ordered to Honduras, where the Regiment was disbanded. Lots of Land were allowed to the discharged soldiers in addition to their pension.

"At the time of my discharge I was Quarter Master Serjeant, and received but 10d. a day; and therefore my prayer is that your Lordship will kindly take into consideration past service and great age, and obtain a higher rate of pension for me, either from the Colonial Government of Honduras or England, and as duly bound, I will ever pray.

"(Signed)

JOSEPH CAIN,

Qr Mr Serj',

5th West India Regiment.

"Belize, British Honduras, 14th January, 1864."

The petitioner states that he was born on July 10th, 1745, and if such statement were correct, he would be now upwards of 120 years old. It seems manifest, however, upon the face of the document, that the age is very much over-stated, for the petitioner would have been seventy-two years of age when he was discharged in 1817, and it is not probable that a man would have been retained in the ranks to such an advanced period of life. The records of the War Office show that at the time of his discharge he was 57, which would make him now 105.

Upon this document the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital increased the man's pension to 1s. a day, which is still issued. The Secretary of State for War has, however, directed the officer commanding the troops in Honduras to cause the identity of the claimant of the pension to be closely investigated, and, if the officer is satisfied that he is the same person to whom the pension was granted in 1817, to ascertain as far as practicable what is his true age. The result of this inquiry I shall have much pleasure in communicating at a future time.

JOHN MACLEAN.

Hammersmith.

A CENTENARIAN VOTER: MR. JAMES HARTNELL. This extract, which appears a well-authenticated instance of a centenarian, was cut from the Bridge-water Standard of Wednesday July 19, and may probably be considered worth a place in "N. & Q.:"—

"It is worth recording that at the election at Bridgewater, on Wednesday (July 12, 1865), Mr. James Hartnell gave his vote in a loud, clear voice, although within a month of his 103rd birthday. His age is proved beyond doubt by the register of St. Mary's church" (at Bridgewater).

E. SANSOM.

[Would Mr. SANSOM, or some Bridgewater correspondent, have the kindness to investigate this case, and let us know the result of such inquiry.—ED. "N. & Q."]]

MARY FLINN.—I copy the following from Evening Star of August 1:—

"FUNERAL OF A WOMAN 109 YEARS OF AGE.—A woman named Mary Flinn, who had reached the above remarkable age, and who had resided for some time in Thomas Street, Wyndham Road, Camberwell, was buried at Herne Hill this morning. So great was the respect entertained for her by her country women, that fourteen couples followed as mourners. The deceased was habited in a brown dress trimmed with swansdown, and her cap decorated with white satin ribbons of great length, which she purchased herself for the occasion. The funeral created quite a sensation in the neighbourhood."

Have not some of your readers the opportunity of identifying this ancient lady, and verifying the statements made concerning her.

JEXTA TURRIM.

Queries.

ANONYMOUS HYMNS.

Who are the authors or the source of the following list, taken from Hymns Ancient and Modern?—

- "124. Thou art gone up on high. [Emma Toke.]
- 137. Three in One, and One in Three. [Marriott.]
- 155. A living stream.
- 165. Take up thy cross.
- 178. Jesu, my Lord, my God, my all. [Faber.]
- 193. From highest heaven.
- 209. 'Tis done, that new and heavenly birth.
- 222. (For those at sea.)
- 231. Fountain of good.
- 232. O praise our God to-day.
- 235. O God of love, O King of peace.
- 236. In grief and fear.
- 237. Rejoice to-day with one accord.
- 240. The year is gone beyond recall.
- 248. Praise we the Lord this day.
- 253. Praise to God who reigns above.
- 254. They come, God's messengers.
- 261. Come, pure hearts.
- 272. Ye servants of our glorious king."

D. Y.

In Sir Roundell Palmer's Book of Praise, p. 415, No. 388, a hymn by William Cowper, 1779, is the following verse:—

"The dearest idol I have known,
Whate'er that idol be,
Help me to tear it from Thy throne,
And worship only Thee!"

and I have found the same reading in several much older hymn-books. But, surely, in the third line Cowper must have written its (i. e. My heart's my idol's throne), and not the personal pronoun which I have italicised. If I am right, Sir Roundell will probably not be displeased at having his attention called to the error, in order that it may not be continued in the many editions of The Book of Praise which will no doubt be called for by the present, if not by future generations.

The last verse also of No. 8, p. 7, being Isaac Watts' metrical version of the hundredth psalm, as varied by Charles Wesley, thus appears:—

"Wide as the world is Thy command,
Vast as eternity Thy love;
Firm as a rock Thy truth must stand,
When rolling years shall cease to move."

A note, made years ago, but whence taken I do not recollect, declares the true reading of the last two lines to be—

"Firm as Thyself Thy truth shall stand,
When rolling years have ceased to move."

And this old reading appears, to my humble apprehension, far more expressive and appropriate than the one adopted by Sir Roundell Palmer.

ERIC.

Ville-Marie, Canada.

On the subject of Anonymous Hymns it is worth noticing, that in most hymn-books all the hymns are anonymous. This senseless practice, which gives such needless trouble to the reader who naturally wishes to know the author of every hymn worth publication, ought to be rebuked by authority; that is, by the publication, with the authority of some distinguished name or society, of a standard hymn-book announced to contain the name of every known author in the collection. This would be almost sure (if equal in other respects) to have a much larger circulation and sale than the anonymous hymn-books. W. D.

[We are compelled to omit several long lists of Anonymous Hymns, as we have not sufficient margin to follow up the subject.—Ed.]

HANNAH MORE, AND THE BLAGDON CONTROVERSY.

Can you, or any of your readers, favour me with the titles of any pamphlets relative to what is known as the "Blagdon Controversy?" I have collected the following, and would be glad to hear of others which were issued on the subject:—

1. "The Controversy between Mrs. Hannah More and the Curate of Blagdon; relative to the conduct of her Teacher of the Sunday School in that Parish; with the Original Letters and Explanatory Notes. By Thomas Bere, M.D., Rector of Butcombe, near Bristol. London, 1801."
2. "A Letter to the Rev. Thomas Bere, Rector of Butcombe, occasioned by his late unwarrantable Attack on Mrs. Hannah More; with an Appendix, containing Letters and other Documents relative to the extraordinary Proceedings at Blagdon. By the Rev. Sir Abraham Elton, Bart. Cadell and Davies. 1801."
3. "An Appeal to the Public on the Controversy between Hannah More, the Curate of Blagdon, and the Rev. Sir A. Elton. By Thomas Bere, A.M., Rector of Butcombe, near Bristol. Bath, 1801."
4. "Expostulatory Letter to the Reverend Sir Abraham Elton, Bart., in consequence of his late Publication addressed to the Rev. Thomas Bere, Rector of Butcombe. Bath, 1801."
5. "The Blagdon Controversy; or Short Criticisms on the late dispute between the Curate of Blagdon and Mrs.

Hannah More, relative to Sunday Schools and Monday Private Schools. By a Layman. Bath, 1801."

6. "A Statement of Facts relative to Mrs. H. More's Schools, occasioned by some late Misrepresentations. Bath, 1801." [By Dr. Moss?]

7. "A Letter to the Rev. T. Bere, Rector of Butcombe. By the Rev. J. Boak, Rector of Brockley. Bristol, 1801."

8. "The Something Wrong developed; or Free Remarks on Mrs. H. More's Conventicles, &c. Seasonably addressed to the Blagdon Controvertists; and inscribed to the Bishop of Bath and Wells. Bristol, 1801."

9. "An Address to Mrs. Hannah More on the Conclusion of the Blagdon Controversy. With Observations on an Anonymous Tract, entitled 'Statement of Facts.' By Thomas Bere, M.A., Curate of Blagdon. Bath, 1801."

10. "The Force of Contrast; or Quotations, accompanied with Remarks, submitted to all who have interested themselves in what has been called the 'Blagdon Controversy.' Bath, 1801."

11. "Truths respecting Mrs. Hannah More's Meeting-Houses, and the conduct of her Followers; addressed to the Curate of Blagdon. By Edward Spencer. Bath, 1802."

12. "Elucidations of Character, occasioned by a Letter from the Rev. R. Lewis, published in the Rev. T. Bere's Address to Mrs. H. More; with some Remarks on a Pamphlet lately published by Edward Spencer, of Wells. By the Rev. John Boak, Rector of Brockley. Bath, 1802."

13. "An Alternative Epistle, addressed to Edward Spencer, Apothecary. By Lieut. Charles H. Pettinger. Bristol, 1802."

14. "Illustrations of Falsehood, in a Reply to some Assertions contained in Mr. Spencer's late Publication. By the Rev. Thomas Drewitt, A.M., Curate of Cheddar. Bath, 1802."

15. "Calumny Refuted, in a Reply to several Charges advanced by Mr. Spencer of Wells, in his Pamphlet called 'Truths,' his Advertisements, and Handbills. By the Rev. John Boak, Rector of Brockley. Bath, 1802."

16. "Candid Observations on Mrs. H. More's Schools; in which is considered their supposed Connection with Methodism. Recommended to the attention of the Public in General; and particularly to the Clergy. By the Rev. ———, Rector of ———. Bath, 1802."

17. "The Force of Contrast continued; or Extracts and Animadversions. With occasional Strictures on the Contraster and others of Mr. Bere's opponents. And Observations on the Effects of Mrs. H. More's Schools. To which is added a Postscript on the Editors of the 'British Critic.' Respectfully submitted to the Consideration of those who have interested themselves in the Blagdon Controversy. By a Friend of the Establishment. Bristol, 1802."

18. "Animadversions on the Curate of Blagdon's Three Publications, entitled 'The Controversy between Mrs. Hannah More and the Curate of Blagdon,' &c., 'An Appeal to the Public,' and an 'Address to Mrs. Hannah More;' with some allusions to his Cambrian Descent from 'Gwyr Ap Glendour, Ap Cadwallader, Ap Styfnig,' as affirmed and set forth by himself, in the Twenty-eighth Page of his 'Appeal to the Public.' London, 1802."

I should also be glad to receive information relative to the authorship of those of the above pamphlets published anonymously.

JAMES PITT.

Stapleton Road, Bristol

In the library of copy of Stemmata

Chicheleana, enriched with considerable additions by the Rev. Charles Annesley, formerly Fellow of that Society. Information respecting him will much oblige
S. Y. R.

ARTILLERY.—At the battle of Leipsic, A.D. 1631, Gustavus Adolphus used a new species of field artillery formed with boiled leather, which gave him a considerable advantage, being lighter and more manageable than metal, and less liable to heat in firing. (Coxe's Austria, ii. 240, Bohm's edit.) Are there any specimens of this peculiar kind of ordnance still in existence? W. W. S.

AUTHOR NOTICED BY LOCKE.—

"Those left by their predecessors with a plentiful fortune are . . . by the law of God under an obligation of doing something; which, having been judiciously treated by an able pen, I shall not meddle with, but pass on."—Locke's Common-place Book. "On Study," dated 1677.

Whose was the able pen, and in what book?

CYRIL.

JONATHAN BIRCH.—I have in my possession a metrical version of Goethe's Faust, 2 vols. roy. 8vo; the first published at London, 1839, and the second in 1842, by Jonathan Birch, Esq. The first volume is dedicated to H.R.H. Frederick William, Crown Prince of Prussia; and the second to the same patron, as Frederick William IV., King of Prussia. I have also a copy of the Nibelungen Lied translated into English verse by Jonathan Birch, 1 vol. roy. 8vo, Berlin, 1848; and I found recently in an old newspaper this obituary notice, 1847: "Sept. 8. Died at the Palace of Bellevue, near Berlin, Jonathan Birch, Esq., aged 64." What was he? Is anything known of this gentleman, who must have been at least a very industrious student? V. S. V.

BISHOPS' LAWN SLEEVES.—Can any one give information as to the lawn sleeves of our English bishops? This question was asked in 3rd S. viii. 29,† but no information has been given. In the picture of Queen Elizabeth's toothache, exhibited this year in the Royal Academy, two bishops are represented in this costume. Is this correct?

SENEX.

BROWNE OF MONTAGU.—I have a portrait, which I procured some years ago from a cottage in East Dorset. The subject is a lady who must have been very good looking, and has been well painted by Sir Peter Lely. There was on the back of the picture before it was re-lined, the following inscription: "Mrs. Elizabeth Browne, daughter of Captain Browne of Montagu." I should be glad to know the genealogy of this lady.
W. W. S.

[* A brief account of Jonathan Birch appeared Gentleman's Magazine, for Dec. 1847, p. 650.]

[† See also our 1st S. vi. 271; vii. 487.—Ed.]

the more elevated with a richer mitre, the other of less height with a mitre plain; unless these are to be taken for low pinnacled or ogee cappings. The second is similarly habited, and holds also a clasped book in his left hand, and a processional cross pattée without the lower limb in his right hand. Whom do they represent?

MACKENZIE E. C. WALCOTT, B.D., F.S.A.

QUOTATIONS.—Whence are the following?—

"Sweetest lips that ever were kissed,
Brightest eyes that ever have shone,
May sigh and whisper, and he not list."

"That heaven may yet have more mercy than man,
On such a bold rider's soul."

"Amundeville may be lord by day,
But the monk is lord by night;
Nor wine nor wassail would stir a vassal
To question that friar's right."

[Vide Byron's Don Juan, canto xvi. stanza 40.]

"Heaven hath no power like love to hatred turned,
Nor hell a fury like a woman scorned."

"Men differ but—at most—as heaven and earth;
But women—best and worst—as heaven and hell."

CYRIL.

"There was something in his accents, there was something in his face,
When he spoke that one word to her, which was like a still embrace;
And she felt herself drawn to him, drawn to him she knew not how,
With a love she could not stifle, and she kissed him on the brow."

K. R. C.

REV. WILLIAM SMYTH OF BOWER AND WAT-
TEN, 1650 (3rd S. v. 498.)—Will C. H. who sent a query respecting the above, kindly communicate with me? Or will he kindly inform me where he finds evidence of the marriage or children of the above?

F. M. S.

229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

WALSINGHAM.—Can any one tell me of a (special) biography of Sir F. Walsingham, or of any quarter where I might be likely to obtain information about his embassy in France beyond what is printed in Digges? I have tried the Record Office. Where are his family papers likely to be found? French historians say that, during the St. Bartholomew, some Huguenots took shelter in his house, whence they were forcibly taken, and put to death. Surely such an outrage (if a fact) must have been protested against by him, and must have found a place in his correspondence. I may add, that I have no intention of "attempting" his life, and that my object is to throw light upon a disputed portion of French history.

PISTOR.

LADY WARNER.—I picked up the other day at a sale here a half-length portrait of a Franciscan nun holding a skull; an inscription below bears her name, "Lady Warner." She probably was a member of the Convent at the Prinsent here, now at Taunton. I shall feel much obliged if your learned correspondent F. C. H. can tell me who she was.

W. H. J. WEALE.

Bruges.

Queries with Answers.

"WHOM THE GODS LOVE DIE YOUNG."—

"This was a favourite apophthegm with the ancient philosophers, and has been quoted with approbation by more than one modern; meaning, we suppose, that lengthened life brings accumulated sin and misery."

The above is an extract from the Dublin University Magazine for July. Will you have the goodness to inform me who is the author of the apophthegm, and by what moderns it has been quoted with approbation? I fancy the original is in Greek.

S. S. S.

[The belief expressed in these words is of great antiquity. See the story of Cleobis and Biton in Herod. i. 81, and the verse from the Δις ἑξαπατῶν of Menander:—

"Ὅν οἱ θεοὶ φιλοῦσιν ἀποθνήσκει νέος."

Meineke, Fragm. Com. Gr. vol. iv. p. 105, imitated by Plautus:—

"Quem di diligunt adolescens moritur."

Bucch. iv. 7, 18.

Wordsworth's Excursion, book i., has this sentiment:—

"Oh, Sir, the good die first,
And those whose hearts are dry as summer dust,
Burn to the socket."

In Morwenstow churchyard, Cornwall, there is this epitaph on a child:—

"Those whom God loves die young!

They see no evil days,
No falsehood taints their tongue,
No wickedness their ways.

"Baptised, and so made sure
To win their blest abode,
What shall we pray for more?
They die and are with God."

Vide "N. & Q." 1st S. iii. 377.]

PRETENDED RESUSCITATION.—My query (3rd S. vi. 185) about Voltaire's story of a London mathematician's attempt to raise the dead has not yet, I think, been answered. The following may throw some light on it:—

"The great geometrician, Fatio, raised some men from the dead in London."—Voltaire's Man of Forty Crowns, ch. vii.

Who was Fatio?

CYRIL.

[Nicholas Fatio, or Faccio, of Duiller, a mathematician, was born at Basle on Feb. 16, 1664. Bishop Burnet, in the first letter of his Travels, dated Sept. 1685, speaks of him as an incomparable mathematician and philosopher. In 1687 he came to England, and made the acquaintance of Sir Isaac Newton. He attached himself to the French prophets, became their chief secret, committed their warnings to writing. In 1701 one of their brotherhood, having lately died, tors gave notice that he would rise again within a fortnight. Guards, however, were placed at his grave to prevent any tricks being played. At last Nicholas Fatio, John Detable, and Elias Marion, were prosecuted at the charge of the French churches in London, and sentenced by the Court of Queen's Bench to stand twice on a scaffold at Charing Cross and the Royal Exchange, with a paper denoting their offence, as disturbers of the public peace and false prophets. (Oldmixon's History of England, iii. 397.) Fatio died at Worcester in 1753. There are many of his original letters and papers in the British Museum; and among them a Latin poem, entitled "N. Facii Duellerii Auriceus Throno-Servatus," in which he claims to himself the merit of having saved King William III. from assassination by a Count Fenil.]

HARROGATE IN 1700.—References to any works giving an account of fashionable life, characters, &c., in Harrogate about the beginning of last century will greatly oblige. F. M. S.

229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

[The only two works known to us of this famed watering place are of a later date: (1) The Humours of Harrogate, in an Epistle to a Friend, by J. E., 4to, 1763. (2) A Season at Harrogate: in a Series of Poetical Epistles from Benjamin Blunderhead, Esq., to his Mother in Derbyshire, 8vo, 1812.]

MEMLING.—In an article in the Saturday Review (for Saturday, Aug. 5, 1865), on the Arundel Society's Publications, mention is made by the reviewer of Memling, a celebrated painter, who lived about the year 1471. He says as follows:—

"No researches have thrown any light on the exact date or place of Memling's birth."

It seems to me a great pity that nothing should be known as regards the very early history of this great painter, and not even the date and place of his birth. Perhaps you or some of the correspondents of "N. & Q." could give some information regarding him. THOMAS T. DYER.

[In Pilkington's Dictionary of Painters as well as in Hobbes's Picture Collector's Manual, i. 196, a short account of this painter will be found under the name John Hemmelinck. A more extended notice of him is given in Nagler's Künstler-Lexicon, band vi. 83-96, where it is stated (p. 83), from a manuscript entry on the last page of an old book, that his grandfather, Ruding Hemling, was born in 1342, and died in 1424; also that his father, Conrad Hemling, was born in 1394, and died in 1418; his wife Mary Bruschin died the same year. John Hemling, the painter, the fifth child of this marriage, was born in 1439, some say at Damm near Brügg; others at Brügg; and some at Eppishausen, near Constance. Consult also the latest edition of Bryan's Dictionary of Painters, 8vo, 1849, for an excellent compendium of the notices of this artist, furnished by different writers.]

THOMAS CROMWELL.—From Dugdale's Origines Juridicæ it appears that Thomas Cromwell, afterwards the Vicar-general, had only the addition of Armiger, when the Mastership of the Rolls was given him, though he was knighted some time before. (Noble's Memoirs of the Cromwell Family, i. 86.) Can you give any account of his parentage or family connections, or was he a brother of Sir Richard Williams, alias Cromwell? GLWYSE.

[Thomas Cromwell was of humble origin, and was born at Putney, where his father Walter Cromwell carried on the business, first of a blacksmith, and then of a brewer. Thomas Cromwell was knighted in 1531, shortly after he was taken into the service of King Henry VIII.; in 1532 he was rewarded with the post of master and treasurer of the King's jewels; in 1533 with the profitable office of Clerk of the Hanaper and Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in the following year Master of the Rolls; created Earl of Essex in 1539, and beheaded 1540. The Protector Oliver Cromwell was a descendant from Thomas Cromwell's sister, who married Morgan Williams of Newchurch, and whose son Sir Richard Williams, one of King Henry's Privy Chamber, and afterwards Constable of Berkeley Castle, assumed the surname of Cromwell, and was the great-grandfather of Oliver, the Protector. Consult Foss's Judges of England, v. 146-156, and any biographical dictionary.]

PRIORS OF WENLOCK.—I am desirous of acquiring the arms of Imburg, or Imbertus, the first Prior of the Abbey of Wenlock, in Shropshire. It is stated that he was elevated to the see of St. David's 1175. I have consulted all the lists of the bishops, and can find no one of that name. The only bishop mentioned as having been a prior of Wenlock is Peter de Leia, 1176. Is he identical with Imburg?

I should also be obliged for the arms of Giraldus Cambrensis, alias Barry, who I believe was a Prior of Wenlock. EMMA CUNLIFFE.

Pant y Ochin, Wrexham.

[Humbert was the first prior of Wenlock Abbey, A.D. 1166 (Dugdale's Monasticon, v. 72. edit. 1825.) Probably Imbert is only another spelling for Humbert. He was succeeded by Peter de Leia, who was promoted to the see of St. David's in 1176. Arms, Gu., a bend ar. It does not appear that Giraldus Cambrensis, alias Barry, was ever a prior of Wenlock. He was elected Bishop of St. David's by the canons in 1199; but the king refusing to give his assent to the election, he was not consecrated, and resigned the see on Nov. 10, 1203, worn out with vexatious altercations. Arms, Ar., three bars gemelles, gu.]

Replies.

COLOURS OF FLOWERS.

(3rd S. viii. 128.)

Adverting to some remarks which I made on this subject in "N. & Q." about a year or two ago, I think that the writer of the note above referred to would find many analogues in nature.

It seems that the laws that govern colour have not as yet been so clearly expounded as might at first appear, and that we have accepted convenient substitutes for the true principles. The former "competitive examinations" oblige us to respect, for want of any other code, but few minds are really satisfied. Indeed, most of the present theories are exceedingly perplexing, as, for instance, those intended to account for the familiar azure of the sky.

The Chinese have five primitive colours, and do not admit the negative properties of black and white. The ordinary experiment of proving the compound nature of white by a coloured disc, rotating on a pin, is surely faulty, though ingenious enough to amuse one.

But let us return. "Roses are red and yellow," says the writer referred to, but never blue. Salvias are red and blue, but never yellow, while no flowers are blue and yellow, or which "show blooms tinted with the three primitive colours." And he asks whether or no it be a law of Nature, that flowers of the same species may have varieties of "red and yellow, or red and blue, but not of blue and yellow, and not of red, blue, and yellow?"

There are a few instances in which roses make an approach towards the third primitive colour, in the small lilac Scotch variety, which is so often associated with the yellow. There is, however, a small and beautiful variety of the Iris found in the higher regions of the West Indian Islands, which is faintly tinted with the primitive colours reminding one of what used to be called "the ribbon of India," as selected, I believe, by Lord Ellenborough.

But although Nature seems to have an objection to these combinations in the same species, she is as remarkably partial to uniting them in the secondaries, viz. lilacs, purples, and greys, with toned yellows, such as buff.

And strange to say, this arrangement seems to be carried occasionally into the fauna as well, for these are the colours (grey and buff) which we find in varieties of Scotch terriers and stag hounds, &c.

Again, I am inclined to believe that of the dull yellows and purples intermixed, amongst familiar flowers, the greater number would be found to belong to poisonous species, such as the Henbane, Birthworts, Nightshades, and others, whose names will suggest themselves to the reader.

But in the vegetable creation, there are unions of colours, which generally fail when made artificially. Nature is exquisitely exact in gradation and juxta-position of tints, and more especially (if one may say so) in the adaptation of all the nice shades of green for the requirement of the bloom with which it is associated, just as we observe in the human creation the perfect harmony of hair and complexion, so that when an aged person unwisely adopts for a wig the brighter tints of youth, the effect is incongruous and discordant, not as regards the lines of the face, but with respect to the change of complexion or colour of skin. The bloom of spring will not assort with the sere and yellow leaf.

The apple-tree in bloom is scarcely to be surpassed in beauty, a beauty, however, partly attributable to the generally surrounding purplish brown branches of neighbouring trees, the light budding of the branches, and cool neutral tints of a garden in spring; but when we seek for examples of striking contrast, we must go to tropical groves, and observe the intense and sombre green of the wild tamarind, with its magnificent scarlet pods; the African Akee, with the light seemingly imprisoned in its foliage, and its blood-red fruit bursting into three compartments, each lined, as it were, with white velvet and showing a jet black seed gem; or the yellow greens of the charming South American "Jacaranda," with its innumerable "peals" of azure bells clustering round branch and stem.

In our own hedges, I think that the yellower the leaf, the blacker will the berries be found as a rule, even before they are perfectly ripe.

It would be curious, from the already known botanical or floral statistics of colour, to inquire into the relative proportions of its distribution, amongst all varieties of flowering plants, compared with the relative proportion to each other, of the prismatic colours, as shown in an ordinary solar spectrum.

Climate modifies to a very considerable extent the aspect of geological hues, so that the red sandstone of the tropics oppresses us more than the same rock in Devonshire. To use a slang phrase, it is louder in arid regions.

Some of these combinations more familiar, are not the less worthy of admiration. The Malvern purplish stone house, with its dark red brick copings and dressings, or the deep Indian red brick edifice with its purple blue alates, especially after a shower of rain, when the colours are more richly toned, are always pleasing, because in harmony with those natural laws which we recognise in their effects, and have been able to classify, but the rudimentary principles of which remain still, I believe, a mystery.

"Each region has a natural physiognomy peculiar to itself." This is true as regards the distribution of plants, which being more of the earth earthy, are indissolubly connected with the soil, in a sort of marriage, which the Hindoo Mythology seems to typify, in that common object of Vishnaina worship, the bridal of the Sak-gram and tooki.*

* Ammonite and Sweet Basil—common all over India.

he said that the carving on the tympanum of the north door of Ribbesford church "represented an archer, who, at one shot kills a salmon and a deer" (Worcestershire, ii. p. 270); for the object that is shot at is no more like a salmon than it is like Dr. Nash. I suggested ("N. & Q." 1st S. vi. 217) that it was a beaver; and it was in connection with this carving and its legend that I incidentally mentioned the popular belief as to the salmon clause in the apprentices' indentures.

Mr. E. Lees, in his delightful Pictures of Nature around Malvern (p. 220, 1856), also mentions Dr. Nash's mistake with regard to the Ribbesford sculpture, but imagines the so-called "salmon" to be a seal.

CUTHBERT BEDE.

SECOND SIGHT (3rd S. viii. 65, 111, 136, 156.)—I would not positively affirm that the old shepherd did see Mr. Austin in the garden: but I see no reason to reject his own conviction that he did. In similar cases, we are met by the stock objections of ardent imagination, mind tinged with superstition, bias of over-credulity, and so forth. But none of these can be alleged in this case. Here was a plain, ignorant countryman, without one grain of imagination, or the least idea of any supernatural occurrence. He was not deceived, as conveniently supposed, "in the dimness of a Michaelmas evening"; for the written account of my old friend and informant expressly mentions that it was only five o'clock, and the sun was still shining brightly. Moreover, the shepherd knew Mr. Austin, and his habitual walk and occupation with his Breviary too well to have taken any one else for him.

But how was it that old John had not the least idea of the affair being supernatural? Evidently because he was a mere animal, too ignorant, stolid, and sensual to reason at all about it. And to my mind, this absence of any judgment on his part of the affair being supernatural, tells strongly in favour of his having seen the apparition: he was a plain man, and he simply related an occurrence of which he had no doubt. What he thought of it afterwards when he found that Mr. Austin had never been near the place that evening but had died several miles off in the night, I have no means now of ascertaining. But my informant, the Rev. Joseph Bowdon, was by no means credulous; indeed he was quite the reverse; he was slow to believe in, and always prepared to object to, narratives of this kind. Now he was on a visit close by at the time; old John was his brother's shepherd, and he would have been sure to sift the whole affair thoroughly—to question John and his wife, and examine the locality, and weigh all the circumstances carefully. Yet, from many conversations with him, I know that he had no doubt that the shepherd did see the apparition of Mr. Austin, and that Mr. Bowdon drew from it the same conclusion which I have already suggested.

F. C. H.

"MEMOIRS CONCERNING THE AFFAIRS OF SCOTLAND" (3rd S. viii. 112.)—The Sir David Dalrymple, who wrote the "Introduction" to the third edition of this brochure, was not, as stated in italics by T. G. S. "afterwards Lord Hailes," but was the grandfather of that distinguished author. He was fifth son of James, first Viscount Stair, and was Lord Advocate for Scotland from 1709 till 1720, dying in 1721. He was the anonymous author of various able pamphlets, &c., on political subjects.

He acquired the estate of Hailes, in East Lothian, from which his grandson, the more eminent man of the two, assumed his title, according to the Scottish custom, when he ascended the bench. The latter was born in 1726, and died in 1792. He is represented through his daughter by his great grandson, Sir James Fergusson, Bart. of Kilkerran, M.P. for Ayrshire.

SCOTUS.

CARTHAGINIAN GALLEYS (3rd S. viii. 128.)—I was once present at a meeting of men of science and literature, including practical ship and boat builders, when the number of banks of oars mentioned in ancient authors was thought incredible; but I suggested that such banks were not always horizontal, but inclined to the horizon, and therefore properly called banks, which must be sloping, as in the case of earthworks, the angle varying according to the nature of the material of the embankment. In a galley of very numerous banks, rowing would be impracticable, unless the rowers were placed so as not to interfere with each other, nor to vary excessively the leverage of the oars. One of these vessels is represented in the Pompeii of the U. K. Society; but I have not hitherto met with an explanation similar to that just suggested.

T. J. BUCKTON.

THE NEW TESTAMENT: ITS DIVISION INTO VERSES (3rd S. viii. 67, 95.)—The reality of the doubt which your correspondents show to exist as to Robert Stephens being the inventor of the division of the New Testament into verses, explains a statement in one of Dr. Donne's sermons, which otherwise would seem unaccountable from him. Preaching on the shortest verse of the gospels (St. John xi. 35), he remarks:—

"The Masorites cannot tell us who divided the chapters of the Old Testament into verses; neither can any other tell us who did it in the New Testament."

This was preached at Whitehall within seventy-one years of the time when the division was said to have been made by R. Stephens, and only twenty-eight years after his son claimed it for him. It would appear, therefore, that this claim could hardly have met with contemporary acceptance.

In the former clause Donne refers to the divisions into Pesukim indicated by the Soph-Pasuk, which some have attributed to Ezra. F. A.

INN SIGNS (3rd S. viii. 127.)—At Middleton, in the county of Cork, there is also a "Bee Hive" inn, or more properly speaking, road side "Shebeen," or public house. The signboard has a lively representation of a bee hive, and is enriched with the following lines:—

"Within this Hive we're all alive
With Whisky sweet as Honey;
If you are dry, step in and try,
But don't forget the money."

Near Cork there is another old and well-known "public," called the "Lion's Den." The proprietor some short time since removed his menagerie to the opposite side of the street, and abolished the old sign on which Daniel and the Lions had so long occupied a prominent place, substituting the announcement that his house was now—

"The Lion's Den,
Renewed again,
with Beamish and Crawford's Porter."

Some fifty years ago, the following might be seen on a sign-board in front of a house at Blarney Lane, in the city of Cork. I copied the lines from a clever crayon picture of that time by J. McDonald, in which the house with its surroundings are truthfully portrayed. Their appearance, however, renders doubtful the truth of the assertion, that adorns the sign-board, that there may be had by the pilgrim from Blarney, or elsewhere, the questionable benefit of "Dry Lodgings":—

"Curious Flower roots, shrubs, and posies,
Green-house plants and Foreign Roses;
Gard'ning in Gen' dun in stile,
Enquire within from Pat^r Doyle.
"N.B. Dry Lodgings."

R. D.

CURIOUS NAMES (3rd S. viii. 127.)—I remember many years ago seeing a sign over a grocer and tea-dealer's shop, in Union Street, Bristol, announcing the names of the tradesman and his predecessor as Beer, late Brewer, a very natural order of succession. But in the same city there was the following laughable sign of three tobacconists:—

"We three is engaged in one cause:
I smokes, I snuffs, and I chaws."

Your correspondent, J. RICHARDSON, mentions a Mr. Lemon as an orange merchant; and we have Mr. Mark Lemon most appropriately and principally concerned in the composition of "Punch."

F. C. H.

As relating to the Messrs. Latimer and Ridley spoken of by your correspondent, I am able, upon reliable authority, to state, that Mr. Ridley never had a being, unless the Christian name of Mr. Latimer, jun., confers it. VERITAS.

"LES TROIS SAINTS DE GLACE" (3rd S. viii. 88, 137) appear to be very similar to what are known in Scotland as the "borrowed days,"* viz., the three last days of March, in regard to which we have the following adage:—

"Sail March unto April,
I see three hogs on yonder hill.
If ye will len me days three,
I'll see and gar them dee.
The first was rain and weet,
The second was snaw and sleet,
The third was sic a freeze,
It froze the birds' nebs to the trees.
But when the days were past and gane,
The silly three hogs cam hirpling hame."

The uncertain temperature of May is, however, pointed at by the advice to retain winter clothing till the end of that month:—

"If ye be wise ne'er change a clout, Till a' the month o' May be out."

GEORGE VERN IRVING.

ROMAN INTOLERANCE (3rd S. viii. 107.)—The fact that Mæcenæus urged Augustus to persecute all who did not conform to the state religion will be found recorded in Dion Cassius, lii. 53. That he so advised him need cause no surprise if we reflect that religious toleration did not find any place in the Roman mind. It is a great mistake to suppose (as is often done) that they had any idea of liberty of conscience. The spirit of intolerance of nonconformity prevailed from the time of the ancient law quoted by Cicero (De Leg. ii. 9). "Separatim nemo habebat deos neve novos: sed ne advenas, nisi publice adscitos, privatim colunto," through legal suppressions of strange religious rites, as instanced by Livy (xxxix. 16), "quoties . . . negotium est magistratibus datum, ut sacra externa fieri vetarent . . . omnem disciplinam sacrificandi, præterquam more Romano, abolerent?" down to the latest persecution of the Christians. Philosophic unbelief was obliged to veil itself under outward conformity. If the Jews at times escaped, it was only from their holding themselves aloof, and not proselytising. It is hard indeed to understand how some of the milder and more refined among the Roman emperors could have persecuted and punished the Christians as they did, if toleration had not been utterly wanting in the religion of the state.

F. A.

[* For notices of "Borrowed Days," see "N. & Q." 1st S. v. 278, 342; 3rd S. iii. 288.]

BATHURST FAMILY (3rd S. viii. 67, 127.)—George Bathurst of Howthorp, co. Northampton, who died 1656, had a son named Benjamin, probably Sir Benjamin Bathurst of Pauler's Perry, Northampton. This Sir Benjamin was father to the celebrated Allen Bathurst, born in St. James's Square, Nov. 16, 1684. In 1705 he was M.P. for Cirencester, in Gloucester. In 1722 he was made Earl Bathurst. He lived to see his eldest surviving son Henry, Chancellor of England, and promoted to the peerage under the title of Baron Apsley (of Apsley, near Woburn, Beds?). He died Sept. 16, 1775, in his ninety-first year, at Cirencester.

In 1706 Allen Bathurst purchased Battlesden, near Woburn, Beds. It was for many years his country seat, and the resort of a celebrated constellation of wits, of whom he was the patron and friend.

Villiers Bathurst, Judge Advocate of the Navy, temp. Queen Anne, was his cousin.

Sir Francis Bathurst of Lechlade, Gloucester, fifth Bart., was probably descended from the Sir Benjamin Bathurst of Pauler's Perry, Northampton, above named.

Grose, the Antiquary, who died in 1791, æt. 52, relates an anecdote of—Winyard, Esq., J. P. of Gloucester, as told him by Mr. and Mrs. Bathurst of Lidney Park, Gloucester, who was possibly related to Sir F. Bathurst of Lechlade.

Baker's Northampton, and the General Index to the Gentleman's Magazine, might be gleaned by MR. BATHURST with advantage.

ALBERT BUTTERY.

CAPTAIN BATHURST (3rd S. viii. 128.)—The Captain Bathurst, who was killed at Navarino, was a son of the Bishop of Norwich, as I was informed at the time by a naval officer, a relative of my own, of most extensive knowledge in all naval affairs. He also said that he was not a relation of Lord Bathurst. He may perhaps be mentioned in Marshall's Naval Biography, in six vols. 8vo, published, I believe, about that time. I know nothing of any of the other Bathursts mentioned with him.

W. D.

KILPECK (3rd S. vii. 476; viii. 39, 117.)—Having communicated with P. S. C. privately concerning the genealogy of the Pye family, I will only mention the following epitaph from Dewchurch, near Kevend:—

"1550. Here lyeth the Body of John Pye, of Minde, a Traveller in far Countreys. His life ended, he left behind him Walter, his son, Heire of Minde; a Hundred and Six Yeares he was truly, and had Sons and Daughters two and forty!"—From English Surnames, p. 146.

T. B. ALLEN.

MERCER (3rd S. vii. 350.)—As a direct lineal descendant of the Scottish admiral who acquired the motto given by your correspondent H. LOFTUS

TOTTENHAM, I may be allowed to correct (if no one else has already done so) his or the printer's rendering of the words.

It is not "The Grit Doul" but "Ye Gret Pule." The term signifies the sea, and has reference to the naval exploits of Sir Andrew Mercer, especially to his attack on Scarborough in command of the allied fleets of Spain, France, and Scotland, 1377.

The family is purely Scottish, as your correspondent C. W. B. will testify, if applied to.

W. T. M.

Government House, Hongkong,
June 24, 1865.

CHURCH DEDICATION (3rd S. vii. 153, 307.)—When were these lines written in Rothesay? The "enthusiastic person of the name of Pemberton" (Orator Pemberton, as he called himself), mentioned by J. G. in "N. & Q." 1st S. vii. 50, and I, on a Sunday afternoon in the summer of 1825, in Halifax, Nova Scotia, found them precisely as they are given by Wm. McK. on the door of the basement-story of a building, the upper story of which was used as a Methodist church, and the lower as a "wine and spirit store." ERIC.

Ville-Marie, Canada.

"LORD STAFFORD MINES," ETC. (1st S. vi. 222, 329, 401.)—These lines, from Halleck's poem of "Alnwick Castle," which your correspondent J. H. L. had "never seen in print," appeared in Samuel Kettell's Specimens of American Poetry, 3 vols. Boston, 1829. The complete poem of "Alnwick Castle" was quoted in The Literary Gazette for July 25, 1829, p. 483. CUTHBERT BEDD.

KAR, KER, COR (3rd S. vii. 336; viii. 55.)—I have always understood that the root of the above Kar and Ker is to be found in the Sanskrit, the word itself being easily traced in all the languages having that common origin. The Celtic and Gaelic forms are Kar, Ker, Car, Caer, Cur. Thus we have Karr, Karkeek, Kergeck, Kerkin, Kernahan, Kernick, Kerwin, Cardew, Carfrae, Carhart, Carclew, Carbis, Carminow, Curnow, Curwen, Curgenven, all surnames derived from local names in Scotland, Ireland, and Cornwall. The following are Breton names—Ker-Sauzon, Kerdrel, Kerdanet, Kergaradec, Keranflec'h, Kerven.

In Le Gonedec's Breton-Français Dictionary, Ker, or Kear, signifies "logis, maison, habitation, village, ville, cité, bourg, bourgade." He remarks:—

"Une infinité de noms de lieux et de famille, en Bretagne, commencent par le mot Ker, que les Bretons, par abréviation représentent par un seul K barré de cette manière K̄. Ainsi au lieu d'écrire Kerdu, ville ou maison noire, ils écrivent K̄du," &c.

In Pryce's Cornish Grammar, Caer is a city, town or fortified place, a castle. Kor in Welsh, and Kaor in Irish, is a sheep. Cor is a synonymous word.

BRETAGNE.

ST. AUGUSTINE'S MONSTERS (3rd S. viii. 99, 117.)—In the same page from which F. C. H. has taken his extract mention is made of an interesting fact, which may suggest the probable origin of this extraordinary tale. After enumerating several instances of such hæus nature, St. Augustine concludes his list by saying :—

"Et cætera hominum vel quasi hominum genera, quæ in maritimâ plateâ Carthaginis musivo picta sunt ex libris deprompta velut curiosioris historię."

From this notice of the collection of curiosities at Carthage, the first step might have been to quote St. Augustine's authority for the existence of the monsters, as having seen them in picture ; the next would be to quote him simply as having seen them, and to this a natural addition would be that, when the saint saw them, he preached to them.

F. A.

BELLS AND THONGS (3rd S. viii. 93, 130.)—May I venture to suggest that "horse-leathern thongs" and "bawdricks of whyte lether" are probably identical? Horse-hide, as used by the collar makers, is white and very tough. It makes, ex-perto crede, the very best laces for shooting-boots, and would, if plaited or twisted into a cord, produce a very strong one. Take, for example, a South American lazo.

W. J. BERNHARD SMITH.

Temple.

"CHRISTIAN CONSOLATIONS" (3rd S. viii. 105.) This little work is chiefly a compilation of sentences from Bp. Hacket's sermons, made probably (I should now say) by some friend or admirer of the good bishop.

C. P. E.

SEA-BATHING (3rd S. viii. 10, 58.)—With reference to the query as to when sea-bathing first became fashionable in England, I send a cutting from an old newspaper, I believe the Public Ledger of 1760 :—

"ON THE LADIES BATHING IN THE SEA AT MARGATE.

"That from the sea, the bards of old have sung,
Venus, the Queen of Love and beauty, sprung ;
That on its curling waves the am'rous tide,
Safe wafted her to shore, in all its pride ;
Soft pleasure revell'd thro' the Cyprian grove,
And gladdened nature hail'd the Queen of Love.
Knowing it false, charm'd with the pleasing tale,
We praise the fiction being told so well.

But when on Margate sands, the British fair
Safe in the flood the curling surges dare ;
When here so many queens of love are seen,
Bathe in the waves, and wanton in the main ;
We justly, Margate, bless thy happier shore,
And bid the fabling poets lye no more ;
In madness they their fancy'd Venus drew ;
Of these we feel the power, and know it true.

No more then, poets, in romantic strain,
One Venus call, when here so many reign ;
No more invoke her from her Cyprian grove,
But henceforth Margate be the seat of love."

An earlier paper, of date 1754, contains the following :—

"PORTSMOUTH SALT WATER BATHING HOUSE.

Notice is hereby Given,

THAT the Bathing-House in this Place will be finished, and fit for Use, by about the 10th Day of May ; and it is judg'd will be the most complete Thing of the Kind in England, as above a thousand Pounds will be expended to make it so.

"It is built near the Harbour's Mouth, on a fine clean Shingle or Beach, where the Water runs in its utmost Purity, being no ways impregnated with Fresh Water Rivers, Mud, or any kind of Filth whatever.

"There are several Baths ; and they are so contriv'd as to be capable of being used at all Times of Tide.

"There are separate Baths for the Ladies and Gentlemen ; and separate Dressing Rooms, with Fire-Places in them.

"The House is so situated as to command, from the Windows of the Rooms, very delightful Views of his Majesty's Dock-Yard, the Harbour, Portsdown, Spithead, St. Helen's, the Isle of White, and an unbounded Prospect towards the Sea.

"To those who are acquainted with the agreeable Situation of Portsmouth little need be said ; but it may not be improper to inform Strangers, that it is a very clean and healthy Town, surrounded with a regular and beautiful Fortification, planted with Trees, and, from the fine Prospects which are to be seen both by Sea and Land from the Ramparts, is allowed to be one of the most agreeable Walks in all England.—There are also very pleasant Rides in the Neighbourhood of the Town, from which Portsdown, so noted for the Beauty of its Prospects, is about four Miles distant. The Isle of Wight is within an Hour's sail ; and there are always good Vessels, with proper Accommodations, ready to carry Ladies and Gentlemen over.

"Portsmouth Markets are plentifully supplied with all Sorts of Provisions, and they are remarkable for the great Quantities and Variety of fine Sea Fish which are brought to them.

"There is an Assembly once a Week.

"The Inhabitants are determined to put their Lodgings and all other Accommodations on as easy a Footing as Possible, which it is hoped will be to the Satisfaction of such as shall think proper to favour the Town with their Company."

As a touting advertisement the above is not bad.

PHILIP S. KING.

STILTS, CRUTCHES, OXTERSTICKS (3rd S. vii. 478.)—II. FISHWICK, after quoting a passage from Marlowe, says : "By stilts, in this passage, is evidently meant crutches. Was this its original meaning?" Whether it was its original meaning or not, I cannot say ; but the word stilts, pronounced stults, has been familiar to me from my infancy as the vernacular name of the sticks which he would call crutches. I am a native of Lothian, and have lived in it all my days (sixty-six years) with little exception ; but I have a neighbour, a native of Angus, whom I heard the other day call crutches "oxtersticks." Here is a puzzler for MR. FISHWICK. It may be mentioned, incidentally, that the old names of the Scottish provinces—as Lothian and Angus—are still in familiar use, though they do not appear in modern maps and books. Lothian embraces the three counties of Edinburgh, Haddington, and Linlithgow, or Mid-East- and West-Lothians. Angus is the county of Forfar. V. S. V.

DEUCE (3rd S. viii. 131.)—The derivation by your correspondent of the word deuce, reminds me of an incident when travelling, many years ago, in Italy. Sleeping in an hotel at Naples, I was awakened by the familiar exclamation of "Dear me," which issued from the adjoining bedroom. I imagined it to be the lamentation of some English lady's-maid; but on listening more attentively, I found the voice to be that of an Italian, repeating the words "Dio mio." R. E. E. W.

HÆVER, ÆVER, OR EAUER (3rd S. vii. 258, 310.)—In Cornwall, hay is commonly called "hæver." Probably the seed, which is very light, was thrown up in the air to discover the direction of the wind. TRETANE.

SPHINX STELLATARUM (3rd S. viii. 129.)—The name of the hummingbird hawk-moth (now, by the way, known to science as Macroglossa stellatarum), is derived from its larva feeding on plants of the order Stellate, which order was founded by Ray, and afterwards termed by Lindley Galiaceæ. WALTER RYE.

Chelsea.

MOPsis (3rd S. vi. 9, 10.)—In Bailey's Dictionary (edit. 1770) there is a word mopsey, which is rather similar to mopsis, and is defined to be a puppet made of rags. W. J. TILL.
Croydon.

IRISH POOR LAW (3rd S. vii. 10.)—Perhaps Dean Swift, in his remarks on this subject, referred to the common law of England (which was declared by the Letters Patent of King John to be binding on the people in Ireland. See Coleridge's Blackstone, vol. i. pp. 100-101), under which the poor were to be "sustained by parsons, rectors of the church, and the parishioners, so that none of them die for default of sustenance." (Ibid. p. 359.) The ancient Brehon laws may have contained some crude provisions for relief of the poor, but these laws were finally abolished in the third year of King James I. However, as there seems to have been no definite plan of carrying out the intention of the law, the poor in Ireland were, until the passing of the stat. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 56, dependent upon private charity, as the English poor were till the passing of the statute 27 Hen. VIII. c. 25. See Stephen's Commentaries, vol. iii. p. 160. W. J. TILL.
Croydon.

CREAKING SOLES (3rd S. viii. 128.)—This, which may be fairly called a nuisance in a small way, I have always understood to be caused by the introduction of paste in laying in the packing betwixt the insole and the outer sole. If your correspondent, in giving his orders to his boot or shoemaker forbid that any should be used, he would soon see the result. GEO. J. COOPER.

Woodhouse, Leeds.

Creaking is only with doubled-soled boots, and is occasioned by the two soles rubbing together. Shoemakers frequently put a piece of cloth between the soles, which effectually remedies the evil. K. C.

The adage is, "Creaking shoes are not paid for;" but if one does not wish to be constantly reminded of the debt, the simplest remedy is to anoint the soles with neats' foot oil, then wear the shoes, walking now and then in wet places. S. PISSER.

Chiswick.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

Etoniana, Ancient and Modern: being Notes of the History and Traditions of Eton College. Reprinted from "Blackwood's Magazine," with Additions. (Blackwood.)

The series of papers on the History and Traditions of Eton College, which appeared from time to time in Blackwood's Magazine, was received with so much favour by Eton men, and was so acceptable to the general readers of that old established favourite of the public, that their republication in a separate volume was obviously called for; and a dainty and interesting volume they make. The author passes in review in a concise, rapid, and yet most effective manner, the history of "The King's College of Our Lady of Eton beside Windsor" from 1441, when Henry VI. granted his first charter of foundation, down to the improvements in the buildings and other arrangements at Eton, which have been carried out of late years. In so doing he presents us with pleasant notices of the Royal Visits with which Eton has from time to time been honoured, and illustrates by a number of characteristic anecdotes George III.'s well known fondness for Eton and Etonians. His sketches of the Provosts and Masters of Eton, from Saville and Wotton, Udall and Harrison, down to Goodall, Keate, and Hawtrey, are made to illustrate the progress of the school; and their respective success as teachers is to a certain extent shown in the happy notice of some distinguished Etonians who have from time to time passed under their tuition; and, while noticing the Walpoles, Wyndhams, Porsons, Wellesleys, Praeds, Moultries, the author might well say that to give a list of Etonians who have distinguished themselves in the State, in the Church, in the Law, in Arms, and in Letters, would be to give a biographical dictionary of half of our men of eminence. In treating of Eton Sports and Pastimes, we have a curious account of Montem and its observances—and here, let us observe in a parenthesis, we wish the writer could give us some account of the old picture of Montem, in the possession of the late Mr. Croker (see "N. & Q." 2nd S. ii. 146). Eton Cricket and Eton Boating are also duly recorded, under the latter head the author doing full justice to the pluck of their Westminster rivals; indeed, as in his capital

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1865.

CONTENTS.—N° 192.

NOTES:—Malherbe, the Poet, on England, 181—Letters of Junius, 182—Purcell Papers, &c., 183—Island of Inch-Keith, 184—Shakspeariana: Shakspeare Family, Tach-Brooke, co. Warwick—Shakspear Family—Shakspeare's "Tempest"—"All's Well that Ends Well," 185—Original Letter by the Lord Protector—Ben Jonson and Bartholomæus Anulus—Ether and Chloroform—"Conceits, Clinches, Flashes, and Whimsies," 1839—"So much the Worse for the Facts"—Slang: Slog—Coincidences—Motto of Virginia, 186.

QUERIES:—Lake Allen, Esq.—Bodeherste: "Tiens ta foy"—Civic Companies of Brussels—Curious Decoration—Samuel Drummond's Pictures—Henry Harris—Heraldic—Isawa: Osiris—Irish Voting Law—Lich-gate or the Churchyard Porch Superstition—Luther on Eshcol—Lancaster Coach—Macaulay and the Younger Pitt—Marshall—The Mystic Ladder—The Mystic Rose—Noy of Corowall—Perplexed Relationship—Philological Society's Dictionary—Playing Barnaby—Rubens at Shrewsbury—"The Rugby Magazine," 1835-37—St. James's Fields—Wedgwood Catalogues, 188.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—"England a Nation of Shopkeepers"—Lady Miller—John Holker—Compound Interest—Boston, a Flower—Viscounts Oxford, 191.

REPLIES:—Calderon's "Daughter of the Air," and "Purgatory of St. Patrick," 193—Ben Jonson, 195—Brunetto Latini, ib.—Birth-place of Cardinal Pole—Luis de Camoens—Hymns—Solution of Continuity—Pretty—Braose—Chartulary of Whalley Abbey—"Grave Maurice"—Quarterings—Blanche, Lady Wake—Modern Latin Pronunciation—Robin Hood Ballad—Joseph Maberly—"Johannes ad oppositum"—Scenting of Books—"Inveni portum," &c., 196

Notes.

MALHERBE, THE POET, ON ENGLAND.

In the collection of the French Classics, published by the enterprising M. Hachette of Paris, Malherbe of course occupies a prominent place,—Malherbe, the literary reformer, the purist, the poet. Three volumes of a complete and admirably edited recueil of his works, are now before me; and my purpose, in the present article, is to draw the attention of the readers of "N. & Q." to the third.

This stout octavo, containing more than six hundred pages, gives us the series of Malherbe's letters to his friend Peiresc, the well-known critic and antiquary. Published for the first time, in 1822, from the originals preserved at the Imperial (then Royal) Library, Paris, this correspondence had not had a fair justice done to it. Faults of every kind, arising from the editor's ignorance, disfigured the text in the most deplorable manner; and the few notes given at the foot of the pages were more than useless. M. Bazin, whose Histoire de France sous Louis XIII enjoys deservedly the highest reputation, had prepared, it seems, a new edition of Malherbe's letters, but he died without having been able to carry out his design; and it was reserved for M. Lalanne, the learned editor of Brantôme, to raise a lasting monument to one of the principal representatives of French literature.

Malherbe is generally known as a poet. He should, however, take a conspicuous place amongst annalists; and his correspondence with Peiresc is a valuable and authentic chronicle of the French Court during the last years of the reign of Henry IV., and the first of that of Louis XIII. Whilst writing to his friend in Provence on the events of the day, supplying him with gossip of every kind, and keeping him au courant of political doings at home and abroad, he has brought together a number of details which confirm the evidence of professed memoir writers, and add new facts to those we possessed already on that epoch of history. I shall borrow from these letters several paragraphs referring to England:—

"If you write to M. Camden, pray remind him of what he has promised to us concerning our genealogy. Marc-Antoine (Malherbe's son) will be particularly obliged to you as being likely, if it please God, to enjoy these honours for a longer time. You will tell him, if you please, that in the abbey of Saint Pierre, at Caen, built by Duke William, is to be found an escutcheon amongst a great number of those belonging to the lords who accompanied him in the conquest of England. It is on a field, argent, sable ermines, and six roses gules. I give him these particulars, so that his description may be correct."—Letter III., October 2, 1606, pp. 5, 6, of M. Hachette's edition.

As a foot-note to the above, M. Lalanne then says:—

"Camden gave, in 1606, a new edition of his Reges, reginae, nobiles et alii in ecclesia collegiata beati Petri Westmonasterii sepulti, and Malherbe hoped perhaps that the particulars supplied by Peiresc would be in time to appear in the work. Peiresc, however, whom his friend so often charges with indolence, did not hasten to write to Camden; and it was only in a letter, dated 'V. non. mai. 1608,' that he transmitted to him the poet's request (cf. G. Camdeni et illustriorum virorum ad G. Camdenum epistola, Londini, mdcxci., 4°, Letter N° 76, p. 107). Other letters of Peiresc, bearing date April 29, June 17, and November 12, 1618, give additional details on the subject. In the last-named, Peiresc expresses his astonishment at not having found in his catalogue of the fiefs bestowed by William the Conqueror, any Malherbe mentioned. 'I know not,' he adds, 'whether the person who made the collection overlooked it, or whether the name Malopra is meant for it, by a corrupt alteration of the letters.'

At the end of the volume now under consideration (pp. 596, 597) is a genealogical tree of the English Malherbes, as follows. It is taken from a document in Malherbe's own handwriting, preserved amongst the MSS. of the Paris Imperial Library:—

"Généalogie de la Maison de Malherbe, qui est en Angleterre, en la Comté de Suffolk.

Geffroy Malherbe.

Henry Malherbe.

Roger Malherbe.

Richart Malherbe.

confidence, state his opinion to his intimate friends. In Bohn's edition of the Letters (1861) great stress is laid upon the letters and opinions of Lady Francis, who believed her husband to be Junius.

I see that Mr. Parkes, lately deceased, had been entrusted with the Francis papers, and that he had prepared a volume, in which, following the example of Lords Brougham, Campbell, Macaulay, and Stanhope, he thought that he had been able to identify Sir Philip with Junius. All the books in the world will not satisfy me of that fact, as the calibre of Francis was not up to the mark of Junius.

My elderly readers will remember that Adolphus proved the identity of Sir Walter Scott with "The Great Unknown," from the unconscious similarity of their opinions and style. In the same way the real Junius will crop out from under an assumed surface. If any one will dispassionately collect all the facts Junius let out concerning himself—

" . . . Omnis
Votivâ pateat veluti depicta tabellâ
Vita senis,"—

for Junius was undoubtedly an old man.

The subject has hitherto been treated most illogically. The problem is, "Given a cap, find a head to fit." Instead of so doing, a head is taken at random, and the cap cut down to fit it. There is not one single candidate proposed, whose claims I cannot stifle by facts contained in the Letters.

I am satisfied that Junius was either known to the Government, or could have been discovered by them, if the Duke of Grafton had not thought that "ignorance was bliss," and did not intend to show his folly by becoming wiser. On September 28, 1771, Junius wrote to the Duke that he had lately "examined the original grant from Charles II. to his son the first duke." This grant would either be in the possession of the duke or enrolled amongst the Public Records. In either case, a person who had consulted it so lately must have been easily discoverable.

Junius, however, on one occasion expressed his fears that he would be impeached by Government if his secret was discovered. This step would only have been taken against a person of high rank and importance. In another place he wrote, "Depend upon the assurance I give you, that every man in administration looks upon war as inevitable." John Dunning is erroneously, I think, considered by some to be the author of the Letters; and those who deny his claims, ground their denial upon the fact that he was Solicitor-General at the time of publication. If anything, that is rather in his favour, for he would thus know the secrets of the administration, and was likely to be impeached if his treachery was found out.

At any rate these two expressions knock Sir

Philip and his claims out of time. A clerk in the War Office (granting that he knew the secrets of the administration) would not have been impeached. He would have been dismissed from his post, tried for libel, and imprisoned for three years.

The discovery of Junius has been a problem that has occupied my attention for many years, and I have collected copious notes on the point, but feel that I am no nearer to my object than I was at starting. I have only been able to refute the claims of all the candidates proposed, without being able myself to suggest a more likely person.

I have lately been reading Bubb Doddington's Journal. Had he been alive at the time I should have thought that he had hired the author to write the Letters. They evidently proceeded from one of the party who hoped to come into power with Frederick, Prince of Wales, had he come to the throne. He died, and the hopes of that faction were destroyed by the unexpected promotion of Lords North and Bute. This will account for the devotion of Junius to the House of Hanover, and his personal hostility to that member of it who was sitting on the throne.

I have to thank several of your correspondents for private letters addressed to me in reference to a query propounded in your number of the 1st of July last. I should be glad if any of them could give me any information as to points suggested above.

JOHN WILKINS, B.C.L.

Cuddington, Aylesbury, Bucks.

PURCELL PAPERS.—No. V.* DIOCLESIAN: SAUL AND THE WITCH OF ENDOR.

A very noticeable work by Purcell is the opera, entitled Dioclesian; or, the Prophetess, a work which, had the Musical Antiquarian Society continued, we were led to hope would have appeared under its auspices, when it might have formed a fitting companion to the other dramatic productions of Purcell brought out by the society; namely, his Dido and Æneas (an extraordinary work for any one to have produced at the age of seventeen), his King Arthur, and his Banquo. However, the time will doubtless arrive for such a consummation, and in the meanwhile somewhat may be registered concerning Dioclesian, for the use of the editor who is to come.

It is, then, a striking sign of the estimation in which the music of Dioclesian was held, that it even appears to have been performed entire as a concert—a fact which we learn from the following curious and interesting advertisement in the Daily Courant for Saturday, May 10, 1712:—

"At Stationers' Hall near Ludgate, on Wednesday next, being the 14th of May, will be Perform'd all the Musick, both Vocal and Instrumental, in the Opera of Dioclesian, Compose'd by the Immortal Henry Purcell, which for the Beauty of Expression, Excellency of Harmony, and Grandeur of Conception, gives a first Place to no Musical Opera in Europe. For the Benefit of Mr. Smith and Mr. Cuthbert. Beginning at 6 o'clock. Tickets are deliver'd at Garraway's and Will's in Cornhill, Sam's Coffee House in Ludgate Street, St. James's and Smirna Coffee Houses at St. James', the British and Young Man's Coffee Houses, at Charing Cross, Tilt-yard Coffee House at White Hall, Tom's and Will's, in Covent Garden, and at the Hall, at 5s. each."

* Vol. 3rd S. VIII. 22.

A remarkable point in the foregoing announcement is the strongly-expressed affirmation of the concert-givers, that Purcell had no superior in Europe. This point becomes the more noteworthy when we remember who was then coming before the world (and the world of England too) as a musical composer. This was no other than Handel himself, whose opera of Rinaldo had appeared in 1711, the year before our Purcell concert in Stationers' Hall. More than one hundred and fifty years have since gone by, and we all know how Handel is estimated in England. It may, therefore, be presumed that we are now able to sit in a calm judgment upon the curious question, whether, in 1712, the strong expressions of the concert-givers were, after all, anything more than expressions of a simple truth?

How Purcell might have stood in relation to Handel had he been granted a similar length of life, which would have given him another six-and-thirty years to work in, can of course be a matter of speculation only. We can, however, take the dramatic works which Purcell produced during his short life of thirty-eight years, and, comparing them with the operas produced by Handel up to the age of thirty-eight, then raise the question whether in those operas there was any greater power of genius shown by the Giant than by Purcell. It is not clear but that the parallel can be fearlessly carried out, and that too with not the smallest impeachment of the veneration due to so wonderful a man as Handel.

The question in hand will not need a very great space for its plain statement. For instance, if songs for the soprano voice are to be considered, we may ask, are there in Handel's operas above alluded to any that are superior to "Fairest Isle" in King Arthur, "I attempt in vain" from the Indian Queen; the two songs for Ariel, "Full fathom five," and "Come unto these yellow sands," with Altisidora's Scene in Don Quixote, "From rosy bowers"?

Again, if base songs are under consideration, a similar inquiry may be confidently made upon behalf of the grand song for the Demon in The Tempest, "Arise, ye subterranean winds;" the Incantation for the Conjuror in the Indian Queen, and Cardenio's mad song, "Let the dreadful engines." If duets are to be spoken of, we may point to such as "Two daughters of this aged stream," in King Arthur; "Sing ye Druids" in Bonduca; and the scene in Tyrannic Love, which last was amongst what the author of Music and Friends, speaking of Mr. Bartleman, calls one of the "fine exhibitions of his rhetorical powers."

Lastly, to these songs and duets, we may add, as putting our case beyond all doubt, such concerted pieces as the Temple Scenes in King Arthur and Bonduca, the military choral song "Come if you dare," and the admirable First Scene, with its varied solos and choruses. Enough, it is conceived, will now have been stated to serve as the foundation for a decision (as far as operas are concerned) between Purcell at thirty-eight, and Handel at the same age.

It would have been interesting, had it been possible, to have carried on a comparison between Purcell and Handel from the region of opera into that of the Sacred Drama, or Oratorio. Although we cannot reasonably doubt that, had Purcell been granted a longer life, he would have tried his strength in the sacred drama; yet it is quite true that he has not written an oratorio. Nevertheless, we are not left entirely without the power of saying something even upon that oratorio question. This is observed in allusion to the truly grand and solemn scene between Saul, Samuel, and the Witch of Endor, beginning "In guilty night and false disguise." Here we have the absolute evidence of what Purcell could do with the sacred dramatic or oratorio scene, and it may be safely said that, in its kind, nothing superior to it is to be found in any of Handel's oratorios.

Those who have compared Purcell's treatment of the Endor scene with Handel's treatment of the same in his oratorio of Saul, will not deem it to be disrespectful to the Giant if they say that had Purcell written a complete oratorio of Saul we might have had a work in no respect inferior to that of Handel. The scene at Endor may be considered as eminently calculated to put a composer to the test, and Purcell has fully shown that he could stand such a test. Indeed, many will think themselves justified in believing that, although Handel's Saul is a production of his maturest time, his Endor music is surpassed by that of Purcell. If such should be the case, the fact is a very remarkable one, and well worthy of being generally known.

ALFRED ROFFE.

Somers Town.

ISLAND OF INCH-KEITH.

The island of Inch-Keith is placed midway between Fife and Edinburgh, and is almost immediately opposite to Leith. It was during the wars between the English and Scots in the Regency of Marie of Guise a place of considerable importance. So much so that in the account of "The Campaigns 1548 and 1549," its recovery from the English is made the subject of much laudation. The difficulties of landing — the gallantry of the Southrons, and the still more wonderful prowess of the French — are set forth in appropriate language, such as might be anticipated, coming from the pen of a Gascon. Abercrombie, the translator of Mons. Beaugue's now very rare work, gives the following particulars:—

"This island (Inch-Keith), upon its being recovered from the English, was named by the Queen Dowager the Island of God, but formerly the French call'd it the Island for Horses; and the reason was, because hitherto it had been thought useless to them, and so remained uninhabited. Yet it is not destitute of the blessings of Nature; it is pretty large, wants not sweet water, has spots of ground not unfit to be converted into pasturage or gardens, and places proper for salt pans and harbours. It is also furnished with plenty of coals, and some quarries of stone."

This is the statement of a person who personally was able to give some reliable account of the island, which, if had been situated in any locality south the Tweed, might have been made a little paradise of its kind; but which has remained very much in the situation it was in when taken possession of by the French; and as Scotland is now treated as a province of England, it is likely to remain so for ever, unless war compels a centralising administration to fortify it.

Mary of Guise — a woman of clear head, but, like her kindred, devoid of principle — at once saw the propriety of fortifying the recovered island; and the following interesting fragmentary document in relation to it was found amongst some papers thrown away as waste. To the Scottish topographer it must be peculiarly interesting. It is given in the original French:—

"Pour la somme de vingt-quatre livres T., que jay receux pour metre es mains de Jehan Francoys pour et en deduction du marche quil a faict pour les canoniers du fort de Lyle Dieu. Faict le xv^{me} jour de mars, 1555.

"CHEART."

It is not improbable that some of your readers may be able to tell who Mons. Cheart was. His name is not to be found in Teulet. J. M.

Shakspeariana.

SHAKSPEARE FAMILY, TACHBROOKE, CO.
• WARWICK.

I enclose you copies of all the Shakspeare entries in the early Register of Baptisms, Weddings, and Burials belonging to the parish of Tachbrooke Episcopi, in the county of Warwick. Tachbrooke is situate about nine or ten miles from Stratford-on-Avon. If the incumbents of other Warwickshire parishes—at all events in this part of the county—would do the same, the collateral relations of the great Warwickshire poet might, I should think, be definitely determined.

I have copied accurately the orthography of the name as it happens to occur:—

Baptisms examined to the year 1662 inclusive.

1557. Roger Shakespere, sonne of Rob'te Shakespere, 21st Apr. bapt.
1560. Anne Shakespere, filia Rob'ti Shakespere et — vxor eius, 14 Sept. bapt.
1574. John Shakespere, sonn of Rob'te Shakespere & — his wife, 4 March bapt.
1596. John Shakespere, sonne of Rog^r Shakespere & Alis his wife, 10 Decemb. bapt.
1607. Elyzabeth Shaxper, the dowghter of Thomas Shaxper and Susan his wyfe, bapt. 12 July.
1628. Elizabeth Shakespeare, the daughter of John and Christian his wife, was bapt. 20 Aprill.
1630. Judeth Shakespeare, the [sic] John and Christian his wife, was baptized 4 Aprill, 1630.

Marriages examined to the year 1658 inclusive.

1559. Rob'te Shakespeare of this p'rishe and Agnes Steward of the p'she of Haselie, marr. here the xixth November.
1592. Roger Shaxpear, sonne of Rob'te and Isabell Parkins, daughter of —, bothe of this p'ishe marr. last daie of Januarie.
1593. Thomis Turner of — and Isabell Shaxpere, daughter of Rob't Shaxpere of this p'ishe, 4 Mar. marr.
1595. Roger Shaxpere and Alice Higgins, bothe of this p'ishe were marr. viii. Octob.

Burials examined to the year 1664 inclusive.

1559. Alice Shakespere dau. of Rob'te, was bur. 12 April.
1574. John Shakespere, sonne of Rob't, was bur. 4 March.
1592. Robart Shakespeare, weaver, was bur. ultimo die Octobr.
1594. Isabell Shaxpere, vxor Rogeri Shaxpere, bur. 26 Novembr.
1599. Anne Shaxpere, wydow, was bur. 15 March.
1673. Elizabetha, filia Rogeri Shakespeare, bapt. Julij 13^o.
1681. Richardus, filius Rogeri Shakespeare, bapt. Martij 27^o.
1683. Priscilla, filia Joh'is Vares, alias Shakspere, bapt. Martij 21^o.
1686. Johannes, filius Johannis Vares, alias Shakespeare, bapt. Aug. 8^o.
1688. Rogerius, filius Joh'is Vares, alias Shakspeare, bapt. Martij 30^o.
1714. Elizabetha, filia Walteri Shakespear and Elizabetha uxoris, bapt. Decembris 26^o.
1717. Maria, filia Walteri Shakespear, bapt. 28 Aprilis.
1719. Walterus, filius Walteri Shakespear, bapt. 20 Decembris.
1724. Sara, filia Walteri Shakespear et Eliz. ejus uxoris, bapt. 12 April.
1732. Richardus Bailis et Elizabetha Shakespear, matrim. contrax^t 26 Nov.
1737. Thomas Brown and Anne Shakespear, both of this parish, marr. Nov. 6, 1737.
1670. Johannes Shakespeare, Textor de Tachbrooke R^{epi} sepult. Decemb.
1684. Christiana Shakespeare, Vidua, sepult. Febr. 13^o.
1685. Priscilla, Filia Joh'is Vares, alias Shakspeare, sepult. Majj 26^o.
1700. Anna, uxor Rogeri Shakespeare, sepult. April.
1708. Rogerus Shakespeare, sepultus erat, Majj 31^{mo}.

1727. Eliz. uxor Walteri Shakespear, sepult. 16^o Septembria.
 1728. Sara, filia Walteri Shakespear, sepult. tertio Julij.
 1729. Eliz. Shakespear, sepult. 4^o Maij.
 1729. Johannes Shakespear, sepult. 1^o Maij.
 1738. Walter Shakespear was buried March 7.

EDW. T. CODD, Vicar of Tachbrooke.

SHAKESPEAR FAMILY (3rd S. vii. 498; viii. 124.)
 The earliest register in St. Paul's church, Shadwell, commenced in 1670. Mr. James, 50, High Street, Shadwell, carpenter and undertaker, is the parish clerk. I understood him to say that he had commenced a search relative to the Shakespear family; but no funds being forthcoming, he had ceased his labours. Although he could furnish some information at the same remuneration I paid him, which was 1s. the first, and 6d. each succeeding year, for searching; and 2s. 6d. each certificate when found.

ALBERT BUTTERY.

SHAKESPEARE'S "TEMPEST."—A distinguished writer in the Revue des Deux Mondes, M. Forcade, has affirmed that Shakspeare translated a part of one of Montaigne's liveliest paradoxes, directed against artificial political legislation, in his humorous sortie entitled Des Cannibales. Montaigne is believed to have been one of Shakspeare's favourite authors; and his copy of Florio's translation of the Essais, published in 1603, with the poet's autograph, is said to be in the British Museum. Gonzalo's Utopian Republic is thus traced up to a whim of Montaigne's. M. Emile Montégut seems not to have been aware of Shakspeare's indebtedness to Montaigne, when he developed his ingenious and interesting theory regarding the Tempest, in a recent number of the same Revue.

M. Montégut's hypothesis is as follows:—The Tempest is very evidently Shakspeare's last piece; and is nothing else but the great poet's dramatic testament, in an allegorical form—his farewell to that faithful public which had applauded, in the short space of twenty years, as many masterpieces of the dramatic art; besides other beautiful and charming productions, which would have formed the most enviable of trophies for any other poet but himself. In short The Tempest, as the magician Prospero expresses it, is the microcosm of that dramatic world created by the poet. To conclude, in M. Montégut's own language:—

"N'est-il pas vrai que La Tempête, ainsi interprétée, forme le plus beau des frontispices pour les œuvres de Shakspeare, frontispice d'autant plus précieux que l'artiste qui l'a gravé est le poète lui-même? Mais cette interprétation n'est peut-être pas exacte? Exacte ou non, elle sort si naturellement de la lecture de La Tempête, elle s'en échappe si spontanément et avec si peu d'efforts, elle est si bien d'accord avec le caractère particulier de cette pièce et le caractère général de l'œuvre de Shakspeare, qu'elle conserve dans l'un ou l'autre cas la valeur allégorique que nous lui avons assignée. Ainsi peu importe à la rigueur que Shakspeare n'ait pas eu les pensées que nous lui prêtons, que cette synthèse si nette et si claire de son génie qui ressort de La Tempête soit un pur effet du hasard, ou qu'il l'ait exprimée d'une manière inconsciente, sans bien savoir ce qu'il faisait, puisqu'elle est si apparente qu'il ne faut même pas d'esprit pour l'y découvrir."

J. MACRAY.

"ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL," Act III. Sc. 3:—

"1st Gent. Indeed, good lady, the fellow has a deal of that, too much, which holds him much to have."

This passage has caused the commentators much trouble. Staunton, in a note, says: "Of this passage no one has yet succeeded in making sense. It is, we fear, irremediably corrupt." Now I do not think so. Let us see. "To hold a man much to have," is, I take it, to get him credit for the possession of much. Now, what is it that obtains for him this credit? why his professing to possess it; his boasting that he has it. And therefore when the gentleman tells the countess that Parolles "has too much of that which holds him much to have," he merely says that he is a great boaster: and that is precisely what Shakspeare has made him throughout the play.

JAMES NICHOLS.

ORIGINAL LETTER BY THE LORD PROTECTOR.—This interesting and, so far as I am aware, hitherto unpublished document of this great man, was copied several years since by a friend from the original letter, and well merits a place in "N. & Q." Heriot's Hospital must be tolerably well known in the South, and the name and history of its founder is embalmed by Scott in The Fortunes of Nigel. Heriot was a man of whom his country ought to be proud: not merely for his munificent endowment, but for his general conduct, in endeavouring to benefit every war as much as he could the city in which he realised his fortune:—

"Right trustie and welbeloved,

"We are informed that one Mr Herriott gave very liberally towards the foundaçon of an Hospitall nere yo^r Cittie, and now called after his Name, for the reliefe of the poore. And being also informed that Elizabeth Donn, his daughter, being reduced to a lowe condicon, you were pleased to allow unto her an yearly pencon of 55£ for the mainteince of her selfe and children; But by reason of the troubles in Scotland, she hath received but little thereof: And being given to understand that, since the said Hospitall with the lands and revenue thereunto belonging were restored to you, M^{rs} Donn hath received nothing of the said Pencon. We doe recomend her condicon to yo^r consideraçon, earnestly desiring you that the said Pencon may be continued to her, and that you will take a speedy and effectuell course for the payment of soe much of the said Pencon as is in arreare since the restitution of the said Hospitall and Lands to you for the present relieffe of her and her children, who are at present reduced to grate straights, which as equity and gratitude calls for from you towards those who are so near related to the Donor and Founder, being now by the Providence of God become fit objects for such Charity. See your speedy and effectual performance thereof, and the kindness you shall shew to this poor gentlewoman, being (as We are credibly informed) very Godly and deserving, will be looked upon by Us as a testimony of your respect to

"Yor Loveing friend
"White-hall, June
"10th, 1656."
"OLIVER P.
(Marked) 25 June, 1656.

(Addressed)
"For our Right trustie and welbeloved the Lord Provost and Bayliffs of our City of Edinburgh, in Scotland,
"These."

J. M.

BEN JONSON AND BARTHOLOMÆUS ANULUS.—Should you consider the following coincidences of any interest to your readers, it is entirely at your service. Looking the other day into one of Gruter's Deliciæ Poetarum Gallorum, I lit upon the following lines:—

"Umbra suum corpus radianti in lumine solis
Cum sequitur, refugit: cum fugit, insequitur.
Tales nature quoque sint muliebres amores:
Optet amans, nolunt: non velit, ultro volunt.
Phœbum virgo fugit Daphne inviolata sequentem.
Echo, Narcissum, dum fugit, insequitur.
Ergo voluntati plerumque adversa repugnans
Fœmina, jure sui dicitur umbra viri."

They are by Bartholomæus Anulus (Barthelemi Aneau), who perished in a tumult at the time of the wars of religion in France, about the year 1565.

But in these lines of Aneau, unless I am very greatly deceived, we have the original of a famous song of Ben Jonson, which, as I have not a copy, I quote from recollection:—

"Follow a shadow, it still flies you,
Seem to fly it, it will pursue:
So court a mistress, she denies you;
Let her alone, she will court you.
Say are not women truly, then,
Styled but the shadows of us men?
"At morn and even shades are longest,
At noon they are or short, or none," &c.

Now, the first verse is nothing but a translation of the first four lines of the epigram, and though the second varies, the idea is borrowed. This resemblance I have never seen noticed in any edition of Ben Jonson, but I remember a note in, I think, Bell's Annotated Edition, in which it was stated that the poet was jesting with some lady on the subject, who desired him as a punishment to write a song on it. He did so: but he seems not to have forgotten to go to Aneau for a hint.

OSWALD WALLACE.

Lincoln's Inn.

ETHER AND CHLOROFORM.—The modern practice of inhaling ether, whereby the patient is rendered unconscious of pain, is generally considered as the discovery of Charles T. Jackson, M.D., of Boston, U.S., in the year 1846; and that chloroform was first administered in England by Mr. James Robinson, surgeon-dentist, Dec. 14, 1848. The practice, however, was not altogether unknown to the ancients; for in Middleton's tragedy of Women beware Women, published in 1657, Hippolito says to the Duke of Florence:—

"Yes, my Lord,
I make no doubt, as I shall take the course,
Which she shall never know till it be acted,
And when she wakes to honour, then she'll thank me
for't:
I'll imitate the pities of old surgeons
To this lost limb, who, ere they show their art,
Cast one asleep, then cut the disease'd part;
So, out of love to her I pity most,
She shall not feel him going till he's lost;
Then she'll commend the cure."—Act IV. Sc. 1.

J. Y.

"CONCEITS, CLINCHES, FLASHES, AND WHIMSIES," 1639.—Since I inserted in the concluding volume of my Old English Jest Books this remarkable performance, I have found some reason to think that the authorship of the volume belongs, not to Taylor, the Water Poet, but to Robert Chamberlain, who, in 1640, published a work entitled Jocabella, or a Cabinet of Conceits, being a collection of jests with a supplement at the end of Chamberlain's own poems. My evidence on the subject is, that the joke about Shakespeare is common to both, and it is scarcely likely that, unless Chamberlain compiled the Conceits of 1639, he would have ventured to appropriate in the very next year what seems to be an original witticism, and which, at any rate, occurs in no other jest-book that has come under my observation. A second point is, that the jeu-de-esprit of 1639 would have lost a good deal of its freshness in 1640, and would perhaps have scarcely been thought worth stealing by Chamberlain out of another man's book. Certainly the jest required to be very new to be at all telling, for it is a deplorably sorry one.

W. CAREW HAZLITT.

"SO MUCH THE WORSE FOR THE FACTS."—This paradoxical saying is usually ascribed to Voltaire; but I lately met with what seems to be the true version of the story, ascribed to its real author. In the Dictionnaire de Sciences Philosophiques (Paris, 1851, vol. v.), there is a Life of M. Royer Collard; wherein it is stated (p. 442) that he disapproved of the opinions of the Fathers of Port Royal on the doctrine of grace: "Ils ont les textes pour eux, disait il, j'en suis fâché pour les textes." So much the worse for the texts—a very different, but much more reasonable saying. V. S. V.

SLANG: SLOE.—In Italian the prefix s is equivalent to our dis- or un-; thus leale is loyal, sleale disloyal; legare is to bind, slegare is to unbind; so slogare is to dislocate, — a not unlikely result of a fierce fight, or "slogging match"; so shingua would mean bad language, or slang. Much of the flash of the thieves is said to be borrowed from the Italian, probably through the organ-boys.

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

COINCIDENCES.—Byron, in English Bards, &c., says —

" . . . as soon
Seek roses in December—ice in June."

Has it ever been remarked, that in Shakspeare's Love's Labour's Lost, Act I., Sc. 1, Biron says —

"At Christmas I no more desire a rose,
Than wish a snow in May's new tangled shows" ?

ERIC.

Ville-Marie, Canada.

MOTTO OF VIRGINIA. — Please preserve the following in "N. & Q.:" —

"The motto on the Virginian coat of arms has been changed. 'Sic semper tyrannis' has been expunged, and the words 'Liberty and Union' now appear above the Goddess of Liberty trampling upon the prostrate form of Tyranny."—Leeds Mercury, Aug. 23, 1865.

A. O. V. P.

Queries.

LAKE ALLEN, ESQ. — His Miscellaneous Collections for a History of Portsmouth form MS. Addit. 8153, 8154. Some account of him will be acceptable.

S. Y. R.

BODEHERSTE: "TIENS TA FOY." — 1. Is there any translation published of Domesday Book relating to the county of Sussex,* or can any one give me any information relative to a place or property called Bodeherste (near Battle) either before or after the Conquest?

2. The motto, "Tiens ta foy," is said in Elvin's Hand-book of Mottoes to be borne by the families of Kemp, Mignon, and Bathurst. Is there any known connection between these three families, or can any explanation be given as to the cause or origin of this similarity in their mottoes?

HENRY BATHURST.

CIVIC COMPANIES OF BRUSSELS. — In the sixteenth century there were at Brussels fifty trade corporations, which formed nine great bodies, or nations as they were termed. The goldsmiths, butchers, fishmongers, market-gardeners, and sawyers formed the nation of Notre-Dame (L'Histoire de l'Orfèvrerie-Jaillerie, &c., Paris, 1850). Is a full account of these nations to be found in any published work? If so, I should be obliged by a reference to it.

* Among the Additional MSS. in the British Museum are the following: "Tabular arrangement of Domesday for Sussex," No. 6360, f. 6. Names of "Places mentioned in Domesday with their modern appellations," No. 6361, f. 36.—Ed.]

J. WOODWARD.

New Shoreham.

CURIOS DECORATION.—A decoration was lately brought to me for interpretation; but I could make out nothing of its mysterious characters. I will describe it, in hopes that some reader of "N. & Q." may favour me with an explanation. It is a star of seven points, the place of the eighth, at the top, being inelegantly supplied by a loop, from which it is to be suspended on a ribbon, or chain. The material is only brass, yet the engraving is remarkably well executed. It displays a shield divided quarterly by an upright crossier, and a transverse spear. In the dexter chief is a lion rampant, and a sceptre before him. In the sinister chief appears a well under a tree, an arrow by its side, and a bull underneath. The dexter base has a man in a kind of frock-coat, with both hands lifted up, as if preaching or exhorting. In the sinister base is a spread eagle. The supporters are two harpies, each extending one wing over the escutcheon, and with the other partly covering her body. Above the shield is a star, with the letter J in the centre; and above all is the eye of Providence. The motto is KODES LA ADOXIA. At first I thought it might have some reference to the Kodex, who founded the sect of Collegians: but the person who brought it said that he understood it to be a decoration of some society, which he called the Order of Stagorians. I confess I am all in the dark about this singular motto and coat of arms, and shall be thankful if any one can give an explanation of it.

F. C. H.

SAMUEL DRUMMOND'S PICTURES. — The picture of Admiral de Winter delivering up his sword to Admiral Duncan, after the battle of Camperdown, by the late Samuel Drummond, A.R.A., is in the Hall of Greenwich Hospital. A portrait of Sir Isamb. Brunel, by the same artist, is in the National Portrait Gallery: and a group, life size, of Sir Oswald Moseley, is at Ashby-de-la-Zouch. Will any reader of "N. & Q." inform me where a portrait of Abraham Newland, and any other pictures by the same artist, are to be found? D.

HENRY HARRIS. — Wanted the following particulars of Mr. Harris, who, from the year 1800 to 1822, was proprietor of Covent Garden theatre. At what place was he born, and what became of his family? It is conjectured that he had only one child, and that a daughter. The date of his death is also desired.*

C. BOWEN.

* Mr. Harris died on May 12, 1839. His death is noticed in the Gent. Mag. for June, 1839, p. 663, and in The Era newspaper of May 19, 1839, p. 593, but these articles do not give any account of his birth-place or family.—Ed.]

HERALDIC.—No reply having yet been given to this heraldic query (3rd S. viii. 87), I beg to repeat my desire to know whose coat of arms bore the device of three griffins passant, looking to the sinister side of the shield (two above one), but without a chevron between them. The tinctures not known. Also I shall be glad to be informed what were the arms of William Wye, who became Lord of the Manor of Lippiat or Stroud, in the county of Gloucester, by his marriage with Maud, daughter and heiress of Thomas Whittington of Lippiat, who died A.D. 1490. (Vide Pedigree of the Whittingtons in Lysons's Model Merchant of the Middle Ages, London and Gloucester, 1860.)

P. H. F.

Stroud.

ISVARA: OSIRIS.—In Moor's Hindu Pantheon (I cannot refer to the page; my reference, therefore, must be to the Edinburgh Review, No. 34), it is stated that the letters "A U M," (pronounced om) represent the Hindu triad—Brahma, Vishnu, and Isvara. M. represents Isvara, as probably the initial letter of mana: signifying mens, or, more correctly perhaps, πνεῦμα. My first question is—

1. What words, symbolic of Brahma and Vishnu, claim A and U as their initial letters or their power? On what ground do A and U represent these deities?

2. As Isvara is Osiris, in assonance as well as in attributes, what deities in the Egyptian mythology corresponded with Brahma and Vishnu in the sound of their names no less than in dignity?

3. Does more modern philological and mythological research justify the conclusion, that the religion of ancient India was in all essential respects the same as that of ancient Egypt?

O. T. D.

IRISH VOTING LAW.—

"The candidates for seats in the parliament which had to pronounce on the question of the Union were bound, by strict pledges to their respective constituencies, to vote for the country whatever measure might be proposed. When these candidates became members, no one produced such mingled feelings of scorn and merriment as an obscure representative, who offered to vote for the Union on terms which he had put down in writing. The Government agreed to the terms, but refused to sign any written agreement. The member, suspecting that this circumstance indicated treachery, made a violent speech against the Union. The last words were on his lips, when a treasury messenger placed in his hands the agreement he had required, duly signed and sealed. He glanced at it, concluded his adverse speech in the spirit in which he had begun it, and in a few minutes voted for the Union. As many people laughed at as cried against this proceeding, which served Ireland better than it pleased Irishmen. But the vote, if we mistake not, obtained a peerage for him who gave it. The Government regarded deeds, and disregarded words."—"Old Election Days in Ireland." Corr-hill Mag. August, 1865, p. 175.

I wish to know more about this. The member will be easily found. Voting in a few minutes after concluding his speech; he must have been the last speaker, as, on that memorable debate, no one spoke for only a few minutes. An agreement, under hand and seal, for the purchase of a vote in parliament is a strange thing, and not less so, that it should be delivered by a treasury messenger to a member while speaking. Which seal did "the Government" use? The Great? the Privy? or what?

In the same article it is said:—

"We have heard of one lord, who, just before the recent election, threatened every tenant, who should fail to vote as his landlord would have him, with eviction. Such a threat may bring the utterer under a sentence of death, issued from a Ribbon Lodge, and such a sentence is as sure to be carried out as doom itself. But this landlord is a dauntless and foreseeing man, and he is said to have made a will, whereby the legatee is directed, under certain penalties, and in case of the legator's death by violence, to evict every tenant from the estate, who has voted against the landlord's directions and interests."—P. 176.

If such penalties are recoverable, the drawer of the will must be a marvellously skilled lawyer.

FITZHOPKINS.

Utrecht.

LICH-GATE OR CHURCHYARD PORCH SUPERSTITION.—In Hone's Table Book, p. 100, is the following:—

"Sir John Sinclair* records of some parishioners in the county of Argyll, that—'though by no means superstitious (an observation which in the sequel seems very odd), they still retain some opinions handed down by their ancestors, perhaps from the time of the Druids. It is believed by them, that the spirit of the last person that was buried watches round the churchyard till another is buried, to whom he delivers his charge.' Further on, in the same work†, is related that—'In one division of this county, where it was believed that the ghost of the person last buried kept the gate of the churchyard till relieved by the next victim of death, a singular scene occurred, when two burials were to take place in one churchyard on the same day. Both parties staggered forward as fast as possible to consign their respective friend in the first place to the dust: if they met at the gate, the dead were thrown down till the living decided, by blows, whose ghost should be condemned to porter it.'"

Does this superstition obtain at present, or is it forgotten?

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

LUTHER ON ESECOL.—Will some one oblige me with the original of the following remark of Luther, and an exact reference to the passage?—

"The bunch of grapes was borne by two strong men, upon a pole or staff: he that went before could not see them; but he that was behind could both see and eat them. So the fathers, patriarchs, and prophets of the Old Testament, did not, in like manner, see the bunch of grapes—that is, the Son of God made man—as they that

* "Statistical Account of Scotland."

† In Vol. I. p. 715.

came behind. The evangelists, apostles, disciples under the New Testament both saw and tasted it, after John had showed this grape: Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world."

H. C.

LANCASTER COACH.—Can any of your north-country readers inform me when the coach between Lancaster and Alverstone, crossing Morecambe Sands at West Bank, ceased to run; and also, the name of the said coach?

E. S.

MACAULAY AND THE YOUNGER PITT.—In the early part of Macaulay's Essay on the second Pitt, Macaulay speaks of his wonderful aptitude and progress in classical studies. In the latter part of the same Essay, he draws a comparison between the solace Fox found in retirement in Euripides and other ancient models, and the want of this in Pitt through deficiency of scholarship. Does there not appear here some inconsistency?

F. G. L.

Exeter.

MARSHALL.—Verstegan, and with him most English etymologists, trace this word to the Teutonic mare, the generic term for horse, and scale=a servant. In the last number of the Intermédiaire des Chercheurs et Curieux, p. 441, a Celtic etymology is suggested, viz. from the Armoric marc'h=horse. I think the word comes to us through the Norman. Is not the latter the more probable derivation?

J. ELIOT HODGKIN.

THE MYSTIC LADDER.—There is a mystic ladder, or ladder of perfection, mentioned in alchemical works, as if it was frequently spoken of by the early fathers of the church. Can any one point out such passages, or give references to other works in which it occurs?

ROSICRUCIAN.

THE MYSTIC ROSE.—Many mystical writers make allusions to the mystic, or black, rose. Wanted direct references to passages where it is mentioned, its botanical history, if any; its emblematical meaning, and any other notes or suggestions which are likely to be of service to a

ROSICRUCIAN.

NOY OF CORNWALL.—Is there any representative of the family to which Attorney-General Noy belonged living in the male line? Was there more than one family of this name existing in Cornwall in the Attorney-general's time? MEMOR, in "N. & Q." (2nd S. vii. 35), says, that "the last representative lately emigrated to America." Is this correct?

At present there are three or four farmers named Noy residing in the neighbourhood of St. Buryan—the birthplace of King Charles's celebrated attorney. They have been situated there for many generations, and are all closely related to each other. Query, are they in any way connected with the Attorney-general's family.

The name itself is extremely rare, and with but one exception, that I am aware of, exclusively confined to the district to which I have referred. I should be obliged for any information respecting the Noy who, as MEMOR states, emigrated to America. When did he leave England?—the precise place of his abode when in Cornwall—his Christian name.—his present address?

W. PENDELL.

PERPLEXED RELATIONSHIP.—In the Europe Speculum of Sir E. Sandys, is the following curious passage:—

"King Philip II. might have called the Archduke Albert his brother, cousin, nephew, and son. He was uncle to himself, cousin-german to his father, husband to his sister, and father to his wife."

Is the allusion to Philip II. of Spain? And if so, how can it possibly be made out?

A. A.

Poets' Corner.

PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S DICTIONARY.—Will you aid in this work by allowing me to ask your readers for quotations for the following words?—

1. For its before 1508.
2. For who in the nominative, as a simple relative, between 1382 and 1523.

W. I. S. HORTON.

Rugeley.

PLAYING BARNABY.—Clarke, in his Survey of the Lakes (1789), says that the curate of Langdale was obliged to sell ale to support himself and family; and adds—

"At his house I have played Barnaby with him on the Sabbath-day morning, when he left us with the good old song—

"I'll but preach, and be with you again."

What is the meaning of playing Barnaby? Was it a game, or does it simply mean drinking à la "Drunken Barnaby," the author of whose journal belonged to the same district? And can any correspondent supply the rest of the song here cited?

H. C. G.

Bebington.

RUBENS AT SHREWSBURY.—Will MR. SAINSBURY, or any other reader of "N. & Q." who may have made Rubens the subject of his study, kindly inform me whether there exists any evidence of that great painter having visited Shrewsbury?

R. A.

"THE RUGBY MAGAZINE," 1835-37.—Can any of your readers inform me as to the authorship of three papers in this periodical, having the following titles and signatures? 1. Xantippe, a dramatic sketch, by R.; vol. i. pp. 284-92. 2. Chirpings from "The Birds" of Aristophanes, by N.; vol. ii. pp. 330, 342. 3. Two Autumn Days in Athens, 2000 years ago, by T. Y. C.; vol. ii. pp. 348-358.

R. INGLIS.

ST. JAMES'S FIELDS.—In old chronicles and various other works of the sixteenth and seventeenth century I find frequent mention of St. James's Fields. Strype even mentions St. James's Farm. Neither of these names do I find on old plans of London. Am I right in supposing that the present Green Park occupies their site, or can you or any of your correspondents kindly inform me of their locality? J. WOODLARK.

WEDGWOOD'S CATALOGUES.—I should feel particularly obliged if such of your readers as possess copies of the catalogues issued by Josiah Wedgwood, or by Wedgwood and Bentley, would kindly communicate to me the editions and dates of such catalogues. I am preparing an analysis of the catalogues, for the use of collectors, and am desirous of ascertaining what editions are in existence besides those which I at present possess, or have access to. Any information concerning these scarce but highly interesting works will be most acceptable. LEWELLYNN JEWITT, F.S.A. Derby.

Queries with Answers.

"ENGLAND A NATION OF SHOPKEEPERS."—Will any reader kindly furnish evidence of Napoleon Bonaparte having said the English were a nation of shopkeepers? At all events, so far as I can learn (if he ever said it), he was not the first who did: for I find that Bertrand Barrère used the following words, in his eloquent speech in defence of the Committee of Public Safety, June 11, 1794, before the National Convention: "Let Pitt then boast of his victory to his nation of shopkeepers—'Nation boutiquière.' " P.

[Although the fact was assumed, and repeatedly alleged, it may be doubted whether the English were ever called a nation of shopkeepers by Napoleon Bonaparte. The period when the outcry against this supposed insult became loudest and most general, was that which succeeded the rupture of the Peace of Amiens, 12 May, 1803. Bonaparte, while himself saluted in our daily press, in our loyal meetings, and in our patriotic placards, with such titles as "Tyrant," "Corsican Despot," "Corsican Usurper," "Corsican Mulatto," was simultaneously charged with holding shocking bad language towards our noble selves; and, amongst other offensive terms, styling us a nation of shopkeepers. Thus in a speech at the York Meeting, 28 July, 1803, Mr. Stanhope is reported to have said: "The Chief Consul of France tells us, that we are but a nation of shopkeepers. Let us shopkeepers then melt our weights in our scales, and return him the compliment in bullets." (Anti-Gallican, No. 1, p. 24.)

So Sir W. Scott, writing on the renewal of the war: "To Napoleon, the English people, tradesmen, and shopkeepers as he chose to qualify them, seemed assuming a confidence in Europe, which was, he conceived, far beyond their due." (Life of N. Bonaparte, vol. v. ch. iv.) To the same effect The Times, 7 July, 1806: "Bonaparte has frequently denominated us a nation of pedlars": and again, 14 Oct. 1808: "The spirit and unanimity of the country . . . must by this time have taught the Corsican Usurper, that this 'Nation of Shopkeepers' are determined to keep their shops," &c. While the writer of a patriotic broadsheet (London, 1808), adopting, as if in defiance or in derision, the signature of "A SHOPKEEPER," intrepidly inquires: "Shall we merit, by our cowardice, the titles of sordid Shopkeepers, Cowardly Scum, and Dastardly Wretches, which in every proclamation he" [Bonaparte] "gives us?"

It is clear then that at the period in question N. Bonaparte was very generally believed to have applied to England the offensive appellation, "A nation of shopkeepers" (Nation boutiquière); and we are assured by a friend who lived in those days; that he well remembers the consequent indignation excited throughout the country. Yet it does not appear that, even then, people were quite sure that the words were uttered by Napoleon himself; for, while some say "The Corsican Tyrant," others say "France," "They" (meaning the French), &c. So Dibdin, in his song sung by Mr. Fawcett at Covent Garden, 12 Sept., 1808:—

"They say we keep shops
To vend broadcloth and slops,
And of merchants they call us a sly land;
But, though war is their trade,
What Briton's afraid
To say he'll ne'er sell 'em the Island."

And The Morning Post of 8 Jan., 1804, in a review of the year 1803: "We have been ridiculed by France, as one nation boutiquière, a nation of shopkeepers."

It will be seen then that, with the attention which our limited time has left at our disposal, we have failed to satisfy ourselves that the phrase in question was ever applied to England by Napoleon I., though so often imputed to him. We shall be glad should any of our correspondents be able to give us further light; the more so because the question is of some historic importance, and our historians have ignored it. When, in respect to any alleged occurrence of comparatively modern history, doubts have already arisen, it is well if "N. & Q." by affording a field for investigation, can aid in deciding the point at issue, ere the time for investigation has passed.

It may be proper to mention, as an aid to inquiry, that if the offensive words were ever really uttered or sanctioned by Bonaparte, the time when this must have occurred appears to define itself with tolerable accuracy. Our extracts from the English press, already given, clearly evince that the supposed insult was known, spoken of, and resented in England not later than July, 1803. Now, on examining the French papers, we find that in the earlier part of the same year, 1803, they had not commenced to launch any official or semi-official attacks against the English generally, but styled us as a people, while they assailed some of our statesmen. The Monitor of 1 Jan. 1804, in mentioning "les Grenville, les Windham, les Fox," adds "ces hommes ne font ni l'opinion ni le peuple anglais. Cette nation si éclairée, si méditative, a une autre marche et un autre esprit." And, again, in the Moniteur of 12 June, 1803, England is complimented as "la nation qui a produit Locke, Neper, et Neuton"; while the same paper, on the 29th of the same month, after condemning the antigallicans, adds, "Les Anglais sensés sont loin de partager ce ton d'ivresse et d'extravagance." These expressions are not at all in accordance with any such general attack on the character of the English as that contained in the phrase "Nation boutiquière"; and it should be borne in mind that the paper containing them was the sole official organ of the French government, i. e. of the First Consul, at the time.—From 7 nivôse an 11 de la République (28 dec. 1802) "le Moniteur est le seul Journal officiel."

In May, 1803, Carrion-Nizas, an orator of the Tribunat, commended us as a people, but denounced our leaders as hucksters: "Ces chefs aveuglés d'un peuple estimable par tant d'endroits, et qui les désavoue, n'ont senti, n'ont raisonné que comme des marchands. Comme des marchands plus accoutumés à juger par de vils calculs que par de hautes maximes," &c. Can this partial impeachment have brought up the previous and more sweeping imputation of Barère, either in French minds or in our own?]

LADY MILLER, of Batheaston, wife of Sir John Miller, Bart., and author of Letters from Italy, who died, June 24, 1781, æt. forty-one, is noticed in Genl. Mag. li. 277; Warner's Hist. of Bath, 255; Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Croker, 12mo edit., v. 277; Rose's Biog. Dict.; Notes & Queries, 2nd S. v. 495; and Chambers's Book of Days, i. 280. What was her Christian name? If Louandes (ed. John, 1551), is to be relied on, it began with M. I should also like to have some information as to her parentage. Absurdly enough her Christian name does not appear on the epitaph to her memory in Bath Abbey church. S. Y. R.

[Lady Miller's Christian name was Anna. She was the only daughter of Edward Riggs, Esq., and sole heiress of her grandfather, the Right Honourable Edward Riggs, M.P., and a commissioner of the revenue in Ireland. She was married to Capt. John Miller, of Bellicasey, co. Clare, in the year 1765. In 1775, Horace Walpole, writing to the Hon. Mr. Conway, says, "Ten years ago there lived a Madame Riggs, an old rough humourist, who passed for a wit; her daughter, who passed for nothing, married to a Captain Miller, full of good-natured officiousness. . . . They run out their fortune, and all went to France to repair it. In France the mother was left with the grandchildren, while the fond pair resorted to Italy. Thence they returned, her head turned with France and boutrims; his, with virtù. They have instituted a poetic academy at Bath-Easton, give out subjects, and distribute prizes; publish the prize-verses, and make themselves completely ridiculous; which is a pity, as they are good-natured, well-meaning people."—Walpole's Letters, ed. 1857, v. 20; vi. 170, 332.]

JOHN HOLKER.—Mr. John Southerden Burn, in his History of the French, Walloon, Dutch, and other Foreign Protestant Refugees settled in England (p. 18), states, quoting Cath. Mag. No. 17, p. 382, that—

"The cotton manufactures of Rouen were . . . established by an Englishman, Mr. Holker, from Manchester: he had taken part with Prince Edward in 1745; was arrested and sent to prison, from which he escaped, and found his way to Rouen, where he set up these manufactures, made a considerable fortune, and was created a baron."

Where can any further information be gained concerning this Mr. Holker? Does his family yet exist in France? K. P. D. E.

[The Life of John Holker, Knight of the Order of St. Louis, would make an interesting piece of biography. He was originally a calenderer at Manchester, but joining the ranks of Prince Charles Edward Stuart in 1746, was taken prisoner at Carlisle. He was confined in Newgate, and would certainly have suffered for his adherence to the Prince, had not he, together with his companion, escaped from their cell by making a breach in the wall. His companion made his egress first, but finding that Mr. Holker, who was a square bulky man, could not follow him, he determined to return and share his fate. They went to work again, and having enlarged the hole, both made their escape. Holker remained six weeks concealed in London by a woman who kept a green-stall, although a large reward was offered for his apprehension. He afterwards fled to France, and served with honour in the Irish brigade, till peace deprived him of his pay. Many applications were made by him to the crown for pardon, which failing to obtain, he was induced to establish a cotton manufactory at Rouen, much to the detriment of England. The French government gave him all possible encouragement, and appointed him Inspector-General of the woollen and cotton manufactories of France. He died at Rouen on April 28, 1786.]

Mr. Holker was descended from a very ancient family, seated at Holker, near Furness Abbey, co. Lancaster. Being attached to the royal cause during the civil wars in the reign of Charles I., Laurence Holker, Esq., was imprisoned at Manchester, and all his estates sequestered. His descendant, John Holker (the father of the calenderer), for his adherence to the son of James II. in 1715, also suffered many years' imprisonment. Consult the Genl. Mag. lvi. (i.) 441; lvii. (i.) 312; lxiii. (ii.) 1039.]

COMPOUND INTEREST.—The following curious calculation was very lately told me by a friend whose accuracy on such subjects has always been remarkable. One penny put out at compound interest at the time of our Saviour's birth, would in 1767 have amounted 250 millions of globes of solid gold, each the size of our earth. The same sum placed out at simple interest, would in the same time have amounted to 7s. 6d.

I should be very much obliged if you could name the page and edition of Dr. Price's work on Reversionary Payments in which this is mentioned. F. M. H.

[The passage occurs at p. xiii. of the second edition of Dr. Price's Observations on Reversionary Payments. He says, "It is well known to what prodigious sums, money, improved for some time at compound interest, will increase. A penny, so improved from our Saviour's birth, as to double itself every fourteen years, or which is nearly the same, put out at five per cent. compound interest at our Saviour's birth, would by this time, have increased to more money than would be contained in 150 millions of globes, each equal to the earth in magnitude, and all solid gold. A shilling put out to six per cent. compound interest, would, in the same time, have increased to a greater sum in gold than the whole solar system could hold, supposing it a sphere equal in diameter to the diameter of Saturn's orbit. And the earth is to such a sphere, as half a square foot, or a quarto page, to the whole surface of the earth."]

BOSTON, A FLOWER.—In an inventory of the time of Henry VIII. a certain vestment is described as "powtheryd with flowers callyd Boston." I am anxious to know what they were.

P. B. M.

[The late Mr. Pishey Thompson found a similar entry in an inventory of goods belonging to the Guild of St. Mary in Boston, and it is probable our correspondent has consulted the same document. It has been conjectured that Boston is a provincial or orthographical error for the word bouton, which may have been the original word. There is the phrase fleurs de boutons, meaning those button-shaped flowers, as in daisies and bachelors' buttons, which might have been the character of the pattern figured on the fabric, and "powthered" or diffused over it.—Vide "N. & Q." 1st S. x. 291.]

VISCOUNTS OXFORD.—I am anxious to obtain biographical particulars of James Macgill, first Viscount Oxford in the Peerage of Scotland; of Robert, second Viscount, who died 1706; and of Robert, grandson of the last, who assumed the title. F. M. S.

229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

[Some interesting biographical particulars of this family will be found in William Anderson's Scottish Nation, iii. 269, Edinb. roy. 8vo, 1863.]

Replies.

CALDERON'S "DAUGHTER OF THE AIR," AND
"PURGATORY OF ST. PATRICK."
(3rd S. viii. 52, 59, 68, and 109.)

A residence of a few weeks at the Baths of Homburg has prevented my seeing "N. & Q." with the usual regularity. I now find in the recent numbers, all together, my own reply and the rejoinder of the original INQUIRER upon the subject of Calderon's Daughter of the Air, and the query of the Rev. CANON DALTON, with the replies of EXPERTO CREDE and F. C. H. relative to The Purgatory of St. Patrick. Upon the subject of The Daughter of the Air I have little to add, except to draw the attention of German scholars to the admirable translation by Gries of these two dramas on the Story of Semiramis, which they will find in the thirteenth volume of the Collection of German translations of Calderon, published at Vienna in 1826, or in the separate collection of those by Gries, eight vols. Berlin, 1840. Raupach's original tragedy of The "Daughter of the Air", after the idea of Calderon, may also be mentioned, as well as an excellent translation of it into English, published in 1831, a copy of which I picked up in my recent passage through London. I have to thank INQUIRER for his encouraging me to undertake the translation of La Hija del Aire. That pleasant task awaits the combination of so many circumstances not likely to come together, that I fear the project must be consigned to that Limbo of unfulfilled intentions which holds many a more promising shade than this.

With regard to Calderon's Purgatory of St. Patrick, I think I shall be able to add something to the valuable information contained in the reply of EXPERTO CREDE to the query of the Rev. CANON DALTON. The confused list of ancient authors who have mentioned the legend of St. Patrick's Purgatory with which the play ends, and which EXPERTO CREDE has quoted, he seems to think we owe to the research of Calderon himself. This is entirely a mistake. The whole list is taken from Juan Perez de Montalvan's Vida y Purgatorio de San Patricio, first published in 1627, on which Calderon's play is altogether founded, but with the names arranged and sometimes erroneously connected, according to the exigencies of the metre. When my translation of Calderon's Purgatory of St. Patrick was published in 1853, I had not been able to procure a copy of Montalvan's Vida, &c., but I have since seen several editions of the original, as well as several translations of it into other languages.

I have now before me two editions of Montalvan's work in the original Spanish. One published at Barcelona by Pablo Campins without date, but probably in 1657, as it contains the Approbation of Valdivieso, given at Madrid the 3rd February in that year, and another at Madrid in 1664 by Melchor Sanchez. At p. 52 of the former edition is the list of authorities adopted by Calderon, that is, of the names of the authors alone, but without any reference to the particular work of each in which the Purgatory is mentioned. This important omission is supplied in the margin of pp. 44-45 of the Madrid edition of 1664. It is also supplied at p. 68 of a very early French translation published at Brussels in 1637, ten years after the work first appeared in Spanish; during which short period six editions of the original had been published. As this translation, which is now before me, is different from Bouillon's Vie de S. Patrice, published five years later at Troyes, and which is the French version most frequently met with, I give the title-page of the Brussels edition as follows:—

"La Vie Admirable du Grand S. Patrice Patriarche D'Hibernie: Avec l'Histoire véritable de son fameux, et tant renommé Purgatoire. Mise en Espagnol par le Docteur Jehan Perez de Montalvan, natif de Madrid. Et traduit en François sur la Sixiesme édition, par F. A. S. Chartreux à Bruxelles. A Bruxelles. Chez Godefroy Schoenaerts au Liure blanc. L'an M.DC.XXXVII."

Here is the passage from Montalvan:—

"Y aunque la materia de suyo parece esteril, no lo es tanto, que no la acrediten * Henrico Salteriese, y Mateo Parisiense, Dionisio Cartuxano, Jacobo Januense, ["ò." in ed. 1657] Genuense Dominicano, Radulfo Higenden. Cesario Heisterbachense, Molerico, Marco Marulo, Maurolico Siculo, el Reuerendissimo Señor Don David Roto, Obispo, y Viceprimado de toda Hibernia, el Cardenal Belarmino, Beda, Fr. Dimas Serpi, Jacobo Solino, Misingan, y muy doctamente Don Felipe Osuleuano Bearro, Hiberno, el Compendio que hijo de la Historia de Irlanda," &c.

The references in the margin, which in the Spanish ed. of 1634 are unlettered, and in the French translation of Brussels are lettered incorrectly, I distribute thus. To Henry of Saltrey and Matthew Paris I give the reference "In Visione Ordi, mil," a misprint for "In visione Oeni militis" as given correctly in Messingham's Florilegium (to which I shall presently refer), and in the Brussels translation. To Dionysius, the great Carthusian belongs the reference "Libro de quatuor novissimis, tertia parte, &c." To "Jacobus Januense [ò] Genuense Dominicano"—or in the words of Messingham, "Jacobi Januensis (alias) Genuensis Dominicani,"—namely, the famous Dominican Friar Jacobus de Voragine, subsequently Archbishop of Genoa, belongs the reference in the margin "In Vita Patricii in Legenda Sanctorum," meaning The Golden Legend, of which he was the author. Of Jacobus de Voragine we get no trace in Calderon's list except in the word "Dominicano," which he absurdly joins with "Esturbaquense" (Heisterbachensis) that properly belongs to the "Cesario" of the preceding line. Radulfo Higenden, turned by Calderon into "Rudolfo," is quoted "In suo Polichronico." Cesar of Heisterbach is quoted "In suis Dialogis." The author who is called "Molerico" in the Spanish editions of Montalvan, 1657 and 1664, is called "Mombrius" both in the Brussels translation of 1637 and in the original work of Messingham, 1624, from which all the names are derived. The work of Mombrius referred to is "tom. ii. de Vitis Sanctorum." Calderon calls him Membrosio. To Marcus Ma-rulus the reference is "Lib. iii. cap. 4." To Maurolicus Siculus, "In suo Martyrologio." To the Most Reverend David Rothe, Bishop of Ossory and Vice-Primate of all Ireland, is ascribed "Lib. 2. de Purgatorio." It will be perceived that the exigencies of metre compelled Calderon to add the words "y el prudente" to the correct description by Montalvan, and to change the "Vice-Primado" into "Primado," which has led your correspondent EXPERTO CREDE into the mistake of supposing that two persons were here mentioned, and that the latter was Peter Lombard, whose name is not mentioned in this place by Messingham or Montalvan, though carefully noted by MR. WILLIAM PINKERTON in his learned essays on "St. Patrick's Purgatory" in the 4th and 5th volumes of the Ulster Journal of Archaeology. To Cardinal Bellarmine I presume the next reference is to be given, "Lib. 2 and 6, de Revel. S. Brigid." To Friar Dynas Serpi is given "Lib. de Purgatorio," cap. 26. "Jacobus" is not the Genoese Dominican suggested by EXPERTO CREDE, who is quoted, as I have mentioned above, much earlier; but Jacobus de Vitriaco, whose name is printed thus in full in the Brussels translation, the reference being, "In Sua Historia Orientali." [Messingham says—"Jacobus de Vitriaco in sua historia orientali, cap. 92. de puteo hoc sic loquitur."—Florilegium, p. 113.] "Cap. 35" is the only reference given to Solinus, and probably refers to his Della cosa maravigliosa del Mondo, mentioned by your correspondent EXPERTO CREDE. "Misingan," who is scarcely improved into Calderon's "Mensingano," is of course Messingham, whose Florilegium is quoted as if it were of no more importance than the others, although it is plain that this work was the sole source of all this seemingly recondite and original research. The long list winds up with a reference to the visit of Raymond, Viscount de Perhilhos, to the Purgatory in 1397, as described by O'Sullivan in his Historie Catholice Ibernie Compendium, Lisbon, 1621, p. 14; and which is but another version of the Vision of Knight Owen, or Enio.

Messingham's Florilegium Inula Sanctorum, seu Vita et Acta Sanctorum Libernie, Parisiis, 1624, was, as I have said, the source of all this parade of erudition. The original work of Messingham is very scarce, but perhaps a small tract in my possession, which contains everything relating to the Purgatory of St. Patrick contained in the larger work, translated into English, and published at Paris in 1718, is much rarer, as I have never heard of another copy. Its title is as follows:—

"A Brief History of Saint Patrick's Purgatory and its Pilgrimage, collected out of Ancient Historians, written in Latin by the Reverend MR. THOMAS MESSINGHAM, formerly Superior of the Irish Seminary in Paris. And now made English in favour of those who are curious to know the Particulars of that Famous Place and Pilgrimage so much Celebrated by Antiquity. Printed at Paris, 1718."

To conclude this long note, I may say that Montalvan's Vida &c. contains nothing concerning the Purgatory that he has not translated from Messingham, and that Calderon's play, so far, contains nothing but what he versified from Montalvan. The romance of Ludovico Enio's early life in Spain and France, at Valencia and Toulouse, seems to have been entirely the invention of Montalvan. This Calderon adopts, and adds to it all those scenes in which Enio figures as the suitor, husband, and eventually murderer of Polonia, the daughter of Egerio, King of Ireland. Many of the theological and metaphysical discussions introduced into the play are found in the Life by Montalvan, and even the striking scene of the apparition, where a muffled figure, on throwing open its cloak, reveals a skeleton, saying to the astonished soldier himself, "I am Ludovico Enio" is suggested by a passage in the work of that remarkable but unfortunate genius, who, dying insane from excessive mental labour at the early age of thirty-six years, left with his other writings about sixty plays, many of which retain their popularity to the present day.

Calderon, however, out of the materials here enumerated, has constructed a very spirited and wonderful drama, which has found many admirers and a good translator in Germany, though the latter fact does not seem to have been known to Schmidt, who mentions the name of every other German translator. The title of the copy before me, which is the only one I have seen or heard of, is as follows:—

"Das Fegefeuer des heiligen Patricius. Schauspiel von Don Peder Calderon de la Barca. Uebersetzt von Al-Jeitteles. Brünn, 1824. Joseph Georg Trassler."

He translates the lines of Calderon boldly as he found them, without troubling himself as to their correctness, and courageously adds a few blunders of his own:—

"Denn so endet die Geschichte,
Deren Kund' uns hat gegeben
Dionisius der Carthäuser,
Und Henricus Saltarensis,
Cäsar, Mathäus Rodulfus,
Domician Esturbarcensis,
Marcus Marulus, Membrosius,
David Roto, und Hibernicus,
Hoherhalmer weiser Primas,
Belarminus, Beda, Serpi,
Dimas, Jacobus Solinus,
Mensigannus, und am Ende
Frömmigkeit und Christenglauben,
Die für diese Wahrheit stehen."—Pp. 189, 140.

D. F. MACCARTHY.

Dublin.

BEN JONSON.

(3^d S. viii. 27, 115.)

Henslowe, in his Diary, where he has frequent occasion to mention rare Ben, invariably spells the name with the superfluous letter; and in Collier's Memoir of Edward Alleyn, p. 87, there is printed a note of R. Daborne's which mentions "Johnson's play." So in the curious poem printed in the Shakespeare Society's Papers (iii. 172), he is styled Ben Johnson; and in all the entries relative to his family which have been discovered in parish records, the name is given in the ordinary orthography. (Collier's Memoirs of Actors, Introd. xxiii.) I have examined the folio of 1640, published three years after his decease; the frontispiece is a portrait of the author, with the inscription "Vera effigies doctissimi postarum Anglorum Ben Johnsonii": in ten places, viz. title-page, "Every Man out of his Humour," "Cynthia's Revels," "Poetaster," "Epicene," "Alchemist," "Catiline," "Epigrams," "Divell is an Aase," and "Staple of Newa," the name is spelt Jonson; while in twelve places, viz.—"Every Man in his Humour," "Sejanus," "Volpone," "Bartholomew Fair," "Fall of Mortimer," "Horace's Arte of Poetry," "English Grammar," "Timber or Discoveries," "Magnetic Lady," "Tale of a Tub," "Sad Shepherd," and twice in the frontispiece, it is spelt Johnson. The conclusion of the entire matter would seem to be that the poet's contemporaries indiscriminately styled him Jonson, or Johnson, and that although he himself wrote it Jonson, he did not consider it worth the trouble to correct the errors of those who spelt his name in the common fashion.

In 1614, Dr. Thomas Farnaby issued an edition of Juvenal and Persius, to which Jonson contributed the following commendatory verses, which are not included in any edition of his works with which I am acquainted:—

"Temporibus lux magna fuit Juvenalis a vitia, Moribus, ingenii, divitiis, vitia.
Tu lux es luci, Farnabi: operisque fugasti
Temporis et tenebras, ingenii radiis.
Lux tua parva quidem mole est, sed magna rigore,
Sensibus et docti pondere iudicii.
Macte: tuo scriptores, lectoresque labore
Per te alii vigeant, per te alii videant."
(Ben Jonsonius. Farnaby's Journal, p. 150. ed. 1680.)
WM. E. A. AXON.

BRUNETTO LATINI.

(3^d S. viii. 147.)

In reply to your correspondent, I beg leave to offer him the following notices respecting Brunetto Latini, taken from the notes of my translation of Dante's Comedy (Hell, c. 15.) In return, he will perhaps favour me with more particular references to the Monthly Magazine, &c. in which Latini is quoted or mentioned, or with a sketch of the information they contain about him.

"Brunetto Latini, Dante's tutor, born in Florence, A.D. 1220, was a notary and diplomatist, eminent in oratory and jurisprudence, and for various philosophic writings. . . . He was attached to the Guelph party, and employed as their ambassador, while Florence was threatened by the power of King Manfred, to petition for the support of Alfonso the Tenth, of Castile. While absent on this mission he heard of the battle of Arbia [A.D. 1260, see Can. 10], and the expulsion of the Guelphs from his native city, in consequence of which events he was compelled to withdraw to Paris. He returned with his party to Florence shortly after Manfred's overthrow, 1266, and was one of the vouchers for their reconciliation with the Ghibellines during the unsuccessful mission of Cardinal Latini from the Pope in 1279. He was again employed as a state-ambassador in 1294, in the negotiations with Genoa against the Pisans, and died in 1296. He is described as a man of great ability and learning, of the most courteous and engaging manners, and of grave but humorous conversation. Villani calls him worldly, with perhaps a worse meaning than we should attach to the expression, and that such a character was generally attributed to him he himself confesses in his Tesoretto; but none of his contemporaries, excepting Dante, have distinctly brought against him any more heinous charges.

"Latini's Tesoro [Treasure], treating 'of all things that appertain to mortals,' is an encyclopedic work, written, during his sojourn in Paris, in the French language, which he considered more universal, and even more agreeable than his own! It begins with an outline of cosmogony, geography, physics, and universal history; comprises next a system of morals, politics, and rhetoric, founded on Aristotle's corresponding treatises, and terminates in a more original Book of Precepts for the conduct, and especially the manners, of rulers and magistrates. The Tesoretto, a work in rude Italian rhyme, was destined for an introduction to the above treatise, and comprises an allegorical vision of Nature and her works, of Love, Virtue, and other such personages. The Pataffio, a collection of proverbs and mots, a work of less moral and dignified character, in Italian ternary rhyme, is also attributed to Latini."

C. B. CAYLEY.

5, Montpellier Row, Blackheath, S.E.

A note by J. M. in a late number of "N. & Q." has recalled to me that I have recently met with several allusions to this subject, so interesting to all Dantophilists, taking into consideration the supposed visit of Dante, Brunetto's pupil, to Oxford (on which see Foscolo's article on Dante in Edinb. Rev. 1818), and that of Petrarch to the same place. (Rossetti's Antipapal Spirit, ii. 191.)

J. M. states, that in the early volumes of the Monthly Magazine are to be found letters said to be translated from Brunetto Latini, who is asserted to have been in England temp. Henry III., and to have had an interview with Roger Bacon, in which a variety of discoveries were communicated, such as the mode of making gunpowder, the virtues of the magnet, &c. This allusion to the magnet is corroborated by some remarks in Chambers' Book of Days, i. 668, à propos of the very early knowledge of the mariner's compass.

Guyot de Provins describes it very accurately in his satirical poem, La Bible de Guyot de Provins. Brunetto, in one of his letters, telling how, during a visit to England, he had seen one of these instruments, borrows the very words of Guyot to describe it. Again, Mr. Edwards, in his Libraries and Founders of Libraries, quotes, on the authority of Lady Macclesfield, a passage from a letter of Brunetto, in which he recounts a night spent at Sherburn Castle, now the seat of the Earls of Macclesfield, towards the close of the thirteenth century, when he was on his way from London to Oxford. It would appear that Brunetto really did visit England, although I can discover no allusion to his journey in any of his biographers. Zannoni, in the copious Memoir prefixed to his edition of the Tesoretto, does not speak of it, neither does Dr. Barlow, in his Contributions to the Study of Dante. I have not been able to consult M. Cha. Caille's recent edition of the Tesoro. I should be glad of any information concerning the journey, the existence, and authenticity of the letters, and where they are to be met with.

J. B. DITCHFIELD, M.D.

The "Extracts from the Portfolio of a Man of Letters," in the Monthly Magazine, were written by William Taylor, of Norwich, who was a frequent contributor to that periodical. His English Synonyms (from which Crabbe borrowed so largely without a word of acknowledgment) also first appeared in the same Magazine.

F. NORSGATE.

BIRTH-PLACE OF CARDINAL POLE (3^d S. viii. 149).—Authorities, I think, are pretty generally agreed as to the birth-place of Cardinal Pole, the last Catholic Archbishop of Canterbury. They almost all follow Leland. Dodd, in his Church History of England, says that—

"Reginald Pole, the fourth son of Sir Richard Pool, was born at Stowerton Castle, in Staffordshire in March, 1500."

His sketch of the cardinal's life is based upon the following writers: Beccatelli, Pitts, Godwin, Wood, Johnstone, and a MS. of Pinning, the cardinal's secretary, preserved in Doway College.

Phillips, in his Life of Cardinal Pole, gives the same castle as the place of his birth:—

"Reginald Pole received his birth at a castle, which takes its name from the river Stour, two miles distant from Stourbridge, in Staffordshire."

His reference for this is to Camden. In other accounts I have seen the place given as Stowerton Castle; and in one, the date of his birth is assigned to May 11, 1500.

And now, let me ask, why an enquiry of this kind could not be made without wounding the feelings of many readers of "N. & Q." and several contributors, who are Catholics, by such an offensive term as the "last Romanist Archbishop of Canterbury?" How would it be received if a Catholic, in speaking of Matthew Parker, were to use language equally offensive to Protestants, which might readily suggest itself? Let us on both sides avoid all that is uncourteous and assailable in the respectable and pacific pages of "N. & Q."

F. C. H.

[Has not our correspondent fallen into much the same error which he condemns? In the judgment of many members of the Church of England Cardinal Pole was not the last Catholic, but the last Roman Catholic Archbishop of Canterbury. Many other persons will be surprised to learn that Romanist is an offensive term. It was in this instance, we have no doubt, used with as little intention of giving offence, as the negative term Protestant is here used by F. C. H. A little less susceptibility might be recommended to writers on both sides.—ED. "N. & Q."]

LUIS DE CAMOENS (3rd S. viii. 28).—Your correspondent E. H. A. inquired some time ago whether some poetic compositions of Camoens had not been discovered in the University of Coimbra, &c. I have just received (August 20th) a letter from Lisbon, informing me that a gentleman there, named Jerumenha, did publish, about three years ago certain poetic pieces of Camoens, which had never seen the light before, under the title of Idyllia; but my correspondent does not inform me whether the MSS. were discovered in the University of Coimbra.

I am also told, that in the centre of the city a beautiful square has been lately formed, called the "Square of Camoens," in which has been erected a fine imposing pedestal, which is to be surmounted by a bronze statue of the illustrious poet.

J. DALTON.

HYMNS (3rd S. viii. 108).—Allow me to assure your correspondent ERIC, that Sir Roundell Palmer's version of the fifth stanza of Cowper's—

"Oh! for a closer walk with God,"— is quite accurate. Sir Roundell Palmer has printed the passage as it stands in the ed. princeps of the Olney Hymns (1779, p. 4), and in various other editions to which I have referred. If your correspondent will consider the preceding stanza, in connexion with the one he has quoted, he will, I think, come to the conclusion that his suggested alteration is inadmissible. As the text of this beautiful hymn—one of the most admirable in our language—is a possession which none who value it would like to suppose to be the subject of any doubt, I beg to quote the fourth and fifth stanzas; from the consideration of which, your readers will perceive that they are linked together by a sense which would be destroyed by the adoption of ERIC's suggestion. I quote from the editio princeps:—

"4. Return, O Holy Dove, return,
Sweet messenger of rest;
I hate the sins that made thee mourn,
And drove thee from my breast.

"5. The dearest idol I have known,
Whate'er that idol be;
Help me to tear it from thy throne,
And worship only thee."

The Holy Spirit had occupied his rightful throne in the heart of the believer. Some idol had usurped that throne. The appeal made in the hymn is to the Spirit, for help to dispossess the unlawful occupant.

J. B.

Allow me to observe, if it is not too obvious, that the line of Cowper to which ERIC objects is clearly right. "His throne," no doubt, would do; but "Thy throne" is far more expressive. The Almighty is represented as dethroned, and the idol as occupying His throne—that which of right is His.

LYTTELTON.

SOLUTION OF CONTINUITY (3rd S. vii. 6, &c.)—The word lacerated shows that Johnson adopted and adapted a phrase which became known to him, or at all events was best known to him, as a chirurgico-lamine one. Until very lately it was a favourite phrase with English surgeons; where a bone was broken or the flesh, &c., cut or lacerated, there was "a solution of continuity."

B. NICHOLSON.

PRETTY (3rd S. vii. 453).—Surely "pretty," which A CONSERVATIVE REFORMER supposes to be a corruption of "pearly," is rather the same word as the German "prächtigt" = splendid or magnificent, the meaning having degenerated in our own version of it, and serving for a less ambitious kind of beauty.

H. H. GIBBS.

St. Dunstan's, Regent's Park.

BRAOSE (3rd S. viii. 86).—HERMENTRUDE asks: "Can the truth be disentangled from this Gordian knot?" The following brief genealogical table will, I think, do it:—

CHARTULARY OF WHALLEY ABBEY (3rd S. viii. 30, 70, 158.)—P. S. C. has not attended to a peculiarity of French writers on Roman Law, viz. that they invariably translate the Latin technical terms into their own language in the same way as they treat names. And as an instance of the latter, I remember meeting in one of their legal works with the phrase, "Comme dit Paul:" and it was certainly some time before I identified the person referred to with my old friend Paulus of the Corpus Juris. This practice affords an easy explanation of the "Actions conquies en fait" of Ortolan, which are simply the "Actiones ad factum prestandum" of the Civil Law. In which code there are enumerated a certain number of the most usual contracts which, occurring daily, received definite names; and were known as a class by the term Nominate,—such as sales, hiring, &c. It was impossible, however, that these should include every variety of bargain, so the contracts which contained specialities out of the ordinary character of these transactions were called Innominate.

Now in each of the Nominate class, the action by which the agreement was enforced had a definite name, as, for instance, the Actiones ex empto, vendito, locato, &c., whilst in the other the bargain was made effectual by the Actio ad factum prestandum, which is Ortolan's "Action conquies en fait." Therefore when notions are referred to, the phrase should be ad and not in factum.

The same is the case with the defence. You have the nominate pleas of fraud or fear, exceptiones doli aut metus, and then the general in factum, importing an answer founded on the particular circumstances of the case.

The in factum of the charter should, therefore, in strict civilian language, be ad factum. My idea is, that the deed in question was scrolled in French, where "en faicte" would be correct; and erroneously translated into Latin as in, instead of ad factum.

GEORGE VERE IRVING.

"GRAVE MAURICE" (3rd S. viii. 149.)—"Grave Maurice" was a well known name applied to Maurice of Nassau in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The epithet is given to him in one of Ben Jonson's plays, the reference to which I cannot give, not having his works beside me. It is applied to him also by Sir Walter Scott, in the following passage from the first chapter of Kenilworth:—

"Michael Lambourne!" said the stranger, as endeavouring to recollect himself; 'what! no relation to Michael Lambourne, the gallant cavalier who behaved so bravely at the siege of Venlo, that Grave Maurice thanked him at the head of the army?'"

ALAN FAIRFORD.

The picture, which is the subject of enquiry, most probably represents Maurice, Elector of Saxony, who perished at the battle of Sievenhausen in 1553. It must not be supposed that "Grave" is our English word, meaning solemn and serious. It is the German title for Count, properly Graf, but Englished Grave, as in Landgrave and Margrave.

F. C. H.

QUARTERINGS (3rd S. viii. 69.)—S. P. seems to fancy that arms belong to estates, whereas they belong to families; they do not indicate property, but blood. Quarterings are the arms of heiresses incorporated into the family shield, and all the descendants of those ladies (and no one else) have a right to use them. When the male line is extinct, and daughters remain, they are heiresses in heraldry, whether they have property or not. What can S. P. mean by "the quarterings for the diservered estates"? Estates have no arms, and carry no right to arms. A man may leave property to another on condition that he takes a certain name, and the arms belonging to that name, but the bequest gives no right to do so, therefore the party has to apply to the Crown for permission to change the name, and to the Herald's College to make him a grant of the arms. P. P.

BLANCHE, LADY WAKE (3rd S. vii. 493; viii. 35.)—I have no doubt that MR. WARREN is quite right in supposing that the Blanche Lady Wake, mentioned by HERMENTRUDE, was the daughter of Henry, Earl of Lancaster. It must be borne in mind that, after the death of her husband in 1349, this Blanche was what would now be called the Dowager Lady Wake; and her prolonged existence would not in any way interfere with the title being borne by the Princess of Wales, on whom the barony had devolved by inheritance.

MELETES.

MODERN LATIN PRONUNCIATION (3rd S. vii. 34.)—Whilst looking over the Index of the last volume of "N. & Q.," I came upon the above-mentioned subject; which, if I remember correctly, has never been answered. Such an important query I was exceedingly sorry to see so passed over, and so will try to make a few observations which may tend to solve the difficulty.

In no age has education in general been more studied than in the present; and since such is the case, it is quite natural that every "long and short" should be pronounced correctly. I have heard many people say that they were taught—sum, ēs, est, and ēgo; but if on the other hand, they had consulted Virgil on the subject, they might soon have made up their minds that they were wrong.

Your correspondent J. M. says, that he is told do-muse and fruc-tuae have superseded domus and fructus. Now, if we refer to the Latin Grammar, we find that the fourth declension makes the genitive case singular end in -iæ. If such be the case, the domus and fructus ought to be pronounced do-muse and fruc-tusc. But this is only what the Latin Grammar says; but, to see if it is right, let us refer to Virgil:—

"Genus immortale manet, multosque per annos
Stat fortuna domus, et avi numerentur avorum."

Here the -us in domus is long, and before a vowel, and, moreover, in the genitive case: so there can be no doubt but that do-muse and fruc-tusc are right; and if they were short, wrong.

Again, Juvenal says:—

"Scire volunt secreta domus, atque inde timeri."

Here, in quite a different style of poetry, we have the same rule; and also, written by another man.

Again, scanning must be consulted:—If domus and fructus be made short, then neither of the lines will scan, which will show that the word is pronounced wrong.

For the sake of proof, I have referred to an Eton Latin Grammar, published in the year 1824, and have found the same rule regarding long and shorts made use of as in the present ones.

THOMAS T. DYER.

ROBIN HOOD BALLAD (3rd S. viii. 88, 158.)—Many thanks to H. J. for his information on the locality of the Sayles; but as to the difficulty about the mention of Watlynge Street, I cannot see that his communication has thrown much light on the subject, which remains in statu quo: for there yet remains the question, whether Mr. Hunter was right or wrong in stating that Watlynge Street passed by Barnsdale? Were there two roads of the name of Watlynge Street: the one going from Dover to Chester, and the other crossing Barnsdale? If so, as we would think from Mr. Hunter, the latter could hardly be "the ancient Roman highway," par excellence. I do not know whether Erming Strete passed Barnsdale.

A. H. K. C. L.

JOSEPH MABERLY (3rd S. viii. 87.)—My attention has been directed to the request of S. Y. R. for information about Mr. Joseph Maberly. Your correspondent seems to wish especially for the date of Mr. Maberly's death. This took place in March, 1860. The details of his life were too insignificant for public record.

M.

"JOHANNES AD OPPOSITUM" (3rd S. vii. 114.)—"Jack-at-warts," that is, Jack-a-thwarts, or Jack-at-thwarts, one wise in his own conceit, and contrary to, and opposite with, his neighbours.

B. NICHOLSON.

SCENTING OF BOOKS (3rd S. viii. 127.)—Her majesty Elizabeth may well have disliked the smell of spyke, for in odour it is but little better than turpentine. There is a good deal of paste used in bookbinding, and it was a common practice to put into it a few drops of the otto of spike, derived by distillation from the Leucadulus spica, in order to make it keep. Some manufacturers employ in our own time creosote for the same purpose; the best thing, however, would be otto of birch bark, as its fragrance resembles Russia leather.

Books that were newly bound—of course it was only new books that were presented to the queen—would savour of spyke more strongly than if they had been long shelved. That her majesty had rather a penchant for perfumery there is ample evidence.

In Nichols's Royal Progresses, we are informed:—

"Three Italians came unto the queen and presented her each with a pair of sweet (!) gloves.

"The Earl of Oxford, Edward de Vere, the first person who brought perfumed gloves into England, presented a pair to the queen, who took such pleasure in the gift, that she was pictured with them on her hands."

In the Lives of the Queens of England, we read, "Perfumes were never richer, more elaborate, more costly, or more delicate than in the reign of Elizabeth." Her majesty's nasal organs were particularly fine and sensitive, and nothing offended her more than an unpleasant smell.

SEPTIMUS PIERCE.

Chiswick.

"INVENI PORTUM," ETC. (1st S. v. 10, &c.)—These lines, which the late Mr. Singer attributed to Lilly, are to be found in the works of Janus Pannonius, Bishop of Funfkirchen in Hungary (2 vols. Traj. ad Rhenum, 1784), where they occur (vol. i. p. 631) as a translation from the Greek Anthology, as follows:—

"Inveni portum, Spes et Fortuna valet, Nil mihi vobiscum, ludite rancillos."

Janus died in 1474, Lilly being then about four years old.

F. NORRIS.

IRISH LEGEND (3rd S. viii. 151.)—There are few lakes in Ireland that there is not a legend, such as quoted above, attached to. The two beautiful lakes of Lough Owel and Belvidere, in Westmeath, near Mullingar, Lough Erne, Killarney, and others, have each their legends, full of romance and poetry. And in the extreme south of Ireland, there is a legend amongst the peasantry that the space, now covered by the Atlantic Ocean, was at one time dry land and joined to America, and was densely populated; but that in one night it was overwhelmed by the water, and has remained so ever since. This disaster is said to have been caused by a young girl, who forgot to fasten up a well from which she had drawn water. Most readers of Irish legends must be acquainted with that poetic story of the sleeping warriors, who repose with "Gherroh Gheerland," which is not unlike some of the lake legends; one of the latter furnished Moore with the material, for the well-known ballad, "On Lough Neagh's banks," &c. S. REDMOND. Liverpool.

REV. CHARLES ANNESLEY (3rd S. viii. 169.)—S. Y. R. is informed that the author of the MS. additions to the Stemmata Chicheana in All Souls College Library was the late Rev. Charles Francis Annesley, M.A., F.A.S., and F.I.S., of Eydon Lodge, and Lord of the Manor of Eydon, co. Northampton. He was formerly Fellow of All Souls' College, and Rector of Sawtrey-St. Andrew, co. Hunts. He was born at Weston-on-the-Green, Oxon, December 26, 1787; second son of Arthur Annesley, Esq. of Bletchington Park, Oxon; and his wife, Catherine, daughter and heir of Admiral Sir Charles Hardy, Governor of Greenwich Hospital, and died September 26, 1863, unmarried. His elder brother was Arthur, Viscount Valentia, Baron Mountnorris, and premier Baronet of Ireland, who died at Bletchington Park, December 30th, 1863, and was succeeded by his grandson, Arthur, now Viscount Valentia, to whom also the manor and estate of Eydon descended on the death of his great-uncle.

B. W. G.

(GOSSAMER (3rd S. ii. 16, 76).)—As agreeing with the French and German popular names, and as supporting my conjectural derivation, I would note the synonyme Virgin's thread or Virgin thread. This is given in one old dictionary (Ash's, if I remember rightly), sub lit. F. I found it also in an old English-Dutch, and in another English-foreign dictionary, both of which are on the shelves of the British Museum Reading Room, but it appears to have escaped the notice of later lexicographers and glossary-compilers. At a distance from library shelves, my references are necessarily vague; while a bad memory, and the loss of my memoranda, prevent me from offering more for Mr. KEIGHTLEY's acceptance.

BENJ. EASY.

ORANGE TOAST (3rd S. viii. 159.)—The following is the Orange toast inquired for by CYRIL. I have it from one of the "Brotherhood," not belonging to that body myself:—

"The glorious, pious, and immortal memory of the great and good King William the Third, who saved us from Pope and Popery, brass money, and wooden shoes. The Pope in the pillory, and the d— pelting him with priests."

S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

TEMPLARS (3rd S. viii. 150.)—In his enumeration of names, your correspondent strangely omits the parish of Temple, in the Presbytery of Dalkeith. It is believed, too, that at the village of Drem, in East Lothian (now a station of the North British Railway), are the remains of a chapel called St. John's Chapel, which belonged to the Knights Templars. There are more than one tenements in the city of Edinburgh which are called Temple Lands, from their having at one time belonged to the Knights Templars; and these are held under the successors of the Knights by a tenure quite different from the ordinary burgage holding. They used to be distinguished by an iron cross on the roof, and one of them is still in existence with that mark; a flat-roofed building in the Grass Market, near the east end of the north side of that street. G.

Edinburgh.

Miscellaneous.

J. MACLEAN, Esq., F.S.A., is about to publish a Parochial History of the Deanery of Trigg Minor, in the County of Cornwall.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM will be closed to visitors from the 1st to the 8th of this month.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

EUROPEAN MAGAZINE. Vol. XXIII.

LONG LIVERS, 8vo. 1722.

 Letters stating particulars and lowest price, carriage free, to be sent to Mr. W. G. BAKER, Publisher of "NOTES & QUERIES," 22, Wellington Street, Strand, W.C.

Particulars of Price, &c., of the following Books, to be sent direct to the gentlemen by whom they are required, whose names and addresses are given for that purpose:—

PENY SOCIETY PUBLICATIONS, Nos. 1, 6, and 17.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE ANTIQUARIES OF SCOTLAND. Any odd parts.

TRANSACTIONS OF THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF EDINBURGH. Vols. III, VI, and VII. In boards.

NOTES AND QUERIES (First Series). Vol. II. In parts or boards.

Wanted by Mr. Thomas G. Stevenson, Frederick Street, Edinburgh.

AL. MAKHARI'S HISTORY OF THE MUHAMMEDAN DYNASTY IN SPAIN. 2 Vols. 4to.

MARSDEN'S NUMISMATA ORIENTALIA. 2 Vols. 4to.

GIBBON. Vol. I. 8vo, 1823.

GRUTE'S GRACEY. Vol. IV. 8vo, 1833.

DANTE. Vol. I. Firenze, 1830.

HERALDIC CALENDAR OF NOBILITY IN HERALDS' OFFICE, IRELAND, 1916.

HUTSON'S ANCIENT SONGS. 1790 and 1829.

Wanted by Mr. John Wilson, 93, Great Russell Street, W.C.

Notices to Correspondents.

Notes on Books in our next.

H. H. G. (Regent's Park) has our best thanks. We shall probably have to address a private communication to our obliging Correspondent in the course of few weeks.—The song of "Lilithulero" appeared in our 2nd S. i. 90.

T. W. BACHELOR is thanked for his communication on Longevity, which shall receive our best attention.

FIRE. The burial Obit on Sir John Moore, by the Rev. Charles Wolf, has been frequently noticed in our First and Second Series.

INQUIRIES.—List of the Bishops of the English and Irish churches.—consult Hights. Book of Dignities, 8vo, 1851.

A. Q. S. For the restoration of illegible manuscripts consult "N. & Q." for July 1 and 15, 1865, pp. 12, 83.

R. S. Q. Declined.

W. L. McK. (Glasgow). Seven articles appeared in our First Series on the Nine of Diamonds the Curse of Scotland.

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 8d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STRAPPED COPIES for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 11s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. BAKER, 22, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all COMMUNICATIONS FOR THE EDITOR should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 193.

NOTES:—Biblical Versifications in English, 201—Autographs in Books, 202—John Watkins Brett, and the Submarine Telegraph, 203—Lady Elizabeth Carew's "Tragedy of Mariam," &c.—The Ruthvens—Atlantic Cable Telegraph—The Bells of St. Helen's Church, Worcester—Baptismal Names—Junius—Hedioc—Gorilla—The Grandparents of the Kembles—Praying for Husbands—Pedantry, 203.

QUERIES:—John Pym, the Parliamentarian, 206—The Bed and the Stature of Og, King of Basan, or Bashan, 207—Admiral Bonbow—Sir Samuel Clarke—Foreign Heraldic Works—The Glovers of Perth—Heraldic Puzzle—Mrs. Hey of Leeds—Hogarth's Paint-Box—"Knight's Quarterly Magazine"—Meeting Eyebrows—Merchant Guild at Winchester—Not Guilty—Philip van Artevelde at Ypres—Raphael's Madonnas—Rousseau—St. Andrew's, Edinburgh—"Sarum Missal"—Theognis—Washington an Infidel—A Welsh Bard, 207.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Hermann: Schiller—The Man in the Moon—Cleland of that ilk—St. Botolph, Aldersgate—Church Patronage in Scotland before 1638—Benedict, 208.

REPLIES:—The Site of Ophir: Ancient Ruins in the Interior of Africa, 210—The last great Literary Forgery, &c., 212—De Quincey on Johnson, 213—The Templars in Scotland, ib.—Emanuel Collins, 214—Gloucester Cross, ib.—Pretended Resuscitation: Nicholas Faccio—Carthaginian Gallies—"Whom the Gods love die young"—Quotations—Curious Decoration—Captain Bathurst—Plymouth—Lady Warner—Carved Pulpits—Mopsis—Coutances—"Fray Gerundio"—Arms of the Medici—Hoyle Family, &c., 215.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

BIBLICAL VERSIFICATIONS IN ENGLISH.

As many readers are justly interested in biblical literature, permit me to illustrate an important branch of it, which does not seem to have been sufficiently noticed by critics and bibliographers. I allude to the history of biblical versifications in the English language, and translations of the books of Scripture in English rhyme or blank verse. In order to avoid needless prolixity, I proceed at once to give a few slight sketches of these pious and curious effusions, so far as I am personally acquainted with them. I have paid considerable attention to such as deserve record, and most of those I shall mention are in my own library. Let me hope that the deficiencies of my information on the subject will be supplied by some other scholar.

In the first place, we have several poetical, or rather versified epitomes of the whole Bible. Such, for instance, is The History of the Holy Bible attempted in easy Verse, by John Fellowes, author of Grace Triumphant, published in four vols. 1777. Respecting the stories of Genesis, they have been illustrated in verse by Sylvester's Translation of Du Bartas; by Blackmore; by Milton (Paradise Lost, vii.); by Barham's Version of Grotius's Genesis Erud.; Sandys's Version of Grotius's Sophompaneas; and other poems founded on the Mosaic narrative. Portions of the book of Judges, especially those relating to Samson, are versified by Milton in Samson Agonistes, and a long poem by Quarles on the same topic. Portions of the book of Kings and Chronicles, so far as relate to David, are versified by Cowley in his Davidis; and Prior has written a poem on Solomon. The book of Esther is versified by Quarles. The whole or parts of the magnificent epic on Job, are versified by Quarles, Blackmore, Scott, and Young.

As to the Book of Psalms, the versifications of these holy and glorious poems, published and unpublished, are too numerous to mention. Some of the most noticeable are those of Sandys, Wither, Milton, Blackmore, Merrick, Sternhold, Tate, Watts, Keble, Montague, and Musgrave (in blank verse). The specimens Milton has left us make us wish he had done a greater number. Thomas Moore has given us a proof, in his Hebrew Melodies, that he could have versified the Psalms with an exquisite lyric delicacy. I have a MS. versification of the Psalms written in my youth, of whose merits I say nothing.

The Proverbs have been poetically illustrated by Prior and others. Ecclesiastes is versified by Sandys. The Canticles, or Song of Songs, is versified by Quarles, and an old anonymous poet. The Prophet Isaiah has been rendered completely in English rhyme by George Butt, 1785. The Lamentations of Jeremiah are versified by Sandys and Quarles. Jonah is versified by Quarles.

In the New Testament, the four Gospels are versified in rhymed couplets by Darling, in a quarto of some rarity. There is Parfit's Gospel Harmony, and Wesley's poetic Life of Christ; and I have also a complete versification of the Harmony of the four Gospels in MS. by myself, in the same chronological order as that which appears in my Improved Monotessaron. The book of the Acts is very quaintly versified by Tye; an account of whom may be seen in Warton's History of English Poetry. The Book of the Revelations has been poetically illustrated by the Rev. Thomas Grinfield in a poem entitled The Visions of Patmos, 1827.

Besides these biblical versifications, there are very numerous portions of Scripture, that have been versified by different poets, in the way of Psalms, Hymns, Paraphrases, Dramas, or Mysteries. For instance, Sandys has given us A Poetic Paraphrase on the Songs collected out of the Old and New Testaments. The old hymn-book of the Moravian Brethren contains many such pieces. So does the Appendix to the version of the Psalms of David, used in the church of Scotland, and our Geneva version of the Scriptures; and also the Olney hymn-book. The most complete published epitome of detached biblical versifications may be found in Belcher's Poetic Sketches of Biblical Subjects, 1825. Some further information on this subject may be found in that excellent book, James Montgomery's Christian Poet, and Cattermole's Sacred Poetry of the Seventeenth Century.

In conclusion, I may remark that these versifications of nearly half the books of the Bible are very different in merit. They are good, bad, and indifferent. The success of Milton, Young, Addison, and Scott, in executing this difficult task, shows that it is possible to accomplish it with honour. But the many comparative failures are proofs that some rare combination of piety, genius, and taste is requisite to do justice to the divine poetry of biblical inspiration. The majority of Scripture versifiers want the noble spiritualism, enthusiasm, and glow of thought and feeling requisite for their enterprise. They too often grovel when they should soar: they smoulder when they should flame, and emit more smoke than fire. Yet, if men of true genius for poetic translation, such as Dryden or Pope, were to arise, and give their whole hearts to Anglicising the poetry of the Bible, they might do much credit to themselves, and much benefit to the public.

The Muse of Heaven well deserves our cultivation. She is the best of the nine, and worth all the rest. Let us join in the beautiful prayer of Milton:—

"Descend from Heaven, Urania, by that name
If rightly thou art called."

FRANCIS BARRIAM.

Bath..

AUTOGRAPHS IN BOOKS.

As it is sometimes of interest and use to place on record inscriptions or names in old works, where the former are of any value, or the latter belong to persons celebrated in history or literature, I subjoin a brief account of some few, which have passed through my hands, hoping that it will not prove too lengthy for the columns of "N. & Q.":—

1. Matthæi Paris Historia Major. Londini. 1571, folio. With the autographs of Robert Glover, Somerset Herald, friend of the editor of the volume, Archbishop Parker, and of Thomas Milles, his (Glover's) nephew, author of the Catalogue of Honor, &c. Glover seems to have tricked all the principal arms throughout with his own hand, and Milles has added many notes in the margins. Also, on the title, the signature of the Rev. W. Cole, F.S.A., and on the back of it, his book-plate.

2. Wilson's Rule of Reason. 1551, 8vo. With the autograph of Sir Thomas Smith, Secretary to Queen Elizabeth, and many marginal notes beautifully written by him.

3. A Natural History. By Sir Thomas Pope

Blount. 1693, sm. 8vo. With the autograph on fly-leaf of Roger North, author of Lives of the Norths, &c., when he was a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1723.

4. Politique, Moral, and Martiall Discourses. By Jacques Hurault, translated by A. Golding. 1505, 4to. Had on the title the autograph signature of "R. Northe." This was Roger, second Lord North, minister to Queen Elizabeth. He died in 1600.

5. Grati Falisci Cynegeticon. Translated and illustrated by C. Wase. 1654, sm. 8vo. On the title: "Sum Jo. Aubrij, 1644 [? error for 1654]." And in the British Museum is Charles Allen's Batailes of Crescey and Poitiers, 1631, 8vo, with "John Aubrey" on the title.

6. Bacon, in his last illness, translated "certaine psalmes" into verse, and the result, a very poor one, was printed in 1625, 4to, with a dedication "To his very good friend, Mr. George Herbert." Among Pickering's books sold in 1854, was the very copy presented by Bacon to Herbert; it realized 11l.

7. Shake-speare's Sonnets Never before Imprinted. 1609, 4to. On the title "N. L., pretium 1s.!" The letters N. L. are the initials of Narcissus Luttrell, the well-known collector, whose books came to Mr. Wynne, of Chelsea.

It is to be regretted that these memoranda of curious copies of books, not always very intrinsically interesting or valuable, have not been more carefully preserved. Heber had a copy of Rowlands' Betraying of Christ, &c., 1598, 4to, presented by the author to a friend, perhaps the only extant specimen. In Mr. Jolley's Catalogue occurred a presentation-copy of Taylor the Water-poet's Old, Old, Very Old Man, 1635, 4to; and a London bookseller advertised for sale some few years back a copy of Phaer's Virgil of the first edition, 1558, 4to, enriched, according to him, with the signature of the distinguished satirist Thomas Nash. Lists of the volumes which formerly stood on the shelves of such men as Ben Jonson and Gabriel Harvey, or at least of some of them, would be interesting, and such lists might be formed with tolerable ease. Something of the same kind might be done for the collections of Narcissus Luttrell and the Rev. Thomas Baker, the Socius Ejectus.

It is a point to be considered, whether catalogues of books, before the modern bibliomania set in, are not of far greater curiosity and interest than such as have appeared since that remarkable epoch. For instance, I, personally, would rather look over the catalogue of a man who bought volumes only which pleased him, than that of one who merely bought, either for the sake of buying, or because his bookseller instructed him it was a publication he ought to have, or because some cotemporary collectors possessed it. Who would not sooner have Pope's Catalogue, or Collins's, than Heber's, or the Duke of Roxburghe's? These last furnish capital material, no doubt, for bibliographers, but of human interest or literary significance, they have not an atom. Book-collecting "foppery," however, seems to have set in early; unless I err, Smith, the Secondary of the Poultry Counter, was tainted with it a little.

W. CAREW HAZLITT.

JOHN WATKINS BRETT, AND THE SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH.

Bristol has been the birth-place of some of the most talented men of modern times. To Matthew Wasbrough, who preceded Watt in one at least of the most important inventions of the steam-engine (3rd S. i. 292); Robert Southey, who was the king's poet, and his brother Henry, the king's physician; Sir Thomas Lawrence, the king's painter, and Charles Wesley, the king's musician, who were all Bristol men, may be added the name of John Watkins Brett, who was the founder of the Submarine Telegraph; and let me further add, that it was a Bristol lady who took out the first patent for the invention of a suspension bridge!

John Watkins Brett was born in this city, but the time, and the exact locality of his birth, is uncertain, as Mr. William Brett, his father, carried on the business of a cabinet-maker in various streets in Bristol until he fixed his residence at No. 49, Park Street, in 1836. Of the invention, with which his son's name is associated, a writer in the Telegraphic Journal says: "Although several may claim the honour of the invention, none, I believe, will ever dispute the title of 'founder' of the submarine telegraph to John Watkins Brett." Of its invention Mr. Brett himself says, "in originating this idea conjointly with a younger brother (Mr. Jacob Brett), who then resided with me, no man's labours or suggestions were borrowed; it was purely an invention of our own."

Having brought his invention to perfection, Mr. Brett proceeds to tell us of its success:—

"In 1847 (he says) I obtained permission from Louis Philippe to unite England with France by a submarine line, but failed to obtain the attention of the public, it being considered too hazardous for their support."

The attempt, however, was made in 1850, and with success; and it was remarked by The Times that "the jest of yesterday has become the fact of to day." To this first success has followed other submarine lines: that between Dover and Ostend in May, 1853; that which connects Sardinia and Algeria in 1854; and the great Atlantic Telegraph, although for the present a failure, will be at length, through the indomitable perseverance of Englishmen, brought to completion.

"The ultimate union of America with Europe by electricity (says Mr. Brett) may now be considered a certainty. Providence has placed this object within our reach; there are no practical impossibilities in the way of its accomplishment; and those united with us in the undertaking do not regard the means required in comparison to the good to be accomplished."

By his first grand success in submarine telegraphy, Mr. Brett had linked together the Old World. It remained to achieve the triumph of connecting that Old World with the New; but he has not survived to witness the ultimate success of those efforts in which he took so large a share. He died December 3, 1863, aged fifty-eight, and lies interred in the family vault in the churchyard of Westbury-on-Trim, near this city.

GEORGE PRYCE.

City Library, Bristol.

LADY ELIZABETH CAREW'S "TRAGEDY OF MARIAM," ETC. — In examining some old books and MSS., for a different purpose, I came across a copy of The Tragedy of Mariam, the Fair Queen of Jewry, 1613, by Lady E. Carew, with a dedication which I never met with before in copies of this drama, as follows:—

"TO DIANAES

EARTHILIE DEPUTESSE, and my worthy Sister, Mistris
Elizabeth Carye.

"When cheerfull Phœbus his full course hath run,
His Sister's fainter Beams our hearts doth cheere;
So your faire Brother is to mee the Sunne;
And you, his Sister, as my Moore appeare.

"You are my next belou'd, my second Friend,
For when my Phœbus absence makes it Night,
Whilst to th' Antipodes his beams do bend,
From you, my Phœbe, shines my second Light.

"Hee, like to SOL, cleare-sighted, constant, free,
You, LVNA-like, vnspotted, chaste, diuine:
Hee shone on Sicily; you destin'd bee
T' illumine the now obscure Palestine.
My first was consecrated to Apollo,
My second to DIANA now shall follow.

E. C."

I also met with a copy of The Travailes of the Three English Brothers, Sir Thomas, Sir Anthony, and Robert Shirley, 1607, with a dedication, which is presumed to be all but unique, in the ensuing terms:—

"To honours fauourites, and the intire friends to the familie of the Sherleys, Health.

"It is a custome amongst friends (and sure a friendly custome), if the obstacles of Fortune, the impediments of Nature, the barre of time, the distance of place, do hinder; nay, if death itselfe doth make that long seperation amongst friends, the shadow or picture of a friend is kept as a devoted ceremonie: In that kinde to all well willers, to those worthy subjects (of our worthlesse Pennes) wee dedicate this Idea and shape of honor. Being vnable to present the substances, wee haue epitomiz'd their large volume in a compendious abstract, which we wish all to peruse, and yet none but friends, because wee wish all should be friends to worth and desert, and wee our selues should haue a safe harbor and vmbrage for our well willing, yet weake labours. If wee haue not lim'd to the life the true portrait of their deserts, (our wills being sealed with our endeavors, and poiz'd by an able censor) we goe (with the Proverbe) to a willing execution, Leniter, ex merito quicquid patiar, ferendum est.

"In our best endeavours,
"Yours,

Cato beat Musu.

JOHN DAY,
WILLIAM ROWLEY,
GEORGE WILKINS."

It may be worth mentioning that the John Day, who was part-author of the preceding play, was a different person from the John Day of Caius College, Cambridge, who wrote The Parliament of Bees, 1641, 4to. Lowndes confounds them.

W. CAREW HAZLITT.

Kensington

THE RUTHVENS. — Upon arranging a variety of old letters, I found one, previously mislaid, which I cannot help considering of the deepest interest. When it fell into my hand originally, it was not easily deciphered, and I did not pay much attention to it; but last year, in consequence of certain professional inquiries I was engaged in as to the old Barony of Halyburton of Dirleton, I remembered the puzzling letter, which I recollected had mentioned something about the Provostry of Dirleton. I found it after a somewhat tedious search, and was delighted—not certainly because it threw light upon the descent in the female line of the peerage, the point I was investigating, and which, I am happy to say, I, after some difficulty, made out—but because it proved to be a document entirely autograph of the noble Lord, the assassin of Rizzio, and who has, as the historian of his own crime, been admitted by Lord Orford into his Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors.

Patrick Lord Ruthven, and through his mother Lord Halyburton of Dirleton, was the eldest son of William Lord Ruthven and Jean Halyburton, Lady Dirleton. He had a brother, Alexander, and according to Scott, the historian of the family, seven daughters. The letter, though having the date of the month, is silent as to the year. This omission is obviated by the writer referring in it to his brother, Alexander, and his son, William (afterwards first Earl of Gowrie). On the back there is this notandum in his lordship's hand:—"Sir Robert Oysler's obligation, that he sould set his lands of the Provostrie of Dyrletoun and Maristoun to William Ruthven, my son."

I never heard of any other autograph of this historical personage than the one before me, and I should imagine it to be of considerable value. Indeed, until I saw it, I entertained an idea that the fierce baron could hardly sign his name. My surprise, consequently, was great when I gazed upon his distinct but somewhat difficult handwriting, and ascertained from its contents that this feudal statesman was, like statesmen of more modern times, quite alive to the pecuniary interest of his family.

J. M.

ATLANTIC CABLE TELEGRAPH. — Maury, in his admirable work on the Physical Geography of the Sea and its Meteorology, says, under the heading "Faulty Cables" (p. 19):—

"One of the chief physical difficulties which seem now [1861] to stand in the way of these lines, lies with the 'cables.' It so happens that all deep-sea lines have, at the present writing, ceased to work. The two Malta lines in the Mediterranean are out of order; so also are the Red Sea lines. No messages have passed between Kurrachee and Aden for some time; and the line to Algiers has been suspended, if not abandoned, for the present. All these lines had cables incased in a wrapping of iron wire; and it is a question whether the difficulty with them all be not owing to that circumstance. The wire wrapping of the Atlantic cable has been found in a state almost of complete disintegration, like the iron fastenings of coppered ships. This evidence of galvanic action excites suspicions as to the proper insulation of that cable. Iron, sea-water, and copper, will make a battery of no inconsiderable power; and the decayed state of the iron wire, in this instance, encourages the belief as to defective insulation."

The failures of the last and present cable are not mechanical only, but electrical mainly. The first message from Newfoundland to Ireland was on the 12th August, 1858. On the 17th the Queen sent a dispatch of ninety-eight words to the President of the United States; on the 18th her Majesty received his reply of 147 words. On the 27th a dispatch of seventy-two words required nine hours for its transmission. The course from Ireland to Newfoundland was more difficult than the opposite direction, "because the voltaism has to contend against the earth current." It was finally silenced on the 1st Sept. 1858, after finishing with the words "correct, correct." (La France, 2nd Sept. 1865.)

There are, I conceive, two prominent defects in these cables: (1) insufficiency of their voltaic (otherwise galvanic, otherwise electric,) batteries; and (2) the use of signals for letters instead of House's plan of striking the question and answer in print direct, and with great promptitude and certainty—say 150 to 200 letters in a minute. The first business to be done, before laying another cable, is to ascertain the cause of failure in all the existing deep-sea lines. T. J. BUCKTON.

THE BELLS OF ST. HELEN'S CHURCH, WORCESTER. — Your readers, who are curious on the subject of church bells, may perchance derive some information from the following paragraph, which forms the heading to a catch (or round) printed in The Monthly Musick of Vocal Musick for Feb. 1707:—

"Eight Bells being Lately Cast at St. Helen's in Worcester, had these Names given 'em. The 1st Blenheim; 2nd Ramillie; 3rd Barcelona; 4th Menin; 5th Turin; 6th Eugene; 7th Marlborough; 8th Queen Ann. On which was made this catch by Mr. Henry Hall of Hereford."

Henry Hall, organist of Hereford Cathedral, the "maker" of the catch, was, I imagine, the writer of both words and music. I am unable to say anything in favour of the latter, and of the former let your readers judge for themselves:—

"Thus while the Right goes merrily Round,
Earth and Air their Tryumphs Sound,
Iô Victoria Sabrina's Bancks rebound.

"Then to the Chiefs whose Names they Bear,
So Wise in Peace, so Warm in Warr,
Fill, fill the Glass and Drink it Fair.

"Tis Anna now Demands the Glass,
Anna, the Joy of Human Race;
Then Drink and Wish the Bells your Glass."

Are these bells still in existence; and, if so, are they yet known by the above names?

W. H. HUSK.

BAPTISMAL NAMES.—From time to time the readers of "N. & Q." have been amused at the strange names given to children at their baptism, but the instances recorded were culled chiefly from the days of the Puritans. The following, however, is a fact of our own times, and is worthy of being embalmed in the pages of "N. & Q.":

A man named Sykes, resident in this locality, had four sons, whom he named respectively Live-well, Do-well, Die-well, and the youngest Fare-well. Sad to say, Farewell Sykes met an untimely end by drowning, and was buried this week (Eleventh Sunday after Trinity) in Lockwood churchyard. The brothers Livewell, Dowell, and Diwell Sykes were the chief mourners on the occasion.

GEORGE LLOYD.

Thurstonland.

JUNIUS.—If Sir Robert Adair left any papers, they might throw some light on the subject of the authorship of the Letters of Junius. In a conversation I had with him, he expressed a strong opinion that they were written by Sir Philip Francis, and added some reason relative to handwriting, which my bad memory presents me from remembering more than in a general way. It is possible that in a diary I have kept, the conversation may be recorded, but it would take me a long time to look through it.

FITZ.

HEDIOCK.—In Lyly's Woman in the Moon, Pandora being mad, thus addresses one of the shepherds:—

"Thy head is full of hedioches, Iphicles;
So, shake them off."—Act V.

Mr. Fairholt in his edition explains these as hedge-hogs, but I think without authority; and in Halliwell's Dictionary the evident corruption or variant "headache" is given as an Eastern Counties word for the corn-poppy. I suspect also that some form of this word has been misprinted as hordock and hordock, where Cordelia speaks of her folly-driven father as—

"Crowned with rank fennel, and furrow weeds,
With hordock, hemlock, nettles, cuckoo flowers,
Darnel, and all the idle weeds that grow
In our sustaining corn."—Lear, Act IV. Sc. 4.

"Search," says she afterwards—

"Search every acre in the high-grown field,
And bring him to our eye."

The reason, therefore, agrees; and while so rank and glaring a flower as the corn-poppy would hardly have been left ungathered by poor Lear, it would, if named, be named among the first. Perhaps the readers of "N. & Q." in the different counties, and especially any in or near Warwickshire, might inquire for, and communicate, the provincial names of the corn-poppy?

B. NICHOLSON.

GORILLA.—In a book of travels, entitled A Voyage to Africa, by William Hutton, which appeared in the year 1821, mention is made of a cannibal nation in the interior of Africa, called the Kaleys, who make iron from the ore. There is also an account of a species of ourang-outang found there, called Ingrona. The traveller himself did not see any of these; but they were described to him as being larger than a man, and so strong as to be able to tear off branches from trees, and beat men to death with them in the woods.

Have we not here the first hint of such animals, and has it not since been expanded and improved upon, and at last presented to us more circumstantially as the formidable Gorilla? F. O. H.

THE GRANDPARENTS OF THE KEEHLE.—A tombstone in Leominster churchyard bears the following inscription:—

"Here waiting for our Saviour's great Assize,
And hoping thro' his merits there to rise
In glorious mode, in this dark closet lies

JOHN WARD, Gent,

who died Oct. 30, 1778, aged 69.

Also SARAH his wife, who died Jan. 30, 1786, aged 75 years."

Mr. Ward was manager of a company of comedians in "this circuit," and was grandfather of Mrs. Siddons, Mr. John, and Mr. Charles Kemble.

C. H.

Hereford.

PRAYING FOR FORTHGONA.—The following extract from the Building News, having gone the round of the newspapers, will perhaps not find an inappropriate resting-place in the columns of "N. & Q.":—

"A very curious legend was told by the Rev. C. W. Bingham to that portion of the party, which, at the recent meeting of the Archaeological Institute in Dorset, was fortunate in visiting the little Norman chapel of St. Catherine, at Milton Abbey. The legend was that, on a certain day in the year, the young women of Abbotsbury used to go up to St. Catherine's Chapel, where they made use of the following prayer: 'A husband, St. Catherine; a handsome one, St. Catherine; a rich one, St. Catherine; a nice one, St. Catherine; and soon, St. Catherine.' Mr. Beresford Hope, who at these gatherings is always equal to any emergency, modestly proposed that all gentlemen and married ladies should retire from the church, so as to afford the young ladies present the opportunity of using so desirable a prayer."

C. STEWART.

PEDANTRY.—Robert Hall said of Dr. Kippis:—

"He laid so many books upon his head, that his brain could not move."

Lord Macaulay of Dodwell:—

"He acquired more learning than his slender faculties were able to bear: the small intellectual spark which he possessed was put out by the fuel."—Hist. Eng., iii. 461.

Sir D. Brewster of Dr. Whewell:—

"He exhibits an amount of knowledge so vast, as at times to smother his reason."—More Worlds than One, 1st edit., p. 257.

CYRIL.

Queries.

JOHN PYM, THE PARLIAMENTARIAN.

I have for many years unsuccessfully endeavoured to trace a connection between the families of John Pym, the Reformer, and that of my maternal relatives, the Pym of the Hazels, but hitherto I have failed. I venture to trouble you with a few facts, which, should you think worth publication in your paper, may produce from some of your correspondents some additional information.

John Pym, the Reformer, was born in the year 1583 at Brymyn, in Somersetshire, and married about the year 1614 Anna, the daughter of John Hooker of Somersetshire, who died in 1620. Where John Pym resided during his married life: I cannot discover, or what were the names of his sons, or where his children were baptized.

Forster, in his Life of John Pym, states that it had been asserted in some histories, that he had entered one of the Inns of Court with a view to the bar; but it is difficult, he adds, to find good authority for this. Through the courtesy of the treasurer I have ascertained this surmise to be correct. John Pym was admitted a student of the Middle Temple as the son and heir of Alexander Pym, deceased, of Brymyn, April 25, 1602, Francis Rowse and William Whittaker being his sureties. Sir Francis Rous had married Pym's mother. I found also that his father, Alexander, son of Erasmus Pym of Camington, was admitted to the same Inn in 1565, and John Pym's son and heir, Alexander, was admitted there Oct. 20, 1626, when John Pym himself and John Baylis were sureties. Later, in 1673, Charles Pym, son of William Pym deceased, of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, gent., and in 1703 and 1709, William Pym and John Pym, grandsons of the same gentleman (the latter of whom was my great-great-grandfather) were also admitted as members of the Middle Temple.

I have recently discovered that this William Pym, of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, was buried in Reach, Leighton-Buzzard, and was born in the year 1619 or 1620; and it has been a tradition in the family for above a century at least that he was the son of the Reformer. His grandsons' deaths were mentioned as they occurred in the Gentleman's Magazine, and they are there stated to have been descendants of that individual.

I want only to find where the Reformer resided during his married life, and where his children were baptized, to discover whether or not he had a son named William. Forster states that his eldest son's name was John, and that he sat with his father in the parliament of 1640 for the borough of Poole, in Dorset. I think this is a mistake, for John Pyne of Currey-Mallet, who was also admitted to the Middle Temple in 1618; and the records of that society show that in 1620 Alexander was the heir-apparent, and he certainly succeeded to the estates. That he had a son John there is some doubt. Mrs. Lesiter of Collingham, Notts, who is a Pym by birth, possesses a portrait of a John Pym, said to be the son of the Reformer, if not the Reformer himself. This lady also possesses many articles said to have belonged to the Reformer, and amongst other things a very ancient copy of his coat of arms—a bull's head within a wreath; but on William Pym's tombstone at Reach, the arms given are very different; namely, sa. on a fess between three owls, as many cross crosslets of the first; and these are the arms of a Buckinghamshire family of the same name, totally unconnected with the Reformer. I find also that Margaret, the widow of a John Pym, and daughter of Finch Deering of Charing, was buried in Rochester Cathedral about 1683, and that her husband bore the same arms. Who this John Pym was I cannot find. Harris, in his History of Kent, gives these arms amongst those of the gentry of Kent, but with no information as to the neighbourhood in which that family dwelt. William Pym of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields married a Harris, but whether of Dr. Harris's family I do not know. If she was, it may account for the insertion of the arms in his book. I have found several pedigrees of the Reformer, where three sons are given, but not one of them is named William.

It is also worthy of remark, that William Pym of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, whose sons were born between 1645 and 1650, called two of them James and Charles, from which it may be inferred that he was a Royalist. This may account for his separation from his family, or it may be proof that he was of a different stock from that of the Reformer.

I should be very grateful if any of your correspondents would give me any information tending to throw a light on this matter.

JOHN PYM YEATMAN.

3, Pump Court,
Middle Temple, E.C.

P.S. From the dedication of Charles F. B. Jeffrey's sermon on the death of Lady Rous, it would appear that Pym could not be present at his mother's funeral, nor is it known where he was for the first six years of his married life.

THE BED AND THE STATURE OF OG, KING OF BASAN, OR BASHAN.

In chap. iii. of Deuteronomy, verse 11, comes the following account of the bed of Og:—

"For only Og, King of Basan, remained of the race of giants. His bed of iron is shewn, which is in Rabbath, of the children of Ammon, being nine cubits long, and four broad, after the measure of the cubit of a man's hand."—Douay Version.

The Authorised Version, or translation, is somewhat different, though the sense is the same. Now is not the word "bed," or "bedstead" (A. V.), calculated to mislead and perplex ordinary English readers: for the simple reason, that "beds" in the East are very different from those used in the West? As the "bed" (עֶרֶשׁ = eres) of Og was nine cubits long, which would be about 15½ feet English measure, the generality of English readers must have some strange ideas of an eastern bed, and still stranger conceptions of the immense stature of Og. And yet the word "bed" may, after all, only mean either a large mattress, or a divan, or sofa, supported by iron rods. The text certainly speaks, as if the whole of the bed was of iron; but how the expression is to be understood, writers appear to differ. Knowing, however, that the bed was 15½ feet long, it does not follow that Og was 15½ feet in height, because eastern beds were frequently so much longer than those who slept upon them. But as Holy Scripture informs us that "Og only remained of the race of giants," we must of necessity conclude that he was of immense stature, though from the length of the bed we cannot decide with any degree of accuracy, what his height really was.

I see, under the article "Giants," in Kitto's Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature (vol. i. p. 757, edit. Edinburgh, 1847), that Rosenmüller, Dathe, and Michaelis, translate the Hebrew word עֶרֶשׁ by coffin, and others by the term sarcophagus. But German commentators are often dangerous guides to follow.

Perhaps you, or some of your learned correspondents, may be able to throw some additional evidence upon a subject which, though more curious than useful, is not by any means devoid of interest to biblical scholars.

Mr. Porter, in his late work entitled The Giant Cities of Bashan, appears to have visited the land of the Scripture giants—the Rephaim, of whom we read in Deuteronomy.

Norwich.

J. DALTON.

ADMIRAL BENBOW.—Can any of your readers throw real light on the parentage of the famous Admiral John Benbow, and on other matters relating to him, which are at present in inexplicable confusion? The common biography, copied and recopied, makes him son of a Col. John Benbow, who escaped from the battle of Worcester in 1651; but the State Trials and the History of Shrewsbury, show that this Col. or Capt. Benbow did not escape, but was shot after the battle. Another account states, on good argument, that this Capt. Benbow was the admiral's uncle, and that he (the admiral) was son of William Benbow, a tanner at Shrewsbury. Add to this, that the date of birth of, the names of the mother and wife of, and the actual place of burial of the gallant admiral are all in doubt; and it will be seen that hence arises a fair subject of investigation for "N. & Q." * Δ.

SIR SAMUEL CLARK.—In connection with the reply (viii. 159) by Mr. T. GLADWELL, I shall be much obliged to any of your readers if they could direct me in what church the Sir Samuel Clark, of Throgmorton Street, would be likely to have had his children's births registered; as, at the date 1675, he would doubtless be a resident of the City. Any information respecting this Sir Samuel Clark will oblige

Lusan House, Quadrant Road,
Highbury New Park, N.

FOREIGN HERALDIC WORKS.—What are the titles of the best works on Danish, Norwegian, Swedish, and German heraldry and family crests, particularizing those translated into either English or French?

Birkenhead.

S. P.

THE GLOVERS OF PERTH.—In the Abbotsford Waverleys are several engravings of ancient relics in possession of the Company of Glovers of Perth. Are there any records or registers of the company in existence, of what nature and from what date?

229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

F. M. S.

HERALDIC PUZZLE.—A. had two wives; by the first, who was an heiress, he has only female issue; by the second he has a son. How should the husband of one of the daughters bear her arms?

[* Some interesting particulars of Admiral Benbow and his ancestry by Charles Hulbert appeared in the Salopian Magazine of 1815, vol. i. pp. 8, 55.—ED.]

Though the daughter is a coheir, her husband has clearly no right to bear her paternal arms on an escutcheon of pretence so long as A. has male issue. On the other hand, to bear her maternal arms would convey a false impression. The suggestion that the arms of her mother should form the principal part of the shield, and those of the father be placed in chief, appears to be without sufficient authority, and would also frequently result in a clumsy complication.

For example: suppose the paternal arms to be arg. a cross gu., on a chief az. three fleurs-de-lis or; and the maternal arms also to contain a chief charged. Let any of your heraldic readers draw the shield so treated, and see for himself the difficulty and confusion that would result from such a method. I should be glad to be informed of a more reasonable mode. J. WOODWARD.

MRS. HEY OF LEEDS.—The Rev. R. V. Taylor has prefixed to his Biographia Leodiensis a list of books by Leeds men, living authors being marked with an asterisk. In this list I find the following entry:—

"HEY (Mrs.), Moral of Flowers, royal 8vo, 1833.—Recollections of the Lakes, and other Poems, 12mo, 1841.—Spirit of the Woods, royal 8vo, 1837."

No asterisk is prefixed to her name. I have sought in vain for an account of this lady in the body of Mr. R. V. Taylor's work. I have therefore recourse to your columns in the hope that some of your correspondents can supply her Christian name and date of death, and give other information respecting her. S. Y. R.

HOGARTH'S PAINT-BOX.—The following extract is from The Standard of Aug. 21:—

"The box owned and used by Hogarth for keeping his brushes, paints, and other materials, is now in the possession of Colonel James V. Bomford of this city. It was purchased at an auction of the effects of Hogarth in London, soon after his death, by the grandfather of Colonel Bomford, and has been in the possession of the family ever since. It is between two and three feet long, half as wide, and about a foot deep."—Elizabeth (New Jersey) Journal.

Can any reader of "N. & Q." say whether the relic is genuine? RICHARD B. PROSSER.

25, Southampton Buildings, W.C.

"KNIGHT'S QUARTERLY MAGAZINE."—Can any reader of "N. & Q." inform me as to the authorship of the papers named below? viz.—1. The Raven; a Greek tale, by "Archibald Frazer" (vol. i. pp. 349-52). 2. Ripperda; a dramatic sketch. Anon. (Vol. i. pp. 103-106). 3. The Old Man of the Mountain; a dramatic fragment, by R. M. (Vol. ii. pp. 310-20). 4. The Lamia; Greek tradition. (Vol. ii. pp. 351-55).

R. INGLIS.

MEETING-EYEBROWS.—Can any of the readers of "N. & Q." give, or refer me to, any observations as to the physiognomical or phrenological meaning of this peculiarity? A superstition that persons with meeting eyebrows will never know trouble, has already been mentioned in "N. & Q."

CYRIL.

MERCHANT GUILD AT WINCHESTER.—In Dr. Milner's History of Winchester, mention is made, on the authority of Trussell's MSS., of a grant of a Merchant Guild made to the inhabitants of that city by Ethelwulf, 856 A.D. Could any of your readers oblige by informing me whether the text of the charter is in existence? Dr. Milner does not give it, but I suppose it is to be met with.

JAYNE.

NOT GUILTY.—Why should our wretched criminals be induced to utter a lie by the customary, and apparently, needless question? Can any satisfactory reason be assigned for the practice? Is an answer to such an inquiry demanded in the courts of justice in other countries? Is it not absurd, and worse than absurd, to expect a culprit after confession (even by the advice of counsel) to plead not guilty? VERAL.

PHILIP VAN ARTEVELDE AT YPRES.—In the illumination representing Philip van Artevelde addressing the people at Ypres, in the Illuminations to Froissart's Chronicles, published by Mr. H. N. Humphreys, above the citizens is displayed a banner charged with the following arms:—Per fess arg. and gu., a double cross of Lorraine counter changed (two of the traverses are in chief, the third in base). I should be glad to learn whose are the arms here represented. J. WOODWARD.

RAPHAEL'S MADONNAS.—What book or books must I consult in order to ascertain the order in which these pictures were painted, any interesting facts connected with the production of each, and the names of the galleries in which they are at present preserved? ST. SWITHIN.

ROUSSEAU.—A correspondent of your French contemporary L'Intermédiaire (ii. 355) quotes the following passage from the end of the second Book of Rousseau's Emile:—

"J'ai ouï raconter à feu Milord Hyde, qu'un de ses amis revenu d'Italie après trois ans d'absence, voutut examiner les progrès de son fils âgé de neuf à dix ans. Ils vont un soir se promener, avec son Gouverneur et lui, dans une plaine où des écoliers s'amusaient à guider des cerfs-volants. Le père en passant dit à son fils, Où est le cerf-volant dont voilâ l'ombre? Sans hésiter, sans lever la tête, l'enfant dit: Sur le grand chemin. Et en effet, ajoutait Milord Hyde, le grand chemin était entre le soleil et nous. Le père à ce mot embrasse son fils, et finissant là son examen, s'en va sans rien dire. Le lendemain il envoya au Gouverneur l'acte d'une pension viagère outre ses appointements.—Quel homme que ce père là, et quel fils lui était promis? La question est précisément de l'âge: la réponse est bien simple; mais voyez quelle netteté de judiciale enfantine elle suppose! C'est ainsi que l'élève d'Aristote apprivoisait ce coursier célèbre qu'aucun écuyer n'avait pu dompter."

[* Trussell (fol. 78) ingenuously confesses, the "origin of this corporacon [the Merchant Guild] I could never yet have the happynes to find."—Ed.]

The French querist wishes to know wherein consists the mark of sagacity that Rousseau so raves about? We might perhaps be better able to answer the question if we could tell how the boy expressed himself in his own language. I would therefore beg to inquire whether the anecdote is anywhere recorded in English. If it is, we should probably have the further satisfaction of learning who was the judicious father, and what became of the promising son.

The Lord Hyde, on whose authority Rousseau relates the story, was probably Henry Viscount Cornbury (described by Horace Walpole as an amiable and disinterested lord) who died in 1753, some few months before his father, the last Earl of Clarendon, of the family of Hyde. MELETES.

ST. ANDREW'S, EDINBURGH. — Can any correspondent favour me with any account of the Architect of St. Andrew's church, Edinburgh? Was he a native of Cupar Angus? P.

"SARUM MISSAL." — I cannot get a satisfactory explanation of the following terms "Cum regimine chori," "Sine regimine chori," "Quando-cunque chorus regitur," which I find in the Sarum Missal. What is their meaning and force in a ritualistic and musical point of view? H. A. W.

THEOGNIS. — I recently purchased Theognidis Megarensis Sententie, &c., Basilee, 1563, on a fly-leaf of which are the following lines: —

"Doctrina vim promovet insitam, Rectique cultus pectora roborant," and folded up carefully between two leaves and a part of the binding (a portion of an old Latin MS. by-the-way), the following list of names: —

"Jo^a Lloyd, *Jo^a Price, *David Evans, Se., *Tho^a Moody, *Philip Rogers, David Evans, Ju., Maurice Lloyd, Edd. Jones, *Tho^a Jones, Edd. Thomas, Jo^a Rogers, Tho^a Price, John Maurice, Se., Jo^a Elliott, Edd. Maurice, Jo^a Lloyd, Rowland Price, David Lloyd, Ju., *Edd Rogers, *Isaac Wms? Tho^a Lloyd, Rich. Wilbraham, 1517." [Those marked * have been crossed out, as has also the last figures of the date.]

Perhaps some of your correspondents can kindly inform me to what they refer. Is the Latin quotation original or not? This edition is not mentioned in Brunet. Is it rare? * ELUY.
Oxford.

WASHINGTON AN INFIDEL. — So says Jefferson (Letters, iv. 525), on the authority of Gouverneur Morris. Is the charge true? CYRIL.

[* Our correspondent is the fortunate possessor of a very uncommon edition of Theognis, Hertelius' second revision, corrected, and improved. The Pinelli Catalogue (Nos. 4434, 4435) notices two different editions by Hertelius, 1561 and 1569, both printed at Basil in 8vo, but not that of 1563.—Ed.]

A WELSH BARD. —

"1541. 1st July, 33 Hen. VIII., a Welshman, a Minstrel, was hanged and quartered for singing of songs which were interpreted to be prophesying against the king."—Stow, p. 582.

Will any reader of "N. & Q." oblige by furnishing some further account of the above old bard? GLWSIG.

Queries with Answers.

HERMANN: SCHILLER. — Can you inform me in what volume or volumes of Hermann's Opuscula are printed his versions of certain plays by Schiller? The names of the plays I forget, and know only that the translations (into Greek) are considered worthy of that great scholar's fame. I have applied in vain to Messrs. Williams & Norgate, and other foreign agents. None of them had the complete work, though some had a stray volume or two of merely critical dissertations. Any one who possesses the book will be able to inform me and confer an obligation on E. C.

[From the short introduction prefixed by Hermann (Opuscula, v. 355, edit. 1834), to his Greek translation of some fragments taken from Schiller's Wallenstein, it does not appear that he ever did into Greek any one entire tragedy of Schiller. Hermann tells us that, being of opinion that in Schiller's plays, though in some respects they come short, there were many things which, if written in Greek, would be most worthy of a Greek tragedian, he (Hermann) when at home in the evening, surrounded by the female confabulations of his own family, did put into Greek verse certain things (or portions), and made a present of his translations to his friends: "nonnulla Græcis versibus exprimebam: quas schedulas deinde amicis quibusdam dedi." We fully understand Hermann as intimating, and as meaning to intimate, that his translations were only off-hand and fragmentary, and this for a reason of which every paterfamilias will feel the force, because he made them "in communi conclavi familiæ obambulans, ubi inter confabulationes mulierum non est seriis rebus tractandis locus."]

THE MAN IN THE MOON. — Can you inform me whether there is any trace of the popular legend in Plutarch's Treatise on the Spots in the Moon? On the roof of Gylfyn church, Conway, is a representation of the moon with the man in it bearing his thornbush, but without his dog.

S. BARING-GOULD.

[In Plutarch's Treatise, which has reached us in an imperfect form, we find nothing that comes very near to the popular legend. He cites the poet Agesianax, according to whom the face seen in the moon is that of a boy. For κόρος, however, critics would read κόρη, which would make the face a girl's. The best thing in Plutarch respecting the moon is a dialogue, more Abraham Lincoln, between the Moon and her Mother.

"'Mother,' said the Moon, 'I want a petticoat, and I want it to fit.' 'Why, how,' replied the Mother, 'can I ever make a petticoat to fit such a creature as you? At one time round and full, at another humped, at another horned!' Even so," adds the philosopher, "there are persons so foolish, that no one can suit them, and no one can satisfy them."—Sept. Sap.]

CLELAND OF THAT ILK.—Was there ever such a family in Scotland; and, if so, was it of old standing? What arms did the family bear, and where is Cleland?

F. M. S.

229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

[Cleland is a surname belonging to an old family in Lanarkshire, and derived from the lands of that name in the parish of Dalzell. The Clelands of that ilk were hereditary foresters to the old Earls of Douglas, and had for arms a hare salient, argent, with a hunting horn, proper, about its neck; crest, a falcon standing on a left hand glove, proper. At other times, for supporters they had two greyhounds. James Cleland of Cleland was one of the patriots who joined Sir William Wallace, and fought, under his command, against the English. He also remained faithful to King Robert Bruce; and for his services received from that monarch several lands lying within the barony of Calder in West Lothian. From him was descended William Cleland of that ilk, who, in the reign of King James III., married Jean, daughter of William Lord Somerville. The name was formerly Kneil-land, with the K pronounced. Consult Wm. Anderson's Scottish Nation, i. 648.]

ST. BOTOLPH, ALDERSGATE.—Can you inform me who was the author of the following lines?—

"Ille conjuncta suo recubat Franciscæ marito;
Et cinis et unus, qui fuit una caro.
Huc cineres conferre suos soror Anna jubebat;
Corpora sic uno pulvere trina jacent.
Ille Opifex rerum, Omnipotens, qui Trinus est Unus, Pulvere ab hoc uno corpora trina dabit."

These lines are said to be on a tablet in the church of St. Botolph, Aldersgate. Who was this Francisca?

THOMAS S. DYER.

[This monumental inscription was formerly in the old church of St. Botolph, Aldersgate, and is printed in Maitland's London, ii. 1075. Can Anne, the sister of Frances, be the celebrated Dame Anne Packington (died 1563), who was certainly buried in this church? The following translation of this epitaph appeared in the Grub Street Journal:—

"Close to her husband, Frances join'd once more,
Lies here one dust, which was one flesh before.
Here, as injoin'd, her sister Anne remains:
Here laid one dust, three bodies thus contains.
Th' Almighty Source of things, th' immense Three-One,
Will raise three bodies from this dust alone."

CHURCH PATRONAGE IN SCOTLAND BEFORE 1688.—I shall be much obliged to any one who will explain the system of church patronage in Scotland, when the Episcopal form of worship was in force, before the Revolution. In 1684 I find a clergyman presented to a living in Berwickshire by the Bishop of Edinburgh; Sir John Sinclair of Longformacus being patron of the parish. Am I to infer from this that Sir John had no share in the presentation?

F. M. S.

229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

[Consult Erskine's Institute of the Law of Scotland, fol. 1773, "Of Ecclesiastical Persons," lib. i. tit. v. sects. 9—11.]

BENEDICT.—Would you be so kind as to inform me why a person recently married is called a Benedict? St. Benedict was never married.

TERRIFE.

[The word is thus explained in Ogilvie's Supplement: "This word, used as a cant term for a married man, or a man newly-married, is derived from one of the characters [Benedick] in Shakspeare's play of Much Ado about Nothing." Benedick, though a man very unlikely to marry, ends by marrying Beatrice.

We suspect, however, that Benedict (or Benedick), as the term for a married man, and especially for one newly married, must have been already in use, and familiar to Shakspeare's mind, when he wrote the play in question. Thus Claudio, Act. V., Sc. 1, says, "Yes, and text underneath, Here dwells Benedick the married man;" and (sc. 4.) D. Pedro, "How dost thou, Benedick the married man?" And accordingly we are disposed to look farther back for the original use of the term.]

Replies.

THE SITE OF OPHIR: ANCIENT RUINS IN THE INTERIOR OF AFRICA.

(3rd S. viii. 142.)

A celebrated traveller* has said—

"Africa is interesting in every point of view. Though known anciently, it is still known but imperfectly; that the old Greek maxim, adopted in after-ages by the Romans, is equally applicable at the present day as it was two thousand years ago—Africa semper aliquid novi offert. Africa never fails to present something new to the inquisitive traveller."

On taking up the Cape and Natal News of Aug. the 2nd, and reading the article "Discovery of Ancient Ruins in the Interior of Africa," I was struck with the truism contained in Sir John Barrow's remark.

The following is the article, and I shall feel obliged by its insertion in your valuable columns, with the present explanation, believing there are good grounds for the truth of the report however marvellous the statement may appear:—

"We have heard that the Rev. J. L. Dohne, near Durban, has been informed by a German missionary of the discovery of the ruins of ancient cities on the southern

* The late Sir John Barrow, Bart.

Africa; and we presume the following account in the Eastern Province Herald, relates to them:—Some time ago, a party of travellers, some of whom connected with the Berlin mission, went on a tour of exploration in the country between the Limpopo and the Zambezi; and here is what they report:—The country where we started on our tour of discovery is in the Leydenburg district, the free territories of Bafedis (a Basuto chief) chief Sekukune, the Sekwaai, where there has been a mission station since the year 1864. We started on our expedition with ten trustworthy and well armed Bafedis, and packers for our little luggage, and took our route north to the Limpopo river; two 'Knoapnenzen' served as conductors to take us to the ruins of Bunjaai,—which we had heard long ago from some eye-witnesses, were willing, but only required the permission of chief Serabane, who was on friendly terms with the living near the ruins. Serabane at first positively refused, as he said it would cost his and our lives if he took us to the ruins, but at last he agreed to let us and our people go there, but on our own risk. One of the packers had been born and brought up in the neighbourhood of the ruins, and only latterly went to Serabane. On our journey we heard some very interesting particulars about them. They were continually frightened to go any further, but at last agreed to take us to the neighbourhood of the ruins, and then leave us to our own adventures on our own way. Why Serabane should refuse and let people be so frightened, I am at a loss to report; but I rate the Bunjaai must be a sacred place, as it is forbidden by punishment of death to take any white man there. Respecting the ruins themselves, so much in, that there are two places on which Egyptian ruins are standing. The smaller place is situated south of the Limpopo, called Bempé there. There even have been waterworks—the water flowing out of an animal's head cut out of stone. Many stories are connected with this place; but more important is the real Bunjaai, on the Salis River. This town must have been several hours' journey in circumference. There are one or more pyramids, also sphinxes, parts of grand buildings, as well as marble tables full of hieroglyphics, and for the continent of Africa certainly very valuable. There is one underground passage, about half a mile long, full of such things with hieroglyphics. This passage has many chambers on each side. The entrance to the one is done very cleverly: after pushing a large stone plate aside, you go to a large saloon. For what purpose this place we served we could not ascertain, but very likely was their burial ground. Although we should have expected to see these ruins, we found it impossible for us to go any further this time—and only two days' journey to the smaller ruins, as the natives through which we passed were diseased by the small-pox and fever, and we would not go; so we had to return, arriving six days later at the mission station Vitalatolu. The neighbourhood near the ruins are called Kwarri-Kwarri. The country is very unhealthy through the continual miasma. Cattle cannot live, as there is a fly called tsetse, which kills them. Plenty of game. A large marble army of naval men will still remember the arduous voyage on the coast of Africa, between the Cape and Sierra Leone, made upwards of forty years ago by the late Admiral William Fitzwilliam in H.M.S. Leven, with Captain Vidal in H.M.S. Barracouta, which occupied upwards of forty years, during which we lost on the insalu-rious coast two post captains, and about eighty per cent. of the officers and men. At that period the admiral (then Captain Owen) visited Inhambane, the territory of the Imaun of Muscat, now of the Imaun of Zanzibar, where he had much free intercourse with that settlement, and obtained a knowledge of the ruins of ancient cities of magnitude, singularly situated between the Limpopo and the Zambezi, which tends to corroborate the report of the German missionary.

At present it is not known where the Limpopo disembogues itself. Livingstone inclines towards Delagoa Bay, though probably nearer to Inhambane. When on this interesting subject, will you permit me to relate a remarkable surmise of my late friend, Admiral Owen, concerning the identity of the Ophir of Scripture, gained during the investigation of the country alluded to—viz. that one of the ruinous cities bore the name of Ophir to this day. He further ascertained, by tradition, that the country abounded with gold, even up to the first visit of the Portuguese some centuries back, but its collection was laid in abeyance through the abominable slave traffic that swallowed up all legitimate pursuits, placing the gold mines in oblivion. Admiral Owen was persuaded in his own mind that the ancient Ophir was in this locality.

When discussing the subject I advanced that, on looking at the actual distance between the Phœnician ports in the Red Sea and Inhambane, it could scarcely, under all the disadvantages of ancient navigation, occupy a three years' voyage, he remarked—"Remember, vessels in those days only sailed before the wind like the Chinese junks of the present day;" and furnished me further with a very plausible account of the cause of the prolonged voyage of Solomon's ships. The first year the winds on the Eastern Coast of Africa allowed the vessels to make Inhambane, but did not suit the return passage, consequently the second year they were obliged to make a course that brought them to Bombay, where they rested until the setting in of the south-east monsoon, or the third year, when Solomon's navy of Tarshish secured a fair passage to the desired haven, bringing "gold and silver, ivory and apes, and peacocks."

This suggestion of the original Ophir of Scripture is not unreasonable when compared with the opinions of very eminent men, who differ materially regarding the site, with far less practical knowledge than the late admiral had to form deductions.

The tediousness of ancient voyages is well known; the time occupied by the circumnavigators of Africa, as mentioned by Pliny and others, is uncertain. It was sometimes doubtless years; for we are told that the voyagers occasionally landed, sowed and planted, waiting patiently the product.

Even in more recent times, comparing the voyages of Europeans with the impetuous navigators of our own day, we shall not be surprised at the three years' voyage of Solomon's fleet. It may to many appear singular that the ruins alluded to should have remained so long unknown, but this is not at all surprising since the country is in fact a perfect terra incognita, bordered on the sea coast by a fearful miasm, destructive at nearly all seasons to Europeans, inhabited by uninteresting Arabs, and to the west by the ferocious Mosilikatse and other warlike savage hordes, and infested with the tsetse fly, peculiarly destructive to animal life.

In conclusion, I would express my firm belief that there are good grounds for further investigation of such truly interesting relics as are described in the accompanying report. Doubtless the active-minded Sir Roderick Murchison and his disciples—the young Lavards, Spokes, Grants, and others, will be on the alert at the prospect of overhauling a second Egypt, far from inaccessible if the undertaking is made under proper directions, and at the proper season of the year.

GEO. THOMPSON.

London.

THE LAST GREAT LITERARY FORGERY:
THE FABRICATED CORRESPONDENCE OF MARIE ANTOINETTE.

(3rd S. vii. 416; viii. 141.)

After reading the extract from Galvani and the remarks of your correspondent C. R. II., supported by the authorities of Lady Morgan, Miss Kavanagh, and the Edinburgh Review of 1841—a date rather distant in this new age of historical research—it may be well to listen to what has been said on the other side of the question in dispute, by distinguished French critics, who reside at the fountain-head of all knowledge respecting France and its history. In the second fortnightly No. for July of the Revue des Deux Mondes, this very inquiry relating to the genuineness of the newly-discovered correspondence of Marie-Antoinette is discussed by M. De Mazade, who arrives at a conclusion by no means in harmony with your correspondent's remarks, but tending, on the contrary, to favour the view taken of the authenticity of the letters. M. Von Sybel, a Professor at Bonn, “un écrivain estimé, quoique très-passionné,” has entered the lists against the correspondence in a very decided manner, but without obtaining a victory, in M. Mazade's judgment. To quote M. Mazade's own words:—

“Il se forme en vérité depuis quelque temps toute une littérature des révélations et de rectifications historiques. Des Mémoires qu'on croyait connaître, et qui étaient plus ou moins altérés, sont rendus à leur intégrité première; des témoignages nouveaux se multiplient sur le xviii^e Siècle comme sur la Révolution; des Correspondances inattendues se produisent, et c'est ainsi que tout récemment encore, on le sait, la reine Marie-Antoinette elle-même, entre tant d'autres personnages de l'époque révolutionnaire, devenait l'héroïne d'une de ces révélations ou de ces restaurations qui, sans modifier essentiellement l'histoire, lui impriment de moins un cachet plus précis, plus familier et plus vivant. On disait bien qu'il y avait des lettres de la reine, et de temps à autre quelques-unes de ces lettres se glissaient dans les livres sur la Révolution ou dans des recueils de documents historiques,” &c.

Editors have appeared who have collected these scattered letters, and we see the result in the attractive publications of MM. Hunolstein, Feuillet de Conches, and the Director of the Archives at Vienna, the Chevalier d'Arnoeth. M. Arnoeth's collection contains a perfectly new series of letters, and quite distinct from any other, between Marie-Antoinette and her mother, the empress Maria-Theresa.

“Quand on compare toutes ces lettres,” continues M. Mazade, “quelquefois rapprochées de dates, on trouve en fin de compte qu'il n'y a entre elles aucune discordance, qu'elles se suivent même assez bien, qu'elles sont écrites sous les mêmes préoccupations, et font allusion aux mêmes circonstances intimes. Où donc est la raison de considérer les unes comme parfaitement authentiques, les autres comme une œuvre de spéculieux mystificateurs, qui n'ont eu qu'à puiser dans les Mémoires de M^{me} Campan ou de Weber? Au-dessus de ces nuages cependant, Marie-Antoinette apparaît dans sa séduisante et douloureuse majesté, suppliciée durant sa vie, objet de contestation après sa mort, et résumant dans sa personne les perplexités d'une époque, les grâces de la femme, et les fiertés de la reine.”

This is but a very brief and imperfect summary (not to encroach too much on your space) of M. Mazade's argument, which your correspondent had probably not seen when he penned his extremely confident remarks. It would be something quite unusual if the writers in the Times, the Athenæum, and the Saturday Review, who are usually so well-informed, and so competent in literary criticism, should all have gone astray on this question. The present reading public will rather listen to them, I think, than either to Lady Morgan or Miss Kavanagh.

M. Feuillet de Conches, in the third volume, just out, of the Lettres de Louis XVI et Marie-Antoinette, has inserted a reply to Professor Sybel's objections to the genuineness of the Letters. The reply enters fully into Professor Sybel's strictures; and in the opinion of a writer in the Journal des Débats, M. John Lemoine, has victoriously refuted them. M. Lemoine's own remarks are as follow:—

“M. Feuillet de Conches, dont la science et le zèle paléographiques sont si connus, et dont plus de quarante années de recherches et d'études ont fait le premier de connaisseurs en matière de documents historiques, s'était borné à indiquer d'une manière générale les sources où il avait puisé ses pièces; il a voulu, pour plus d'exactitude encore, énumérer en un second tirage de ses deux premiers volumes l'origine de chaque lettre. . . . C'était la meilleure reponse à faire aux critiques de l'Allemagne, qui ont révoqué en doute l'authenticité des premières lettres de son recueil monumental. A cette démonstration victorieuse, il a ajouté une préface qui réfute de la façon la plus péremptoire les attaques injustifiables dont il avait été l'objet de la part de nos voisins d'outre Rhin," &c.

J. MACRAY.

DE QUINCEY ON JOHNSON.

(2nd S. ix. 401.)

"We recollect," says De Quincey, "a little biographic sketch of Dr. Johnson, in which . . . the author quotes the well-known lines of the translation of Juvenal:—

'Let observation with extensive view Survey mankind from China to Peru,' and contends with some reason that this is saying in effect—

'Let observation with extensive observation survey mankind extensively.'—De Quincey, Selections, vol. ii. p. 72.

Your correspondent S. C. supposes the criticism Coleridge's. But the same is found in a contemporary publication, viz.—

"Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the late Dr. Samuel Johnson, containing many valuable Original Letters, and several interesting Anecdotes both of his Literary and Social Connections. The Whole authenticated by Living Evidence. London, 1785. 16mo.

By the author, or rather a warm admirer of Pope, by whom these strictures were communicated, it is remarked:—

"Let observation survey the world from China to Peru, and we must allow its view to be extensive, whether the poet tell us so or not." "He owned," it is added, "at the same time that nothing but Johnson's nibbling, with so much indelicacy, at the beautiful veneration of a poet whom he had always esteemed the most classical and elegant in the language, could have provoked him to read what he acknowledged an excellent poem, with such fastidious minuteness."

When Dryden's opening of the Tenth Satire is contrasted with Johnson's, it should be admitted that, pari passu, Juvenal may be charged with tautology, and that the latter transfuses not only the sense, but almost the words of the original:—

"Omnibus in terris, quæ sunt a Gadibus usque Auroram et Gangem."

The great critic would perhaps have silenced the objectors with another exclamation, in which words akin to each other are used with no tautology:—

"Let hypercritics with extensive view Review the bards from Homer to Carew."

Whilst upon this "biographic sketch," I cannot refrain from quoting, as a literary curiosity, the following criticism on Shakspeare by the anonymous author of these Memoirs, which shows that even in the year 1785 a Rymer existed, with whose prototype's Tracts on Tragedy, reviewed in the first volume of The Retrospective Review, the subjoined extract may be compared:—

"This is the favourite bard of Englishmen, and he owes his immortality to their discernment, as in every other nation his absurdities had probably buried him in oblivion. It was said by one of the Popes, with the usual decency of professional impostors, that a book which required so much explanation as the Bible, ought not to have been written. This witticism applied to Shakspeare would be deemed blasphemy, and yet apart from a few splendid passages, what do we find in his plays to justify their excessive popularity, or to give the author that supereminence which he has so long enjoyed on the English stage? Do they serve to correct the taste, improve the heart, enlighten the understanding, or facilitate any one purpose of public utility? His characters are in fact all monsters, his heroes madmen, his wits buffoons, and his women strumpets, viragos, or idiots. He confounds the relations of things by aiming at no moral object, and for pleasantry often substitutes the grossest obscenity. His creations are as preposterous as they are numerous, and whenever he would declaim, his thoughts are vulgar, and his expressions quaint or turgid or obscure. He makes Achilles and other illustrious characters of antiquity hector like bullies in a brothel, and puts in the mouths of his heroines the ribaldry of Billingsgate. There is not a rule in dramatic composition which he does not habitually violate. He is called the poet of nature, and he certainly imitates her deformities with exactness, but seldom aims at that preference of art which consists in copying her excellence. The profusion of intemperate praise which accompanies his memory indicates much oftener an abject deference for the opinion of the multitude than any real sense of intrinsic merit. And many a reader fancies himself charmed with the beauties, who is only a dupe to the name of an author. Johnson was not a critic to be misled by report, while he could have access to the truth. He even says, that there is not one of Shakspeare's plays which, were it now to be exhibited as the work of a contemporary writer, would be heard to the conclusion. And he states the excellencies and defects of his author in terms so equally pointed and strong, that he has run into paradox where he meant only to be impartial."—Pp. 138-141.

BIBLIOTHECAR. CHETHAM.

THE TEMPLARS IN SCOTLAND.

(3rd S. viii. 150.)

When my friend Mr. CARMICHAEL returns to town, I shall be happy to give him more full information on this subject than would be suitable for your columns. In the meantime I may state, in regard to the Knight Templars of Scotland, that a most capital account of their history was written by the late lamented Professor Aytoun, who was Grand Prior, as a preface to a new edition of their rules. I have mislaid my copy of this; but speaking from memory, I may venture to give the following epitome.

It was a rule of the Order that no knight should fight against a Christian foe, except in self-defence; but confine his exertions to the cause to which he had devoted himself—the liberation of the Temple from the Moslem. The excitement used in Scotland, during the great the Edwards of England, led the ights to draw their swords in support pendence of their country. In conse-this, they were cut off from the Order; maintained their existence, and chiefly ore northern parts of the island. Pro-ytoun gives, in extenso, a remarkable when Charles Edward was at Holly-herein there is described a meeting of the at which H. R. H., after having been knight, was elected Grand Master. Be-that period and the present century, the sion of the Order is a little obscure.

I joined it, that distinguished naval Sir David Milne, of Milnegraden, was d Master. He obtained in Paris, and preed to the Order, the collar worn by that er. This had been lost sight of since the exeion of Jacques de Molay, the last of the Conental Grand Masters, whose memory is always membered at all the festive meetings of the rder. Sir David was succeeded as Grand Master by the late lamented Duke of Atholl; and I think few who were present at his inauguration by Aytoun as Grand Prior, will ever forget it.

The French Templars originated with Sir Sydney Smith. I do not know upon what authority, but the two branches of the Order can easily be distinguished. Both have the imposed cross in red; but the underlying one is, in the French Order, white and gold: in the Scotch, black and silver.

Both, however, must be distinguished from the extraordinary body which have chosen to call themselves Knight Templars; and are, in fact, a simple attempt to extend the Masonic Orders without any reason whatever, and pass themselves off for what they never could be; as it is a sine quid non that every candidate for admission into the real Order of the Temple shall prove his right to armorial bearings, not through a seal engraver, but through the College of Arms in England, or the Lyons Office in Scotland.

(GEORGE VERE IRVING, K.C.T.)

In the parish of East Kilpatrick, Dunbarton-shire, there is a farm called Temple of Knights-wood.

EMANUEL COLLINS.
(2nd S. vi. 533.)

He was a native of the county of Somerset, and was educated at the Bristol Grammar School under the Rev. Alexander Calcott, from whence he proceeded to Oxford, where, at Wadham College, he took his B.A. degree. He stated that he was be a misvicars of that church, and among Richard de Newbury, and among sent incumbent, the Rev. George Elanu.

carefully searching this document, as well as the registers of births, marriages, deaths, &c., for his signature without success, I am ready to say.
with the registrar of the diocese of Bath and Wells, in answer to my inquiries in that quarter, that "no person of the name of Emanuel Collins was instituted to the vicarage of Bedminster." It is probable, therefore, that he was a curate only, for that there was such a person in holy orders somewhere in this neighbourhood appears certain from the fact of there having been, under date of 1762, "A mezzotinto engraving drawn by N.
Hone, and scraped by James M^{rs} Ardell, depicting a comely-looking personage in canonicals named The Rev. Emanuel Collins, A.M.; frequently to be seen (as Evans says) in our print-shops."

This singular character is said to have been once the "master of a school for boys in Shannon Court, Corn Street, in this city, and subsequently in the parish of Bedminster. In the latter he is spoken of as "one of the strangest fellows that ever wore a cassock, or took up the trade of tuition. He was clever and prodigate; scribbling out his ways and means by authorship; for gain."
It cannot be matter of surprise, therefore, to find Southey saying, that "his school failed him, not because he was deficient in learning—of which he seems to have had a full share for his station—but because of his gross and scandalous misconduct."

And he further tells us that, "He afterwards kept something so like an alehouse, that he got into a scrape with his superiors;" for here, it is said by Evans, he "performed the marriage ceremony at a crown a couple—an abuse of the sacred ordinance which, we have been told (continues the writer), was chiefly instrumental in producing the Marriage Act of 1752."

There can be no doubt, I think, that it was this individual to whom Chatterton refers in his poem of "Kew Gardens," and not to William Collins, the author of the Oriental Eclogues.

GEORGE PRICE.

City Library, Bristol.

GLOUCESTER CROSS.
(3rd S. viii. 152.)

There are, as you conjecture, no remains of this cross in existence. The ancient edifice included to by SIR THOMAS WINNINGTON is a beautiful old conduit which was erected by Aldermen Scriven in 1636, in the Southgate Street, Gloucester. When I was a lad it stood in a near the south-west side of the present c market, but the field being required for building purposes, it was fortunately obtained by Edmund Hopkinson, Esq., of Edgeworth House, and removed to the grounds there at considerable expense by that gentleman. It would be a great and appropriate ornament of the park recently established in Gloucester.

With respect to the High Cross in that city, Furney was right in telling Dr. Ward that Bishop Goodman contributed to its repair, for in an interesting and characteristic letter from the Bishop, published in Mr. Davis's Annals of Windsor (vol. ii. p. 101) he writes to the Mayor of Windsor:—

"Many cities doe this year (1635) either build or repaire and beautifie their Crosses. Bristow hath erected one little inferior to the Crosse in Cheapside. Gloucester by my persuasion hath done the like, and though I suffer them to beautifie some pictures, yet the crosse itself is wholly at my charge."

It was taken down about a century ago, in pursuance of an act for the improvement of the city, being no doubt greatly in the way, and probably much dilapidated, though it is to be regretted that, like the conduit, its remains were not preserved in some convenient place. A lithograph entitled "Gloucester Cross, 1520," was published some years ago by a local bookseller, but the upper part at least is entirely imaginary, and is very different and inferior to Ricketts's drawing for the Society of Antiquaries, which was engraved and published in Atkyns's History of Gloucestershire (from which the photograph purchased by SIR THOMAS WINNINGTON is made), and also from a beautiful little etching of the cross in my possession "by John Smith, from a drawing by J. L. Bond." It appears that anciently there were several crosses in Gloucester. Archdeacon Furney's MS. in the Bodleian contains rude pen and ink sketches of two of them, which I have copied, but neither of them is in the least like the one drawn by Ricketts, though one of them is subscribed in the MS. "Alta Crux, Gloucester." A fac-simile of the old High Cross of the city would have been a far better memorial to Bishop Hooper than the new one which has been erected. I made the suggestion at the time, but it was disregarded.

GLUCESTRIENSIS.

PRETENDED RESUSCITATION: NICHOLAS FAC-
CIO (3rd S. viii. 171.)—Permit me to add to your note upon Faccio the following particulars relating to him. He is said to have first invented the application of jewels to watchwork, to diminish the friction of the pivots. The experiment was, however, tried before his time. To him belongs the merit of having been the first to discover and apply the art of piercing rubies, to receive the pivots of the balance-wheel, about 1700. In the London Gazette, of May 11th, 1704, we read:—

"Her Majesty having granted to Mr. Nicholas Faccio, gentleman, of the Royal Society, Peter Debaufres and Jacob Debaufres, watchmakers, her letters-patent, &c., for the sole use in England, &c., for fourteen years, of a new art, invented by them, of figuring and working precious or common stones, crystal, or glass, and certain other matters, different from metals, so that they may be employed in watches, clocks, and many other engines, as internal and useful parts of the engine itself, in such manners as were never yet in use. All those that may have occasion for any stones thus wrought, may be further informed at Mr. Debaufre's, in Church-street, near St. Anne's. There they may see some jewel-watches, and some essays of free watches, and wholly free watches, and all belong unto the same art."

It seems that Faccio was at one time a teacher of mathematics in Spitalfields. He was too lavish in the prosecution of inventions and projects, which never repaid him. His Latin poem, to which you have called attention, contains a lengthy and not inelegant description of the jewel-watches, of which he claimed to be the inventor. Vide Chalmers's Tatler, vol. iv. p. 646.

EDWARD J. WOOD.

Green, in his History of Worcester, describes Facio as a person that city received as a disciple from the school of affliction; but whether as a stipendiary on the posthumous bounty of King William, or subsisting on his own fortune, he is unable to ascertain. He lived there respected and esteemed; and died aged ninety, and was buried at the church of St. Nicolas, April 28th, 1753. A letter to Henry Hastings, and a MS. narrative of Facio's life, is printed in the Appendix to Green's work. The latter MS. also in Seward's Anecdotes.

THOMAS E. WINNINGTON.

CARTHAGINIAN GALLEYS (3rd S. viii. 128, 175.) Athenæus (v. 41) mentions the diutropes, meaning a vessel with twenty banks of oars, erroneously, I conceive, rendered by Liddell and Scott "with twenty oars," which belonged to Hiero, aided in its construction by Archimedes, who invented the helix, and drew into the water this vessel (420 feet in length), requiring as much timber in its construction as sixty triremes. Also (v. 37) the ship of forty banks of oars (ρεσσαρονόη), built by Ptolemy Philopater: this vessel was in length 70 fathoms, in breadth 9½, and in height 12 fathoms. The longest oars were precisely the same length as the breadth of the vessel, 9½ fathoms. They were so finely balanced with lead in the handles, that they were very handy to use; although some of them turned on a point about 40 feet above the surface of the water. This vessel required 4000 rowers, besides 400 supernumeraries, distinct from the 3000 mariners on deck. The arrangement of such oars, and such number of rowers, may be thus made: take nine men for each oar, larboard and starboard; that is, eighteen men in the top row or tier (ἄνω τῆρας); take six tiers of such men on the sloping bank—this gives 108 to each bank; and as it had forty banks, the full complement of men needed on this supposition is 4320. This is a maximum, for a less number would suffice to work the lower rows or tiers (ὑγῖται and θαλαμῖται), and at the stem (πρόκωποι) and near the stern (ἐπικώποι).

Since writing the above, I find Eschenburg considers the previous difficulty settled by Mr. Holwell of Edinburgh; who, in 1826, published an Essay to show that these banks were oblique as well as horizontal. This solution appears to be unknown to Liddell and Scott.

T. J. BRCKTON.

I see that the subject of rowing with banks of oars—the trireme or galley system—is discussed at the present moment in “N. & Q.” I have recently seen the subject illustrated in full detail in a very interesting volume published during the present year by Michael Levy, Frères, Paris. It is entitled:—

“Mémoires d'un Protestant condamné aux Galères de France pour Cause de la Religion, re-imprimés d'après le journal original de Jean Marteilhe de Bergerac en 1757.”

The book is a very remarkable one, both religiously and historically; while, indirectly, it exhibits much both concerning the penal system and the naval warfare of France at the time, specially with its maritime neighbour, England. The period is from 1700 to 1713.

At page 439 the reader will find several pages headed, “De la vogue d'un galère,” “la vogue” being defined as “proprement le maniement des rames.”

Historical readers will remember that it was on board one of the French galleys that John Knox was confined after being taken prisoner by the French at St. Andrew's in 1547; but the particulars of his confinement are scantily known; and whatever the nature of it may have been, it will in all probability have been that of a prisoner of war, and not by any means of that kind so painfully described in these pages.

FRANCIS TRENCH.

Isip Rectory, Oxford.

“WHOM THE GODS LOVE DIE YOUNG” (3rd S. viii. 171.)—Several years ago, when visiting some churches in Lincolnshire, I went to see among others the church at Boothby Pagnall. On a tombstone in the pavement of the north aisle, I was much taken with the following brief and energetic version of the apophthegm, which the ancients expressed more diffusely:—

“Ὁν φιλεῖ Θεός, Θνήσκει νέος.”

F. C. II.

The story of Cleobis and Biton is translated into metrical verse by Mr. Bode in his Ballads from Herodotus, published 1853. The conclusion of which is thus rendered:—

“All placidly without a pang, without a single sigh,
They yielded up their blameless lives—and call ye this to die?”

O no! 'tis but a rest prolonged—a waking on the shore,
Where the stormy blasts of mortal life shall rave and howl no more:

Where in the Elysian fields the good repose in endless rest.

Oh! 'tis of all the gifts of heaven the choicest and the best.”

THOMAS E. WINNINGTON.

QUOTATIONS (3rd S. viii. 171.)—

“For men at most differ as heaven and earth,
But women, worst and best, as heaven and hell.”
Idylls of the King, Vivien, p. 136.

“The reddest lips that ever have kissed,
The brightest eyes that ever have shone,
May pray and whisper, and we not list,
Or look away, and never be missed,
Ere yet ever a month is gone.”
Thackeray's Rebecca and Rowena.
A. H.

The couplet—

“Heaven hath no rage like love to hatred turned,
Nor hell a fury like a woman scorned,”— is to be found in The Mourning Bride (by Congreve), Act III. Sc. 8. “Rage,” and not “power,” is, I think, the correct reading.

J. B. SHAW, M.A.

Old Trafford, Manchester.

“But heaven may yet have more mercy than man,
On such a bold rider's soul,” is from a poem signed “C. K.,” published in Fraser's Magazine, Jan. 1859, p. 103. I believe the Rev. Charles Kingsley is the author, and that it is now included among his acknowledged works.

EDWARD PEACOCK.

How could K. R. C. have got at these lines? For his information it may be stated, that those beginning—“There was something in his accents,” &c.—were written by the late Mr. Glover, Aide-de-Camp to Sir W. Dennison, in Madras. He was afterwards killed in New Zealand.

E. M.

CURIOUS DECORATION (3rd S. viii. 188.)—Although I have not attained the degree in Freemasonry to which this decoration appears to me to belong, I can yet explain it partially. There is a degree in Freemasonry of Knights of the White Eagle or Pelican, to which this may appertain. I conceive the Lion and Sceptre to indicate the royal house of Judah. The eagle is the symbol of supreme power. “The harpies” are, I suppose, the cherubim. The letter J is the initial of “Jehovah,” and the motto, correctly put, “Kodesh l' Adonai,” means “Holiness to the Lord.” The correct explanation I conceive is known to very few persons, and these would not furnish it. I can form no conjecture as to the meaning of the crosier, the spear, the tree, the arrow, or the bull. But, on the the blazing star with its seven points is asonic; so is the man in the attitude

T. J. BUCKTON.

W BATHURST (3rd S. viii. 128, 177.)—
Walter Bathurst, R.N., who was killed at of Navarino, was certainly not a son of rst, Bishop of Norwich. The Bishop's
e Henry, Archdeacon of Norwich, Sir benjamin, Charles, and Robert. Charles
'95, Benjamin disappeared mysteriously
Robert died in 1820, and Henry and Sir rived their father. If Captain Walter had been a son of the bishop, he could said that he was not a relation of Lord meaning, I presume, the late Earl

That nobleman was second cousin of
p. I may here relate an anecdote of urst, for which I am in the best position
. A Catholic priest was once at his d ascending with him the staircase to
y. They passed a large tabular list of ps of Norwich, and Dr. Bathurst stopped d pointed to his own name at the the list, with the date of his appoint-1805. He said with a smile to the
You see how long I have been here: I k you for that. If I had not advo-ur cause, I should have got a better
I could have had anything through re Lord Bathurst." F. C. H.

TH (3rd S. viii. 87, 137.)—Though I swer my own question, I can satisfy the your correspondent. The view he pos-aken out of John Howard's State of the England and Wales, 4to, Warrington, ch work gives the plan also. But that the one to which I referred. I beg sk, if any one possesses a large plan of Hospital at Plymouth? as I am de-scertaining the names of the engraver, ded to it. WYATT PAPWORTH.

VARNER (3rd S. viii. 171.)—The Lady about whom MR. WEALE enquires, was he Order of St. Francis in the first Eng-ent of Poor Clares established on the which was founded at Gravelines. She wife of Sir John Warner. They were rts to the Catholic faith; and separat-tual consent, he became a Jesuit, and mer a Poor Clare, taking the name of re of Jesus. They both made their reli-ession on the same day, Nov. 1, 1667, rch of the Franciscan Convent at Grave-e life of Lady Warner was written by d Scarsbrick, S.J., and the portrait de-
MR. WEALE is usually prefixed to it.
l Scarsbrick was appointed one of the
at the court of James II. F. C. H.

CARVED PULPITS (3rd S. viii. 170.)—The first figure described is that of St. Bonaventure, B.O.D.
He is often represented, as here, in the habit of a Franciscan friar, holding a remonstrance. The second is probably another eminent Franciscan,
St. Peter of Alcantara, who is often represented with a cross, which is sometimes luminous, sometimes made of boughs, sometimes in his arm, or appearing over him. Their dress here is not an alb and cape, but the Franciscan coarse brown habit and hood. F. C. H.

MOPSIS (3rd S. viii. 179.)—I think there can be no doubt that in the extract from Lord Anderson, the word Mopsis is used in the sense of a doll made up of rags, like a mop; but it is not generally known that the German word Mops, signifying a pug-dog, was the symbol adopted by a secret society, which arose in Germany in imitation of Freemasonry soon after the condemnation of that society by the Bull of Clement XII. in 1763.
This new society took the Mops for their symbol,
as the dog is noted for fidelity and attachment, and were called Mopses. They had their statutes, signs, pass-words, and ceremonies. They admitted females, who were eligible even to all their offices and dignities, except that of their chief, who was termed Grand Master. F. C. H.

COUTANCES (3rd S. viii. 113, 153.)—I believe that MR. WALCOTT is quite correct in stating that in 1490 Henry VII. procured from Pope Alexander VI. a bull for the annexation of the islands of Guernsey and Jersey to the diocese of Winchester. But what was the effect of this bull? Mr.
Durell, in his edition of Falle's History of Jersey (1837), refers, at p. 435, to an order in council of April 15, 1550—just half a century after the date of the bull—as recognising the authority of the Bishop of Coutances. And MR. WALCOTT himself supposes that the annexation to Winchester was not effected until 1565. If effected at that time, how was it brought about? Was it the queen's doing; and, if so, was it put forward as a new measure, or was it based on the Papal bull? I would also beg to inquire where the Visitation that MR. WALCOTT speaks of was held by the Archbishop of Canterbury in 1578.

NEALE.

"FRAY GERUNDIO" (3rd vii. 430.)—It is true that Fray Gerundio is described by its translator as consisting of one (issued) volume only, and as having another volume still lying perish; but as the two volumes printed 1778 (and which seem to bring the book to a natural termination) are described by Brunet as reprints of the two-volume first edition of 1758, I am inclined to think there may be some mistake in the letter of your correspondent F. W. C.

But this he can readily see by ascertaining if his MS. ends with the fourth chapter of the sixth ffe (sometime of Stearsley) was a cottager at gton in Yorkshire, aged about seventy in 1810."

llington is about four miles from Stearsley. Surtees was an excellent genealogist, and particular in accepting any allegation regarding a pedigree, without good proof of its. And he certainly would never have added any statement into his history without being ed of its correctness. I have always under- that the Radclyffes of Stearsley say, their y did originally come from Ugthorpe, near by, and this is a confirmation of Mr. Sur- statement. They are, and I believe always been, Roman Catholics. J. F. W.

TH SWEETSER (3rd S. viii. 47.)—There are of that name in our neighbourhood, espe- in Reading, Mortimer, and Sulhamstead in hire. Joseph Sweetser keeps a little general at the latter place. I am much interested e Pilgrim Fathers, as some of my family over with Penn, and were Quakers.

JULIA R. BOCKETT.

Iney.

LO EPISCOPARI (3rd S. vii. 42, 306, &c.)—See r's History of Cambridge.

nongst the bishops of this house (Emmanuel) Rich^d worth, fourth master, must not be forgotten, who but w^d not, be bishop of Bristol: not out of covet- s (from wh^b none more free), because so small the ies thereof; or laziness to decline pains, none being aborior in his calling; or scruple of conscience, being more zealous in a certain episcopacy; but for ecret reasons wh^b these troublesome times suggested him. He was a most excellent preacher, both by us life and patient death."

Holdsworth (often called Oldisworth) was Archdeacon of Huntingdon. He was one of prived loyal clergy in 1643-4, and is duly emorated in Walker's Sufferings, &c.; Ward's of the Gresham Professors. His works were by Thos. Fuller, in 1651. See also Fuller's lies of England, "Northumberland."

JUXTA TURRIM.

E OLD MAIDS' SONG (3rd S. viii. 116.)—I a copy of this curious old ballad, written between forty and fifty years ago, but at oment I have not been able to "lay hands ' The version given by A. T. is tolerably t, but he will allow me, I am sure, to supply arse, which is, I believe, the second in the hich I have referred to. It runs thus:—

"We'll petition George the King,
Poor old maidens;
We'll petition George the King,
Poor old maidens!
We'll petition George the King,
A tax upon all men to bring,
For it is a shameful thing
That we should die old maidens."

ften heard this ballad sung in my boyish and the tune, a very plaintive, and as A. T.

says, doleful one, is still fresh in my mind, note for note, as I used to hear it.

L. JEWITT, F.S.A.

Derby.

PRINTED GRANTS OF ARMS (3rd S. vi. 126, 198.) To the lists of printed grants of arms should be added those north country grants (temp. Elizabeth) which are printed in the Appendix to Tonge's Visitation of Yorkshire, published by the Surtees Society. J. WOODWARD.

"AMICUS PLATO," ETC. (1st S. iii. 389, 464, 484; 3rd S. viii. 160.)—These words are not in Cicero, I believe, as stated by Bohn; but are adapted from Aristotle (Nicom. Eth., i. 4), who, speaking of ideas as represented by Plato and Socrates, whose opinions he disputes, adds,—'Ἀμφὶν γὰρ ὄντων φίλου, ὁσίον προτιμᾶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν.' "Although both are dear to me, truth must be preferred" = "Amicus Plato, amicus Socrates, sed magis amica veritas." I doubt if Cicero wrote such Latin: the word amica meaning a courtesan, and giving a ludi- crous and immoral sense to what Cicero rever- enced in the highest degree, "divine philosophy."

T. J. BUCKTON.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

The Poetical Works of William Cowper. With Notes and a Memoir by John Bruce. In Three Volumes. (Bell & Daldy.)

If anything could add to the wide and deserved popu- larity of Cowper's Poems, it would be such an edition of them as has just been issued by Messrs. Bell & Daldy. In the first place, this new Aldine Cowper is printed by Messrs. Whittingham at the Chiswick Press, and is as handsome a book as can be; and in the second and more important place, it has had the advantage of being superintended by a gentleman who has been for years a diligent and admiring student of Cowper's writings; who, while hold- ing, in Cowper's own words—

"True Piety is cheerful as the day," appreciates most fully the purity of his moral and religious teaching, and sympathises most fully with all the poet's best and holiest feelings; yet is at the same time able to season his admiration when Truth demands it, and to point out candidly and distinctly the failings and short- comings of Cowper—the result of his peculiar tempera- ment—and the mistaken judgment of his friends. The admirers of Cowper, on perusing the carefully-written Memoir which Mr. Bruce has prefixed to the present edi- tion of the Poems, and reading anew the painful story of his tangled life, will, we doubt not, share our satisfaction that the Editor, under the conviction "that our know- ledge of facts relating to Cowper is cumulative," deter- mined to put aside the Memoir written by the late Mr. Mitford, and incorporate, in a fresh sketch of the Poet's life, much of the new materials which his own industry and the kindness of a large circle of literary friends has enabled him to collect. We say much, for though very much that is new will be found in Mr. Bruce's sketch, which occupies some two hundred pages, still, as he tells us, the various letters and papers con- nected with the poet which have never seen the light, and with which he has been favoured, would have so extended it, as to have rendered it inconsistent with the size and general character of the present edition. These papers and documents have therefore been reserved for a separate publication. For that separate publication the readers of the present Memoir will look anxiously, and for nothing with greater curiosity and interest, than for any new light which Mr. Bruce may be enabled to throw upon the romantic history of his cousin Theodora's watchful interest and never-changing attachment to the Poet. And here one word to show Mr. Bruce's views on the subject of Cowper's mental alienation: "That Cowper was in the first instance driven mad by over-much religion, which at one time was the prevalent belief; we consider to be certainly a mistake. His madness, it will have been seen, was rather occasioned by want of religion than by excess of it, and the reception of definite views of Christianity, although it did not work his cure, exercised, on his first recovery, a very beneficial effect upon his health both of body and mind." As an Editor of the Poems, Mr. Bruce has exhibited most praiseworthy care in the collation of his text. Those only who have themselves performed similar tasks can tell the amount of time and labour which are expended to trace home the several poems of a writer to their original authorities, and to show how they have grown up under his forming hand. The brief notes in which the readings of the various editions are given tell how conscientiously the Editor's duty in this respect has been fulfilled; while the notes illustrative of the passing allusions which now call for explanation are terse, clear, and intelligent. And we may sum up our notice of these welcome volumes, by asserting our conviction that, while Cowper's poetry has "by its simplicity and ease, and by the purity of its moral and religious teaching, taken its place among English classics," Mr. Bruce's edition of that poetry is clearly destined to take its place among the Standard Editions of such Classics.

Surrey Archaeological Collections relating to the History and Antiquities of the County, published by the Surrey Archaeological Society. Vol. III. (L. Reeve & Co.)

This goodly volume of nearly four hundred pages is very creditable to the body of local antiquaries by whom it has been produced. The papers are not only good in themselves, and sufficiently varied in their character, illustrating, as they do, the Churches of Merstham, Crowhurst, and Chertsey; the Families of Uvedale, Burgh, Bowyer, Duncumb, &c.; the Manor of Kennington, the Old Inns of Southwark, the Mints of Surrey, Surrey Etymologies, and last, though not least, the Visitation of Surrey; but they have the great merit of being one and all strictly confined to local objects—a point too often lost sight of in similar societies. The families, localities, celebrities, and antiquities of Surrey generally are pleasantly treated and well illustrated, and it will be a great reflection upon the county, if its influential men do not support a Society so well calculated to preserve a record of everything connected with Surrey, which ought to be had in remembrance.

Messrs. Longman will shortly publish—"Journal and Correspondence of Miss Berry," edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Lady Theresa Lewis—"Mozart's Letters," edited by Dr. Nohl, translated by Lady Wallace—"Epigrams, Ancient and Modern, Humorous, Witty, Satirical, Moral, and Panegyric," collected and classified by John Booth, B.A., Cantab.

Messrs. Macmillan are about to publish—"An attempt to ascertain the State of Chaucer's Works, as they were left at his Death," with some Notices of their Subsequent History, by Henry Bradshaw of King's College—"Essays on Art: Mulready—Dyce—Holman Hunt—Herbert—Poetry, Prose, and Sensationalism in Art—Sculpture in England—The Albert Cross, &c., by Francis Palgrave Turner, M.A., late Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford—"A Defence of Fundamental Truth," being a Review of the Philosophy of Mr. John Stuart Mill, by James McCosh, LL.D.

Mr. Hotten announces—"History of Signboards from the Earliest Times to the Present Day," with Anecdotes of Famous Taverns, Remarkable Characters, Ancient Marks of Business, Coffee and other Old Houses in the large and small towns up and down the Country, by Jacob Leachwood, assisted by John Camden Hotten—"Christmas Carols," an entirely new Gathering of Ancient and Modern, including several never before given in any Collection; with the Music of the more Popular Religious Carols, edited, with Notes, by William Henry Husk, Librarian to the Sacred Harmonic Society—"Romany in Europe," a Complete History of the Gipsies, since their first appearance among the Nations of the West; with Notices of their Customs, Language, the various Laws enacted, &c. and the Books relating to them, by William Pinkerton, F.S.A., F.A.S.L.

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

LIVES OF THE WARRIORS, by Sir Edward Cust. Part I. Murray, 1863. EUROPEAN MAGAZINE. Vol. XXIII.

LONG LIVERS, 1700. 1722.

 Letters stating particulars and lowest price, carriage free, to be sent to Mr. W. G. Smith, Publisher of "NOTES & QUERIES," 22, Wellington Street, Strand, W.C.

Particulars of Price, &c., of the following Books to be sent direct to the gentleman by whom they are required, whose name and address are given for that purpose:—

PUBLIC RECORDS OF IRELAND: the Inquisitions. The volume called "Ultonia," or any vols.

STONE'S IRISH WARS.

JARDINE'S NATURALIST'S LIBRARY. Original edition. Vols. XXXIX.

and XL. Fishes of Guinea, or vol. XL.

LA PUCELLE, OR THE MAID OF ORLEANS. From the French of Voltaire.

1736-7.

LARDNER'S LECTURES ON LOCKE'S ESSAYS.

BACON'S WORKS, by Spedding. Vols. VI. to IX., or any.

SELECTIONS FROM BACON, by Moffitt.

WARRIOR TRAVELS IN MEXICO. 2 vols.

Wanted by Mr. W. B. Kelly, 8, Grafton Street, Dublin.

Notices to Correspondents.

F. C. H. We are quite sure our Correspondent never intended to use the term Protestant in an offensive sense. It is needless, therefore, to insert his defence of a term which he must know does not occur in the Book of Common Prayer, the Canon, or the Articles of the Church of England.

J. SATIABURY. The late Joseph Hunter published a List of the Commanders of the Army at Lyincourt, 1850, 12mo.

A. N. The Widow of the Wood, 1755, 8vo, is by Benjamin Victor.—A World without Souls, 1806, 12mo, by the Rev. J. W. Cunningham.

HIMMELREICH. A Bandy-Beggar was a kind of bridle kept in many parishes to take up or chase away mendicants from the locality.

BOOTH. Mrs. Plunket was a lady passionately fond of low proceeding, as noticed in Wycherley's Plain Dealer.

J. CLEMENT. The Horric Knife was named from Col. James Smith, who resided in Louisiana, but was by birth a Georgian. He was a man of daring, and of great muscular powers.

R. C. Raid, or rule, a hostile incursion, "properly (says Jamieson) of the equestrian kind," is derived by that author from the A.-S. raed, rule, and the verb raidan, to ride. Conf. in old English raid and rule. "Whither smyk ye a rule to-day."

R. INGLIS. The Table of Contents to C. Goudal's Poems and Translations, 1850, makes nearly six pages.

GIORGIO PALESTRINA. For the Latin original of the hymn "Jerusalem the Golden," see our last volume, p. 253.

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d., or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 8d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STAMPS COPIES for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 12s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. SMITH, 22, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all COMMUNICATIONS FOR THE EDITOR should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1865.

CONTENTS.—N^o 194.

NOTES:—Chaucer's Tabard, 221—Devonshire Household Tales, &c., 222—The Cattle Disease, 1765, 1865, 223—Hamilton Family, 224—William Williams, Archdeacon of Cashel, 176.—Fly-leaves—Sir Henry Raeburn—Miracle of St. Bernard—Curious Hindoo Custom: Rain Charm—Hydrophobia—Wasps—Ariosto's Account Book—Chalker, London Slaug for Milkman, 225.

QUERIES:—Bagatelle—Barbarossa, the Corsair—Rev. James Chalmers, D.D.—Campbells of Skeldon, Ayrshire—Douay Bible—Epigram on Bishop Pretymann, Tomline's Translation—Ex-Queens and Queen Dowagers—Foreign Territorial Divisions—The Guelphs and Gibellins—Bishop Hall's Clock—Heraldic—Jacob's Blessing on Nephtali (or Naphtali)—Lizars—Admiral Thomas Mathew—Medal for the Battle of Milbally—General Wm. Maxwell—Barone Norel—Ogilvy of Ardoch—Quotations wanted—Tyrian Purple in America, 226.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Horace, Edit. 1712-13—Sir Elijah Impey, Knt.—"Two Pair" or "Two Pairs"—Authors wanted, 229.

REPLIES:—Letters of Junius, 230—Curious Decoration, 233—Salmon and Apprentices, 234—The Templars in Scotland, 176.—Samuel Drummond's Pictures—The Mystic Ladder: The Mystic Rose—Lich-gate or Churchyard Porch Superstition—Civic Companies of Brussels—Raphael's Madonnas—Curious Names—Ash—Short Drinks—Jewish Letters—The Earl of Poverty—"So much the Worse for the Facts"—Harrogate in 1700—Silver Cup—Browne, Viscount Montague—Cue—Boston, a Flower—Quarterings—Regimental Costume—Fires, how anciently kindled—Sulists, Crutches, Oxtersticks—Luther on Eshcol—Macaulay and the Younger Pitt, 235.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

CHAUCER'S TABARD.

With reference to the threatened demolition of the old Tabard, or Talbot, Inn, at Southwark, and the appeal that has been made for its preservation, I observe in a local paper, the South London Chronicle, a paragraph in which the antiquity of the building is called in question:—

"A Parliamentary Return of the date of 1634," says the writer, "mentions 'the inn called the Talbut, a newe building of brick, built upon an old foundation, about six yeares past, by Mr. William Garford, landlord thereof, and Mr. William Chafey'; and what (if any) of the ancient Tabard remained then in existence was probably burned in 1676. To dedicate the Talbot Inn to the memory of Chaucer would be to preserve a building of which scarcely a brick has come down to us from Chaucer's time."

The writer of this paragraph is clearly mistaken in his inferences. The building that was erected in 1628 was obviously the house over the gateway facing the High Street, and stretching some way down the yard to the right and left. It could not have been the building at the back of the yard—that which contains what is called "The Pilgrims' Room"—because the latter is not built of brick, but of timber. This is the part of the house which is generally supposed to be in some measure the same as the famous inn to which Chaucer referred. I am not qualified to speak authoritatively on the subject; but I think I may safely assert that the range of timber buildings facing the visitor as he stands with his back to the High Street is older than the year 1628. The external gallery and staircase belong to an earlier period. Mr. William Garford and Mr. William Chafey, according to the Parliamentary Return, built their new inn of brick, for by the time of Charles I. that had become the ordinary material for London houses; but, as I have said, the most ancient part of the Talbot is constructed of wood, after the fashion of the Plantagenet and Tudor reigns. Then we are told that, if any of the old Chaucerian Tabard remained after the rebuilding of 1628, it was "probably burned in 1676." It is true that in that year Southwark was visited by a fire of great magnitude, in which, unquestionably, a portion of the Tabard was destroyed. The building at the back of the yard, however, could hardly have been included in the destruction, for assuredly that style of domestic architecture had utterly passed away by the time of Charles II., and the structure now remaining must therefore be referred to an antecedent age. The house over the gateway, which contains the existing inn, was very probably built after the fire of 1676, and no assertion of antiquity is made on its behalf. But the timber building—though possibly that too was partially reconstructed in the alterations and additions made, according to Speght, by "Master J. Preston," toward the close of Elizabeth's reign—seems to be veritably connected with Chaucer's era, and is therefore a legitimate object of regard to students of old English literature.

Can any of your readers throw additional light on this very interesting question? And would it not be as well if some architect, skilled in the archæology of his craft, were to examine the old building, and give us the result of his observations? The inn is to be pulled down in about two years from the present time, that warehouses may be erected on its site. Such a fate would be regrettable; and I appeal to the literary men and antiquaries of England to avert it, if possible.

EDMUND OLLIER.

Perhaps the following, which appears in the columns of the London Review of August 26, may be worth preserving in the columns of "N. & Q." :—

"THE SIGN OF FIVE CENTURIES.—The last number of All the Year Round contains an article from which we learn that the Tabard, or Talbot Inn, at Southwark, celebrated as the scene of the introduction to Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, is to be pulled down in about two years, at the expiration of the existing lease, in order that a 'pile of warehouses' may be built on the site. This is sad news for all lovers of early English literature—indeed for all who love to preserve our few remaining relics of old times and half-forgotten manners

The writer asks: Will the literary men and the antiquarians of England suffer such a loss, without at least making an effort to avert it? There is time enough for the attempt, and time in itself is a great auxiliary. We have saved Shakespeare's house at Stratford, let us do our best to save Chaucer's house at Southwark. Unquestionably it will be a disgrace to the country, if the old Tabard is destroyed without some more urgent necessity than the building of a pile of warehouses. According to the same article, the White Hart, close to the Tabard—a house mentioned in Shakspeare's Henry VI., and famous as the scene of the first introduction of Sam Weller to Mr. Pickwick—has been demolished within the last few weeks. We have recently lost many of these curious old buildings, and we can hardly afford to part with the most interesting of all."

I may add that, as the lease of the old Tabard was sold by auction on the 9th of June last at Garraway's Coffee House, 'Change Alley, Cornhill, by Messrs. Rushworth, Jarvis, & Abbott, of Saville Row, Regent Street and Change Alley, Cornhill, it is to be feared that we shall lose this old relic; but I think, before it is taken down, the Corporation should have a model taken and have it preserved in the Guildhall Library. It may also be worth noting that the building materials of the old Spread Eagle Inn, in Gracechurch Street, were sold by auction on the 29th ultimo, and the workmen have commenced pulling it down; but it is to be hoped that a photograph has been taken, or some drawing preserved of this inn, which was I believe one of the oldest in London. A. II.

DEVONSHIRE HOUSEHOLD TALES.—No. II.

III. JACK HANNAFORD.

There was an old soldier, who had been long in the wars—so long that he was quite out at elbows, and he did not know where to go to find a living. So he walked up moors, down glens, till at last he came to a farm from which the good man had gone away to market. The wife of the farmer was a very foolish woman; the farmer was foolish enough too, and it is hard to say which of the two was the most foolish. When you've heard my tale, then you may decide. Now, before the farmer goes to market says he to his wife, "Here is ten pound all in gold, take care of it till I come home."

If the man had not been a fool he would never have given the money to his wife to keep. Well, he went off in his cart to market, and the wife said to herself "I will keep the ten pound quite safe from thieves;" so she tied it up in a rag, and she put the rag up the parlour chimney.

"There!" said she, "no thieves will ever find it now, that is quite sure."

Jack Hannaford, the old soldier, came and rapped at the door.

"Who is there?" asked the wife.

"Jack Hannaford."

"Where do you come from?"

"Paradise."

"Lord a' mercy! and may be you've seen my old man there," alluding to her former husband.

"Yes, I have."

"And how was he a-doing?" asked the goody.

"But middling; he cobbles old shoes, and he has nothing but cabbage for victuals."

"Deary life!" exclaimed the woman. "Didn't he send a message to me?"

"Yes, he did," replied Jack Hannaford; "he said that he was out of leather, and his pockets were empty; so you was to send him a few shillings to buy a fresh stock of leather."

"He shall have them, bless his poor soul!"

And away went the wife to the parlour chimney, and she pulled the rag with the ten pounds in it from the chimney, and she gave the whole of the sum to the soldier, telling him that her old man was to use as much as he wanted, and to send back the rest.

It was not long that Jack waited after he had received the money. He went off as fast as he could walk.

Presently the farmer came home and asked for his money. The wife told him that she had sent it by a soldier to her former husband in Paradise to buy him leather for cobbling the shoes of the saints and angels of heaven. The farmer was very angry, and he swore that he had never met with such a fool as his wife. But the wife said that her husband was a greater fool for letting her have the money.

There was no time to waste words; so the farmer mounted his horse, and rode after Jack Hannaford. The old soldier heard the horse-hoofs clattering on the road behind him, so he knew it must be the farmer pursuing him. He lay down on the ground, and shading his eyes with one hand, looked up into the sky, and pointed heavenwards with the other hand.

"What are you about there?" asked the farmer, pulling up.

"Lord save you!" exclaimed Jack, "I've seen a rare sight!"

"What was that?"

"A man going straight up into the sky, as if he were walking on a road!"

"Can you see him still?"

"I can."

"Where?"

"Get off your horse, and lie down."

"If you will hold the horse."

Jack did so readily.

"I cannot see him," said the farmer.

"Shade your eyes with your hand, and you'll soon see a man flying away from you."

Sure enough he did so; for Jack leaped on the horse, and rode away with it. The farmer walked home without his horse.

"You are a bigger fool than I am," said the wife; "for I did only one foolish thing, and you have done two."

This is undoubtedly the same story as "Not a Pin to choose between them," in Norse Tales. A similar story is found, with variations, in collections of German household tales. It is told also in Wenzig's West Slavonic Märchenschatz, p. 41. It gives a glimpse of the curious semi-pagan ideas of heaven, which reign among the peasantry.

IV. SIR FRANCIS DRAKE AND THE DEVILS.

Sir Francis Drake, the great navigator, determined to build a large mansion for himself at Buckland Monachorum. He brought masons and builders from Plymouth, Exeter, and Tavistock; and they worked hard, squaring stones and setting them in mortar: so that the walls rose in one day six feet from the foundation.

Next morning every stone was removed from its place, and carried to a great distance.

The great Sir Francis Drake was very angry, but he could not tell who had done the mischief; so he ordered the builders to recommence their work, and they built till they had raised the walls to the same level. Next morning every stone was removed. So then Sir Francis determined to find out who had done this. The builders worked as before, and at night Sir Francis hid himself in a tree and watched.

At midnight, the earth opened; and out came a multitude of little black devils, chattering and laughing. They set to work at the stones of Buckland Monachorum House; and they carried them away with the greatest ease, and all the walls were demolished before cockcrow.

Next day the workmen builded as before, and raised the walls for the fourth time. Sir Francis in the evening dressed himself all in white, and climbed into a tree. Presently the earth opened, and out came the little black devils, chattering and laughing. Sir Francis let them come with a load of stones under the tree; and then he flapped his arms, and cried out very loud "Kikkeriki!" And the devils looked up, and saw the great white bird (as they thought him) sitting crowing in the tree; and they dropped all the stones and ran away, screaming with fright, thinking the end of the world had come.

This story seems to be a fragment of an old household tale, which has suffered anthropomorphism. It was probably told of some Fearless Jack long before Sir Francis Drake was born. The little devils are undoubtedly Trolls or Dwarfs. I am not sure that I have got a correct, or a complete version of the story, as it was obtained from a half-witted fellow; who told it me one day, near Buckland, whilst I was engaged in opening a tumulus.

S. BARING-GOULD.

Horbury, Wakefield.

THE CATTLE DISEASE, 1765, 1865.

"No Christian bull, or cow, they say,
But takes it out of hand;
And we shall have no cows at all,
I fear within this land.

"The Doctors, though they've spoken all,
Like learned gentlemen,
And told us how the entrails look
Of cattle, red or green,

"Yet they can nothing do at all,
With all their learned store;
So heav'n pray take this plague away,
And vex us not no more."

I have taken this from the Wits' Magazine, a rather low publication of the last century. It is there stated that the hymn, or dirge, was actually sung at a church in the west of England during the prevalence of the great murrain of the last century. It is added that the clergyman, on coming out of church, inquired whose psalm or hymn that was; "surely it was not one of David's psalms?" To which the clerk replied, "No, Sir; King David never made such a psalm as that in his life; that is one of my own making, Sir."

This murrain of the eighteenth century must have been a serious affair, since it was thought worthy of mention in a king's speech on opening parliament—a circumstance which is thus commented upon by Junius:—

"Yet while the whole kingdom was anxiously agitated with expectation on one great point, you merely evaded the question; and, instead of the explicit firmness and decision of a king, gave us nothing but the misery of a ruined grazier, and the whining piety of a methodist."—Letter to the Duke of Grafton.

To make the matter more ridiculous, it was said that, when mention was made, in the speech, of horned cattle, the Duke of Grafton and another peer, who had both recently experienced the infidelity of their wives, bowed to each other.

The ancients had a notion that the plague or pestilence usually first attacked the "lower animals," and afterwards extended its ravages to the human kind. Thus Homer (Iliad, a. 50) says of the plague in the Grecian camp—

Οὐρῆας μὲν πρῶτον ἐπέχετο, καὶ κύνας ἀργυροῦς.

"On mules and dogs th' infection first began,
And last the dire contagion fixed on man;"

where it is remarkable that Pope employs the words "infection" and "contagion" as synonymous. Probably the difference between them had not been so clearly explained as we believe it has been in our days.

I do not know, and cannot stop to inquire, whether the same circumstance has been observed in connection with other plagues recorded in history. I allude particularly to the plague at Athens in the time of Pericles; to the pestilence called the Black Death in the fourteenth century; and to the plague at Marseilles in 1720, which, however, is now pronounced to have been only a modification of typhus; so at least says Gibbon.

I have a suspicion that the "Dirge" is to be found in another publication of the same century, but anterior to the Wits' Magazine, perhaps in the Tutler. W. D.

HAMILTON FAMILY.

The following notices of the Hamilton (Baronets) family of Castle Conyngham, co. Donegal, Ireland, from the title-deeds of that estate, may be useful to any future compiler of extinct baronetages:—

"xvii. Sir James Cuninghame of Glengarnock —, having got into pecuniary difficulties, Sir James assigned in 1609 the lands of Glengarnock (note, In Ayrshire, parish of Kilbernie) in behoof of his creditors, and went to Ireland, where he has got a grant of 12,000 acres of land from King James VI." (Note to above—"As late as 1615 . . . he appears to have still remained in Scotland.")

"xviii. John Cuninghame . . . with the view of recovering the wadset lands of Boquhan, he sold the lands of Crawfield . . . The deed of sale was dated at Castle Cuninghame, Ireland, the penult day of January, 1643." Patterson's Ayrshire Families, vol. ii. pp. 119, 120.

"Sir John Cuninghame, who was seised by virtue of a grant from King Charles the First of the manor of Castle Cuninghame, containing several denominations of land situate in the county Donegal, left issue two daughters, the eldest of which intermarried with Col. William Cuninghame, and left issue by him only one son Henry Cuninghame. Henry died before the revolution, and left issue only one daughter named Ann. The said Ann at the age of 12 years ran off from a boarding school with and married the Rev. Mr. Andrew Hamilton."

"The younger daughter of Sir John Cuninghame, the Patentee, died unmarried."

"1710. The eldest son of said Andrew and Ann was born in this year and named Henry."

"1725. The said Ann died, leaving issue the said Henry her eldest son, and several other children, sons and daughters."

One daughter married Peter Benson, Esq., of Birdstown, and "died in 1801, aged 70 years." —(Obituary of Derry Journal Newspaper of that date.

"The said Henry Hamilton, afterwards created Sir Henry Hamilton, died in or about the year 1781 without issue." [1775 or 1776. See documents referred to below.] Case for the Opinion of Beresford Burston, Esq., signed by him 4 April 1789.

Judgement in Court of King's Bench, Trinity Term, 1775. Bateson against "Henry Hamilton, of Castle Conyngham, in the County of Londonderry, Esquier." [Londonderry an error for Donegal.]

21 May, 1776. Lease from "Sir Henry Hamilton of Castle Conyngham, in the county of Donegal, Baronet."

1789. "Dame Mariamne Hamilton, of Cutts, in the county of Londonderry, widow and relict of Sir Henry Hamilton, Baronet, deceased," signs agreement of sale of to James Law of Portland Place and Canon Hill, Esq.

1783. Lease from "Dame Mariamne Hamilton, of Castle Roe, in the county of Londonderry, universal devisee of all the real and personal estate of Sir Henry Hamilton, of Castle Conyngham, in the county Donegal, Baronet, deceased."

1810. Major Law recovers a receipt from the agent of "the Representatives of the late Dame Mariamne Hamilton," for balance of purchase money.

In the deeds in my possession, Mrs. Benson left a daughter who married Colonel Richard Charlton, who assumed the name of Maxwell; and her descendants are now in possession of the Benson estates. CHEVROX.

N.B. No arms of either Conyngham or Hamilton are attached. The seals bear a female bust, or the arms of the land-agent Thomson.

WILLIAM WILLIAMS, ARCHDEACON OF CASHEL.

Very little appears to be known about this divine, inasmuch as Archdeacon Cotton, in his Festi Ecclesie Hibernice, vol. i. p. 54, has given merely the following brief particulars of one who preceded him in the archdeaconry of Cashel:—

"1692. William Williams, a scholar of T. C. D. [having been elected in the year 1679] appears. He died in 1693."

I lately visited the old parish church of Leixlip, in the diocese of Dublin; and while looking after monumental inscriptions, as I am wont to do in such places, I found a flat stone in the aisle with these words upon it:—

"Depositio Deborae Relictæ Gu. Williams Archidiacon. Cassel. Sororis Narcissi Aepi Dub. Quæ Decessit 24 Mar. 1695, æt. 65."

This proves a family connection between Archdeacon Williams and the worthy and esteemed Narcissus Marsh, D.D., who, having been Archbishop of Cashel for four years, 1690-1694, was promoted to the Archbishopric of Dublin, and subsequently to that of Armagh. The archbishop, I may observe, for some time occupied an old fashioned house at Leixlip, which is still very commonly known as "the Archbishop's Palace," but is divided into several small tenements.

In the aisle of Leixlip church there is another flat stone, with the following inscription:—

"Here are deposited the Remains of Doctor Arthur Price, Lord Archbishop of Cashel, who died the 17th of July, 1752, aged 74."

Archdeacon Cotton mentions his death at Celbridge, and his burial in Leixlip church, adding (without any reference to the foregoing inscription) that "a monumental stone was raised to him at Cashel, which still lies in St. John's churchyard."

There are some other inscriptions in the church (which has been greatly improved within the last few years, mainly through the liberality of the present good rector of the parish) and in the surrounding graveyard, which certainly are worthy of being transcribed. ABHRA.

FLY LEAVES.—On a blank leaf at the end of a copy of Camden's Remaines, 1614, 4to, occur the following, which are presumed to be unpublished:—

"In John Pinner.

"Here lies John Pinner—O ungentle death!
Why didst thou robbe John Pinner of his breth?
For livinge he, by scrapinge of a pinne,
Made better dust than thou can'st make of him."

"Here lieth the Cobler, John Wether, Whose soale death hath ripte from his upper lether!"

"Here lieth he the which } lived long and died riche. }

Death and an honest Cobler fell at bate,
And findeinge him neare worne needles would translate.
He was a trusty soule, and time hatte beene
He would well liker'd go through thicke and thinne.
Death putt a tricke vpon him, and what was't?
The cobler call'd for's alle; Death brought his laste.
'Twas not vprightly done to cutte his threade,
Whoe mended more and more till hee was deade;
But since hee's gone, here's all that can be saide, Honest Jack Cobler here is vnderlaide."

"Vpon a Locke-Smithe.

"A zealus lock-smithe died of late,
Who is by this at heaven's gate.
The reason is he will not knocke,
Because hee meanes to picke the locke."

"Vpon Mr. Pricke, M. of Artes of Christ's Colledge, in Cambridge.

"The one and 20th * of November
Christ's Colledge lost a
Cupid and Death shotte both at one nicke;
Cupid the marke mist, but Death hitt the pricke."

W. CAREW HAZLITT.

SIR HENRY RÆBURN.—In Chambers's History of Peebleshire, strange to say, amongst the numerous Hays mentioned, no notice occurs of the Rev. John Hay, minister of Peebles about 1720-40, and whose daughter and sole heiress, Ann, married, and had a daughter Anne, who became the wife of Sir Henry Ræburn, the celebrated portrait painter. As the latter has been considered sufficiently eminent to be classed with "Scottish Worthies," I hope that this note may not be unacceptable. SP.

MIRACLE OF ST. BERNARD.—Perhaps the following extract from Caxton's Game of the Chesse, the first work printed in England, will prove of interest to the readers of "N. & Q.:"—

"Hit happend on a tyme that saynt bernard rode on an hors about the contrey and mette with an hasardour or dyse player, which sayd to hym thou goddes man wilt thou playe at dyse with me thyn hors ayenst my sowle, to whom saynt bernard answered yf thou wylt oblyge thy sowle to me ayenst my hors, I wyl a lyght down and playe with the, and yf thou haue mo poyntes than I on thre dyse I promyse the thou shalt haue myn hors, and then he was glad, and anone caste thre dyse; and on eche dyse was a six, whiche made xviiiij poyntes, and anone he took the hors by the brydel as he that was seure that he had wonne, and sayd that the hors was his. And than saynt bernard sayd abyde my sone, for there be mo poyntes on the dyse than xviiiij, and than he cast the dyse in suche wyse that one of the iij dyse clefte asondre in the myddes, and on that one parte was vi, and on that other side an aas, and eche of that other was a sise. And than saynt bernard sayd that he had wonne his sowle for as moche as he cast on thre dyse xix poyntes. And than whan this player sawe and apercevyd this myracle, he gaf his sowle to saynt bernard and became a monke, and fynysshed his lyf in good werkys."—The fourth traytye, cap. viij.

* Corrected by the original writer from the fifteenth, which word has been scored out.

CHARLES STEWART.

CURIOUS HINDOO CUSTOM: RAIN CHARM.—The following paragraph from the Bengal Hurkaru of July 15th, recording a singular custom practised by the natives when desirous of rain "in due season," is worth preservation in "N. & Q.:"—

"At last the bursat has set in in the valley of the Ganges, to the unspeakable comfort and content of the ryots. Great fears were entertained in many districts of the Upper Provinces that the rain would come too late to be of use. The heat and drought were most severe. Men and animals drooped under it, and the fields presented a spectacle that raised the gaunt spectre of an impending famine to the fearful gaze of the ryot. Rain was not only longed for, it was prayed for. The pundits and moulvies were called into the service, and muntras and belts were read with intense but unavailing fervour. Finding the efforts of the priests fail them, the ryots next had recourse to an ancient and somewhat singular custom. At night all the women of many of the villages walked naked to some neighbouring tank or stream, and there with songs and invocations sought to propitiate the offended heavens, and to induce the gods to send them rain. This device was also without immediate effect, and despair and gloom were fast settling down upon the hearts of the peasantry, when the sky was overspread with clouds, and the rain came down in earnest."

The rites here mentioned seem to be somewhat analogous to those practised, for the same purpose, by the "medicine-men" among the North American Indians. WILLIAM KELLY.

Leicester.

HYDROPHOBIA.—In the parish register of Swettenham, Cheshire, is the following:—

"1704. To cure the Bite of a Mad Dog or Cat. (A receipt of Mr. Troutback's, and to be found in the church book of Northalerton).

"Take six ounces of rue, small sliced, four ounces of Garlic stampd and pild, four ounces of Mithridate or Venice treacle, four ounces of Syrrupe, or filde or scrapt pure english tin or pewter; boyle these in five pints of old ail on a gentle fire for an hour, then strain it, and keep the liquor in a glass or close vessel.

"And thus you are to use this medicine:—To a man that is bit you are to give 8 or 9 spoonfulls warm in a morning fasting, and apply every day some of the ingredients which remain after the liquor is strained off to the wound; but give it cold to beasts—to a sheep 8 spoonfulls, to a dog 4, to a horse or a cow between 16 and 18, and they must be given seven or eight days together after the bite.

"If you add a handfull of ash-coloured liverwort to this receipt, it hath been found an excellent thing; it grows on all dry grounds."

B. L. V.

WASPS.—I should much like information, and many others will, I am sure, partake in the same wish, relative to the very remarkable absence of wasps the whole of this season. The readers of "N. & Q." who are acquainted with natural history may perhaps be enabled to account for it, and at all events the subject is well worth inquiry. Here some of the inhabitants have seen none of these troublesome, and sometimes well-remembered, creatures. I have only seen two. I believe they kill a good many flies; but here the flies have not been more numerous than usual. Female wasps were very plentiful in the spring. Bees have been abundant among the fruit—not a wasp visible. FRANCIS TRENCH.

Islip Rectory, Oxford.

ARIOSTO'S ACCOUNT BOOK.—Please preserve the accompanying in "N. & Q.:"—

"In Modena a treasure has been discovered in the form of an account book, with double entries, kept by that most chivalrous and humorous of Accountants-General, Ariosto. The register commences with the year 1522, and terminates with the 15th of May, 1525, and is all in the handwriting of him who sang of Orlando, that most conspicuous and celebrated among the people 'reputed to be very sensible, yet gone furiously mad from sheer love.' This trouaille is bound in parchment, and contains nineteen leaves, each of which bears the ducal stamp of the House of Este."—Aug. 29, 1865.

K. P. D. E.

CHALKER, LONDON SLANG FOR MILKMAN.—A few days since I had planned a day's excursion for my family into the country. On my wife expressing to the nursemaid her fears that the weather would be bad, "Yes," said the girl, "the chalker—I beg pardon, ma'am, I mean the milkman—said it would rain all day." This expressive synonym for a London milkman has never, I believe, yet found its way into any slang dictionary.

JUXTA TURRIM.

Queries.

BAGATELLE.—Can any of your readers give any particulars respecting the game of Bagatelle? There is no denying that it is now and has been for some years a most popular game, and yet none of the books of games upon which I can lay my hands contain more than the rules how to play it. Strutt never mentions it at all. It is certainly an offshoot from Billiards, but its introduction must have a date. Perhaps some light might be thrown upon the date of its introduction if any of your correspondents could tell when government first imposed a licence upon inn-keepers keeping a bagatelle-board. SELLOC.

BARBAROSSA, THE CORSAIR.—Did Horac d' Mytilene, better known as the Corsair Barbarossa, sack Fondi in the spring or autumn of 1535? Is that event, with its attendant circumstances, recorded by Muratori? From what authors do we learn most on the subject? NOELL RADECLIFFE.

REV. JAMES CHALMERS, D.D.—Can any of your Oxford or Cambridge correspondents inform me by reference to the Matriculation Book, respecting the college, parentage, and place of early education of the Rev. James Chalmers, D.D., born at — 1684, rector of Little Waltham, Essex, and buried at Wickham, St. Paul's, near Halstead, in the same county? JOHN RICHARDSOX.

12, St. Helen's Place, Bishopsgate Street.

CAMPBELLS OF SKELDON, AYRESHIRE.—Inquiry is made for any further information, or clue to it, as to the descent of this family than that afforded by Robertson's Ayrshire Families, and Patterson's History of the County of Ayr, particularly, to enable the pedigree to be traced of George Campbell, who, about the middle of the eighteenth century, is described as late of Skeldon, merchant in Ayr, whose wife was Helen, and whose daughter Agnes, born 1712, was married to Robert Dobie or Dobbie of Ayr. This George Campbell was alive in 1770.

The Campbells of Skeldon were a direct branch of the Loudon Campbells, and Charles Campbell Junior de Skeldoun is ranked fourth in succession in a deed of entail, which Hugh, first Lord Loudoun, executed in 1613, seeing no male issue of his son. Lady Margaret Campbell, however, his granddaughter, became Baroness Loudon, and Sir John Campbell of Lavers, her husband, was created Earl of Loudoun, from whom descended, through Flora, Countess of Loudoun, the titles of Loudoun to their present possessor the Marquis of Hastings. The only present representatives of the Campbells of Skeldon are said to be the descendants of the above-named Robert Dobie. Address, if not by "N. & Q.," F. J. J., box No. 62, post office, Derby.

DOUAY BIBLE.—I wish to be informed in reference to the English version so called—1. Where I can obtain an account of the editions of it? 2. When and by whom it has been from time to time revised? 3. Which text or edition is considered the standard? 4. What official ecclesiastical sanctions any or all the revisions have received? B. H. C.

EPIGRAM ON BISHOP PRETTYMAN, TOMLINE'S TRANSLATION.—This prelate, as is well known, always professed a great aversion to changes amongst his clergy. On his own profitable exchange of the see of Lincoln for Winchester, a clever epigram was written, bringing out the marked contradiction between the bishop's preaching and practice. What were the exact words? They justify "promotion" on the plea of a "true translation." I should be grateful to any of your correspondents for the complete epigram.

JOSEPHUS.

EX-QUEENS AND QUEEN DOWAGERS. — What is the difference between these two titles? Is not an ex-queen a queen who is deposed, and a queen dowager the widow of a king? Why, then, are writers beginning to confuse the two to such an extent that The Times informed us not very long ago that the "ex-Queen of Prussia," and the "ex-Queen of Saxony" had been travelling in various parts of the continent. I understand who is meant by the "ex-Queen of Naples," that kingdom having been conquered by another king; but I am not aware of any conquest of Prussia nor revolution therein, and the "ex-Queen of Prussia" is therefore beyond my comprehension. I saw also the other day in a newspaper mention of the "ex-Queen of the Sandwich Isles." Will newspaper writers look in their dictionaries?

HERMENTRUDE.

FOREIGN TERRITORIAL DIVISIONS. — Can any of your readers kindly inform me where I can obtain in a brief form the following information? —

1. The names of all the departments which collectively formed the first French Empire, at the period of its greatest extent.

2. Those of all other states, Regal or Republican, wherein the same territorial divisions were adopted during the same period; namely, in Germany, including the Confederation of the Rhine, the Kingdom of Italy, and its several republics at various periods; Switzerland, Spain, the Batavian Republic, the Kingdom of Holland, &c. &c.

N. J. B.

THE GUELPHS AND GIBELLINS. — What is the best source of information connected with these two celebrated factions that desolated Italy and Germany for so many years? You may also be able to inform me what is the origin of the term Gibellino, or Gibellini, to use the Italian form.

J. DALTON.

Norwich.

BISHOP HALL'S CLOCK. — Some four or five years since, on entering a loft in a coal wharf in this town, my attention was drawn to an antique clock silently standing on a bracket, and begrimed with dust and dirt. It was without a case; the pendulum and weight uncovered like a Dutch clock; the bell formed a dome above. It had the inscription, "William Allmand in Louthberry fesitt." The grimy tenant of the loft told me that it was the property of his employer, and that it went by the name of "Bishop Hall's clock."

On account of its ancient look I bought it of the owner, and received it with the following history. It was formerly in the possession of the Rev. Robt. Walker of South Winnow, in Cornwall, and was valued by its owner as "Bishop Hall's clock." After Mr. Walker's death his household goods were sold, and this clock was then purchased by the coal merchant.

I subsequently found that this Mr. Walker was a descendant of Hall, the famous Bishop of Exeter, and afterwards of Norwich. The Walkers, several of whom were men of mark in Cornwall, came of a gentle family long resident in the city of Exeter, members of which had represented their native place in parliament for many generations. Sir Thomas Walker, Knt., married Mary, the only daughter of the youngest son of that distinguished prelate. The vicar of South Winnow was a great-grandson of the before-mentioned Sir Thomas Walker.

I put a question to your casuistical readers—whether I am warranted, from this curious concatenation of fact and tradition, in calling my curious clock a veritable relic of the great Bishop Hall?

THOMAS Q. COUCH.

Bodmin.

HERALDIC. — A.'s ancestors have been gentlemen for six generations but do not appear to have borne arms. They married, however, most of them coheiresses of ancient and noble families. If A. applies for, and receives a grant of arms at the present time, would either the English or Scotch Heralds' College sanction his quartering the arms of the coheiresses above-mentioned with his own? I am particularly anxious to know both the English and Scotch practice.

REIDMANTON.

Where shall I find the arms of the English, French, Dutch, and Spanish colonies?

W. M. M.

JACOB'S BLESSING ON NEPHTALI (OR NAPH-TALI). — With reference to the passage in Genesis xlix. 21, containing the blessing of Jacob on his son Nephtali, I should be glad to receive a few remarks from any of your biblical scholars. The Authorised Version gives the following translation: "Naphtali is a hind let loose; he giveth goodly words." The Douay Version renders the passage thus: "Naphtali, a hart let loose, and giving words of beauty," according to the Vulgate, which has—"Nephtali, Cervus emissus, et dans eloquium pulcritudinis." Luther's translation runs thus: "Naphtali ist ein schneller Hirsch, und giebt schöne Rede." But Herder's is different—"Naphtali ist eine schießende Terebinthe, die schöne Wipfel wirft." (Der Geist der Hebräischen Poesie. P. ii. S. 205.) But as Bochart, in his Hierozoicon (lib. iii. cap. xviii.) gives a new translation altogether, considering that the present Hebrew text has not been pointed correctly by the Masorites, will you inform me if his version has been followed by the greater part of our modern commentators? The LXX. appear to have translated from a text different from the Hebrew now in use, for they render the passage thus: "Νεφθαλειμ στέλεχος ἀνεμένον ἐπιδίδους ἐν τῷ γεννήματι κάλλος." Rosenmüller, Houbigant, Lowth, and Michaelis seem inclined to adopt Bochart's version. J. DALTON.

LIZARS.—Was there ever any engraved portrait of the well-known engraver of this name published, or engraved portraits of any of the name? F. M. S.

229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

ADMIRAL THOMAS MATHEW.—I have recently seen in the United Service Journal for November, 1846, a very well written life of the gallant and ill-used Admiral Thomas Mathew, whose name is so pertinaciously mis-spelt Mathews in English historical works. The writer deduces the admiral's descent from Elvorch, Lord of Torkelyn in Anglesea, of the royal blood of Britain, who settled in Glamorgan shortly before the invasion of the Norman knights, and states that a full pedigree was then before him.

I should be extremely glad to be favoured with a sight of this pedigree, as Welsh genealogists generally name Gwaithvoed the Great, Prince of Cardigan and Gwent, as the founder of the family. G. MATHEW.

Junior United Service Club, London, S.W.

MEDAL FOR THE BATTLE OF MILBALLY.—Joseph Cain, whose petition to the War Office is given ante, p. 167, says: "I wear a medal for the battle of Milbally, fought in the year 1797." Can any correspondent give an accurate description of the medal and colour of the ribbon worn with it? GIBSON.

GENERAL WM. MAXWELL.—Can any of your readers give me any particulars of General Wm. Maxwell of the United States army of 1775 to 1780? From a search made at the Record Office it appears that a person of the same name lived in North Carolina in 1774, the year before the war broke out. Was this Wm. Maxwell of North Carolina the person that figures in the history of the War of Independence? WM. MAXWELL.

Elswick Ordnance Works, Newcastle.

BARONE NOREL.—What house, and where situated in London, was the Casa del Barone Norel mentioned in the History of the Jesuits by Father Bartoli? FITZ.

* His translation of the Hebrew text, with an alteration of the vowels and one or two letters, is this: "Naphthali is a well-spread tree (Terebinthus), which puts out beautiful branches." Naphthali est Terebinthus putula, sive ramosa, edens ramos pulchros. (See Rosenmüller's Scholia in Genesis, cap. xlix. 21, Lipsie, 1795.)

OGILVY OF ARDOCH.—Walter Ogilvy of Ardoch and James his son are mentioned in the parish register of Cullen, Banffshire, in 1734, along with the Earl of Findlater, and appear to have been relations of the earl. I shall be glad of any information as to the descent of these persons. F. M. S.

229, Clarendon Villas, Plumstead.

QUOTATIONS WANTED.—Whence come the following lines, and what are the "ten thousand" "tossing their heads in sprightly dance?"—

"Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle in the milky way,
They stretch in never-ending line
Along the margin of the bay;
Ten thousand saw I at a glance
Tossing their heads in sprightly dance."

E. B.

"Lives there a man whose servile breast
Is sunk in slav'ry's fatal rest?"

Lives such a man?—I will not ask
What country gave him birth:
He could not be of English mould,
For such a slave, so tame, so cold,
Would rouse his hardy sires of old,
And drag them back to earth."

K. B.

"My words fly up, my thoughts remain below;
Words without thoughts never to Heaven go."

W. M. M.

[Hamlet, Act III. Sc. 2.]

TYRIAN PURPLE IN AMERICA.—In the Adventures of John Cockburn (London, 1730, p. 173), a sailor who was taken by pirates and set on shore, and who traversed the isthmus of Panama on foot, is the following curious account of a dye, which seems to resemble the purple of the ancients:—

"We had two Pettocoos of Cotton Thread in the Canoe, which the Indians were to dye for the Governor of Leon, with a certain Fish found in the Rocks, which dye is of a very fine Purple, and this Work they went about, while Barnwell and I staid on shore to rest us. They make use of no Canoe or other Vessel to convey themselves off to the Rocks, but tie up a Quarter of a Pound, or some such Quantity of Thread in their Hair, and fix a Piece of light Wood across their Breasts to keep their Heads above water, and so swim off to them; this they do, because no vessel can live among them. Some of these Rocks lie half a Mile or Mile from the Shore.

"Now the method used to dye the thread is this: they take the Shell off the Rock where it sticks very fast, and rub it gently on the Thread, and then lay it down again where they found it, with great Care, for they are very cautious of killing the purple Fish. If the Weather proves fair, they will dye their Thread in one Tide, of as fine a Purple as ever was seen, and which will never fade. The Spaniards call it Helo Morado, the lovely Colour, and I have seen the Thread sold among them for twelve Pieces of Eight a Pound, which are twelve Crowns English Money."

Is this dye now in use in Central America, or is anything known of it? A. A.

Poets' Corner.

Queries with Answers.

HORACE, EDIT. 1712-13. — I have lately met with a particularly multifarious sort of a volume, and I should like to know something more about it, as it is without doubt a curiosity and perhaps valuable. The general title-page runs thus: —

"The Odes, Epodes, and Carmen Seculare of Horace. In Latin and English; with a Translation of Dr. Bentley's Notes, To which are added Notes upon Notes. In 24 Parts complete. By several Hands. Biformis Vates. London: Printed for Bernard Lintott at the Cross-Keys, between the two Temple-Gates in Fleet Street. MDCCXIII."

(Query, Where are the two "Temple-Gates"? Are we to understand the gates of the Inner and of the Middle Temple?)

Of these twenty-four parts, which were published at intervals, I have only nine, each part containing about seven odes. The date of the first is 1712, A.D. They are preceded by "Dr. Bentley's Dedication of Horace, translated," by the "Life of Horace by Suetonius," also cleverly translated, and a Preface. (Præfatio ad Lectorem.) The title-pages of all the parts are alike, except that they have different mottoes, and read as follows: —

"The Odes of Horace, in Latin and English; with a Translation of Dr. Bentley's Notes. To which are added, Notes upon Notes; Done in the Bentleian Style and Manner."

The translations and notes alike show great ability, while the latter are as remarkable for their prolixity as for their keenness of wit, the sarcastic nature, and versatility of the criticism. The translations of the odes are uniformly good, and frequently very elegant. It is evidently a skit on the critic Bentley, as will appear also from the Preface to the first part, in which the different objects of the work are given: —

"Thirdly, To convince him how ridiculous it is to presume to correct Horace without authority, upon the pretended strength of superior judgment in Poetry. And, Lastly, How easily such a Presumption may be turned upon the Authors, and sufficiently expose them their own way."

A. H. K. C. L.

[This amusing production is noticed by Bishop Monk in his Life of Dr. Richard Bentley, 1830, 4to, p. 248. He says: 'The sixth writer who attacked our critic's Horace devoted more time and trouble to this task than all the other scoffers together. The translation of the Odes is executed in poetical measure, in a rapid and off-hand style, but not without considerable spirit and cleverness. The version of Bentley's notes professes to be in literal English, but is in truth a mere travesty; adopting such a vulgar phraseology as would give a ludicrous character to any book that ever was written. This I presume to have been the attractive part of the performance, which caused it to amuse the public as much as it undoubtedly must have done. The 'Notes upon Notes' are miserably vapid: and their unvaried sneer is tiresome and nauseous. Nevertheless the author found encouragement to pursue his task of exhibiting the Doctor's Horace in a ridiculous light, through twenty-four successive numbers." The anonymous writer was unknown to Bishop Monk, for he adds, "There appears once to have been a notion that the author was no other than Bentley's old enemy Dr. King. A copy of the book, in an old binding, shown to me by Mr. Evans, the eminent bookseller of Pall-Mall is lettered 'King's Horace.' But Dr. Wm. King was dead some time before the completion of the work."

[* In Fleet Street. Lintott appears to have resided between Inner Temple Lane and Middle Temple Lane.]

This satirical work, however, may have been projected by Dr. William King, although it is now generally attributed to William Oldisworth, who succeeded Dean Swift and Mrs. Manley in the editorship of The Examiner. "Oldisworth is an ingenious fellow," says Swift to Stella, "but the most confounded vain coxcomb in the world, so that I dare not let him see me, nor am I acquainted with him." (Swift's Works by Scott, ed. 1824, i. 146.) Pope, in his letter to Lord Burlington, giving an account of his journey and adventures on the road to Oxford, tells us, that "silence ensued for a full hour, after which Bernard Lintott lugged the reins, stopped short, and broke out, 'Well, Sir, how far have you gone?' I answered, 'Seven miles.' 'Z—ds, Sir,' says Lintott, 'I thought you had done seven stanzas. Oldisworth, in a ramble round Wimbleton-hill, would translate a whole Ode in half this time.' I will say that for Oldisworth (though I lost by his Timothy,*) he translates an Ode of Horace the quickest of any man in England."

William Oldisworth was attached to the abdicated royal family, and was present at the battle of Preston in 1715. He died on September 15, 1784. William Oldys, in one of his jottings, speaks of Oldisworth's manuscript memorandum book. What has become of it?]

SIR ELIJAH IMPEY, KNT. — Could you oblige me by inserting in your next number a description of the arms of Sir Elijah Impey? During the trial of Warren Hastings he resided at Boreham House, near Chelmsford, and in that neighbourhood there is an old mansion still known as Impey Hall, though named long before Sir Elijah became a prominent man. I have searched for but cannot find any particulars as to his birth-place, death, or place of burial. Can you inform me on any of these points? F. I.

[Sir Elijah Impey was the third and youngest son of Elijah Impey, Esq., of Butterwick House, Hammersmith, by his second wife, Martha Fraser. Sir Elijah was born at Hammersmith on the 18th June, 1732, and baptised in St. Paul's chapel, Fulham, on the 24th June. He was educated at the Westminster School, and admitted a pensioner at Trinity College, Cambridge, 21st Dec. 1751. In 1759 he took his M.A. degree. After practising as a bar-

* This alludes to A Dialogue between Timothy and Philothene, written against Tindal's Rights of the Church.

ristler for seventeen years, he was appointed in 1773 to fill the new and important post of Chief Justice of Fort William, Calcutta. Whilst he resided in India he amassed great wealth; and in 1787, Sir Gilbert Elliott charged him with high crimes, &c., in the administration of justice in India, of which he was acquitted by the House of Commons in Feb. 1788. After his return home, Sir Elijah resided in Essex and in Wiltshire; but, in 1794, removed to Newick Park, Sussex, where he died on the 1st Oct. 1809, in the seventy-seventh year of his age. His remains are interred in the family vault at Hammersmith, where a marble tablet is erected to his memory. Arms: Gu. on a chevron, or, between three leopards' heads, as many crescents. Imp. gu. a saltier, or, between four wheat sheaves of the same, for Reade. Crest: A leopard's head, gu., between a pair of wings erect, or. Consult Memoirs of Sir Elijah Impey, Knt., by Elijah Barwell Impey, 8vo, 1846; Welch's Alumni Westmonasterienses, edit. 1852, p. 345; and Faulkner's Hammersmith, p. 136.]

"TWO PAIR," OR "TWO PAIRS." — Would you be good enough to decide through your paper a very simple question which has arisen between a friend of mine and myself, and on which a rather heavy sum has been staked? The question is whether one would say as the best English "Two pair of trousers," or "Two pairs of trousers." I. I. R.

[As this is not a question of fact, but a matter of opinion, we think the stakes should be withdrawn. In determining which is "best English," does grammar take precedence, or idiom? According to grammar, we ought to say "two pairs," "three pairs," "four pairs," &c.; for "pair" certainly has its plural, "pairs," as in the phrase "they went in pairs." Idiom, however, and with it, we think, the general practice of our language, requires us to say "two pair," "three pair," "four pair." So in many other cases, where a noun substantive stands connected with a numeral. Thus we say "an hundred pound," "five pound ten," "just five foot," "six foot six":—

"You may stay there a week, see all the sights round, And carry home change from a note of five pound."

So Fal-staff, in like manner subordinating grammar to idiom, "Master Shallow, I owe you a thousand pound."

This idiom, however, which appends a noun in the singular to a numeral that implies plurality, is no mere peculiarity of our own beautiful vernacular. The Germans also say "hundert Pfund" (an hundred pound), "acht Fuss Ton" (an eight foot tone, referring to an organ), "so viel Fuss lang" (so many foot long); and in like manner, with regard to the word now in question, "Paar" or "Par" (pair), — "Vier Paar Tauben" (four pair of pigeons). "When Paar is joined with a numeral," says Campe, "it remains unchanged."

In one word, the idiom in question is as old as Moses. Thus in Lev. xxvii. 4, "thirty shekels" is in the Hebrew "thirty shekel," which is only one instance out of many.

Where there is this apparent divergence (though only apparent, we would suggest,) between grammar and idiom, we cannot pretend to determine the controversy one way or the other; and, so far as we are concerned, the question of the trousers must remain undecided.]

AUTHORS WANTED. — By whom are the following? —

"Daily Observations, or Meditations, Divine, Morall Written by a Person of Honor and Piety," 4to. Anno Dom. 1654.

[By Arthur Lord Capel, murdered for his adherence to King Charles I. on March 9, 1648-9. "In his lifetime," says Fuller, "he wrote a book of Meditations, published since his death, wherein much judicious piety may be discovered."]

"Some Fruits of Solitude, in Reflections and Maxims, Relating to the Conduct of Human Life." In Two Parts, 12mo. London, 1702.

[By William Penn, the celebrated Quaker.]

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

Replies.

LETTERS OF JUNIUS.

(3rd S. viii. 182.)

Your correspondent, MR. WILKINS, has opened a clue to the discovery of the authorship of Junius which I believe has hitherto been perfectly disregarded. I mean the statement of Junius, that he had lately examined the original grant from Charles II. to his son, the first Duke [of Grafton]. This grant, MR. WILKINS observes correctly, would either be in the possession of the duke, or enrolled among the Public Records, in which case a person who had consulted it so lately must have been easily discoverable.

First of all let us define the exact places where Junius could have seen this grant. He uses the words "original grant": this, in strictness of language, can mean nothing but the letters patent themselves, with the great seal attached. Now an instrument of this nature is not a public document; it remains in the possession of the grantee and his representatives as their private property, and no person can demand an inspection of it. It could only be seen by favour or by subterfuge. This is, however, beyond the point perhaps. I do not attach any value to Junius's use of technical language; and as it is scarcely likely that he could have seen the patent in the possession of the Duke of Grafton, we must fall back upon the only other source to which Junius could have applied himself. The enrolment of the grant in question (on which I shall presently make a few remarks) will be found among the Patent Rolls which are now preserved in the Public Record Office, but were in Junius's time kept in the Rolls Chapel. Since reading MR. WILKINS's letter I have had the opportunity of inspecting the books giving an account of all searches among the records in the chapel. They commence early in the last century, and extend to a very late date, but most unfortunately there is a hiatus from June, 1769, to June, 1778, which it is not possible now to supply. Had it not been for this I think the point might have been easily settled, for the entries in these books are very precise in describing the records inspected, and the persons by whom they were inspected, except in a few cases where, instead of a name, is this note "Gent. unknown." There seems to be a fatality about everything connected with the Junius controversy, and the thought has occurred to me, is this hiatus really accidental? This also it is now impossible to say.

Previously, however, to 1769 the grants relating to Whittlewood Forest were inspected by a Mr. Phillips of Cecil Street, and afterwards of Church Court, Temple, but this was plainly for a legal purpose, and besides was long before the period when Junius required to see the record in question. A copy of the grant Junius saw was made for Mr. Phillips on December 4, 1767.

And now as there remains no clue to the various persons by whom the records at the Rolls Chapel were inspected during the year 1771, thereby dashing our hopes of discovery in this direction, I will pass to another consideration; namely, the merits of the dispute itself between Junius and the Duke of Grafton concerning the timber in Whittlebury Forest.

By letters patent dated June 21, 25 Charles II.,* the king granted to Henry Earl of Arlington the honour of Grafton, co. Northampton, and the demesne and manor of the same, also all the underwood, &c., in Whittlewood Forest, except all timber and oak saplings, with reversion to Henry Fitzroy, Earl of Euston, in tail.

By other letters patent, dated January 12, 32 Charles II.,† Henry, Duke of Grafton, was made ranger of Whittlewood Forest.

The first patent, which was the one seen by Junius, expressly excepts to the crown all timber and oak saplings, as he says in his letter; but he disingenuously omits to state that in the same patent the underwood was granted, which was all that the duke claimed, as I shall presently show. Junius, when he says that the duke asserted his claim to the timber by virtue of his appointment as ranger of the forest, utters an untruth, and he knew it well. He could not have perused the grant, and yet overlook the portion concerning the underwood; or if he did, which I cannot believe, he convicts himself of a blunder which is even more inexcusable than departure from the truth.

The following extracts from the Records of the Treasury will throw a little light on the history of this transaction, and will perhaps help to remove the odium which Junius tried ungenerously to cast upon the duke.

In July, 1770, we find a document from which it appears most distinctly that the duke had no right to the timber in Whittlebury Forest; for if he already possessed it, he need not have applied for any money proceeding from the sale of it:—

"After, &c. Having had under our Consideration a Memorial of the Duke of Grafton stating that the old part of the Lodge belonging to the Warden of Whittlebury Forest must necessarily be rebuilt as the same is at present not habitable, and applying for an allowance of 2000*l*. from the Crown towards enabling him to rebuild the same, he undertaking in order to complete the said building to lay out on the premises a larger sum than that for which he applies, and also stating that the said sum of 2000*l*. can be raised by the sale of such trees in the said Forest as are not fit for the use of the Royal Navy, and which may be done without prejudice to the growth of such valuable trees or to the said Forest. And we having thought proper, that the said service that shall be carried into execution in the manner proposed in the said Memorial, these are to authorize and require you, calling to your assistance such proper officers and persons who ought to be present on occasions of this nature, to mark, fell, and cut down such certain parcels and quantities of trees within the said forest of Whittlebury as are not fit for the use of the Royal Navy, and the taking away of which will in no wise prejudice the growth of Navy Timber, which by the sales to be made thereof will produce the clear sum of 2000*l*. and no more, which sum is to be by you paid over to the said Duke of Grafton to be applied by him towards rebuilding the old part of the Lodge as aforesaid, and all further charge that may be necessary for completing the said building is to be defrayed at His Grace's own expence. And you are hereby required to render an account of your proceedings herein before the proper auditor within 12 months from the date hereof. And this, &c.

"W. T. C. 6th July, 1770.

JOHN PITT, Esq^r, Surveyor Woods."*

On the 28th May, 1771, appears this minute of the Treasury Board (the Lords present being Lord North, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Dyson, and Mr. Townshend):—

"Read letter from Mr. Pitt, Surveyor-General of the Woods, transmitting two letters which he hath received from the Commissioners of the Navy, wherein they state that their purveyor has surveyed upwards of 1800 trees in Whittlebury and Salcey Forests, which amount to a like number of loads, and desire to purchase the same for the use of his Majesty's Navy.

"Transmit copies of the said papers to the Duke of Grafton, Ranger of Whittlebury Forest, and to the Earl of Halifax, Ranger of Salcey Forest."†

On the 7th November, the following minute appears:—

"Read letter from the Duke of Grafton, Ranger of Whittlebury Forest, complaining of several proceedings of the agent of Mr. Pitt, Surveyor-General of the Woods, relative to the felling of 1800 loads of timber in Whittle-

* Pat. Roll. 25 Charles II., p. 8, No. 8.

† Pat. Roll. 32 Charles II., p. 8, No. 15.

* Treasury Warrant Book not relating to Money, No. 84, p. 141.

† Treasury Minute Book, No. 41, p. 155.

to be inserted directing that the proper officers of the forest have notice in order that they may attend the marking of the Trees to be cut in pursuance of such warrant. I am &c. 13th Dec. 1771.

"JOHN ROBINSON." *

This decision of the Treasury was thenceforward acted upon, for we find that in the year 1772 the Duke of Grafton, as ranger, took the initiative in informing the Crown what timber might be cut, as the following minute of March 10th shows:—

"Read Letter from the Duke of Grafton, Ranger of Whittlewood and Salcey Forests, acquainting my Lords that one of the largest Coppices in Whittlewood Forest is now cutting; in which there are at least 200 large trees fit for the service of the Navy; and that in Salcey Forest there is no coppice this year in course of cutting.

"Mr Pitt, Surveyor-General of the Woods, attends hereon, and informs my Lords, that if they have no objection, he will give notice to the Navy Officers of this timber, and proceed in the usual manner.

"Write to Mr Pitt, giving him directions to proceed accordingly.

"Write to the Duke of Grafton, returning him thanks for his communication, and acquaint his Grace that my Lords have given directions to the Surveyor-General of the Woods to give notice to the Navy Officers of the said Timber; and to proceed in the cutting thereof, agreeably to the rules and regulations directed by this board." †

I do not know whether these extracts have ever been printed before; if not, I think they will be interesting to your readers, as giving an authentic account of all the transactions concerning Whittlebury Forest, of which Junius complains. This unknown writer, whatever may be his merits generally, has in his letter to the Duke of Grafton used fine language, but he has forgotten to use the truth. His little tirade about the "Oaks" will seem to many a superficial reader grand and conclusive, but in reality it is worthless because it is built upon the rotten foundation of a falsehood.

W. H. HART.

Folkestone House, Roupell Park,
Streatham, S.

CURIOUS DECORATION.

(3rd S. viii. 188, 216.)

My thanks to MR. BUCKTON for his partial explanation of the symbols on this decoration. The degree of Freemasonry to which he alludes is, I presume, that of Rosa Crucis, the jewel of which is a pelican, which also appears upon the seal of the Order, with a rose-coloured ribband. But none of the other figures on the decoration are connected with the Order of Rosa Crucis. If I may hazard a conjecture, I think the lion and sceptre symbolize the kingly power, while the crozier and spear represent the clerical and military authorities. But beyond this I do not see my way. The motto may be intended for the Hebrew words, as given by MR. BUCKTON; but it is distinctly engraved in bold Roman capitals, as I gave it: KODES LA ADONIA. And this puzzled me. I was of course aware that the sacred name, ADONAI, is used in various Orders of Freemasonry; and I know that KADOSH appears on the mystical ladder of the Masonic Knights Templars; but it was difficult to suppose that on a decoration with engraving of superior execution, these words should have been so completely perverted as above. I have since ascertained that the owner of the star was formerly a member of the society called Stagorians, and that he wore this as such. The society certainly did exist in the city where he resides. I shall make further enquiries, and may have more to communicate later on. F. C. H.

MR. T. J. BUCKTON is not quite correct in apportioning the medal described by F. C. H. (who, I presume, from the initials and his Bristol recollections has seen such a specimen before), to belong to the Knights of the White Eagle, or Pelican. It is an old jewel belonging to the Order of the Holy Royal Arch before the union of the two Grand Lodges in 1813. Its principal points represent the leading standards of the four divisions of the army of Israel, which make the compound figure of the cherubim, and are composed of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle. A man to personify intelligence and understanding; a lion to represent strength and power; an ox to denote the ministration of patience and assiduity; and an eagle as the figure of that promptness and celerity with which the will and pleasure of the great I AM is always executed. The other emblems refer to the bearings of some of the principal tribes of Israel. The motto, "Holiness to the Lord," is that of the Supreme Chapters of Royal Arch Masons everywhere. The crozier is emblematical of the officer, Jeshua the son of Josedeck the high priest, who wore it. The spear, now superseded by the sword, which every companion will recognise as one of the necessities of the builders who returned with Zerubabel, and the tree alludes to the burning bush seen by Moses on Mount Horeb, in the Wilderness of Sinai. From the peculiarity of its bearing an arrow, now disused with us, I infer that the medal in question was made previous to the year 1775.

* MATTHEW COOKE, 30th, &c.

MR. BUCKTON having read correctly the first part of the symbolic matter, let me point that the tree, the well, and the arrow, will be found in Gen. xlix. 22, 23. The bull (𐤁𐤍), also belonging to Joseph, in Deut. xxxiii. 17. The reading of the whole matter is this: When the lion of the tribe of Judah, to whom belongs the morning star, is reconciled with the house of Joseph (the ten

* Treasury Letter Book, No. 24, p. 341.

† Treasury Minute Book, No. 41, p. 471.

tribes), then the power of the Spirit, or eagle, will return, and holiness to Jehovah the Lord will be the rule; the kingly (spear) power, and the priestly (crozier) will then be wielded by one who has the secret of those seven. The decoration then refers to the fulfilment of Zech. iv. 10, and vi. 13; and also Amos v. 15, and ix. 11, &c.

LE CHEVALIER AU CIN.

SALMON AND APPRENTICES.

(3rd S. viii. 107, 174.)

Your learned correspondent CUTHBERT BEDE, in referring to the old, old story of the salmon clause in indentures of apprenticeship, incidentally mentions that I have been for years offering a reward for the sight of any indenture containing such a clause, but have failed. Will you allow me to say, that I do not believe there ever was such a practice, although it exists with much vivacity in tradition along the banks of the principal salmon rivers of Scotland and England? I have been assured, scores of times within the last thirty years, that indentures of apprenticeship with the salmon clause included, were common at one time. Some of my informants asserted that they had seen them; while others, not going exactly so far, yet insisted that they had been informed by eye-witnesses of their existence, whom they entirely believed. Such statements have been made to me on the banks of the Ness, the Spey, the Dee, the Tay, the Forth, and the Tweed, in Scotland; and here, in Worcester, on the Severn. How is this to be reconciled with the fact that, from an early portion in the Henry series of our English Statutes, passing downwards through the reigns of Plantagenets, Tudors, Stuarts, and Guelfs, to the 24 and 25 Vict. c. 109, there are, in the Statutes at Large, a great number of Acts of Parliament, all declaring that the salmon fishery had decreased, and was constantly diminishing? So far as England is concerned, this seems to me to be conclusive. I believe in the Acts of Parliament, and I do not believe in the mythic indenture clause, either as regards England or Scotland. On the contrary, I have a strong suspicion that the latter is one of those delusions that are so general and so widely scattered as to be inexplicable so far as origin is concerned; but which seem to serve the beneficent purpose of a practical satire on a great abuse. If the salmon fisheries of England were fostered, as they ought to be, but assuredly as they never yet have been, salmon fish might be sold at such a price as to render the indenture salmon clause an absolute everyday reality; and I am thankful to be enabled, after nearly thirty years' advocacy of salmon fishery reform, to add that, by the Statute 28 and 29 Vict. c. 121, passed in July last, very little now remains for future legislation in order that the prodigious prolificity of these kind of fishes may have a fair chance of becoming that blessing to the people which is dimly shadowed in the ancient myth.

THE EDITOR OF THE WORCESTER HERALD.

Dr. Nash, in the Introduction to his History of Worcestershire (p. 85), makes only a general observation on the subject of abundant salmon:—

"The salmon was formerly so plenty, that many persons, when they bound their children apprentices, thought it necessary to insert an article, that the master should not feed them with salmon above twice a-week."

The Commissioners who reported on the salmon fisheries in England and Wales in 1861, heard in every locality they visited of these conditions of apprenticeship; but were never able to obtain a sight of the instruments themselves. They thought, however, their existence probable in former days, when no communications existed such as at present, and the means of transport were deficient. From limitation of demand rather than from abundance, a low price might arise—and they instance the low price of turbot on some parts of the Irish coast, from a similar reason. I, like the Royal Commissioners, am not yet convinced the salmon and apprentice clause to have been a vulgar error; and the worthy EDITOR OF THE WORCESTER HERALD may yet possibly find the possessor of some ancient parchment claim his promised reward. THOMAS E. WINNINGTON.

There is no doubt that salmon was formerly very plentiful. In my History of Henley (p. 322) I have given an extract from the Rolls of Parliament (temp. Edw. III.), showing that salmon fry was taken from the Thames and given to the pigs; and that the Commons petitioned the king, "q nul salmon soit pris en Tamise entre Graves-hend et le pount de Henlee sur Tamise en temps q'il soit kiper." JOHN S. BURN.

The Grove, Henley.

THE TEMPLARS IN SCOTLAND.

(3rd S. viii. 150, 213.)

Keeping to the above heading, not because I am about to treat of the subject itself, but simply for the purpose of reference, I beg leave to enter a protest against MR. GEORGE VERE IRVINE, K.C.T., when he endeavours to exalt the modern and dubious French Order of the Temple, and decry that of the more ancient and authentic descendants of the Knights Templars, yet flourishing in connection with Freemasonry. To open this much debated question, or to cite the long list of authorities I have collected on the matter, would be to occupy entire numbers of "N. & Q." in a discussion in which neither side could claim a victory; because we should each enter the lists, like boxers, having both hands securely tied behind them, and remain exposed to every blow aimed at us, without the power of returning or parrying it—our mouths being effectually closed on the very points on which persons are desirous to examine us.

MR. IRVING seems to fancy Professor Aytoun wrote an Introduction to the Statutes of the French Order of the Temple; whereas it was connected with the "Chapter General of the Religious and Military Order of the Temple" in Scotland: a Masonic Order, of which the late Grand Master Mason of Scotland, the Duke of Athole, and the present Grand Master Mason, J. Whyte Melville of Bennoch, were respectively the past and present Grand Masters; and under the former, Professor Aytoun, himself a member of the Grand Lodge and Grand Chapter of Scotland, was a Grand Prior.

MR. IRVING is right about the Templars fighting for the Bruce: hence the Masonic Templar Order, called the Royal Order of Scotland, founded by King Robert in 1314; of which the Grand Master Mason of Scotland, J. Whyte Melville, is Deputy-Grand Master and Governor—the Grand Mastership being hereditary in the crown of Scotland.

There is no doubt about Prince Charles Edward being installed a Knight Companion, and afterwards Grand Master of the Masonic Templars, considering that the Chevalier Ramsay—the great Masonic light of Scotland—was in attendance on him and one of his most trusty adherents. It is curious, too, that Sir David Milne was also an officer of the Grand Lodge and Grand Chapter of Scotland; but the Jacques Molai collar story is, I fear, just worth as much as the Larmenius charter of transmission. As MR. IRVING states, the Order of the Temple, or French Order as we call it for distinction, was founded by Sir Sidney Smith, a high Freemason; and the Duke of Sussex, our last Grand Master, was one of its Priors—the patent for which was sent him by the Emperor Paul of Russia, another high-grade Freemason.

With the ritual of the Scotch branch of the Order, lying open before me, I readily acquiesce that they are compelled to have armorial bearings, but this was a fancy introduced by the Chevalier Burnes; and how, without the aid of the College of Arms, or Lyons Office, this is complied with, the ritual indicates. Curiously, the Scotch Templars do admit occasionally non-Masons into the Order; but the proportion is, as I am assured by competent authority, not a fifth per centage of the whole number. The Order of Masonic Knights Templars have no reason to be ashamed of their lineage; and, with all due deference to MR. IRVING, if we do not require coats of arms from our candidates, neither do we wish to pass ourselves off as Knights Templars instituted by Sir Sidney Smith; but as a branch of the same Order as that of Christ of Portugal, whose reception, &c., &c., is identical in all essentials with our own. MATTHEW COOKE, 30^c, K.T., K.M., &c.

SAMUEL DRUMMOND'S PICTURES (3rd S. viii. 188.)—In reply to D.'s letter requesting to be informed of any particulars respecting the works of the late Samuel Drummond, I may state that I possess a painting by him representing the extraordinary achievement of Captain Rogers of the Windsor Castle post-office packet, who, with a crew of twenty-eight men, captured by boarding the French privateer Jeune Richard, manned by a crew of ninety-three. This picture is, I think, quite the best that Drummond ever painted. He executed it for my grandfather, who afterwards commissioned Ward to engrave from it a plate in mezzotinto. The picture measures 5 feet 2 inches by 3 feet 2 inches.

Drummond was a very uncertain painter; and while some of his works, such as the one just named, the "Death of Nelson," and the surrender of "De Winter," show great merit in grouping and general design, others are poor in composition, and mere daubs in colour.

When I was a boy I remember a very large picture of his used to hang, dusty and neglected, in one of the upper rooms of the Soho Bazaar. It represented the apotheosis of the Princess Charlotte. In one corner sat Prince Leopold, in a suit of mourning, weeping into a white handkerchief. Britannia stood by weeping also, attended by her lion, who, if not actually weeping, was looking very much inclined to weep. Soaring up to heaven was the princess holding her dead infant in her arms, while an angel was reaching down from the clouds as if about to receive them. Nearly forty years must have elapsed since I had seen this picture at the Bazaar, when, to my surprise, I met with it again a year or two ago on the staircase of the Station Hotel at York! It had, I presume, been purchased at the sale of Drummond's effects, which took place at his death.

Should D. require any further information about this picture, I am sure he would obtain it from the courteous and respected landlord of the hotel. I enclose my address, which you will kindly communicate to D. should he apply for it.

JAYDEN.

In answer to your correspondent D., I beg to state that I have a full length life-size portrait of Sir Humphrey Davy by Drummond. The work is finished with great minuteness of detail; and is by far the best likeness of that eminent man ever painted. Should your correspondent

I may also add, that there is a publican of the name of Negus, in a street leading from Fitzroy Square to Tottenham Court Road. There are also, in the Hampstead Road, two publicans named respectively Born and Death. WM. RAYNER.

Three commercial travellers whom I know well, met, some years ago, on a Saturday night, at the Rose and Crown Hotel, Wisbeach. When the "boots" went for their letters to the Post Office, on Sunday morning, the names of this trio were Death, Blood, and Crucifix.

On a sign-board over a publichouse, in Ipswich, there is the name of Sophia Death, dealer in spirituous liquors. And over a fancy bazaar, going to the Yarmouth pier, may be seen the name of T. Image, dealer in foreign shells and curiosities. Near the Post Office in Nottingham, there is Christian, dyer; and in York, a Sturdey, bootmaker.

These are a few reminiscences of the road, which occurred to me on reading the paragraphs in "N. & Q.," 3rd S. viii. 127, 176.

JAMES GIBSON.

Bradford.

ASH (3rd S. vii. 168.)—For the information of W. T. T. D., I beg to say that the house and estate of Ash now belong to Captain Still, of Mountfield, Musbury, Devon. Lysons makes out that Ash, or De Esse, was possessed by De Esse, who gave it to Juliana, wife of John Orwey. It was afterwards successively in the families of Street and Hampton, by marriages with co-heiresses of Orwey. A co-heiress of Hampton brought it to Billet, whose heiress married Drake, and then Frankcheyney. It was during the possession of the Drakes, that the great Duke of Marlborough was born there. The widow of the last baronet sold the estate to Williams. From Williams I am unable to trace it to Gatcombe. Be that as it may, I have understood that Mrs. Gatcombe, a widow lady, who had been godmother of the late John Marwood Wolcott, Esq., J. P., of Knowle, near Sidmouth, gave it to the said Mr. Wolcott for no other known reason. And I hold up Mrs. Gatcombe as a pattern for all godmothers, never having had the like myself, albeit I want it more than he. Nevertheless, Mr. Wolcott (whom I knew well) sold this compact property to the above-mentioned Captain Still.

P. HUTCHINSON.

SHORT DRINKS (3rd S. viii. 171.)—During a residence in the West Indies, I generally heard the expression "long-drink," applied to a thirst-quenching draught of brandy and water, gin and water, or wine and water. "What will you take as a long drink?" was a usual mode of offering a casual visitor such refreshment. I conclude it was so applied in contradistinction to another occasional refreshment, namely, a tiny glass of liquor—such as noyau or Copenhagen cherry-brandy—which I fancied might be the converse, a "short drink;" but this I merely conjectured. The instance, "langhe dranken," given by W. H. J. W., may lead to the supposition that the expression had been imported into the British from the Dutch or Danish West Indian colonies.

C. B.

Montrose.

JEWISH LETTERS (3rd S. viii. 87, 139.)—This work is well known to be the production of the Marquis d'Argens,—one of those Frenchmen of wit and learning with whom Frederick the Great surrounded himself at the Court of Berlin. There he filled the office of "chambellan" to the king, and was also Director of the Royal Academy of Berlin. In this city he passed twenty-five years of his life, and died in France in 1771. He was author also of the Lettres Chinoises, and the Lettres Cabalistiques; which, together with the Lettres Juives and the Philosophie du Bon Sens, were reunited under the title of Les Œuvres du Marquis d'Argens, 24 vols., 12mo, 1768. My edition of Les Lettres Juives is in 6 vols. 8vo, à la Haye, 1742; and I have possessed also, the English translation. The Lettres Juives are formed on the model of the Turkish Spy, to which the former are inferior in regard to both style and matter. The book is little read at the present day, though it had great success in its time; and the work by which its author is better remembered, is his Mémoires—the edition of which, printed at London in 1735, was reprinted at Paris, 8vo, 1807, preceded by a "Notice Historique sur le Marquis d'Argens, sa Résidence à la Cour de Prusse, et ses Œuvres." From this, the following extract relates to the Lettres Juives:—

"Cet ouvrage eut de la vogue; il est écrit d'un style tranchant et sententieux; l'auteur y soumet à son jugement les hommes, les livres, les lois, et les opinions; sous des noms de juifs, de rabbins, il traite les questions les plus difficiles de la morale et de la politique; il décide tout avec une assurance dont les plus grands génies n'auraient pas osé donner l'exemple.

"On peut le citer comme un modèle de ce langage hardi et chargé de rapprochements singuliers qui faisaient fortune alors, et qui commença la révolution survenue dans l'art d'écrire. Ce ne sont plus ces expressions naturelles et vraies que l'on retrouve dans les écrits de Bayle, de Pascal, d'Arnauld, et d'autres qui ont embrassé le genre polémique * * * *

"Les succès des Lettres Juives fut dû à la singularité du cadre, à la variété des matières qui y sont traitées, et au système d'incrédulité et de dénigrement qui en fait le fonds. C'était alors un grand mérite; ce serait aujourd'hui d'un très-mauvais goût et un juste titre de mépris." Pp. 98-4.

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

The book is translated from the Lettres Juives of Jean Baptiste de Boyer, Marquis d'Argens. It was popular in the last century, and procured the author an invitation to the court of Frederick the Great. A translation bears the title of The Jewish Spy, of which I have seen one edition, Dublin, 4 vols., and another, London, 5 vols. The first edition of the original work is La Haye, 8 tom. 12mo, 1754.

E. N. H.

THE EARL OF POVERTY (3rd S. viii. 150.)—Mr. W. H. Ainsworth, in his novel, The Lancashire Witches, applies the title of Earl of Poverty to John Paslew, the last Abbot of Whalley. He was executed for the prominent part he took in the insurrection called the Pilgrimage of Grace, which ensued on the suppression of the monasteries, and is said to be buried under a slab at the end of the south aisle in Whalley church, on which is inscribed the simple epitaph "Miserere mei"—one, perhaps, of the shortest on record, excepting, perhaps, "Miserrimus" in Worcester cathedral. I am, however, unable to say what is the novelist's authority for the application of the title to the abbot, or why he assumed so strange a one.
OXONIENSIS.

"SO MUCH THE WORSE FOR THE FACTS" (3rd S. viii. 187.)—This, I believe, is commonly attributed not to Voltaire, but to the Abbé Siéyes.
LYTTELTON.

Hagley, Stourbridge.

HARROGATE IN 1700 (3rd S. viii. 172.)—In enumerating works later than the above date, describing that place, you have omitted to mention Humphrey Clinker.
J. H. L.

SILVER CUP (3rd S. viii. 129.)—I think that Dante's river of blood and centaurs are represented, though the text is not closely adhered to:—

"Noi ci appressammo a quelle fiere snelle:
Chiron prese uno strale, e con la cocca,
Fecce la barba indietro alle mascelle,
Quando s'ebbe scoperta la gran bocca,
Disse a' compagni: 'Siete voi accorti,
Che quel di retro muove ciò che tocca?'
Così non soglion fare i piè de' morti."

Chiron puts Dante and Virgil under the care of Nessus, who shows them the boiled tyrants:—

"Qui vi si piangono gli spietati danni;
Qui v'è Alessandro, e Dionisio fero,
Che fe' C'ecilia aver dolorosi anni:
E quella fronte, ch'ha 'l pel così nero,
È Azzolino; e quell'altro, ch'è biondo,
È Obizzo da Esti."

The initials are those of the first, second, and fourth tyrants. If intended for them, I do not know why Obizzo should be preferred to Azzolino.
FITZROPKINS.

Louvain.

BROWNE, VISCOUNT MONTAGUE (3rd S. viii. 106.)—Your correspondent JUSTIN BROWNE of Hobart Town, will find an interesting article on

"Browne of Lings, claiming to be Viscount Montacute" in the Reliquary Quarterly Archaeological Journal, v. 193-7. (April, 1865.)

L. JEWITT, F.S.A.

Derby.

CUE (3rd S. vii. 317, 427; viii. 113, 155.)—Since my last communication, I have obtained the best authority for saying that replique precisely corresponds to the actor's cue, or the last words of a previous speech, as used on the French stage.

T. J. BUCKTON.

BOSTON, A FLOWER (3rd S. viii. 193.)—The vestment "powtheryd with flowers callyd Boston," was, I think, embroidered with flowers terminating in three buds, a decoration frequently met with. It is what is termed in heraldry botoni, and applied to a cross, the ends of which resemble the triple leaf of the trefoil, and it is termed a cross botoné, and sometimes by the French croix trefflée.
F. C. H.

QUARTERINGS (3rd S. viii. 69, 198.)—P. P. seems scarcely to have taken my meaning correctly in using the word dissevered. I am aware of the rules which he gives on the subject, but to make my query more intelligible I shall repeat it in another form.

A. married an heiress B., and acquired her real estate. She brought with her the real estates of two other heiresses, C. and D. A. had two sons by B., the elder of whom inherited his father's patrimonial estates, &c., but the second son received as his portion the estate of the heiress D.

My query was—Does not the second son, by acquiring this latter estate, take with it, as a matter of course, the arms of the heiress D. to whom it originally appertained?

Some authorities say that the elder son (and heir) alone is intitled to the quartering of D., a dictum opposed to that of Edmonston, whom I quoted.

Of course I do not suppose any special destination, but simply a case where A. has the power of apportionment.

There are authentic instances * where the second son was allowed five such quarterings, while the heir had eleven. If there had been no such question, why did not the former also carry seven quarterings along with the paternal duly difference, not only a portion of them? Sr.

REGIMENTAL COSTUME (3rd S. viii. 69, 134.)—Hogarth's famous "March of the Guards to Finchley Common, 1745," will give one of the best sketches of the military costume of the time. The handsome young grenadier and his wench—the portly sergeant with his halberd—the drunken soldier revelling in the gutter—the gay drummer and fifer boy—the soldier kissing the milkmaid, while another guardsman empties the contents of the milk pail into his hat—and another hero adroitly appropriates the pies of the itinerant vendor—form a tout ensemble which has never been equalled since, for its graphic richness and accuracy of colouring, and correctness of outline.

* Herald's Visitations, Brit. Mus. Harl. MSS. 1480, fo. 57; 1357, fo. 49. b.

BREVIS.

FIRE, HOW ANCIENTLY KINDLED (3rd S. vii. 82, 296, 423.)—There is, in Homer's Iliad, a passage which seems to me to bear curiously on this subject; and as I have not seen it quoted or referred to by any of your correspondents, I now send it. In book xii. 177, 178, we read:—

πάντη γὰρ περὶ τεῖχος ὁρώρει δεσπιδὰς πῦρ, λάδινον.

Some translators have taken λάδινον as adjective to τεῖχος; and, no doubt, the wall was made of stones, &c. Others, as I think rightly, have taken it as adjective to πῦρ; but have understood πῦρ metaphorically, without sufficient warrant I think. Why should not the passage be understood thus literally?—

"For everywhere about the wall arose [now raged]
A marvellous fire,—flinty!"

The literal view of the passage is, that the combatants' arms, of which a considerable component part was of iron or steel (as well as of copper or brass), came so fast and furiously in contact with the stony wall, that fire flashed from end to end of it.

In second Book of Maccabees x. 3, we read: "And striking stones, they took fire out of them;" which, in the LXX., is thus, — καὶ πυρόσαντες λίθους, καὶ πῦρ ἐκ τούτων λάβορες, &c.

For a method of preserving alive the "seed of fire," in Homer's time, I would refer those who are searching into the subject to the beautiful simile at Odyssey, book v. 488—490. T. S. N.

STILTS, CRUTCHES, OXTERSTICKS (3rd S. vii. 478; viii. 178.)—Crutches are supports for one who cannot walk, stilts are not. In fact, he who would walk on stilts must practice well their use before he can.

After a somewhat diligent search, I find that Holyoke, in his Dictionary, 1617, gives the words "Crutches, Stilts and Scatches," apparently with the same meaning. Halliwell also mentions as a provincialism the word stilts, for crutches. Elsewhere, in every instance where I have found the words, they have, strictly speaking, a distinct and separate use.

Shakspeare, as far as I have been able to learn, has not used the word stilts at all. The word crutches he has used over and over again.

Oxter is a good old Saxon word for the armpit. "Under my oxter," meaning, under my arm, is a saying which any one, who will give himself the trouble to listen, may hear in either England, Ireland, or Scotland. Oxter-sticks for crutches is, therefore, significant enough without any further explanation. GIBSON.

Liverpool.

Oxtersticks may be a puzzler for MR. FISHWICK or V. S. V., but will not puzzle long one familiar with the Ulster Scots. Oxter is the hollow under the arm, below each shoulder. Oxtersticks, therefore, sticks used there=crutches. C. W.

LUTHER ON ESHOOL (3rd S. viii. 189.)—Inquiry is made for the original of a certain passage of Luther. The original idea, and the substance of the passage, will be found in St. Ambrose and St. Augustin. St. Ambrose says:—

"Duo autem in phalanga portantes uvam, duo populi demonstrantur, Christianus utique et Judæus. Et sicut mos est portantium, unus præcedens, alter subsequens, ita prior Judæorum designatur populus, Christianorum secundus. Et sicut antecedens quod portat non videt, et retrorsum idem semper habens, quadam dorsi aversione contemnit: qui autem sequitur, semper id oculis perspicit, semper custodit obtutibus, semper corporis vicinitate potitur."—Serm. 72.

In St. Augustin the same idea is found expanded:—

"Hanc uvam duo deferunt inserto vecte pendentem. Possunt isti duo etiam Christianum vel Judaicum populum figurare. Isti ergo sunt duo, id est, Synagoga vel Ecclesie populi. Et quia prior fuit Judæorum populus, præcedit Judæus, sequitur Christianus. Salutem suam hic ante conspectum suum gerit, ille post dorsum. . . . Incedunt duo sub sacro fasce ordine suo. Hic semper videt, ille semper relinquit. Judæus autem proximum se æstimat, sed absentat. Christianus ergo presenti munere fruatur, Judæus solo onere prægravatur."—De Temp. Serm. c. F. C. H.

MACAULAY AND THE YOUNGER PITT (3rd S. viii. 190.)—After the perusal of many works referring to the private and public lives of Fox and Pitt, I do not see any inconsistency in Macaulay's statement as to the classical acquisitions and tastes of these distinguished antagonist contemporaries. There can be no question, I presume, as to the early advancement of both in the classics, and probably Pitt might be the superior in early life. The later life of Pitt was clouded; and his mind, of a more delicate cast, was too much absorbed by other matters to allow the dulce lenimen curæ to act, as it did on the more joyous and masculine mind of Fox; who most delighted in the classics after he had spent all his money, his own and borrowed, at the gaming table. Pitt was also a great gambler. We know that, in later life, Fox corresponded with Gilbert Wakefield on classical subjects; but Pitt appears to have considered that the mastery of the historical monuments of the ancients in early life sufficed. He does not appear to have highly or enthusiastically appreciated ancient poetry, as Fox did. I am compelled to give the mere impressions left on my own mind, as I am at present without the means of reference to substantiate my impressions by positive proof. T. J. BUCKTON.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

Diplomatarium Anglicum ævi Saxonici. A Collection of English Charters, from the Reign of King Æthelberht of Kent, A.D. 457, to that of William the Conqueror. Containing: I. Miscellaneous Charters. II. Wills. III. Guilds. IV. Manumissions and Acquittances. With a Translation of the Anglo-Saxon. By Benjamin Thorpe. (Macmillan & Co.)

The present important contribution to Anglo-Saxon history is, as Mr. Thorpe tells us, based on Mr. Kemble's great work, the Codes Diplomaticus, printed for the English Historical Society, and which is now becoming extremely scarce. The documents included in that work fall naturally into two classes: the first includes all such deeds or muniments as illustrate history generally, including the state of the constitution, testamentary dispositions, heriots, marriage, and other settlements, leases, mortgages, markets, tolls, customs, jurisdictions, rights, privileges, and immunities of both lay and ecclesiastical persons; the Witanagemot, or Great Council of the Nation, and the inferior Courts—such as the County Courts and the Court of the Hundred—with the forms of civil and criminal procedure. The second class, consisting of simple grants of land, are purposely excluded from the present volume; and Mr. Thorpe proposes to publish them in a separate volume, with a translation of, and commentary on, the Land Boundaries—and such a collection, as he well observes, cannot fail of being of the highest interest and value to the topographical antiquary. The first division of the present volume consists of some 230 miscellaneous charters; which with the sixty-seven wills, which form the second division, afford numerous cursory glimpses into the manners of the age, particularly some of the grants of immunities to monasteries from the burthen of entertaining the king's messengers, horses, hounds, hawks, &c. The wills and bequests are chiefly of royal and noble persons, archbishops, and bishops, and are at once the most ancient collection of similar documents existing in any old vernacular tongue of modern Europe, and a mine of curious information respecting the private life of our ancestors, their dress, furniture, utensils, ornaments, &c. The third division contains the articles of constitution of those corporations, or fraternities, known under the denomination of Guilds, viz. the Trade Guilds, which are the origin of our Civic Companies; the Frith (Peace) Guilds, and the Guilds instituted for social or religious purposes; and which, with due allowance for difference of times and manners, bear a close resemblance to the Benefit or Friendly Societies of our working classes, though composed of persons of a higher grade, and containing more of the religious element than these. A series of manumissions conclude the volume, which may not inaptly be regarded as the historic portion of the existing Anglo-Saxon charters. As it is needless to speak of Mr. Thorpe's profound knowledge of the language in which these documents are preserved, and consequently of his fitness to edit and translate them, we may bring our notice of this useful volume to a close by stating, that its usefulness is considerably increased by the addition of a compendious Glossary of such words as the editor considered might require explanation, and a copious Index of Names.

The Student's English Dictionary, Etymological, Pronouncing, and Explanatory, in which the Words are traced to their ultimate Sources, the Root or Primary Meaning inserted, and the other Meanings given fully, according to the best Usage. By John Ogilvie, LL.D. The Pronunciation adapted to the best Modern Usage by John Cull, F.S.A. Illustrated by about 300 Engravings on Wood. (Blackie & Son.)

This ample title-page sufficiently describes the object of the present work, which is intended to supply the want which has long been felt both by teachers and pupils in our colleges and advanced schools, of an English Dictionary strictly Etymological as well as Explanatory, and which should be at the same time of moderate size and price. Dr. Ogilvie's experience as Editor of the "Imperial" and "Comprehensive" Dictionaries well qualified him for the preparation of such a work as that proposed; and the printer and publisher have done their parts towards it very effectually, so that the result is a compact, though comprehensive Dictionary for the higher class of English students, carefully prepared, well printed, and published at a very moderate price.

Mr. Bentley's announcements for the present month include a new novel by the author of "Uncle Silas," entitled "Guy Deverell," in 3 vols.—A Two-shilling Edition of "The Semi-attached Couple."—"Harem Life in Egypt and Constantinople," by Emmeline Lott, formerly Governess to H.H. the Grand Pacha Ibrahim of Egypt, in 2 vols. post 8vo, with steel portrait; and the third volume of the shilling "Tales from Bentley."

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Particulars of price, &c., of the following book to be sent direct to the gentleman by whom it is required, and whose name and address are given for that purpose:—

SHAKESPEARE. A good octavo edition in two volumes.

Wanted by Lord Lyttelton, Hagley, Stourbridge.

Notices to Correspondents.

A. A. Books may be obtained direct from the Parisian publishers; but it is more advisable to order them through a London agent.—The French "N. & Q." is entitled L'Intermédiaire des Chercheurs et Curieux, Paris, Duprat.

T. M. Very few of the words are old English. They can only be explained in connection with the passages where they occur.

J. DALTON. The story of John Gilpin was told to Cooper by Lady Ashton; but whence derived, or whether related by her as a true story, or as a myth, does not appear. Consult Mr. Bruce's Memoir of Cooper, prefixed to the Aldine edition of Cooper's Poems, just published. Vide also "N. & Q." 2nd S. viii. 110; ix. 33; x. 351.

W. M. M. Only two volumes were published of Memoirs de Portugal, par le Chevalier d'Oliveira, Amsterdam, 1741; and à la Hâle, 1743.

GEORGE FAIRBAIRN. A correct English version of "Jerusalem the Golden" may be found in The Rhythm of Bernard de Morlaix on the Celestial Country, edited and translated by the Rev. J. M. Neale, M.A. 1859, 16mo.

R. INGLIS. The initials appended to Blighted Pasque Flowers, 1698, 12mo, are S.C. and M.E.S.

S. CLARK. Some account of King James the First's polemical College at Chelsea may be found in Fulter's Church History, iii. 233–241, ed. 1837, and in Father Paul's Letters, ed. 1893, p. 269.

ERRATA.—In the Latin inscription (ant. p. 210) the word et in the second line should change place with est in the fifth line. At p. 171, col. ii. line 1, for Princent read Prinzenhof.

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 6d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for STRAIGHT COLUMNS for SIX MONTHS forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly Index) is 11s. 6d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. BENTLEY, 22, WELLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all Communications for the Editor should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 195.

NOTES:—Wellington Despatches, 241—The Thatched House, at Hoddesdon, 242—The first Mayor of Winchester, 243—Epitaphs Abroad, 244—St. Withburga's Well at East Dereham, Norfolk—Inn Signs—Erasmus "De Contemptu Mundi"—Pedigree—Atlantic Cable—Dates of Books and Pamphlets, 247.

QUERIES:—Had Lionel, Duke of Clarence, a Son? 248—Anna Bollena Pennies—Anonymous—Barometric Leeches—"The Christian Year"—Sir John Davies—Discovery of Ancient MSS.—Epigram on a Secretary of the French Academy—Frederick the Great—Gonzagas of Mantua—Heraldic Query—Lanmas Lands—Meltham—Military—"O dear me!"—Old Miniature—Pedigree of D'Avila—Philander's "Macaronic Madrigal"—Rhys ab Madoc ab David—Roman Catholic Gentry in Lancashire—Roman Mortar—The Sutton Family—Mrs. Elizabeth Somerville—Marshal Soult and the Battle of Toulouse, 249.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—James Boswell, Esq.—The Code of Honour—Lichfield—Coach, 253.

REPLIES:—Rosamond, the Queen of the Lombards, 254—Symbolization of Colours in Heraldry, 255—Purgatory of St. Patrick, ib.—Prester John—"Animali Parlanti"—Braose—Robin Hood Ballad—Perplexed Relationship—Concygare, Coneygarth—Maesmore—Bodeherste—Washington and Excoisior—The Hall of Lost Steps—Burial in Coffins—Marshall—Anonymous Hymns—St. James's Fields—"Will o' the Wisp"—Bishops' Lawn Sleeves—Regimental Medal—St. Augustine's Monsters—Heraldic Puzzle, 256.

Notes on Books, &c.

Notes.

WELLINGTON DESPATCHES.

I beg to be allowed to call attention to "N. & Q." to what seems to me a great literary desideratum: I mean a revised, consolidated, and improved edition of the whole set of the Duke of Wellington's Despatches.

Before going into the particular reasons for this, I cannot help dwelling a little, superfluous though it may be, on the general importance of their being published in the best possible manner, from their extreme interest and utility.

No more admirable model of a public man has ever been presented to the world. This has of course often been set forth in various points of view, as well as the unsurpassed military ability which they exhibit; and I will only notice one topic, the thorough completeness with which the Duke mastered every subject brought before him. Many most striking instances might be quoted. The following are all from the Supplementary Despatches:—

On leaving India he furnished the Government with several papers and memoirs on its condition, including a complete review of the whole of Lord Wellesley's internal policy.

In his brief interval of leisure at home, the question of contemplated military operations in Mexico and South America was referred to him. He was never in those countries, but he investigated the whole condition of them by means of books and documents, and there remains to us a very long and most elaborate series of papers by him, exhausting the subject of carrying on war there.

On his first embassy to Paris he was instructed to bring the question of the Slave Trade before the French Government. The merciless Clarkson sent to him all his own and Wilberforce's productions, and all the Blue Books. Going there soon afterwards, the delighted Clarkson found that the Duke had read every word of them, and knew the subject as well as himself.

A small and amusing instance is from the time of his Irish secretarship. An Irish clergyman sends him a play of his own composition. The Duke acknowledges it, and says he has read it with pleasure.

From Gurwood's collection I will only recall the many elaborate letters on the charming subject of the Spanish and Portuguese currency.

Much more might be said. But then, the greater the value of these important documents, the more important is it that they should be fairly accessible and readable.

Now, in the first place, they fill twenty-three volumes, according to Gurwood's first edition, or eighteen if we use the second; and this is in fact the longest, though in fewer volumes. This alone is a great evil. No more certain axiom in itself than μέγα βίβλιον μέγα κακόν, though the evil may often be inevitable, and may be more than compensated by good. But here the evil might beyond doubt be greatly mitigated.

In all the latter volumes of this Supplementary collection, and at a constant and rapid rate of increase as we approach the close, the Duke's own productions occupy but an exceedingly small portion of the whole book, and are buried and overwhelmed beneath mountains and continents of other men's writings. Endless coils of red-tape from Lord Liverpool, Lord Bathurst, Lord Castlereagh—endless farragos on tactics and campaigning from General Dumouriez—endless diplomatic wanderings from Sir H. Wellesley—chaotic anonymous papers, addressed apparently by no one to nobody, fill up at least nineteen-twentieths of the book. Not by any means that all these have no value; many of them have great value. But they are like the "slumber-lakes" of Rushworth, Collins, &c. They are raw material for the patient and laborious historian, from which to work out his condensed and luminous narrative, and are for a totally different purpose from the immortal words of a great and original man. These are for the general reader—not for the professional author or critic. The delight can hardly be expressed with which the said general reader arrives and slakes his thirst at these rare fountains in the desert.

has long disappeared; and in almost every recent notice of Hoddesdon that I have seen, is stated to have occupied the site of the Thatched Cottages adjoining Buffalo's Head Shot, by the Ware Road, at the northern extremity of the town. This statement is found among other places in Mr. Jesse's edition of Walton's Angler, published by Mr. Bohn; where it is made on the authority of a note in Major's edition.

This statement is certainly incorrect; though the Thatched Cottages formerly existed as a public house, called the Buffalo's Head; but the Thatched House, to which Walton referred, was situated in the centre of the town of Hoddesdon, on the east side of Chapel Hill, near the Old Chapel or Clock House (now Town Hall), and not far from the site of the old Market Cross and Market House.

My authority for this is an authentic copy of—

"A Circuit of the Bounds of the Parish of Great Amwell, as they were recorded by Thomas Hassall, Clerk, Vicar there, anno 1634, and so observed in his day," in which the following mention is made of the Thatched House, viz.—

"In the parish of Amwell from Cunnisbyes, or the Bell, we go up the town to Hoddesdon, taking in all those houses which stand together on the same side as the Feathers, the Thatched House and others till we come to the White Hart, an inn fronting the New Town House, over against Lord's Lane."

I am also enabled to confirm this evidence, from the information of a respectable inhabitant of the town, who has, in the course of his professional duties, seen and examined deeds relating to the Thatched House in which its site was represented as agreeing with the description given in the perambulation quoted. A part of the parish of Great Amwell is situate in Hoddesdon, forming, as it were, islands in Hoddesdon. The Bell Inn, spoken of in the Perambulation, is still the Bell Inn; on the north side of it is the original "Way" from the town down to the Lea. The front of the Hoddesdon Brewery adjoining the Bell is built on the site of the Feathers; and the house on the south side of the Brewery gateway, with inclosed square grass plot in front, is built on the site of the old Thatched House. It is now the residence of Charles Peter Christie, Esq., a highly respected gentleman, one of the firm of the Hoddesdon Brewery—Messrs. Christie & Co.

CHARLES WHITLEY, JUN.

[We are sure this information will be very acceptable to all Wakonians. We wish Mr. WHITLEY would, with the assistance of his friend, ascertain who was the "Harry Bailey" of the Thatched House, the host who supplied the good ale for which it was "very remarkable."—ED. "N. & Q."]

THE FIRST MAYOR OF WINCHESTER.

In the account supplied by the public journals of the restoration of the "Butter-cross" at Winchester, by G. G. Scott, Esq., which has been recently completed, and (as the common phrase now expresses it), "inaugurated," I find that one of the figures inserted in this structure is said to represent—

"Florence de Lunn, Winchester's first Mayor, holding in his hand a scroll inscribed Charta Privilegiorum, in reference to the privileges conferred on the city of Winchester by the Charter of 1184, granted by King Henry II."

Having had occasion to make particular inquiries into the municipal history of this ancient city, I beg to send you a very condensed account of the results I arrived at, as far as they bear upon this subject, that the local tradition embodied in this figure of "Winchester's first Mayor" may be rated at its true historical value. And first, respecting the claim of this "Florence de Lunn" to such a distinguished position. In the Muni-ment-room over Westgate is a painted list of the Mayors of Winchester, forming part of what are known as the "City Tables," which is printed in the Appendices of both Wavell's and Milner's Histories. In this list, Florence de Lunn stands first and also second, under the dates 1184 and 1185. Wavell, whose book was published in 1773, and who acknowledges his great obligations to an unpublished predecessor (soon to be mentioned), adorns his second volume with a portrait of "Florence de Lunn, first Mayor of Winchester, A.D. 1184," with a strip of parchment inscribed Charta Privilegio in his hand, and choicely habited in the costume familiar to us all, through Houbraiken's engraved portrait of Henry IV.! This is the whole evidence in his favour.

Wavell's portrait needs must stand on its own merits. I hope it has been faithfully followed in this figure in the "Butter-cross." But as for the Tables, as far as their origin can be ascertained, they were compiled in the beginning of the seventeenth century, and were founded upon the researches of Alderman John Trussell, a diligent antiquary (of the class then extant in provincial cities), whose "History" still exists in MS., and which, from a very careful examination of it, I can certify to contain not more than the usual amount of "human stupor" prevalent in histories of those days, in proportion to facts, more or less clearly seen and recorded. Milner, in his Appendix, with great ease demolished the historical portion of them: the credit to be given to the List of Mayors may be judged from two or three facts, taken at random from notes relating to the subject. No mention is made in it of Nicholas Koppinger, most probably mayor in 1244-5; nor of Thomas Bowland, whose monument in the Cathedral records that he had held this office, and Rawl. MS. Miscell. 780, English College at Rome.

On another white marble gravestone, in capitals, is this following inscription:—

"D. O. M.
Joanni Simoni, nobili Anglo,
Georgii, equitis aurati,
et Margaritæ,
de baronibus Molineux,
filio,
eximie indolis
ac fortitudinis
adolescenti,
qui in aula Magnæ Britannicæ
honoribus functus,
dum ad majora tenderet
abreptus morte,
piissime obiit
xiii. Aug. anno Dñi MDCLXIX.
Amantissimo filio mater
afflicta posuit."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
Hic jacet R. P. Franciscus
Fenwick, Anglus, Ordinis
S. Benedicti Congregat.
Anglicana,
S. Theologiae doct. Sorbon.
Jacobus II. Angliæ Regi a sacris domesticis,
magister generalis
sui ordinis,
conventus Parisiensis
Prior,
demum a capitulo
generali abbas præsidens Collegii Gregoriani de urbe creatus, obiit iii.
Calend. Nov. an. Salu.
MDCCXIV.
ætatis suæ L.
Requiescat in pace."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
Franc. Moro, nobili Anglo,
qui bonis, patria, amicis,
pro fide Catholica relictus,
A^o Jubilei Romani
veniens, exilii sui an. vi.
ætatis LX.
obiit, 8 Octobris MDLXXV.
Georgius Morus filius unigenitus chariss^o
patri posuit."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
R. D. Jo. Setone, Pr^o Anglo
Theologie professori candidiss^o, qui post duriss^a vincula et multa adversa pro sacrorum dogmatum assertionem perpassa,
Romani ex patria exul venit, ubi an^o ætatis suæ LXX^a animam Deo dicavit, xiiii Kal. Aug. MDLXXVII.
R. S., Anglus, ex test^o her.
opt. mer. p. c."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
Richardo Walmsley
secundo genito,
et ex morte primi fratris
heredi, Richardi Walmsley nobilis armigeri de Dunkenhall, comitatus Lancastrensis,
et Mariæ Fromonds,
filie et heredis
Bartholomæi Fromonds
de Cheame,
nobilis item armigeri
comitatus Surriensis,
qui æt. an. xx. urbem ingressus,
decimo quarto post diem,
non tam celeri
quam felici morte abreptus,
in ea piissime quievit,
secundo Dec. an. MDCLXXX.
Charis filii cineribus
mater illacrymans posuit."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
Rev. Dno Guilielmo Harto,
alim Hargravia, Præbytero Anglo,
patria Lancastrensi,
sacrae theologiae
et philosophiæ
varia in academiis
professori,
postremo vero in pontificio
Romanae sapientiæ studio, quo in munere post diuturnos ad Dei obsequium
labores, carceris etiam ærumnas pro fide in Angliâ toleratas, pie mortem obiit,
xiiii Calendas Januarii MDCLX, ætatis suæ anno LXIII.
Bonis omnibus pie
in usus erogavit. (Sic in MS.)
Curatores posuerunt."

On another, under a person in an episcopal habit, in capitals, is this inscription:—

"Hic jacet P. Pr. Joannes
Shirwood eps. Danelmæ sereniss. (sic in MS.) Regis Angliæ orator, qui obiit xii Januarii, an. M.CCCC.XCIII, cujus anima in pace quiescat."

On another white marble gravestone, in capitals, is this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
Thomæ Gagio, equiti
Baronetto, Anglo-Sussexensi, patre honoribus ac nominibus,
matre nobilitate pari,
Mariæ Tankerville,
alias Camberlana, nato,
familia non magis
generis claritate
quam perpetua fidei Catholice constantia illustris principi,
qui in ipso ætatis flore
ipsaque in ultimam urbem ingressu,

Deo animam, corpus terre inter cives suos, tradidit.
xxii. Novembris Anno Dñi MDCLX.
Joannes Gaglius eques
baronettus carissimo fratri merens posuit."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscription following:—

"D. O. M.
D. Hugoni Odoeno nobili Cambro
Britanno Carnarvienti, qui, florente adhuc ætate, patriam hæresis infectam fugiens, l. annos in Gallia, Hisp^a, Belgio, Italia, vivens, exilio (sic in MS.) consenuit, ejus opera et consilio uterque Philippus Hisp.
Reges, Albertus Austriae et Burgundiae et Alexander Parmae duces in rebus gravissimis sunt usi. Catholicam contra sectarios fidem semper pro virili adjuvit provexitque usque adeo ut illius zelo exagitati hæretici insidias struere, calumniis traducere, novas indies illi molestias procudere, usque ad extremum vitæ sp̄m non destiterint, quas oēs erecto semper et in-fracto alio vel contempsit vel supera-vit; ejus in Deum pietas, liberalitas in pauperes, in bonos oēs benevolentia, ereptum terris cælo dignum reddi-derunt. Romæ octogenerarius (sic in MS.) Romanæ, fidei propugnator acerrimus, maximo
Catholicorum Anglorum dolore, moritur iii Calend. Junii, anno MDCXVIII.
Collegium Anglorum insigni benefac-tori, et Carolus Guineus, ex sorore nepos, ex testamento hæres, amantissimo avunculo, posuere."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
Gabrieli Alano, pietate ac
vitæ innocentia singulari, quem ut amoris sanctique exilii vinculum cum Gulielmo fratre, Cardinale Angliæ, in vita conjunxerat, sic nec
locus ipse in morte separavit.
Obiit die xxiiii. Martii, anno ætatis sue LVIII, humane salutis MDCXVII. Thomas Alanus avunculi optimi amantissimi memoriæ
posuit."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscription in capitals:—

"D. O. M.
Edm^{do} Danieli, pbro
Anglo, Ec. Cæ^{le} Heref.
dec^o, qui propter suum
in fide Cæ^{le} constantiam multa passus, dignit^{at} oibus spoliatus, post an^o xiii. in exilio Romæ transactos, obiit
xxx Octob^{is} MDLXXVI.,
ætatis sue an^o LVII.
Maurit^{us} Clenoc^{us} et Gulielm^{us} Elias mœsti pos."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscripti in capitals:—

"D. O. M.
Andree Aiton, nobilis Scoti,
patria Fifensi, Dumblanen, eccl^e cancellarii, rectoris de Spot, viri optimi, fide ac integritate insignis, litterarumque culti et ornat in maxima honorum et fortu-narum expetatione functi lamentabile sepulcrum
lacrys bene merenti posuit.
Vixit annis xxxii, mensibus octo et diebus xv.
obiit die xii Octobris
MDXXVIII."

On another white marble gravestone, partly cover^d by a bench is, in capitals, this inscription:—

"Thome Wythy
Anglorum aditu taciturnitate qua virtutes Britanni
Inventores sibi me
munt nulli secund
Christophorus prothonotarius
MDVIII. 4 Sep."

On another, under a busto of a priest is, in capitals, this inscription:—

"Edvardo Scot, Londonien., jure cons.,
cubiculario Pont.
Regioque sollicitatori, et hujus Hospitalis
integerrimo gubernatori, Hospital. soci **
pientiss. bene merenti
pos. Vix. an. XLII. obiit
ix. Kl. Aug. MDIII."

On another white marble gravestone is, in capital^s, this inscription:—

"D. O. M.
Audoeno Ludovico Cambro-Britanno
U. J. D. ac Professore Oxoni in Angliæ ac Regio Duaci in Flandria, Archidia-cono Hannoniæ et canonico in me-tropolitana Cameracensi atque officiali generali utriusque signature,
referendario Caroli Cardinalis
Borromæi Archiepiscopi Mediolanen-sis, vicario generali Gregorii XIII.
et Xisti V. in congregatione de consultationibus episcoporum et regularium, a secretis episcopo Cassanensi, Gregorii XIV. ad Helvetios nun-tio, Clementis VIII. Apostolicæ visitationis in alma urbe adjutori. Anglos in Italia, Gallia ac Belgia omni ope semper juvit, atque ejus imprimis opera hujus Collegii ac Duacensis et Rhemensis fundamenta jacta sunt.
Vixit annos lxi, menses ix, dies xxlii,
exul a patria xxxvi.
obiit xiv. Octobris MDCXCV.
Ludovicus de Torres, Archiepiscopus
Montis Regalis, amico posuit."

On another white marble gravestone, in capitals, this following inscription:—

Deo Trino Uni.

Gulielmo Alano Lancastrensi, S.R.E.
 præs. Card. Angliæ, qui extorris patria, perfunctus laboribus diuturnis in orthodoxa religione tuenda, sudoribus multis in seminariis ad salutem patrie instituendis, fovendis, periculis plurimis ob ecc. Rom., opere, scriptis, omni corporis et animi contentione, defensam, hic in ejus gremio, scientiæ, pietatis, modestiæ, integritatis, fama et exemplo clarus ac piis omnibus charus, occubuit, xvii. cal. Nov.
 an. æta. LXIII., exilii xxxiii., Sal. huma.

MDCXIV.

inter lacrymas exilium pro religione,
 civium perpetuum illorum effugium.
 Gabriel Alanus frater, Thomas Heschetus sororis filius, fratri, avunculo, chariss.
 optimo optimeque merito
 merentes posuerunt."

On another white marble gravestone is this inscription in capitals:—

"D. O. M.

Patri Roberto Personio, Anglo, Somersetano, Societatis Jesu,
 sacerdoti integerrimo atque doctissimo,
 et hujusce Collegii optimo moderatori,
 qui ad animi cultum, ad studium pietatis, ad Angliæ conversionem, Collegiorum domiciliis ac diversoriis per opportuna loca, qua per ipsum ex integro constitutis, qua collocupletatis ab ipso, magnæ spei convocavit, magnis laboribus instituit, juventutem Hispani,
 Vallisletii, Gadibus, Ulyssiponi, Duaci,
 Audomari, Romæ; quo duce et socio pater
 Edmundus Campianus, Catholicæ reipublicæ propugnator acerrimus, in Angliam primus ex Societate trajecit, quoque vindicæ et patrono veritatis, hostium passim exagitata temeritas, libris, scriptis, sermonibus, literis, exemplis, defensa religio, recreata sanctitas.
 Cum inter hæc ipse nullam caperet partem concessæ quietis, nullum a suo capite recusaret discrimen honestissimæ defensionis, semper paratus, semper erectus,
 semper in mediani flammam irrumpens, animæ magnæ prodigus, omnino vir, LXIII. explevit annos, ex quæis sex et triginta in Soc. Jesu per omnia virtutis
 exempla transegit.
 Obiit xv Aprilis
 MDCX.

Against the north wall, under an effigies in relieve at full length of a bishop in pontificalibus, is this inscription in capitals:—

"D. O. M.

Christophoro Archiep. Eboracen.
 S. Præsed. presb. cardinali Angliæ, a Julio II. pont. max. ob egregiam operam S. R. E. prestitam dum sui Regis legatus esset assumpto, quam mox et domi et foris castris pontificiis prefect. tutatus est.
 Obiit prid. id. Jul. A. Sal.
 MDCXIII.

In the west wall, on a white marble monument, is this inscription, partly obscured by the confessional chair:—

"D. O. M.

R. D. Nicholao Mortono, pro. Anglo, sacre theologiæ doctore clari, qui amicis char. ceterisq. bonis quibus pro fide Catholica in patria amissis A.

 LXXV, ætatis vero LXVI, Romæ mortuus est, A.D. MDLXXXII, d. xxvii. m. Ja-Voluit eodem tumulo cum cum quo eadem religionis
 Angliæ aufugit Romæq. simul venit.
 Mortonus nepos amantissimus patruo posuit."

W. D. MACRAY.

(To be continued.)

ST. WITHBURGA'S WELL AT EAST DEREHAM,
 NORFOLK. — Last year I sent a communication to "N. & Q." connected with St. Withburga's Well.
 A few days ago I visited the well again, and was surprised to find that the water was nearly all dried up. On mentioning the fact to the respected vicar (the Rev. B. J. Armstrong, B.A.), I was informed that the railway authorities at Dereham had lately sunk a very deep Artesian well, which was no doubt the cause of St. Withburga's Well having become so dry. He also told me that he was afraid the "sacred well" would soon become "a thing of the past" altogether, and that the spring which hitherto—according to the ancient legend—was said to have risen on the very spot where the body of St. Withburga had reposed, was now considered by the evidence of recent excavations to rise about a mile on the other side of the town.

The vicar has lately published an interesting Guide to the parish church of East Dereham, in which he quotes a curious receipt left on the high altar by the Lord Abbot of Ely, after the body of the saint had been removed to Ely by the monks.
 It is as follows:—

"I, Abbot of Ely, and Lord of Dereham, by and with the consent and approval of Edgar the King, have translated the body of St. Withburga to be hereafter kept in Ely Abbey with increased splendour and reverence; and
 This, Presbyter of Dereham, is my Receipt for the blessed Body aforesaid."—Historia Eliensis.

This document was found on the altar, written on parchment, when the mass-priest entered the church the morning following the translation of the body.

On the road leading to the beautiful vicarage is a fine picturesque old cottage bearing the date of 1503, which tradition points out as having been part of "Bishop Bonner's Palace." According to the statement of Mr. Armstrong, Edmund Bonner was vicar of Dereham in 1534, where he remained (according to White's Norfolk Directory,
 p. 936, ed. 1864), till the year 1540, when he became Bishop of London.

The present vicar has made great improvements in the parish church, particularly in the chancel, where the Piscina and Sedilia have been admirably restored.
 J. DALTON.
 Norwich.

INN SIGNS. — These lines I once saw over the door and on the sign of a beer-shop in Whitchurch, Hants, the occupant of which was a tailor, and his house was known by the sign of "The Cabbage," a representation of the vegetable, of which the tailors are said to be so fond, being placed on the sign: —

"All of their honesty will prate,
But who observes the plan?
Kings, Priests, and Ministers of State
Will cabbage all they can;
Let me this precedent pursue,
And cabbage all I can from you."

The above was over the door, and the following appeared on the sign: —

"Let Father Mathew rave and rant,
And spurn those blessings Heaven has sent;
I hail with joy a gift so dear
Bestowed on man, his heart to cheer.
Don't heed old Father Mathew's tale,
Nor take his pledge to drink no ale.
I'll pledge my cask good ale supplies,
Drink! but be moderate and wise."

J. W. BATCHELOR.

Odiham.

The following are taken from the Standard for September 4, 1865: —

"There is a sign with the following inscription at Ham Green, between Aylesbury and Bicester, upon a public-house kept by Jhon Huff: —

"Jhon Huff, he sells good beer, and that's enough.
Stop! there is a mistake here:
He sells foreign wine and spirits as well as beer."

Again: —

"The inscription on Farmer Peek's house, on the road from Cape Town to Simon's Bay, Cape of Good Hope: —

"Mulum in parvo, pro bono publico;
Entertainment for man or beast all of a row,
Lekker host as much as you please;
Excellent beds without any fleas.
Nos patriam fugimus—now we are here.
Vivamus, let us live by selling beer,
On donne à boire et à manger ici;
Come in and try it whoever you be—
The Gentle Shepherd of Salisbury Plain."

THOMAS T. DYER.

ERASMUS "DE CONTEMPTU MUNDI." — In 1533, Thomas Berthelet, King's printer, sent from his press a little volume in 12mo, entitled Erasmus De Contemptu Mundi, and purporting to be rendered into English by Thomas Paynel. But in Letters of Royal and Illustrious Ladies of Great Britain, edited by Mrs. Wood, i. 306, I find that, at the request of Margaret, Countess of Salisbury, Gentian Hevet translated this same work, and published it in 1533! No translation by Hevet appears to be known, but it is remarkable that Paynel's version was printed in the year mentioned by Mrs. Wood. The volume consists of 89 leaves, not 88, as stated by Lowndes. The last is occupied by a table.

W. CAREW HAZLITT.

PEDIGREE. — I see that in the new edition of Webster's Dictionary the derivation from "per degrés" is retained. The derivation from "ped de grue" is only alluded to. I remember the late George Offor, Esq., once showed me a curious broad-sheet, in which this word was printed "pedigrue" clearly pointing to the etymology which Webster does not follow. B. H. C.

ATLANTIC CABLE. — It is proposed that on the next attempt to lay an Atlantic cable two separate ones should be used. The shore ends being secured at Valentia and Newfoundland, the cables may be paid out simultaneously; when arriving at a certain point a splice may be made, and the entire cable committed to the deep. Had this course been adopted the late fatal disaster would have been avoided. A. C.

DATES OF BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS. — I wish you would permit me, through your columns, to call the attention of authors and publishers to the importance of placing the year of publication upon the title-pages of their works. I have lately had to refer to several pamphlets published within the last ten years, for statistical and other information, and have had considerable trouble in finding out the date to which the information was brought up. The value of an author's opinions or facts will often depend upon the precise time they were uttered. T. B.

Queries.

HAD LIONEL, DUKE OF CLARENCE, A SON?

"Certainly not," will probably be the answer immediately suggested to the mind of any genealogist who may read the question. I must beg, however, a moment's attention to the subject. There is one passage in one of the Issue Rolls, which, if we are to take exactly as it stands, there can be no doubt of the existence of a son of Lionel. If we regard it as a mistake on the part of the scribe, the question may yet be answered in the negative. I scarcely like to decide the point on my own responsibility, and should be grateful to any of your correspondents who would give me his opinion as to whether the evidence adduced below is sufficient, on the one hand, for the acceptance of the passage as it stands, or, on the other, for the supposition of a mistake on the part of the writer of the Roll.

The passage in question (which for more accuracy, I give verbatim), is as follows: —

"Isabelle filie dñi R. p manus ppas apud Eltham de p^{ost} sobiend' ad volunt' R. vidz, in p^t eiusdem Cape vocate Tripe deaurata et aymellat' e vnus parvus Cape p ipam lib de dono suo primogenito Leonelli Com' Dulnest' fñ dñi R. £21 . 2 . 6." (Issue Roll, 6 Nov. [1355] 80 E. III.)

This one word, "primogenito," is that on which the whole question turns. I have examined the word carefully, and no examination will change its appearance to "primogenita." This word, then, cannot refer to Philippa, the only hitherto acknowledged child of Lionel, unless we suppose some slip of the scribe's pen. The arguments pro and con appear to me to be as follows:—

1. On the 9th of October previous, we find a reward to John Prior, valet, for bringing news to the King "de natiuitate fit Comitisse Dulneestre, consort' Leonelli fit R." This does not help us, since there is no need to remark that "fit" may stand for either "filii" or "filie." But am I not right in supposing, that the contraction generally, if not always, implies the masculine gender, where the context does not lead to a different conclusion?

2. The birth of Philippa is set down by various writers as 1355 or 1360, and all assert that it took place at Eltham. I find no other intimation of the birth of a child of Lionel, and from the preceding passage it is evident that the money paid to Lady Isabel for the cups was given at Eltham. The first mention of Philippa is in the same Roll, under the date of Feb. 13, 1356, when 20*l.* was paid to Reginald de Pyrpount for the expenses of the "fit Com' Dulneestre" in the Abbey of Campsey. This entry reappears in the Paschal Roll for the same year, where the "filie" is given in full. (July 4. Pasch. 30 E. III.) If the entry relate to the birth of Philippa, she must have been sent to Campsey Abbey when only a few weeks old. On the 20th of October, 1357, and at Christmas, further payments are made to Reginald de Pyrpount, for Easter term, when it appears that Philippa was still at Campsey. On the 9th of October, 1358, the last payment is made for Philippa's sojourn at Campsey. It is paid this time to the Countess of Ulster her mother, and the entry states that she remained at Campsey for two years. (Mich. 33 E. III.) After this date, the name of Philippa is always found accompanying that of her mother. We may therefore suppose that her sojourn at Campsey was from the close of 1355 to that of 1357.

3. The gift of these gilt cups may intimate that Lady Isabel was, or was to have been (for the death of the child may have prevented it) one of the sponsors for the infant. Hardyng informs us (Chron. p. 333) that the sponsors of Philippa were, the Queen, the Archbishop of York, and the Countess of Warwick.

4. If the child born in 1355 were a brother of Philippa, she must have been older than he, as the dates of her residence at Campsey show. Yet Lionel Duke of Clarence was only seventeen in 1355.

Let me ask also, where was Campsey Abbey? I find it spelt in the Issue Rolls—Caumpesey, Caumpsey, and Campesse. In an extract from Rot. Pat. 21 E. III., in Rymer's MS., it is spelt Caumpesee. Was it in England or Ireland? The circumstances of the death of the Duchess of Clarence render this a point desirable to be ascertained. The reason for Philippa's sojourn there was that she might be under the care of her grandmother, Matilda of Lancaster, Countess of Ulster, who took the veil at Campsey in 1343.

Must I, then, conclude from the above that the scribe of the Issue Rolls wrote primogenito through a mere slip of the pen? I wish he had let his pen slip at some word of less genealogical and biographical importance. HERMENTRUDE.

ANNA BOLLENA PENNIES.—How is one to account for the name of Anna Bollena given to English pennies in Flanders? People whom I have asked say that it is from the figure with the shield and trident. W. H. JAMES WEALE.

Bruges.

ANONYMOUS.—1. The Black Dwarf. This was the title of a Whig political periodical published about 1819. It contains several dramatic pieces. Two having the signature W. R. H., and another having the title of "Gotham in Alarm," by "an Oddfellow." Can any of your readers give any information regarding the authorship?

2. Who is author of Poems of Early Years, by a (Senior?) Wrangler. London, 1851. The author was of Trinity College, Cambridge.

3. Who is author of Montatryn, the Benevolent Patriot, a Drama, in five Acts, exemplifying a Practical Plan for the Abolition or Diminution of Parochial Taxation, 1823. Where was this book printed?

4. Who is author of Rosemond, a Tragedy, 1820. Printed by W. Foat, London.

R. INGLIS.

BAROMETRIC LEECHES.—Some years ago papers were read upon this subject. Can you give me a clue to finding the publication in which these interesting particulars were printed? OLDUK.

"THE CHRISTIAN YEAR."—The Pull Mail Gazette, in a short notice of the death of the Rev. Samuel Rickards, which took place a week or so ago, states that he was an intimate friend of the Rev. John Keble, who "entrusted to Mr. Rickards a duplicate copy of the MS. of the Christian Year. Mr. Keble's copy was lost in Wales; and to Mr. Rickards the world is indebted for a work which has passed through thirty editions, and is as familiar to American as to English readers."

I have also heard a statement to the effect, that Mr. Keble offered the MS. to three publishers: Messrs. Parker, Messrs. Rivington, and Mr. Talboys of Oxford, for the insignificant sum of 20*l.* It was refused, but the first named firm undertook to publish it at the author's expense. The work has now passed through upwards of seventy editions, and it is said that the profits have been sufficient to enable its revered author to build three churches. Can any one inform me what amount of truth there is in these two statements?

R. B. PROSSER.

25, Southampton Buildings, W.C.

SIR JOHN DAVIES. — Of what family was Sir John Davies, Marshal of Connaught, temp. Eliz.? He possessed large grants of land, some of which, including Clonsanville Abbey, co. Roscommon, are still in possession of his descendants. He also exercised almost regal power (he had power of life and death) in Connaught; yet hitherto I have failed to find any further information about him than this, and that he is supposed to have been of Shropshire family. These questions have been already asked in "N. & Q." (2nd S. xi. 209, 277, 352), and as yet without any reply. They are particularly wanted for genealogical purposes.

F. R. DAVIES.

Hawthorn, Black Rock, Dublin.

DISCOVERY OF ANCIENT MSS. — The following singular list of discoveries is now going the round of the newspapers. Perhaps some of your correspondents can tell us what amount of truth there is in it: —

"Bibliophiles rejoice at the fact that in knocking down a modern villa erected on the site of an antique Roman dwelling some precious fragments have been discovered which fill up certain passages wanting in the 'Annals of Tacitus.' Furthermore, a few unpublished pages of the 'Republic' of Cicero have been found in the library of the old convent of Fucino; as also fragments of the lost books of Titus Livy's history. Canon Anthony Biffi is the fortunate student who has stumbled on these valuable relics of the past, and he has promised to publish them as soon as possible for the edification of the learned. Strange to say a somewhat similar discovery has been made in Mexico. It appears that a nuncio of former days left at his death the whole of Pambeo Litta's work, with valuable autograph notes. This work has been purchased by a French military surgeon." — Star. (Leeds Mercury, Aug. 29, 1865.)

A. O. V. P.

EPIGRAM ON A SECRETARY OF THE FRENCH ACADEMY. —

"Un savant homme loue dans une épigramme le Secrétaire de l'Académie Française de savoir si bien plusieurs langues, qu'on croiroit ses vers latins sont de Virgile, ses vers espagnols de Gongora, et ses vers italiens de Pétrarque, et lui dit ensuite à lui-même: —

'Oppida certarunt septem de patria Homeri,
De patria certant oppida mille tua.'

Il emploie la même pensée au sujet du fameux Grotius, dont l'on croyoit la religion assez incertaine, et il dit agréablement, que, comme Smyrne, Rhodes, Salamine, Colophon, Pyle, Argos et Athènes se disputent Homère, Arius, Socin, Arminius, Calvin, Luther et Rome se disputent Grotius." — Bouhours, Pensées Ingénieuses des Anciens et des Modernes.

Who was the savant and who was the secretary? Menage, I believe, never held that office, and I do not know any other Frenchman of that age who affected to write in various languages. Bouhours made from time to time additions to the Pensées. If the above is in the first edition of 1689, the then secretary is probably intended. What is the original Latin of the epigram on Grotius? —

FITZHOPEKINS.

Paris.

FREDERICK THE GREAT. — There is a work with this title: —

"Dictionnaire Politique; ou, Glossaire Alphabetique, que le célèbre D. J. Volkna, Professeur d'Eloquence Militaire et Politique au Collège de Berlin, a composé, pour ses leçons privées. Traduit sur l'imprimé Allemande." A Londres, 1762."

Querard (vol. iii. p. 205) ascribes this production to the great monarch of Prussia, upon the assertion of Rospini, a bookseller of Petersburg; but this is apparently the only authority for the assertion. Is there any corroborative evidence?

I have a MS. exceedingly neatly written, and doubtless of the date it bears, entitled, Les Mutinées du Roi de Prusse, pour son Neveu. A Berlin. 1760. Was this work Frederick's, and when was it printed?

With the copy of the Dictionnaire Politique there has been put up —

"Mémoire de Monsieur le Comte de Maillebois, Lieutenant Général des Armées du Roi Chrétien, et Maréchal Général des Logis de S. M. en 1757."

There is a separate title, but neither place of printing, printer's name, nor date. J. M.

GONZAGAS OF MANTUA. — What author gives the fullest account of this family, and the adventures of its principal members in the sixteenth century? NOELL RADECLIFFE.

HERALDIC QUERY. — On the old porch of the church of Stroud, in Gloucestershire, is sculptured an escutcheon, bearing a fess of two lines chequy between two crescents; tinctures not indicated.

These are supposed to be the arms of the person who built, or assisted to build, the porch and the south aisle to which it is an entrance. Both Atkins and Rudder attribute it, wholly or in part, to the Whittingtons of Lippiat. But these are not the bearings of the Whittingtons; and I shall feel obliged if any correspondent of "N. & Q." will say to what family these arms belonged.

P. H. F.

LAMMAS LANDS. — There is a vast tract of lands extending from Bow, near London, beyond Cambridge, and also running into Hertfordshire and the adjacent counties, which is held in this curious way. From old Lady Day (April 5) to old Lammas Day (August 12), they are the property of different owners, who are entitled to cut and carry the first crop of grass. On old Lammas Day they are thrown open to the various parishioners entitled to the rights of common of pasture; and, till the next 5th of April, they are absolutely common lands, with this exception, that only beasts of husbandry—cows, bullocks, and horses (averia), can be turned out. Tradition states that these lands were demesne of the crown, and granted to the inhabitants by King Alfred in consequence of their victory over the Danes when they went up the river Lea, and encamped at Hertford. Can any of the legal readers of "N. & Q." give me references to authors who have written on the subject, or any other information thereon? A. A.

Poets' Corner.

MELTHAM.—This is the name of a large village, township, and manor, in the parish of Almondbury, in the West Riding of the county of York. The name occurs in Domesday Book; since the date of which, no change has been introduced into its orthography. It is pronounced in two ways—by some Melth-am, and by others Melt-am; but no reason is assigned for the difference. About half a mile west of the village, there still exist (what are supposed to be) the remains of a small Roman encampment; and the Saxons and Danes are known to have settled in the neighbourhood. Can any one, therefore, suggest from elementary terms in the languages of either of these nations, the probable origin and meaning of the name?

LLALLAWG.

MILITARY.—I am much indebted to your correspondents for their answers to my former queries. Perhaps they or some other reader can give me further information on the following points:—

1. If the infantry regiments at one time numbered 134 and the dragoons 33, wore facings of any colour not now in use by these regiments?

2. In the Annual Army List, 1808, the oldest I have at hand (Half-Pay List), the subalterns of several disbanded regiments appear as Second Lieutenants. When was the distinction between Ensigns and Second Lieutenants first made, and did any Fusileer, Rifle, or Light Infantry regiments exist among the numbered regiments of infantry beyond those now in the Army List?

3. Can I learn anything as to the following corps? 85th Royal Volunteers, 88th Royal Welsh Volunteers. These two regiments appear in the Stations of the Army in the Annual Register, 1763, and were, I think, disbanded soon after. Also the York Fusileers, who appear in the early part of the last French war. MILES PEDITUS.
Glasgow.

"O DEAR ME!"—Will any of your obliging correspondents kindly point out the origin and etymology of this singular, yet very general, expression, which, in its existing form, seems to be entirely void of sense? The constant usage of such expressions, and their frequent occurrence in the very vernacular of the vulgar, is too apt to make us lose sight of their real force. Great credit is due to "N. & Q." for its invaluable services in the field of folk-lore and common sayings. I do not remember having seen an explanation of this phrase. Is it possible that it can be an adaptation of "O Domine," an expression frequently occurring in the ancient liturgy of the church of England, in the mass, but particularly in the Preces and Responses, and which would consequently be noticed by the people in the regular and monastic services? Hence, from its frequent repetition on the lips of priest and people, it might have been parodied, or converted into the phrase in question.

Mr. Matthew Arnold would, perhaps, call this "a freak in etymology;" but, prima facie, it certainly does not appear more improbable than that "hocus-pocus" should have its origin in "Loc est corpus meum," or than "O my eye and Betty Martin" as the rendering of "O mihi et beata Maria!" It is noteworthy, not that it is a proof of the probability of my suggestion, but because it is illustrative of my point at least, that the French have "O, mon Dieu!" the Germans "Ach lieber Gott!" or "Mein lieber Gott!" There is also great similarity in the interjection Dame! Lord from domine, as madame is mea domina. But the nearest approach to the English phrase is the ejaculation of the Italian, "Dio mio," which R. E. E. W., in "N. & Q." (3rd S. viii. 131), says he at first supposed to be "O dear me."

I have heard it suggested that there is the idea of cost, or self-loss, in the word "dear" here, but it must be remembered that this is only a secondary meaning of the word. I wished to draw the attention of your readers to the subject, believing that I shall thus meet with a satisfactory explanation. A. H. K. O. L.

OLD MINIATURE.—At the sale of the effects of a baronet of ancient descent in the north of England, whose title we suspect is extinct, amongst a lot of miscellaneous articles was included a miniature, exquisitely painted upon silver, of a young man, name unknown. The size is about that of a five shilling piece, oval, not round. The dress is of the latter portion of the reign of James, or the beginning of that of his son. The hair is dark; the moustache above the upper lip neatly trimmed; the chin cleanly shaved; no whiskers. He has about his neck one of those delicately cut ruffs then in fashion. Were any of the artists of that period accustomed to paint on silver? J. M.

PEDIGREE OF D'AVILA.—Is there any Spanish peerage or published genealogy of the families of the present grandees of Spain, where I can meet believe, however, the facts of the case were altogether different, and that the abdication of Napoleon was not known to him until after the battle. I have a distinct recollection that the Duke of Wellington, I think in the House of Lords, stated in justice to the French general, that he had sent up the despatches which contained the intelligence to the French camp after the battle. This acquits Soult of the foul charge of having entered upon the contest with a guilty knowledge, and of having carried it on for the selfish purpose of redeeming some of the laurels which he had lost in his previous struggles with the British Commander-in-Chief.

Such matters are all-important in historical inquiries; and I should feel greatly obliged if any of your readers could refer me to the occasion and the data when the Duke of Wellington made the explanation I have referred to. T. B.

Queries with Answers.

JAMES BOSWELL, Esq.—Is any work extant bearing especially on the life and memoirs of J. Boswell, Esq. (author of Johnson's Table-Talk), ancestor to Sir Jas. Boswell, Bart.? This biographer of the illustrious Dr. Johnson gave good dinners and good claret; he was a bon vivant, and a lover of the Bourdeaux grape. An account of his masquerade dress is given in the London Mag. 1769. The celebrated Corsican patriot, Pascal Paoli, when in England, was his particular friend about that period, which was when his secretary, Carlo Maria Buonaparte and his wife Letitia resided at Corte, previous to the birth of Napoleon I. probably. He published an entertaining account of Corsica when under the government of Paoli, in 1766. Among his visitors and guests, about 1768, were David Hume, Sir J. Pringle, F.R.S., Dr. Franklin, Gen. Oglethorpe (the friend of Goldsmith) also David Garrick, and other notabilities of the age. Oglethorpe himself kept a good table, and patronised all the wits of the period; well known as the founder of Georgia in America, 1738; the only snipe shooter on the wing in England of the time; shot snipes where Conduit Street and Marylebone, and Pimlico now exist. George II. used to go out to see him shoot. He was the opponent of John Wesley in Georgia, and the monarch of the North American Indians there. About 1793, Boswell intended to espouse Miss Milles of Exeter, daughter of the Chattertonian dean, renowned for his antiquarian and classic lore, and for his discovery of the Roman penates near Broadgate, Exeter, whose name will ever live in the pages of Devonian literature. Among his friends in Devonshire was the Rev. W. J. Temple, the rector of Mamhead, near Dawlish, at present the seat of Sir L. Newman, Bart., and one of the most charming gems of that varied and undulating county. I believe he married a Miss Montgomerie in 1770.

I should be glad to know if any private memoirs or records exist of this worthy and respected chum and friend of Samuel Johnson beyond the Table-Talk. James Boswell died on May 19, 1795. BREVIS.

[Most biographical dictionaries contain some notice of James Boswell, the friend of Dr. Johnson. Perhaps the best account of this good-natured social individual is that contained in Chambers's Biographical Dictionary, i. 276—288, which is followed with some particulars of his two sons, Alexander and James. Consult also Letters of James Boswell addressed to the Rev. W. J. Temple, 1857, 8vo. This work also contains a Biographical Introduction.]

THE CODE OF HONOUR.—Where is the Code of Honour, as held by modern duellists, to be found? The author of Guy Livingstone, in speaking of a character whom he evidently does not intend to make guilty of any infraction of its laws, says:—

“He had lingered some time within reach of England, to give Mannering an opportunity of demanding satisfaction. But the injured husband knew his man too well to trust himself within fifteen paces of Mohun's pistol.”

Now I have always understood that, when satisfaction is given to an injured husband, his fire is not returned. B.

[Our present correspondent having followed the example of too many others, in giving us no reference to the page or chapter where we might find and verify the passage in question, we feel ourselves fortunate in having had to search a novel of one volume, and not of three.

Though a gentleman is a gentleman all the world over, and men of honour, being actuated by common principles and by common feelings, understand each other meet where they will, we apprehend that with regard to the rules of duelling, there exists not, and never did exist, any one code, uniform in all its details, and alike prevailing and recognised throughout civilised society. The code as it prevails, or rather did prevail in England, the French code, the German code, the American code, have each and all their distinguishing features and their practical differences, more or less important.

This consideration, perhaps, affords the true solution of the question now before us. Had the affair been between Englishmen, we apprehend that, under the circumstances of the case, the injured party might have taken his pop at the offender without anticipating a return fire. But we are not quite clear how far the same rule would have held good according to Irish views, and Mohun, the offender, is an Irishman. (Guy Livingstone, ch. xvi.) We know of no written code of duelling which was ever generally and permanently received in Ireland; but Sir Jonah Barrington has given us a code which was intended to be so received, “Prescribed for general adoption throughout Ireland;” and of which the thirteenth rule vir fortissimus, in hoc consilium adsciret. Peredeo cum reginæ suadenti tanti nefas consensum adhibere nollet, illa se noctu in lectulo suæ Vestiarie, cum qua Peredeo stupri consuetudinem habebat, supposuit, ubi Peredeo rem nescius veniens cum regina concubuit. Cumque illa, patrato jam scelere, ab eo quæreretur, quam se esse existimaret, et ipse nomen suæ amicæ, quam esse putabat, nominasset, Regina subjunxit: Nequaquam ut putas, sed ego Rosemunda sum, inquit. Carte nunc talem rem Peredeo perpetrata habes, ut aut tu Alboin interficias, aut ipse te suo gladio extinguat. Tunc ille intellexit malum quod fecit, et qui sponte noluerat, tali modo in regis necem coactus assensit. Tunc Rosemunda, dum se Alboin meridie sopori dedisset, magnum in Palatio silentium fieri præcipiens, omnia alia arma subtrahens, spatham illius ad lectuli caput, ne tolli aut evaginari posset, fortiter colligavit, et juxta consilium Helmichis, Peredeo interfectorem, omni bestia crudelior, introduxit. Alboin subito de sopore expergefactus, malum quod imminabat intelligens, manum citius ad spatham porraxit, quam strictius religatam extrahere non valens, apprehenso tamen scabello suppedaneo, se cum eo per aliquod spatium defendit. Sed heu prohi dolor, vir bellicosissimus et summæ audacia, nihil contra hostem prævalens, quasi unus de inermibus interfectus est, uniusque mulierculæ consilio periit, qui per tot hostium strages bello famosissimus extitit. Cujus corpus cum maximo Langobardorum fletu et lamentis, sub cujusdam scalæ adscensu, quæ palatio erat contigua, sepultum est. Fuit autem statura procera, et ad bella peragenda toto corpore coaptatus. Hujus tumulum nostris in diebus Gisbertus, qui dux Veronensium fuerat, aperiens, spatham ejus, et si quid in ornatu ipsius inventum fuerat, abstulit. Qui ob hanc causam vanitate solita apud indoctos homines, Alboin se vidisse, jactabat."—Lib. i. cap. xxvii., and Lib. ii. cap. xxviii. pp. 40, 41, 70-72.

H. W. T.

SYMBOLIZATION OF COLOURS IN HERALDRY.

(3^d S. viii. 159.)

The inventor, whoever he may have been, of printed or "tricked" equivalents, for heraldic tinctures, seems to have discovered, rather than to have designed arbitrarily, a system which we may daily recognise in its effects as the result of natural and not artificial laws.

The horizontal lines expressive of azure are absolutely necessary, in linear engraving, to give a correct idea of that colour. Distance and atmosphere, as well as water, could not be rendered intelligible (even, we may assume, to the uneducated eye), by vertical or oblique lines.*

Terrestrial inanimate objects, on the contrary, are characterized by obliquity or angularity as the contours of rocks and trees which partake of the vertical, oblique, and occasionally horizontal, but all more or less mixed; hence we have the greens, purples, blacks (?), and tawneys of heraldry.

* I have observed at sea the horizontal parallelism of the waves receding into the blue distance, and how, in consequence, the perpendicular or vertical arrangement of the French tricolor flag, makes it at once conspicuous at great distances, whereas the same three colours of the Dutch flag, arranged horizontally, blend with and are soon lost in the distance.

Flame or fire, being the element most opposed to fluid, the tendency of which is of course to lie horizontal, presents the most direct contrast, and must be represented by vertical lines. No others could conveniently be substituted to represent the aspiring element, hence gules.

As for the metals, argent or white explains itself; but the dots used to represent yellow, or or, seems more obscure. Still we may infer something from the fact of motes in the sunbeam, and the effect produced on the eye after gazing on a brilliant yellow object. Motes or specks seem to float before the vision, and this effect (absurd as the illustration may appear) is a very common result of a well known yellow secretion, bile.

I shall not proceed further with the minor heraldic tinctures, my object being simply to propound the query, viz., Are not these symbols of colours in heraldry based upon scientific principles, and not merely an arbitrary arrangement, invented as a convenient substitute or equivalent.

The question of colours and lines appears to me to be one of the relation of form to colour, and not of relative colours in nature and art. "Witches oils" might burn "green, and white, and blue," but to represent them without colours, the oil itself as a fluid would have to be represented by horizontal lines, while the flames arising from it would necessarily be represented by only three "forms"—the vertical of gules, the white space of argent, or the dots of yellow. Thus fire and the metals have in this symbolization a natural affinity.

SPAL.

PURGATORY OF ST PATRICK.

(3^d S. viii. 68, 111.)

F. C. H. asserts that the legend of St. Patrick's Purgatory "does not appear in any authenticated Life of St. Patrick." Either this assertion must be erroneous, or its author finds another meaning in the word authenticated than the one generally received and understood. A Life of St. Patrick, or indeed of any other saint, except a very modern one, if there be such, could only be authenticated by authority of the higher powers of the Church, and I believe that Montalvan's Vida in the original is so authorised and authenticated. The Portuguese translation is con Licencias, and we all know what those words signified in Portugal during the seventeenth century. Nevertheless, there are six separate letters of approbation and authorisation attached to the volume. The French translation is thus entitled:—

"Histoire de la Vie et du Purgatoire de Saint Patrice, Archevesque et Primat d'Irlande. Mise en François par le R. P. François Bouillon, de l'Ordre S. François, Bachelier en Théologie. A Paris, 1648. Avec Privilege du Roy, et Approbation des Docteurs."

The approbation, which is on another page, runs as follows:—

"Permission D. V. R. P. Provincial.

"Nous soubs-signé Docteur en Théologie de la Faculté de Paris, Ministre Provincial, et Commissaire Général de la Grande Province de France de l'Observance S. François, avons permis et permettons au R. P. François Bouillon, Bachelier en Théologie, Religieux du même Ordre, de mettre en lumière un livre intitulé, Histoire de la Vie et du Purgatoire de S. Patrick, Archevêque et Primat d'Irlande, mise en François par sa diligence et son soin. Fait en nostre Monastère de Saint Claire au Faubourg S. Marcel lez Paris, ce 27 Novembre 1612.

"F. P. Rouze, Ministre Provincial."

"Nous soubs-signés Docteurs en Théologie de la Faculté de Paris, certifions avoir lu un livre intitulé La Vie, les Miracles, et le Purgatoire de S. Patrick, etc., mise en François par le R. P. François Bouillon, Bachelier en Théologie, dans lequel nous n'avons rien trouvé qui soit contraire à la Foy, et aux bonnes mœurs. Fait à Paris ce 7 Decembre, 1612.

"F. DE FRESNE DE MENGE.

"P. CORPIN."

So, in this work, which gives the sensational story of the Life of Enio—his murders, robberies, and seduction of an unfortunate nun—there is, according to those Reverend Doctors of Theology, nothing contrary to the faith or good manners.

There is yet a strange Italian Life of St. Patrick, with a full account of the Purgatory, quite different from the Life by Montalvan, and bearing the extraordinary title of—

"Il Mosé dell' Ibernia. Vita del Glorioso S. Patrizio, Canonico Regolare Lateranense, Apostolo e Primate dell' Ibernia, descritta. Dall' Abb. D. Giacomo Certani, Can. Reg. Lat., Dottore Filosofo e Collegiato, e nell' Università di Bologna Publico Professore di Filosofia Morale. In Bologna. Con Licenza de' Superiori, 1686."

There are four several authorities attached to this work, of which the following is probably not the least important:—

"Die 2 Junij, 1683.

"A. R. P. Camillus Etori Sac. Jesu videat, si placeat, præsentem Librum, cui titulus, Il Mosé dell' Ibernia, etc., et referat an attentis Regulis Indicis, Sac. Canonis, et aliis Constitutionibus Apostolicis, concedi possit, quod Typis mandetur, etc. Fr. Paulus Hieronymus Giacomus Inquisit. Bononiæ."

The work itself is scarcely worthy of notice, it being just what might be expected of a learned Doctor and Professor of Moral Philosophy, who describes St. Patrick as a Canon Regular, the saint having died centuries before the Order was instituted. Still I can scarcely imagine that F. C. H. will now state that it is unauthenticated. I may add, that it contains a curious engraving representing St. Patrick doing battle with the demons, and using his bell as an offensive weapon—according to a tradition still current among the lower orders in Ireland. The following epigraph is prefixed to the engraving:—

"Stus. Patritius catervas Demonum visibiliter ex Iibernia populavit; ex eius Vit."

Besides the authenticated lives, there is a curious lighter literature of S. gatory, among which we drama. Also a less known titled St. Patrick for Ireland the romance is but a st Patrick's Purgatory forms one of the finest of the old Guerino detto il Meschino, Florentine in the fourteen yourite book of Don Quix the Canon of Toledo, "So to say that the history of false!"

And I have what Carlyl lying book, printed at An entitled En Nieu Histoire which also gives an account gatory, and an engraving gallants, attended by two monks, about to enter. This is a very tantalising I cannot read Dutch; but into English, and long p My English copy, purport edition, entitled The Right History of Fortunatus, w. Looking Glass on London we have a different accou Purgatory from that give tracted from the Passiona of Pantagruelistic pleasant work, has no doubt occasi pularity; though it is er by any authority whatever PRESTER JOHN (1st S. MS., referred to antè p. 1. rian voyage," contains "th Joannes and of the first g cessors for many years. "Now in the Cottonian C preserved a copy of it in X see Dee's Diary, edited fo p. 38. Cf. Catalogi MSS. 2 p. 358.

According to Purchas Janni. King of Ethiopia i to whom the Dominican A bassador by Emanuel, Kin founded with Prester John

"This eye-witness," he s Priest John, following the v the relations of a Priest John applied to this Negus of Ethi you may see at large."—TI Journal of Rubruquis, A.D. 121

Raulin, in his Historia (pp. 353-4), shows that spread over the history of in the confusion made by the ancients between India in Asia and Ethiopia, which was colonised from thence, and consequently called India in Africa; and also, that there were two Prester Johns, "sicuti et Presbyter Joannes in Æthiopia Africana ex alio Presbytero Joanne Indico, cui Tartari tributa pendebant." See also Munsteri Cosmogr., 1329; Leibnitz, Accessiones Historicae, ii. 345 sq.; Mosheim's Historia Tartarorum, pp. 23-4; and Ecclesiastical History, tenth century, chap. i. The Portuguese conjecture that Prester John's Christian kingdom was in Abyssinia was abandoned in the seventeenth century; see Geddes' Church History of Ethiopia, p. 1.

We find in Brunet, who refers to Panzer and Hain, an early printed book entitled Joannes Presbyter, De ritu et moribus Indorum; republished with the title:—

"Tractatus pulcherrimus de situ, dispositione regionum et insularum totius India, necnon de rerum mirabilium ac gentium diversitate. — Voy. Nouvelles de la terre de prestre ichan, et au mot Lettera."

For other authorities, see Universal History, Modern, vi. 169-72. Sir John Mandevile thus quaintly writes of the Emperor Prester John:—

"And also he hath born before him a Vessel full of Jewels, and Gold, and precious stones, in token of his present Nobleness and of his Might; he hath born before him likewise a Platter of Gold full of Earth, in token that all Lordship and Nobleness shall turn to nought, and all flesh shall turn to earth."

BIBLIOTHECAR. CHETHAM.

"ANIMALI PARLANTI" (3rd S. viii. 90.)—Can any of your readers inform me whether the passage quoted from W. S. Rose's translation and condensation is from the original poem? I cannot find it; nor does it appear to me quite in Casti's style. Your correspondent is probably right in supposing the allusion is taken from Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato. He will find a further notice of Albracca in Hallam's Literature, in his remarks on Bojardo's poem. C. J.

BRAOSE (3rd S. viii. 86, 197.)—Many thanks to your correspondent for his kind attempt to unravel my difficulties. I gather from the genealogical table, that he considers the Countess Marshal to have been the wife of the younger William de Braose, and not Mary de Ros at all. Whose daughter, then, was the Countess Marshal?

Again, am I to gather that "Eleanor, daughter of Sir Roger Bavent," married first Peter de Braose, and afterwards his brother William?

The startling intimation, that Thomas of Brotherton was the son of Ralph de Camoys and Margaret de Braose, instead of King Edward I. and Marguerite of France, is, I presume, a mere printer's error. HERMENTRUDE.

ROBIN HOOD BALLAD (3rd S. viii. 88, 158, 199.) If A. H. K. C. L. will refer to my extract from

Mr. Hunter's Tract, he will see that Mr. Hunter does not discuss the question whether Watlynge Street passed by Barnsdale, but merely implies a doubt about the correctness of the ballad writer.

I think I have seen (but have no means of verifying my impression) the lines written:—

"Walks up unto the Sayles,
Up unto Barnyt dale."

Perhaps the following extract from the third volume of Testamenta Eboracensia, just published by the Surtees Society, may have some bearing upon the question of the Sayles:—

"1411, April 23. Dispensation allowing Robert, son of Roger le Massy of Sale, Domicellus, and Margaret, dau. of Sir George Canington, divi Cov. and Lichfield, to marry, they being related in the 4th degree."—Reg. Langley, at Durham, 47^a, Op. Cit., p. 320.

H. J.

Sheffield.

On referring to Professor Pearson's valuable work, The Early and Middle Ages of England, I find this passage:—

"Two great roads connected London with the Hines of Hadrian: one going westward to Chester, swerving east to York (the northern prefect's residence); and then going westward again to Boroness. This is the famous Watling Street of Anglo-Saxon times."

Hence it would appear that there was a branch from the main road, bearing the same name; and which would, in all probability, pass by Barnsdale.

In this case the mention of Watling Street in the ballad would be strictly correct, and Mr. Hunter would be right in his assertion. It seemed to me improbable that Erming Street should be meant, as Mr. Ritson supposes.

A. H. K. C. L.

PERPLEXED RELATIONSHIP (3rd S. viii. 190.)—The following table will clear up A. A.'s difficulty:—

HERMENTRUDE.

CONEYGARE, CONEYGARTH (3rd S. viii. 48, 78, 119.)—X. Y. Z. has discovered that there are actually no less than three places bearing these names noticed in the Ordnance Maps of Wilts. and Dorset. And another correspondent thinks the term confined to the south of England! A tolerably extensive acquaintance with landed property south of the Tweed for over half a century enables me to assure these gentlemen that there are few old manor houses or monasteries to which there was not attached a coneygare, coneygre, or conygarth, that is to say a rabbit-warren; and although the land is now, in very many instances, applied to a different purpose, the name is retained in the terriers, and is in common use by the farmers or occupiers. In fact I know no name of more frequent occurrence in descriptions of the fields on a farm than the coneygare, coneygre, or conygarth. It is a strange fancy to seek far-fetched etymologies of local names in Great Britain from Latin, Greek, Sanskrit, or anywhere but in the language of the people by whom such names were most likely originally imposed. A much larger portion of our local appellations than is generally supposed are Ancient British, or as we now term it Welsh. Those in question are so: cwning, a rabbit, caer, in composition gaer, a town, a camp; cwning-gaer, literally a rabbit's town or camp. Cwning-arth, from cwning and garth, in composition arth, a fold, an inclosure, is much the same thing.

T. W.

MAESMOR (3rd S. vii. 67.)—Your learned correspondent, F. C. H., asks whether there can be any connection between this name of a parish near Gloucester, and Maesymor or Mazmorras. I must confess such a question from such a quarter occasioned me no small surprise; however, as no one has replied to it, I will merely observe that the name is pure Welsh; Maes mawr, the great field. Maes is a field in the most extensive sense, as a battle-field, &c., and mawr, great. We may very naturally inquire the origin of this name as applied to the parish near Gloucester. The only extensive plain or field comprised within its boundary is the north part of the Isle of Alney, so noted in English history as the scene of the combat between Edmund Ironsides and Canute. Whether this may not be the allusion intended I cannot pretend to determine; but it appears to me extremely probable.

T. W.

BODEHERSTE (3rd S. viii. 188.)—MR. BATHURST may consult:—

"Domesday, faithfully translated, with an Introduction, Notes, and Illustrations, by Samuel Henshall, M.A., and John Wilkinson, M.D. London, 1799. 4to. Part I. Containing Kent, Sussex, and Surrey."

For his information I may add, that the name "Bodeherste" does not appear in the index to the folio reprint of Domesday, published by order of the House of Commons in 1783—1816. Neither is it in the index to Bohn's edition of Dugdale's Monasticon.

R. B. PROSSER.

25, Southampton Buildings, W.C.

WASHINGTON AND EXCELSIOR (3rd S. vi. 90.)—The device upon the saucer, possessed by EIRIORNACH, is the coat of arms of the State of New York, perhaps badly painted. What he calls a globe, is the shield. The two female supporters are Justice and Liberty: the latter with a palm branch in one hand, and a rod surmounted with a liberty cap (not a thimble) in the other. The crest is an eagle, standing on a hemisphere (not a bird cage). The motto, "Excelsior," refers to the rising sun upon the shield; which device and motto are very appropriate to the State of New York, which, from being the third state in the Union in population, has become the first. The set of china probably had a different coat of arms on each piece. A book published in London a few years ago, called Things not Generally Known, asserts that "Excelsior" is the motto of the United States. "E pluribus unum," is the motto of the Union.

UNEDA.

Philadelphia.

THE HALL OF LOST STEPS (3rd S. vi. 415.)—The lobby, or entrance to the courts of law in Paris, was formerly called "La Salle des Pas Perdus," in allusion to the waste of time therein by clients.

UNEDA.

Philadelphia.

BURIAL IN COFFINS (3rd S. vii. 113, 266.)—Your correspondents may be interested in the following extract from a terrar of lands, fees, &c. belonging to this vicarage. The date of the terrar is 1707:—

"The Parish Clerk is chosen by the Vicar, his Salary paid as followeth, viz., the Churchwardens pay him yearly for looking to the Clock and ringing a bell at the Customary hours day and night, seventeen shillings, and the Costables eleven shillings. For every passing bell, five pence, for every grave in the Churchyard and without Coffin, four pence; if with Coffin, one shilling. If the grave be within the Church, two shillings. Every marriage with licence, one shilling; without licence, sixpence. At every Christening or Churching feast, either his dinner or four pence."

H. M.

Caistor, Lincolnshire.

MARSHALL (3rd S. viii. 100.)—This word, I imagine, is clearly derived from the French Maréchal, which in its turn comes from Marschalens, a Teutonic Latin compound adopted by the Normans, and signifying a shoer of horses, farrier, or smith. This functionary was a person of considerable importance, and even honour, in the days of chivalry, when neither king nor noble could dispense with his constant services. Maréchal is the modern French word for a farrier.

H. A. KENNEDY.

Gay Street, Bath.

ANONYMOUS HYMNS (3rd S. viii. 168.)—On the authority of the useful articles in the Penny Post, which have before been of service to us, I attribute some of the hymns which form the subject of D. Y.'s query to the undermentioned authors and sources:—

124. "Thou art gone up." Emma Toke or S. Phillimore.

193. "From highest heaven." Sir H. Baker.

232. "O praise our God." Rev. W. W. How (1860).

236. "In grief and fear." Rev. W. Bullock.

237. "Rejoice to day." Rev. W. W. How.

240. "The year is gone." From the Latin.

253. "Praise to God." Rev. R. M. Benson, Curate of Cowley.

261. "Come pure hearts." Adam of St. Victor.

272. "Ye servants of our glorious King." S. Ambrose.
St. SWITHIN.

ST. JAMES'S FIELDS (3rd S. viii. 191.)—In an Act, 1662, for repairing the highways of London and Westminster, among other thoroughfares of St. James's, mention is made of—

"One other street in St. James's Fields, commonly called the Pall Mall; and also one other, beginning from the Mews up to Piccadilly (now the Haymarket), and thence to the Stone bridge to the furthestmost building near the Bull, at the corner of Air Street."—Knight's England, vol. iii. book viii. ch. iv., "National Industry."

I infer, from this account, that the whole of the streets mentioned, from Petty France to Air Street, were then St. James's Fields; which, like those of St. George's and St. Giles's, retained their names in popular reference long after they were mapped into streets, but without a definite idea of their bounds.
J. A. G.

"WILL O' THE WISP" (3rd S. viii. 69, 160.)—As the supposed cause of this phenomenon is alluded to in Dr. HAHN's note, I may refer him to a little treatise, entitled—

"Natural and Philosophical Conjectures on the Ignis Fatuus, or Jack in the Lantern: endeavouring to prove that the Light so called proceeds from some Flying Insect, and not from a fixed Vapour, as generally believ'd. With a Description and Curious Figure of the Indian Lantern Fly: a Nocturnal Insect, which carries a Light in dark Nights, equal to that of our Will with a Whisp. London, 12mo, 1736."

This treatise forms part of a volume, entitled—

"A Description of a Great Variety of Animals and Vegetables, &c.: being a Supplement to a Description of Three Hundred Animals, &c. London, 12mo, 1736."

This was followed by—

"A Description of some Curious and Uncommon Creatures, omitted in the Description of Three Hundred Animals, and likewise in the Supplement to that Book, &c. In which is included, the Natural History of those Great Curiosities, the Chimpanzee, Male and Female, brought from the Angola, on the Coast of Guinea, and late publicly shown in London. Illustrated with Sixteen Copper Plates, &c. London, 12mo, 1739."

The original work is entitled:—

"A Description of above Three Hundred Animals, &c.; with a particular Account of the Manner of Catching Whales in Greenland, &c. Illustrated with Copper-plates, whereon is curiously engraven every Beast, Bird, Fish, Serpent, and Insect, described in the whole Book. 12mo. London, —."

My copy is a later edition, Glasgow, 1794, 12mo.
WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

BISHOPS' LAWN SLEEVES (3rd S. viii. 169.)—

"The rochette is spoken of in the old Ordo Romanus under the title of linea; and has, no doubt, been very anciently used by bishops in the western Church. During the Middle Ages it was their ordinary garment in public. The word rochette is not, however, of any great antiquity, and perhaps cannot be traced further back than the thirteenth century. The chief difference between this garment and the surplice formerly was, that its sleeves were narrower than those of the latter; for we do not perceive, in any of the ancient pictures of English bishops, those very wide and full lawn sleeves which are now used."—Palmer's Origines Liturgica, vol. ii. p. 318.

One of the plates appended to Mr. Palmer's work, represents a bishop dressed in a chimere and rochette. See also the frontispiece to Hart's Ecclesiastical Records.
C. J. ELLIOTT.

Winkfield Vicarage.

I have an engraving by G. Vertue, 1750, from a picture by Holbein, representing King Edward VI. presenting the charter of Bridewell Hospital to the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London. On the king's right stands Thomas Goodrich, or Goodrick, Bishop of Ely, dressed apparently in white lawn sleeves.
F. J. J.

REGIMENTAL MEDAL (3rd S. viii. 150.)—The medal Ob. "Bust of Wm. III.," &c., of which there are several varieties, is simply one formerly worn by members of Orange Lodges. The old 87th, originally known as "Keith's Highlanders" in 1759, and afterwards as the "Prince of Wales's Irish," could not with propriety wear such a medal. Whether the soldiers of the 87th ever wore a regimental medal, I should be only too glad to know; my own impression is, that there is no regimental medal for the 87th Regiment.

GIBSON.

Liverpool.

ST. AUGUSTINE'S MONSTERS (3rd S. viii. 178.)—The explanation suggested by F. A. is entitled to attention on more grounds than one: for while it goes far to vindicate the veracity of St. Augustine, it furnishes at the same time a serviceable measure to gauge the value of tradition by.

MELETES.

HERALDIC PUZZLE (3rd S. viii. 208.)—Would not the husband of A.'s daughter be entitled to bear on an escutcheon of pretence her paternal and maternal arms quarterly, which if she had not been a co-heiress he would have impaled?

JOSEPH RIX, M.D.

St. Neot's.

Miscellaneous.

NOTES ON BOOKS, ETC.

Calendarium Genealogicum. Henry III. and Edward I. (In Two Volumes.) Edited by Charles Roberts, Secretary to the Public Record Office. Published by authority of the Commissioners of H. M. Treasury, under the direction of the Master of the Rolls. (Longman.)

It would be impossible, within the space at our disposal, to convey to our readers any adequate idea of the vast amount of Genealogical information to be found in these two volumes; or to compress in an intelligible form the full and satisfactory account given by Mr. Roberts in his ample and exhaustive preface, of the materials from which these volumes have been compiled, the varied character of those materials, and the many important subjects which they serve to illustrate. The particular series of Records from which the present work has been compiled is denominated the "Inquisitions post mortem," because such Inquisitions are by far the most important documents in the collection, which consists in addition, however, of "Inquisitions ad quod damnum," "Assignments of Dower," "Proofs of Age," "Extents," and "Valuations" of lands and tenements, and occasionally of personal effects, "Sheriffs' and Coroners' Inquisitions," "Escheats," documents relating to the lands of "felons and fugitives," and to "disputed inheritances" petitions to the King, and pleas and returns to writs of Certiorari. There are Inquisitions also taken on particular occasions; for instance, to ascertain boundaries and liberties of various kinds, of markets and fairs, ferries and fisheries, tithes and common of pasture; or local duties, as the repair of roads and bridges; or personal duties, as taking the order of knighthood. So that the title by which the whole series is called "Inquisitions post mortem," affords a very limited and imperfect idea of what it actually contains. From these documents all the genealogical matter contained in them has here been carefully extracted, all the extracts being given in the exact words of the Record; but instead of retaining the difficult abbreviations in which they are written, and which render them so unintelligible to those who are not practised therein, the words are given in extenso, with such slight alteration in the spelling as is necessary to render the text intelligible to persons not accustomed to mediæval Latin. An index of upwards of 150 pages, printed in double columns, gives completeness to this important book.

The Chronicle of "The Complete Angler" of Izaak Walton and Charles Cotton. Being a Bibliographical Record of its various Phases and Mutations. By Thomas Westwood. (Willis & Sotherton.)

To the numerous admirers of Izaak Walton—and how many and variously minded are the good men and true, who are bound together by the one link of love and reverence for the memory of that worthy man!—the present volume will have peculiar interest. It is not a mere bibliographical account of the fifty-three editions of The Complete Angler, which had appeared up to the time when Mr. Westwood brought his task to a close, for it abounds in incidental disclosures; since, as the writer observes, it is difficult in summing up the revivals, and telling the tale of the successes of England's one perfect Pastoral, not to be tempted occasionally out of the dusty highway of listmaking into those simious meadow-paths of gossip and garrulity, that seem so much more germane to the matter. We should probably have had a word or two to say upon some of these "simious meadow-paths of gossip and garrulity," but we read the book by the side of the Lea, and the spirit of Walton shed its gentle influence over us.

An Enlarged and Illustrated Edition of Dr. Webster's Complete Dictionary of the English Language. Thoroughly revised and improved. By Chancey A. Goodrich, D.D., &c., and Noah Porter, D.D., &c. To be completed in Twelve Monthly Parts. Parts VII. and VIII. (Bell & Daldy.)

We are glad to chronicle the steady progress of this admirable and remarkably cheap Dictionary. The eighth Part brings the work down to the word "SCANTLING."

BOOKS AND ODD VOLUMES

WANTED TO PURCHASE.

Particulars of Price, &c., of the following Books, to be sent direct to the gentlemen by whom they are required, whose names and addresses are given for that purpose:—

EUROPEAN MAGAZINE. Vols. I. II. and VIII.

Wanted by Rev. E. F. St. Leger, Scotland Rectory, Kirtom in Usher.

Lewis's TOPOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY OF ENGLAND. Last edition preferred.

Wanted by Rev. J. Pickford, M.A., Bushey Rectory, Watford, Herts.

FRENCH (G. J.) TIPSITS OF THE CANONS ECCLESIASTICAL, 1687.

HINTS ON THE ARRANGEMENT OF COLLEGE SCHOOLS.

ED. DR. E. MÜNH, 1827.

Ed. HERR. GÜLL. Rotterdam, 1826.

LIAMENTATIONES OMBRORUM VIRIDUM.

Wanted by Rev. J. Irvine, Kilbuck, Bray.

THE COMPLETE ENGLISH DICTIONARY, by a Lover of good English and Common Sense. 12mo, 1753.

Wanted by Rev. J. Osborn, 8, Spital Square.

NOTES AND QUERIES (No. 290), July 21, 1885.

Wanted by Dr. Douzon, Whithy.

Notices to Correspondents.

WAD'S BORN. If our Correspondent, R. B. Q. Ouse, will refer to our 2nd S. v. p. 512, he will see that his explanation of this passage has been already proposed by another Correspondent, H. C. K. We are inclined to believe that Chaucer alludes to an ancient legend, but have not yet been able to refer to M. Michel's Essai sur Vade, which will probably throw light upon the tradition in question, and so perhaps indirectly upon the passage under consideration. See Mr. Wright's note in the Percy Society's edition of the Canterbury Tales.

T. C. N., whose article on Shakespeare Family appeared in "N. & Q." of 21st June last, is requested to state where a note will reach him.

K. R. C. We doubt whether the armorial bearings referred to can be relied on. Please repeat the Query on German Post's Usages.

E. M. We have a note for this Correspondent. Where can we forward it?

GEORGE FRIDMAY. We cannot find the name of Prætorius in the Domesday Book of Cornwall; but as that work is in the Reading Room of the British Museum it is easily accessible. Father and Sons, in 1864, published a Literary Edition of the Text of Cornwall. Consult also Lyon's Cornwall, pp. lili.—lxiv.

A. CHALISTEY. The new Catalogue of the British Museum is only complete to the end of the letter K. Most of the names required are contained in a volume entitled Tractatus Literari, which will be found under that name, probably with cross references.

E. H. A. For Lord Kingsley's prescriptive right, see "N. & Q." 2d S. i. 451; 3rd S. i. 204, 315; ii. 17.

J. DALTON. The Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the late Dr. Samuel Johnson (Lond. 1785), is a work of no authority. For notices of the author, the Rev. William Shaw, see "N. & Q." 2nd S. v. 37, and the European Magazine, i. 34.

FRANCIS THURSON. The lines on Milton's Blindness are by Miss Elizabeth Lloyd of Philadelphia, and are printed in "N. & Q." 2nd S. v. 114.

BRUNNEN.—In p. 144, col. ii. line 23, for "Lord Belhaven" read "Lord Belhaven."

 Cases for binding the volumes of "N. & Q." may be had of the Publisher, and of all Booksellers and Newsmen.

A Reading Case for holding the weekly Nos. of "N. & Q." is now ready, and may be had of all Booksellers and Newsmen, price 1s. 6d.; or, free by post, direct from the publisher, for 1s. 8d.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" is published at noon on Friday, and is also issued in MONTHLY PARTS. The Subscription for SEVEN COPIES for Six Months forwarded direct from the Publisher (including the Half-yearly INDEX) is 11s. 4d., which may be paid by Post Office Order, payable at the Strand Post Office, in favour of WILLIAM G. BAKER, 25, WALLINGTON STREET, STRAND, W.C., where also all Communications for the Editor should be addressed.

"NOTES & QUERIES" is registered for transmission abroad.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1865.

CONTENTS.—No 196.

NOTES:—Charteris of Amisfield: "Second to None," 261
—Notes from the Issue Rolls, 262—Head of King Charles
I., 263—Relics of Nelson, ib.—"Antony and Cleopatra"
—A Curious Bequest—Mechlin: Church of Notre Dame
beyond the Dyle—Dr. Johnson: "Which"—Dial Mottoes—English-French—Gauge: Gauge—Perennial Superstition, 264.

QUERIES:—Anonymous Work—John Bailey—Mrs. E.
Batty—Bibliographical Queries—"The Cabinet"—
Casa, Garropoli, Redit—Christendom—Delaval of Seaton Delaval—Druidism—Englewood—"The Book of Enoch" —Epigrams—The Fenians—"Fair Play is a Jewel"—
Homer—Immaculate Conception—Oxfordshire Militia—
Pingos, the Engravers—See of Dublin: Early Episcopal Records—Tennyson's "May Queen"—Mrs. E. Hill Trotter—Mary Clare Warner—Washing Hands and Feet before Meals, 265.

QUERIES WITH ANSWERS:—Biblical Versifications in English—A Guess at Authorship—Number Forty—Homer on the Age of Nestor—Kenneth Macaulay, 265.

REPLIES:—Letters of Junius, 269—Bockford's "Thoughts on Hunting," &c., 270—Not Guilty, 271—The Bed and Stature of Og, King of Bashan, ib.—Meeting Eyebrows, 272—Frederick the Great—The Younger Pitt—Havi-land's "Cavalry"—Turner Family—Malherbe Pedigree —"To pluck a Crow"—Sarum Missal—Hedlock—Foreign Heraldic Works—"Amicus Plato," &c.—Washington an Infidel—Theognis—W. Alexander—Two Readings in "Hamlet"—Archbishop Whately's unanswered Riddle
—Orange Toast—Epigram on St. Luke—Atlantic Cable —Telegraph—Creaking Soles—The Ocean Cavern—The Great Bed of Ware, &c., 273.

Notes.

CHARTERIS OF AMISFIELD: "SECOND TO NONE."

Having read Mr. Grant's work of fiction entitled Second to None, I can without hesitation affirm it to be a work of very considerable merit.
But the object of this note is not to trouble your readers with my opinion, but to point out one or two facts which, as the novel purports to be an historical one, and is likely to pass through other editions, may not be deemed valueless.

One of the prominent characters is a dragoon, who is introduced as the remaining male heir of the Charteris's of Amisfield—a family of considerable antiquity in the shire of Dumfries. This unfortunate person is represented as having dissipated his estate, and having been so far reduced in his fortunes as to enlist as a private in the Scotch Greys. He is ultimately killed in battle in Germany.

It so happens, nevertheless, that the family in question had, very nearly a century before, been dispossessed of Amisfield, and the heir male and representative about the time of the novel was no less a person than the celebrated Colonel Charteris, whose portrait is inserted in one of Hogarth's plates of "The Harlot's Progress." He was Colonel Charteris of Amisfield, no doubt, but not the Dum-friesshire Amisfield, which he either could not or would not buy back. There was in the vicinity of Haddington a valuable heritable property bearing the name of New Miln or Mills, which obtained a melancholy notoriety for having been the scene of an alleged murder by a young profligate of the name of Philip Standsfield, who was accused of killing his father. It was the last instance in Scotland where touching the body was made a part of the proof; and as the parent, when touched by his son, bled, this was accepted as evidence, there really being little else to convict, except the fact that the father and his reprobate son were on very bad terms. Philip, nevertheless, was put to death.

The estate subsequently fell into the hands of the colonel, who christened it Amisfield, the name by which it at present is known, and from him it came to the noble family of Wemyss by the marriage of the daughter of Charteris to the Earl of that period. By some family arrangement the original destination of the Wemyss and Charteris estate was changed, the younger branch taking the Wemyss estates in Fife, whilst the elder one received in lieu the colonel's lands and name.

Mr. Grant's dragoon, Charteris, had been victimised by a scoundrel of the name of Shriley, whose fate is a very wretched one, having been worried to death by a butcher's dog in an attempt to rob his brother's house. Singularly enough, I heard a similar story upwards of fifty years since.
It was told me by the late Gilbert Innes of Stow, the great Scottish millionaire, with whom, when a youth, I was well acquainted. The event occurred in a family of great antiquity, of wealth, and position; but subsequently much injured by the conduct of one of its representatives, who was hanged for murdering his steward. The date assigned by Mr. Innes has escaped my memory, but the circumstances are still vivid in my recollection.
A brother of the peer was extravagant and vicious;
so much so, that his relations had little intercourse with him. The earl was in the country when his housekeeper was directed to take charge of the plate, which, having been deposited with his lordship's bankers, had been ordered by letter to be retransmitted to the house. Everything was apparently quite regular, and not the slightest suspicion existed of imposition.

When the plate came, the housekeeper began to be uneasy and restless; with this feeling she went to the butcher, who was wont to supply the family with meat, and asked him to send some one to sleep in the house. He answered, "I'll tell you what I will do; I will send you my dog. But remember to lock yourself in your room, and do not, whatever you hear, venture out, for if you do, the animal will tear you to pieces. I will take the key of the main door with me, and call early in the morning for the dog."

The housekeeper did as ordered; and, although during the night she was prevented from sleeping

Prince of Wales, and also nurse of Edmund of Langley (on May 13, 1362, she is called "the late Johanna"); Cristiane, wife of John de Enefeld, nurse of Thomas of Woodstock, son of the Lord King; Agnes Pore, nurse of Margaret of Windsor, the King's daughter. "The Lord Edmund of Langley" thus appears to have required three nurses in succession. To the above notes may be added the following notices from Rymer's MS. Collectanea: 1349, Johanna de Oxenford, nutrice Edmundi de Langeley, filii Regis; Agnes Pore, nurse of our very dear daughter Margaret of Windsor; Amia de Gloucester, nurse of William and Johanna, the King's children. (Sloane MS. 4586, art. 118; 4587, art. 18; 4581, art. 157.)

At an earlier date we find noticed — Matilda de Perie, nutrice Johannis de Eltham fratris Regis [Edw. III.] (Sloane MS. 4580, art. 81); Johanna de Boys, nurse of Eleanor, sister of the King (Eleanor, Duchess of Gueldres, eldest sister of Edward III. Ib. art. 116); and at a later period, Johanna Colson, nurse of Katherine, daughter of the King (Edw. IV., Sloane MS. 4616, art. 55.)

HERMENTRAUDE.

HEAD OF KING CHARLES I.

In the narrative of the execution of Charles I. in the State Trials, vol. i. p. 998 (6 vol. fol. ed. 1730), it is mentioned that after the fatal event had taken place —

"The Corps was put into a coffin, and the Bishop and Mr. Herbert went with it to the back stairs to have it embalmed; after embalming, his head was sewed on, and the Corps was wrapt in lead, and the Coffin cover'd with a Velvet Pall, and then remov'd to St. James's."

Sir Henry Hallford, in his extremely interesting and minute description of the finding of the coffin of Charles I. in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, on April 1, 1813,* states as follows:—

"On removing the pall, a plain leaden coffin, with no appearance of ever having been enclosed in wood, and bearing an inscription, KING CHARLES, 1648, in large, legible characters, on a scroll of lead encircling it, immediately presented itself to the view. A square opening was then made in the upper part of the lid, of such dimensions as to admit a clear insight into its contents. These were, an internal wooden coffin, very much decayed, and the body carefully wrapt up in cere-cloth, into the folds of which a quantity of unctuous or greasy matter mixed with resin, as it seemed, had been melted, so as to exclude as effectually as possible, the external air. . . . At length the whole face was disengaged from its covering. The complexion of the skin of it was dark and discoloured. The forehead and temples had lost little or nothing of their muscular substance; the cartilage of the nose was gone; but the left eye, in the first moment of exposure, was open and full, though it vanished almost immediately; and the pointed beard, so characteristic of the period of the reign of King Charles, was perfect. The shape of the face was a long oval; many of the teeth remained; and the left ear, in consequence of the interposition of the unctuous matter between it and the cere cloth, was found entire. . . . When the head had been entirely disengaged from the attachments which confined it, it was found to be loose, and without any difficulty was taken up, and held to view."

It will be observed that these two accounts differ in two particulars; the State Trial report asserting that the head was sewn on, and the body wrapped in lead, whereas Sir H. Hallford tells us that the head was found to be loose, and the body wrapped in cere-cloth. There can be no doubt, I suppose, that Sir Henry's statement is the correct one. It bears internal evidence of being strictly true, and was moreover authenticated by the sign manual of George IV., then Prince Regent, in whose presence, as well as that of his brother the Duke of Cumberland, and other persons of consideration, the disinterment was made. I may remark that neither Lord Clarendon in his History,* nor Mr. Herbert in his narrative of the last days of the unfortunate King,† although they both mention the embalmment of his body, make any allusion to the sewing on of the head.

H. A. KENNEDY.

Gay Street, Bath.

RELICS OF NELSON.

I enclose a verbatim copy of a quotation in the Times of Sept. 13, relative to a Life, &c., of Lord Nelson:—

"One of the most costly and interesting relics of Nelson is still extant in the possession of a gentleman residing at Cheam, in Surrey. It consists of a small golden pyramid, composed of the identical 84 guineas which were found in the Admiral's escritoire, when he so gloriously fell in the arms of victory at the memorable battle of Trafalgar, on the 21st of October, 1805. After Nelson's death these coins fell into the hands of Mr. Alexander Davison, of St. James's Square, London, the intimate friend and navy agent of the hero of the Nile, and who, as a mark of lasting respect to his gallant friend, caused this pyramid to be constructed out of the coins in a quadrilateral form, each side containing the complement of 21 guineas. Upon the occasion of Mr. Davison becoming insolvent some years afterwards, the relic under consideration was, among other property forming a portion of that unfortunate gentleman's estate, sold under the hammer by the auctioneers of the day, the Messrs. Farebrother, and the pyramid adverted to was at that period purchased at the sale by a relative of its present possessor."

"With it are four large volumes, elegantly bound in purple morocco, containing the whole of Nelson's original despatches. These important manuals were primitively stereotyped upon vellum by 'Beneley' specially for the service of Mr. Davison: the only other copy of this work was in the possession of the late eminent collector of antiquities, Mr. Beckford of Fonthill Abbey, and is now, we believe, in the British Museum."—From The Waterford Mail, as quoted in The Times, Sep. 18.

As this paragraph contains some inaccuracy, and as (when a youth) I had something to do with the matter, will you accept my statement of the circumstances, quite fresh in my memory? It is concerning the last paragraph alone.

* History of the Rebellion, vol. iii. part 1. p. 366. 1807.

† Wood's Athena Oxoniensis, vol. 2. p. 708, ed. 1721.

* Essays and Orations, &c. London, 1833.

My father printed Dr. Stanier Clarke's Life of Nelson, two vols. 4to. Dr. Clarke was Librarian to the Prince of Wales (George IV.), at Carlton House. Of this excellent typographical specimen, two copies only were on vellum—one for Mr. Davison, the appropriation of the other I forget.

Mr. Davison, I presume, took his copy to his place in Ireland. His house was burned down some years afterwards. Mr. D. had insured his vellum copy at some Dublin office for 500*l*. After the fire the Directors objected to pay. He entered an action against them; my father was subpoena'd to Dublin to prove at the trial that only two copies existed on vellum. One having been burned, of course only one can remain, of the destination of which I am ignorant; probably it is, as stated, in the British Museum.

As to "stereotyping," that is absurd: first, because we never stereotyped at Bolt Court; and secondly, because it would have been altogether inappropriate. It may be that, in saying four volumes, Mr. Davison had some MSS. constituting two volumes bound up to match with the two of Dr. Stanier Clarke's. Mr. Davison, having lost the vellum copy, probably had one of the paper ones (which said paper was better than vellum to show off the printing) bound up. One point is certain; that if there be a vellum copy at the British Museum, there cannot be another "in the possession of a gentleman residing at Cheam, in Surrey."

B. BENSLEY.

[There is a vellum copy of Dr. Clarke's Life of Admiral Nelson, 2 vols. 4to, 1809, in the British Museum. It is splendidly bound, and kept in a case. We have recently had the pleasure of conning it over.—ED.]

"ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA," Act IV. Sc. 9.—

"1st. Soldier. Hark, the drums
Demurely wake the sleepers."

Mr. Staunton has this note upon the word demurely:—

"Demurely in this place is more than suspicious. Mr. Collier's annotator conjectures 'Do early,' and Mr. Dyce 'Do merrily;' but neither reading is very felicitous."

But why suspicious, or why alter it all? The literal meaning of demurely is, customary, according to custom. The word is derived from the French word, de mœurs. Now mœurs, means customs; and that again is derived from the Latin words, de more—according to custom.

Warburton says the word here bears the meaning of solemnly; and quotes this passage in Milton in support of that opinion:—

"Come Pensive Nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure."

But even here, the original meaning is just as applicable; and he has no authority for "solemnly" but the context:—

"Come Pensive Nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure,"—

i. e. observing your usual demeanour, according to your wont.

That Shakspeare, who so often uses words in their very primitive sense (and uses them, too, so correctly), intended it to bear this meaning, I have no doubt; indeed, I am inclined to think that it was the only meaning it did bear in his day. And if strictly analysed, it will be found to be its meaning now, though used reproachfully.

This granted, the sense of the passage becomes clear enough:—

Hark the drums
Demurely wake the sleepers,"—

i. e. according to custom—the customary drums. The word is extremely applicable, when we remember the regularity of all military observances; and that it was the morning drums—the réveil.

JAMES NICHOLS, M.R.C.P.

13, Savile Row.

A CURIOUS REQUEST.—Is not the following scrap, cut from a local newspaper, worthy of preservation in "N. & Q."?—

"The following notice was lately posted on the doors of the parish church at Holsworthy, Devon:—

"Extract from the will of the late Rev. Thomas Meyrick:—"I give and bequeath the sum of 100*l*. in trust to pay the dividends annually to the churchwardens of the parish of Holsworthy, who shall openly give 2*l*. 10*s*. to the young single woman resident in that parish who is under 30 years of age and generally esteemed by the young as the most deserving, and the most handsome, and the most noted for quietness and attendance at church: and on the next day shall openly give the remainder of the dividend to any spinster not under 60 years of age, and noted for the like virtues, and not receiving parochial relief." The churchwardens will be glad to receive the names of any persons who consider themselves entitled to either of the above bounties before the 19th inst."

T. B.

MECHLIN: CHURCH OF NOTRE DAME BEYOND THE DYLE.

"Icy gist la noble dame Elisabeth
Egerton, espouse du treprudent
Chevalier Messire Guillaume Stanley,
Coronel et du Conseil de Guerre de Sa Ma^{te} d'Espagne la quelle trespassa de ceste vie le 10 d'Avril, 1614.
Priez Dieu pour son ame."

Colonel Wm. Stanley above mentioned was buried in the same tomb 6 March, 1630, and also Roland Garett, his cousin, 26 June, 1628.

W. H. JAMES WEALE.

Bruges.

DR. JOHNSON: "WHICH."—In a letter in my possession, written by Dr. Johnson to my great-grandfather, occurs the following paragraph, which

I think is worth making a note of, on account of the peculiar way in which the Doctor uses the pronoun which :—

"I have obtained a benefit play for Miss Williams, which yet will not be for her benefit without the concurrence of her friends, among which she numbers you."

In his Dictionary, Johnson defines "which" as "the pronoun relative—relating to things"; and although he adds, "it formerly was used for who and related likewise to persons," yet he gives no more modern instance than a quotation from Shakespeare.

BEARLEY.

DIAL MOTTOES.—At Courmayeur, Piedmont :

"Afflictis lentæ, celeres gaudentibus, hora."

At Visp, Switzerland :—

"Omnes time, propter unam."

R. R. DEES.

Wallsend.

ENGLISH-FRENCH.—A box is placed at the Charing Cross Station of the South Eastern Railway to receive donations for the blind, without indicating the particular institution in any way. The French are invited to contribute thereto in the following terms :—

"L'Association pour le bien, etre (!) des Aveugles Accepter d'avec Reconnaisance la moindre aide pour ses Fonds."

B. J. T.

GAUGE: GUAGE.—I find The Times habitually spells guage and guager, "gauge" and "gauger." Surely this is inconsistent with all rule and precedent. Guage and guager find their equivalent in wage and wager; just as guard becomes ward, and guarantee, warranty. There is no instance that I am aware of in English, of aw being pronounced a, save this one—the arbitrary pronunciation of the "Thunderer"—brutum fulmen at least here. Other fancy spellings are "kerb," for curb-stone; "berth" for birth (sleeping place on board ship); and "fullness," for fulness (Athenæum). May I correct another misspelling, very common now-a-days? Millionaire should be invariably millionnaire, as we write debonnaire in French.

O. T. D.

PERENNIAL SUPERSTITION.—

"Je recueille autant que possible des renseignements sur les traditions, coutumes et histoires locales. J'ai fait déjà plusieurs petites découvertes fort curieuses. Ecoutez, par exemple, ceci :

"J'étais, il y a quelque temps, à la noce d'un mien parent, dans le canton de Boos, à la Neuville-Chant-d'Oisel. Les mariés, à leur grand effroi, durent étrenner la nouvelle mairie. Aucun mariage avant le leur n'y avait encore été fait. Savez-vous ce qui les inquiétait? C'est que dans cette salle neuve on n'eût pas, pour la consacrer, versé la sang du coq. En effet, il ne se fait point de mariage à la Neuville-Chant-d'Oisel sans qu'on ne répande dans la chambre des époux le sang d'un coq.

"Cet usage vient directement de la Grèce et de Rome. Il ne s'applique pas seulement à la maison qu'habiteront les nouveaux mariés, il doit l'être aussi à la salle des mariages, au moins à son inauguration. On n'osait avouer au maire ce désir de ne point renoncer à cette tradition, mais on n'osait non plus se marier dans un lieu où n'aurait pas été versé le sang du coq. Mon parent et sa fiancée eurent recours à un biais : ils demandèrent au maire la permission de faire le repas de noce dans la mairie même ; le maire, qui est un homme d'esprit, devina parfaitement le motif de la demande, à laquelle il consentit ; le repas se fit et se prépara dans la mairie ; l'on y put ainsi laisser tomber quelques gouttes du sang qui devait porter chance aux jeunes époux.

"N'est-il pas étrange qu'un tel usage ait survécu de près de deux mille ans à la religion qui en faisait un devoir ?

"Vous voyez, monsieur, qu'il fait bon, comme, vous l'avez dit, d'avoir l'œil à tout ; on s'instruit à regarder autour de soi presque autant qu'à lire."—Le Siècle, Aug. 28, 1865.

The above evidence of the durability of a superstition seems to me worth preserving in "N. & Q."

FITZHOPELINS.

Malines.

Queries.

ANONYMOUS WORK.—

"EBRIETATIS ENCOMIUM : or, the Praise of Drunkenness ; wherein is authentically, and most evidently proved, the necessity of frequently getting Drunk ; and, that the Practice of getting Drunk is most ancient, primitive, and catholic. Confirmed by the Example of Heathens, Turks, Infidels, primitive Christians, Saints, Popes, Bishops, Doctors, Philosophers, Poets, Free-Masons, and other Men of Learning in all Ages. By Boniface Oinophilus de Monte Frasconi, A.B.C. London, 1728, 12mo, with frontispiece."

I am not aware that anything is known as to the author of the above tract. I copy the following from the Country Journal ; or, the Craftsman, July 15, 1727 :—

"Advertisement to the Publick.

"I thought I had secured myself from all censure, when, in the Preface to a little Piece (composed for universal Entertainment and Instruction), entitled Ebrietas Encomium : or, the Praise of Drunkenness, &c. I have declared that, 'I am very well contented the World should believe me as much a Drunkard as Erasmus (who wrote the Praise of Folly) was a Fool, and weigh me in the same Balance.' The Translator of Erasmus is now (deservedly) a Right Reverend Prelate, and to him I appeal for the innocence of my Performance ; wherein (after the same Manner Erasmus has established Folly) 'I have evidently proved the necessity of frequently getting Drunk, and shewn that the Practice of it is most Ancient, Primitive and Catholic. Illustrated by the examples of Turks, Infidels, Heathens, and Hereticks, Doctors, Philosophers, Poets, Free-Masons, and other Men of Learning in all Ages.' So that I now hope so useful a Treatise may (without any Molestation) be sold as usual, by Mr. CURRIE, in the Strand, to whom I gave it, to print ; as my own Act and Deed.

"R——T S——A.

"Southampton, June 27, 1727."

It is possible, though not probable, that the above is a puffing advertisement by CURRIE. I think it genuine, and send it as a query, hoping that it may be the key by which some reader of "N. & Q." may give the full name of the author of this curious but well known tract. W. LEE.

JOHN BAILEY.—I shall be glad of any particulars of this gentleman, better known from the cognomen Jack Bailey, who was the chief promoter of the fashionable acquirement of driving four-in-hand. A box-seat alongside of John Bailey from London to Oxford, and vice versa, on the Birmingham post-coach, was usually booked for a fortnight in advance. He lived and died much respected, and bequeathed to Sir Henry Peyton, the second baronet, his silver watch, the regulator or time-piece in all his journeys between the George and Blue Boar, Holborn, and the Angel Inn at Oxford. ♦

MRS. E. BATTYE.—This lady published Giuliano de Medici and other Poems, 1838, Southwell. Is Giuliano de Medici a drama, or does the volume contain any dramatic poetry? R. INGLIS.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL QUERIES.—Is anything known of the authorship, and what is the date, of Pasquine in a Traunce,* &c.? London, printed by Wm. Seres, 4to (see Watt, s. r. Seres). Who wrote A Voyage through Hell, &c.? London: Richardson & Co. 1770, 8vo; Moloch turned Painter? London: Organ, 1771, 4to; and A Discourse on the Four Last Things, &c.? London: Wilson & Fell, 1763, 8vo. A. CHALLSTETH.
Gray's Inn.

"THE CABINET" (3 vols. 8vo. Norwich, 1704-5.) Can any of the readers of "N. & Q." tell me who were the authors of the following articles in the above-named work?—

(Vol. I.)—1. Preface.—2. Honorius.—3. What constitutes a Man?—4. The Rights of Juries.—5. Party Spirit.—6. The Necessity of a Reform.

(Vol. II.)—1. The present Situation of the Country.—2. The Code of Nature.—3. The Vision.—4. Necessity of a Convention.—5. Public Speaking.—6. On Primogeniture.—7. "The Feareful Harte," &c.—8. Effects of War.—9. A Rhapsody.—10. March to Leicester.—11. Ode in Imitation of Callistratus.—12. A Dream.—13. The Soldier.—14. Waste Lands.—15. Popular Societies.—16. The English Constitution, &c.—17. Lines on Bishop Corbet.—18. Origin of Despotism.—19. Standing Armies.—20. Lines to Sylvia.—21. The Art of leading the Public Mind.

(Vol. III.)—1. Suspension of Habeas Corpus Act.—2. The Custom of Praying for Kings.—3.

[* Pasquine in a Traunce, by W. P., printed by W. Seres [1570?], and again by Thomas Este, Lond. 1584, 1to, is a translation of a work by Caelius Secundus Curio, Professor of Eloquence at Lausanne and Basle, entitled Pasquillus Ecstasticus, una cum aliis etiam aliquot sanctis pariter et lepidis dialogis, quibus præcipua religionis nostræ capita elegantissime explicantur, Basle, 8vo, 1544, et Genevæ, 8vo, 1667.—ED.]

What Government is best adapted for the Research of Truth?—4. Stanzas on the 29th of May.—5. Ode to Moderation.—6. Expenditure in War and Peace.—7. On Oppression.—8. Love and Patriotism.—9. Simplicity of Ancient Manners.—10. Public Charities. Q.

CASA, GARROPOLI, REDI.—In A Letter on the present State of Learning in Europe, London, 1708, pp. 184, Casa, Garropoli, and Redi, are called "forgotten rhymesters," and "vile flatterers of Louis XIV." I wish to know whom the writer means. The only name of the above which I know is Redi, and I do not think that the author of Bacco in Toscana is intended. E. N. H.

CHRISTENDOM.—When was the word Christendom first used as a collective noun to denote the portion of the globe in which Christianity prevails? What corresponding term is there in Latin or Italian? P. S. C.

DELAVAL OF SEATON DELAVAL.—Where is to be found any good genealogical account of this family? All the notices that I have seen are defective and inaccurate. The late Lord Delaval claimed to be nineteenth in descent from Gilbert de la Val, one of the barons who was in arms against King John; and—

"To commemorate the actions of his ancestor, his supporters were two barons in complete armour, but without their helmets, all proper, the dexter one holding in his right hand a sealed deed inscribed "Magna Charta," and in his left a drawn sword resting on the shield, and the sinister one holding a spear with a banner gules fringed and charged with a lion passant guardant, or, being the arms of William I., cousin to one of the ancient Barons of this name, who also carried one of his head banners when he invaded England."—Thomson's Magna Charta, 810, 311.

E. H. A.

DRUIDISM.—Although I find several articles relating to Druidism scattered through "N. & Q.," yet the questio rerata of the derivation of the word has not been discussed. Perhaps you or one of your learned correspondents would kindly supply the most plausible conjecture on this subject supported by authorities. MANCUNIENTIA.

ENGLOWESE.—The arms of this family, often borne by members of the Gorges family in the sixth quartering of their shield, has been the subject of so many mistakes in its description that it is almost impossible to decide on the correct one. On the tomb of Sir Edward Gorges and Anne Howard his wife in the chancel of Wraxall church, Somersetshire, the arms are painted thus: "Arg. a chev. btw. 3 crosses patée sa."

On a shield over the fire-place in the large hall at Charlton House, Wraxall (formerly the residence of the Gorges), they are represented: "Arg. a chev. btw. 3 quatrées on dice sa."

In a sketch of the Gorges arms taken out of the Heralds' College many years ago, and on which is this note "Visitation of Somersetshire, 1623," they are thus drawn: "Arg. a chev. btw. 3 billets sa. guttées d'eau," four on each.

Which of these is correct? Where can I obtain an authority for the correct drawing of the arms? How did the Gorges family claim to quarter them?

T. B. ALLEN.

"THE BOOK OF ENOCH."—Many works have appeared on this subject. I find two German editions frequently referred to; viz. (1) Das Buch Henoch in vollständiger Uebersetzung, mit fortlaufendem Commentär, &c., von Andr. G. Hoffmann (Jena. Zweite Abtheilung, 8vo, 1838); (2) Das Buch Henoch, &c., von Dr. A. Dillmann (Leipzig, 1853.)

As I have not seen either of these works, can any of your correspondents inform me if Dr. Dillmann has thrown any additional light on the so-called Book of Enoch? I understand he has written a very valuable "Introduction."

J. DALTON.

EPIGRAMS.—I shall be glad to know the authors of the following works:—

"Epigrams of Martial, Englished, with some other pieces, Ancient and Modern." 8vo. 1695.

"A Book of New Epigrams, by the same hand that translated Martial." 8vo. 1695.

"New Epigrams." Part 2. 8vo.

"A Court of Judicature in imitation of Libarius, with New Epigrams, by the hand that translated Martial. 8vo. 1697."

"Odes and Elegies upon Divine and Moral Subjects." 8vo. 1698.

CHALK-DOWN.

THE FENIANS.—In the discussions which have appeared on the subject of the Fenians, I have been much surprised to see no reference to the dialogue in Scott's Antiquary, on this subject, between Mr. Jonathan Oldbuck and Captain Hector Macintyre. The latter quotes a passage from a Celtic poem, in which mention is made of the "bare-armed Fenians." It occurs just before the adventure with the "phoca," which all readers of the book will recollect. Where did Scott find the "Fenians"? W.

"FAIR PLAY IS A JEWEL."—Can any of your correspondents say where this saying is to be found? H. M. HEETS.

HOMER.—It is hazardous to ask Homeric questions, as the answers may be overwhelming. I am collecting matter relating to translations, and shall be obliged by information as to any in Danish, Icelandic, or Dutch. I do not ask for criticism, there not being room for it in "N. & Q.," but wish to know of each whether it is thought to be 1, faithful to the words? 2, to the spirit? 3, poetical in its own language? 4, of any value? E. N. H.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.—In Scott's Continuation of Milner's Church History (i. 443), a decree of the Council of Trent is quoted (apparently from Sleidan, but I am unable to verify it), which, after stating that concupiscence remains in the baptized, but that its guilt is washed away in the Sacrament, goes on to say that the Virgin Mary is not included in the decree, but that that is to be held which Sixtus IV. had defined. There the quotation ends; but the historian proceeds to say, with an apparent reference to Sleidan and Maimbourg, or one of them, that that Pope had declared heretics all those who should maintain that the Virgin was conceived in original sin.

May I ask your learned correspondent F. C. H. if this is correct? And if so, where the authority for it is to be found? It seems to assert as de fide the Immaculate Conception, which I thought till recent times had never been held as more than a pious and probable opinion in the Church of Rome. See, for example, Massillon's Sermons on the Conception. LYTTELTON.

Hagley, Stourbridge.

OXFORDSHIRE MILITIA.—I am collecting materials for a sketch of the early history of this corps, 1778-1814, and would feel greatly obliged for any information not to be found in "The Army Lists." A. M. HARTE.

United Service Club, Dublin.

PINGOS, THE ENGRAVERS.—Can any of your readers give me any particulars of the lives of the Pingos, father and son, who were engravers to the Mint during a considerable part of the reign of George III.? * NUMISMATICUS.

SEE OF DUBLIN: EARLY EPISCOPAL RECORDS.—What early episcopal records are still preserved of the see of Dublin? Has the "Repertorium Viride" ever been printed; and, if so, when? What transcripts (if any) of early episcopal registers of this see are to be found in the public libraries of Dublin? AIKEN IRVING.

TENNYSON'S "MAY QUEEN."—In Mr. C. Knight's Half Hours with the best Authors, it is stated that Tennyson's first volume of Poems was published in 1830. I should be obliged if some one of your readers would inform me in what year the third part, or what is called "the conclusion" of The May Queen first appeared. S. S. S.

Mrs. E. HILL TROTTER, published in 1838, at Kensington, Cinderbriht, a Drama, and Poems. Can any of your readers inform me whether the authoress was a native of Scotland, and whether she published any other works? R. IRVING.

MARY CLARE WARNER.—Who was Mary Clare Warner, aged twenty-five, who was professed in [* Some brief notices of Thomas Pingo, sen., are given in Noble's College of Arms, p. 426; and in Kugler's Künstler-Lexicon, xi. 720. He is also incidentally noticed in "N. & Q." 2nd S. ii. 494; v. 417, 418.—Ed.]

1637 at the poor Clares of Gravelines? Lady Warner (Clare of Jesus Warner) was thirty-one at her profession in the same year, and her children were mere infants at the time. THUS.

WASHING HANDS AND FEET BEFORE MEALS.—At the present day it is customary before sitting down to dinner, &c., for persons to wash their hands. This, in a sanitary point of view, is quite proper, but I wish to ascertain if our Hebrew brethren do not practise it as a ceremony of another description. There are many instances in Genesis of the feet being washed before meals; and also the instance of our Blessed Redeemer at his Last Supper. Is it still a ceremony amongst the Hebrews? It is as ancient as Abraham.

S. REDMOND.

Liverpool.

Queries with Answers.

BIBLICAL VERSIFICATIONS IN ENGLISH.—MR. BARRHAM mentions (3rd S. viii. 201) an anonymous version of Solomon's Song. Is it one in four cantos, entitled the Fair Circassian? I had such a poem, published in the early part of the eighteenth century, so called, meretriciously written; evidently the canticles formed into a dramatic poem, accompanied by other amatory verses, and a pitiful lament for the young and talented scholar who had died from the cruelty of his mistress. I have searched in vain for the volume in the curiosæ of my books. I have forgotten also the source from which I derived my information, that the unhappy author was the voluminous translator Creech, of whom little seems to be known but his tragical death, and that involved in mystery. Lowndes has I see a pamphlet mentioned thus, under art. "Creech, Thomas":—

"A Step to Oxford; or a Mad Essay on the Rev. Mr. Thos. Creech hanging himself, as it is said, for Love; with the Character of his Mistress in a Letter to a Person of Quality. London, 1704. 4to." 12 leaves. Boswell, 2386. 7s. 6d.

I should like this memorandum to elicit something more of Creech and his career, if Mr. Nichols's, or other works of literary anecdote, can furnish such additions. J. A. G.

[The Fair Circassian, a Dramatic Performance, done from the Original by a Gentleman-Commoner of Oxford, 1720, 4to. is by Dr. Samuel Orrell. The Song of Solomon has also been versified by D. Fenner (Anon.), 1587, 8vo; by G. S. i. e. George Sandys, 1642, 4to; Anon. 1653, 8vo; by J. Lloyd (Anon.), 1681, 4to; by R. Fleming, 1691, 8vo; in blank verse by J. Bland, 1750, 8vo; Anon. 1781, 4to, &c. There is an excellent article respecting Thomas Creech, with what appears to be a complete list of his translations, in Wood's Athenæ (Bliss), iv. 739. But Wood's account of him does not carry us down to his death, nor give us some particulars which may be found in Nichols's Select Poems, i. 130. Consult also Kippis's Biog. Britannica, iv. 432, and Hearn's Diary, ii. 582. There was a pamphlet published in 1709, by H. Hills, in Black-Fryars (pp. 16), entitled Daphnis; or a Pastoral Elegy upon the unfortunate Death of Mr. Thomas Creech, with a poem on The Despairing Lover, and The Despairing Shepherd. The principal poem speaks of his death and the cause of it plainly enough; and it is of quite sufficient merit to find a place in any life of poor Creech. The second poem was probably written in reference to his death, though this is not expressed. It is on a person who hanged himself on account of an unrequited passion. The third is the well known little poem, commencing—

"Alexis shunn'd his fellow swains, Their rural sports, and jocund strains,"— and was probably written on the same occasion.]

A GUESS AT AUTHORSHIP.—Christ's Bloud's Sweat, or the Sonne of God in his Agonie. In Verse. Lond. 1613, 4to. By J. F. The question arises, who was this J. F.? Now, in 1629, the Rev. Joseph Fletcher, A.M., published The Historie of the perfect-cursed-blessed Man, in verse, and in the absence of any other claimant to the initials attached to the tract of 1613, I am inclined to assign them to Joseph Fletcher.

W. CAREW HAZLITT.

[In Jolley's Catalogue, ii. 1143, a copy of The Historie of the Perfect-Cursed-Blessed Man is described of the date 1628, and it is there said to be "by J. F., M.A., Rector of Welbie [Wilby] in Suffolk. Printed by M. Flesher, and are to be solde at the signe of the Greyhound in Paul's Churchyard, 4to, 1628." Following the title is an emblematical print by T. Cecil, on the reverse of which is the Errata, with this curious remark: "Errata are not many, and yet fewer in some copies, for as they were spied in the presse they were amended in the remaining copies." To each section of the work is an emblematical print, and at the end is one of "Man Triumphant." Mr. Bindley's copy of this excessively rare volume sold for 28l. 2s.

About the centre of the chancel of Wilby Church, in Suffolk, is a brass plate with the following inscription:—

"The memorie of the pious and worthily deserving Mr. Joseph Fletcher, late Rector of this church. He departed this life the 28th of September, 1637, aged 60 years.

"Rectores bini simul hic sine pneumate vivunt.

Qui dum spirarunt verus uterq; fuit.

Nomine verus erat prior, alter nomine Fletcher,
Ite verus verum quem via vera docet.

"Two parsons here under one stone are lay'd
Who whiles they liv'd were both true Parsons sayd:
The first was True by name, Fletcher indeed,
Who left for all the True-way book to read:
Who doth, though dead, to all the true way tread,
Whose booke the true-way still the truth doth spread."]

NUMBER FORTY.—Has the number forty any mystical meaning? Henry Cornelius Agrippa makes it the number of expiation. It very often occurs as a period of time. It rained 40 days and 40 nights at the Deluge. The Israelites wandered 40 years in the wilderness. Moses was in the Mount 40 days. Goliath defied the armies of Israel, it is said, for 40 days. Our Lord was 40 days in the desert, and as commemorative of this we have the 40 days of Lent. Then in Scotch Law there are the 40 years prescription (usucapio of the Civil Law); 40 days' residence for establishing a domicile, and an inhibition must be recorded within 40 days. In the Canon Law there was the 40 days during which an excommunicated person might seek absolution. D. M.

Glasgow.

[Although a measure of prominence is certainly given to the number forty in the Bible, we do not apprehend that it is there invested with any mystical meaning. Should our correspondent wish to investigate the subject, we would recommend a comprehensive view; that is, a view not restricted to a single number, but one extending to such others as equally claim attention in Scripture. For aid in this inquiry we would suggest the perusal of the article "Number" in Dr. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.]

HOMER ON THE AGE OF NESTOR.—Will you kindly inform me as to what you consider to be Homer's conception of the age of Nestor? (Vide Il. i. 250-53, Clarke's edition). I confess that, owing to the different significations given to this passage by Accius, Cicero, Horace, Ovid, and other Latin authors, besides the bewilderments of the commentators from Didymus downwards, I am puzzled exceedingly. I do not know, in fact, whether to set the γᾶρον down at sixty (20×3), ninety (30×3), or three hundred (100×3). If you, or any of your correspondents, will illumine my darkness, I shall be much obliged.

PIERCE EGAN, JUN.

Woodridings, Pinner.

[We incline to the opinion that, in the four Homeric lines to which our correspondent refers, it was never intended to determine Nestor's exact age. By this passage, and by the line in the Odyssey—

Τῆς γὰρ δὴ μὴ φασὶν ἀνδρῆσθαι γένε' ἀνδρῶν,
iii. 245,—

it appears to be intimated that Nestor had reigned over three consecutive generations of men. If out of such data commentators have attempted to make more than "meets the eye," no wonder they cannot agree.]

KENNETH MACAULAY published in 1827 The Colony of Sierra Leone Vindicated. In 1830, I find this work referred to as by the late Mr. Kenneth Macaulay. When did he die? S. Y. R.

[Kenneth Macaulay died at Sierra Leone on June 5, 1829, after a residence of upwards of twenty years at that colony. Gent. Mag. xcix. (ii.) 651.]

Replies.

LETTERS OF JUNIUS.

(3rd S. viii. 182, 230.)

The revival in your pages of discussions respecting Junius comes accompanied by many solemn recollections. Within a few months there have been taken from us two of your correspondents, whom the questions now raised would have stirred like the call of a trumpet. Not only, within that period, has the grave closed over MR. PARKES, whose Franciscan investigations promised to be of the very highest value, but also over that greater than MR. PARKES, whose acquaintance with the whole Junius controversy, as with many others of the mysteries of our literature, I never expect to see equalled;—I allude to the late MR. DILKE. With the calmness which marked his outpourings of knowledge, indefatigably gathered up, by constant inquiry in all directions, he would have set us right in a few minutes as to the true bearings of MR. HART's new documents. In the darkness which has succeeded on the withdrawal of two such eminent lights, I would ask to be permitted to direct attention to the dates of these papers, and to solicit some further information on the questions which thence arise.

The new documents show that on the 28th May, 1771, the request of the Commissioners of the Navy to purchase 1300 trees in Whittlebury and Salcey Forests was directed by the Lords of the Treasury to be communicated to the Duke of Grafton, as ranger of Whittlebury, and to the Earl of Halifax as ranger of Salcey.

On the 7th November, 1771, a letter from the Duke of Grafton, complaining of the conduct of the agent or deputy of Mr. John Pitt, Surveyor-General of the Woods, in reference to those 1300 trees, was taken into consideration by the Lords of the Treasury. We may presume that that letter was written a few days, or at most a few weeks, before that date.

On the 3rd December, 1771, Mr. Surveyor Pitt attended the Lords of the Treasury. The whole business was investigated. Mr. Pitt threw all the blame upon his deputy, whom he stated that he had dismissed. "My Lords" lectured Mr. Pitt on "the evil tendency of a proceeding of this nature." Mr. Pitt submitted with exemplary meekness to be, what Junius terms, "browbeaten and insulted." The Lords, as Junius also states, recalled their warrant, and the oaks of Whittlebury remained unfelled.

All this was communicated to the Duke of Grafton from the Lords of the Treasury, in a reply to his letter, which reply was dated 13th December, 1771.

Such is the order of the proceedings as detailed in MR. HART's documents. It agrees with that stated by Junius. In his letter to the Duke of Grafton, we substantially find the complaint of the Duke, the dismissal of the Deputy, the brow-beating of Mr. Pitt, and the decision of the Lords of the Treasury. But Junius's letter which contains all these things was dated on the 28th September, 1771. (Woodfall, 1812, ii. 321, and ed. 1772, ii. 248.) How is the prevision of Junius to be accounted for?

Cannot some correspondent give us a few particulars respecting "Mr. Phillips, of Cecil Street, and afterwards of Church Court, Temple?" Was he the predecessor of any existing firm of lawyers? And cannot Mr. HART, whose diligence in bringing to light these valuable entries entitles him to universal thanks, discover some further information in the books or papers of the Lords of the Admiralty, or in those of the Commissioners of the Navy?

JOHN BRUCE.

BECKFORD'S "THOUGHTS ON HUNTING," ETC.

(3rd S. viii. 146.)

A few remarks from a Dorsetshire man may assist the inquiry in "N. & Q." as regards the author of the above work. Peter Beckford of Iwerne, Steepleton, who succeeded his father Julines Beckford of the Island of Jamaica, as owner of Steepleton, 1765, was, as the Retrospective Review states, a most accomplished hunter, who "could bag a fox in Greek, find a hare in Latin, inspect his kennels in Indian, and direct the economy of the stables in excellent French." His letters, very popular in their day, especially in Dorsetshire, a crack hunting county, were original, from his own practice and observation, and not borrowed from The Art and Pleasures of Hare-Hunting, London, 8vo, 1750. Beckford's letters were printed among the treatises on hunting compiled by William Blane, Esq.,—title, On Hare-Hunting, from Xenophon, by W. Blane, Esq., Lond. 1788. But I do not find them in Blane's Encyclopedia of Rural Sports, published about twenty years since, of which I have a copy with the title-page missing. I fear neither Blane nor Beckford must be classed in their treatises with the prose Cynegetica of Xenophon or Arrian; but there is a treatise, "Arrian on Coursing," the Cynegeticus of the Younger Xenophon, translated from the Greek, with Classical and Practical Annotations," which exhausts the Cynegetica only incidentally handled by Beckford and Blane. Two hundred and fifty copies of this work were published by Bohn, 1831, and soon passed into the hands of scholars and learned book collectors, in whose libraries they are only to be found, being too deeply classical and too expensive, with em-bellishments from the Antique, for general circulation.

The author of this scholar-like treatise, whose name does not appear in the title-page, was the Rev. William Dansey of Blandford, in Dorsetshire, five miles from Steepleton, where Peter Beckford composed his letters. It is singular that Dansey makes no mention of Beckford in the long list of "Bibliotheca Cynegetica" at the end of his Arrian, which he had consulted for the perfection of the work. Books in all languages, ancient and modern, are specified in this list, and references to the passages given from which he drew information.

He observes that the partial labours of Mr. Blane "on Hare-Hunting from Xenophon" were derived from Schneider's Annotations. He would, I am sure, have quoted Beckford had he considered him anything more than "a literary sportsman wishing to enliven his communications by a reference to the Cynegeticus, and quoting it in his vernacular tongue." Dansey was something more than a literary sportsman. His treatise leaves no particular of ancient or modern hunting unexplained or unillustrated, the vignettes from classical medals are as chaste as the text of the whole work is recondite. As a specimen of annotation to authors quoted, take this at the end of the list. "London, 1710: The Chase, a poem by William Somerville, Esq."

To this list might be added the French Cynegetica of Gauchet, Pomey, Passerat, &c., &c.; the Encyclopédie Méthodique, Dictionnaire de toutes les espèces de Chasses; and the Italian Cynegetica of Pogessi, Gatti, &c.; to some of which the author is indebted for a few remarks. The catalogue might be amplified by the numerous tracts on the laws of the chase collected by Fritsch and Manwood; the "Notices of Early British and Anglo-Saxon Hunting," gathered by Pegge, in the Archæologia; by Strutt in his Sports and Pastimes; and by Turner in his History of the Anglo-Saxons; and, though last, not least valuable, whether we regard the novelty of such a summary, or the elegance and classic taste of its execution, the article on hunting by Mr. Smedley in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana. Of the English Cynegetica, Dansey adds, Somerville's Chase is alone admitted; the doggerel of The Boke of St. Albans by Dame Juliana Berners, or the "One sumtyme scole mayster of Seynt Albons," 1486, are too quaint for the present age. I confine my extracts to Somerville's charming little poem in English. The wide-world hunting lore from ancient classics can only be guessed at by studying carefully Dansey's Cynegeticus, 1831.

QUEEN'S GARDENS.

NOT GUILTY.

(3rd S. viii. 208.)

This plea, which is also called the general issue, is used for the purpose of enabling the court to try the prisoner for the offence for which he is indicted. The courts cannot try a cause, whether criminal or civil, until the plaintiff and defendant are at an issue; that is, until the plaintiff asserts one thing, and the defendant traverses or denies it, or confesses it and avoids it, by pleading something which avoids the effect of his confession.

Now, a criminal cause bears some analogy to a civil cause. In the former case, the crown is the plaintiff, and the prisoner is the defendant. The indictment states the cause of complaint, and answers to the declaration in a civil action by which the plaintiff states his cause of action. The prisoner's plea of not guilty answers to a traverse at common law. In addition to other pleas, the prisoner can plead by way of confession and avoidance, the special pleas of autrefois convict, autrefois acquit, autrefois attain, and pardon.

Now, a prisoner is generally confined to two modes of answering the indictment, either by saying that he is guilty or that he is not guilty. If he confess the crime mentioned in the indictment by saying that he is guilty, and persist in this course, the court cannot try the cause, and has nothing to do but to award judgment. But out of tenderness to the life of the prisoner, and in order that he may have the benefit of any doubt of his guilt which may arise upon the face of the evidence alone, the court, at least in capital cases, will advise the prisoner to plead not guilty, and so ensure to himself the benefit of a fair trial. (See Stephen's Comm. vol. iv. p. 461.)

VERAX will see that the question guilty or not guilty is not a useless inquiry. The prisoner has an option of confession, though the court is, in capital cases, reluctant to take advantage of it. The court does not stand in the relation of father confessor to the prisoner. It does not wish to have his confidence; it is a judge of his legal, not of his moral guilt. If he insists on confession, the court will act upon it because, in the words of Serjeant Hawkins (Pleas of the Crown. ii. 469), "it is the highest conviction that can be;" and the court would be neglecting its duty if it would not act upon such strong presumptive evidence of guilt. But, unless it be so compelled, it prefers to have the prisoner's guilt established by legal proof by third persons rather than by his own confession.

The plea of not guilty has a technical sense. By using it the prisoner puts himself upon the trial by jury. It would be hard upon a prisoner to disallow him such a plea, as it is used for a purpose which is irrespective of his moral guilt.

W. J. TILL.

THE BED AND STATURE OF OG, KING OF BASHAN.

(3rd S. viii. 207.)

The Orientals have no separate sleeping apartments, but repose all night in the same room and on the same seat they have sat, or rather reclined, on in the day. These are best known to us as divâns, which were merely elevations of the floor round three sides of a room, whereon cushions were placed. Nevertheless they had something like a bedstead when they slept on the house-top. The form of such bedstead is perhaps nearly the same as those described by Wilkinson in his Ancient Egyptians. These had a rest for the head, as the Chinese and Japanese have, usually of wood, and certainly as comfortable as the stone pillow which Jacob used. The Hebrew word for bed, meaning mattress, bolster, or pillow, is mittah. The frame to hold such bedding is called eress, corresponding to our bedstead. The latter word only occurs in Deut. iii. 11, Job vii. 13, Ps. vi. 7, xli. 4, cxxxii. 3, Prov. vii. 16, Song i. 16, Amos iii. 12, vi. 4. There is no ground for the suggestion of Dathe, that the passage respecting Og's iron bedstead (Deut. iii. 11) is a subsequent interpolation, for the same passage is found in the same words in the Samaritan Pentateuch. "The cubit of a man" is the space from the tip of the finger (not from the wrist, as Gesenius asserts) to the elbow, that is half a yard, and from the centre of the chest to the tip of the finger a yard, as both arms extended from tip to tip of the fingers make a fathom, or six feet. This is the rude system of measurement before astronomical and geodesiacal corrections were adopted. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible (ii. 594) is in error in stating the length of Og's bedstead at 15½ feet, it should be 18½, from which if we deduct one-third, the usual proportion, we have Og's height 9 feet; Goliath's was a span, or 9 inches more. Now 8 feet 4 inches was the height of O'Brien, whose skeleton, 8 feet high, is still preserved in Hunter's Museum, Lincoln's Inn Fields. One of Frederick the Great's guards was 8½ feet high, and a yeoman of Duke John Frederick, at Brunswick, Hanover, was of the same height (Haller, Elem. Phys., xxx. i.). The ancient measurement being based on the space of the outstretched arms, which is the same as a man's height, some little deduction from our reckoning in feet must be made, because the average of the ancient Israelites, judging them by the Arabs of the present day, could not stretch their arms quite so far as six feet, still less could they span nine inches.

The word Raphaim (rendered giants) means the dead; it also means the marvellous, because the size of the bones were marvellous when ascribed to men, such bones being perhaps those of the megatheria. Augustin was much interested in time at least, it would have failed to elicit admiration; and Winckelmann, while expressing his own dislike, wonders that the tender Theocritus should have bestowed it upon the nymph of whom his Daphnis became enamoured:—

Κἄμ' ἐκ τῷ ἄντρῳ σύνοφρος κόρα ἐχθὲς ἰδοῖσα.

Idyll. viii. 72.

In Ulysses, to whom Isaac Porphyrogenetes attributed the σύνοφρος, it is more appropriate; and it may be thought to add a fitting sternness to the ideal Hercules, whom Herodes depicted, as we learn from Philostratus (De Vit. Sophist. lib. ii.), τῶν ὀφρύων λασίως ἔχων; or to Palamedes, to whom the same writer attributes ὀφρὺς ἐμβάλλοῦσας πρὸς τὴν βίνα. Not that we are altogether certain as to what was really signified by the word σύνοφρος, by which Hesychius would understand a moral quality rather than a physical peculiarity. However this may be, it was the μεσόφρυνον, the slight interstice between the meeting brows,—the glabella of the Latinists of the iron age,—which chiefly excited the admiration of the ancient connoisseurs of female beauty. Thus Anacreon, in that exquisite ode, in which the poet bids his painter friend delineate his mistress, exclaims:—

Τὸ μεσόφρυνον δὲ μὴ μοι
Διάκοπτε, μήτε μίσγε.
'Εχέτω δ' ὅπως ἐκείνη
Τὸ λεληθότως σύνοφρον
Βλεφάρων ἴτυν κελαίην.*

Od. xxxiii.

Thus likewise Petronius Arbiter, in enumerating the "points" of a beautiful girl, does not forget the—

"Frons minima, et quæ radices capillorum retroflexerat; supercilia usque ad malarum scripturam currentia, et rursus confinio luminum pene permixta."—Sat. Cap. 126.

And Claudian rapturously exclaims—

"Quam juncto leviter sese discrimine confert Umbra supercillii!"

De Nupt. Hon. et Mar. v. 267.

Thus, too, Martianus Capella notes the "Pubem ciliorum discriminans glabellæ medietas."

Lib. ii.

And Aristænetus lauds the—μεσόφρυνον ἐμμέτρως τὰς ὀφρὺς διορίσει.

Lib. i. Epist. i.

I have only to add that, as far as my own opinion goes, I conceive that this feature is devoid of either physiognomical, or phrenological significance; and that, pictorially, it generally seems

* Finely translated by T. Moore:—

"Let her eyebrows sweetly rise
In jetty arches o'er her eyes,
Gently in a crescent gliding
Just commingling, just dividing."—Od. xvi.

to suit those faces on which it is found. If the ancients did admire it to a greater extent than is consistent with our standard of physical beauty—which I am inclined to doubt—I can only say with Junius:—

"Non est quodd mirum cuiquam hinc videatur antiquioribus usque adeo placuisse supercilia hunc in modum confusa; quum passim observemus alia multa, quæ nostri non sunt stomachi, veteribus in deliciis fuisse."—De Picturâ Veterum, folio, Rott. 1694, p. 244.

WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

I have never heard any remark concerning this peculiarity, other than that persons having it are "bad tempered." This I have heard very frequently.

The following, which is the only information I can find on the subject, may have some interest for your correspondent CYRIL.

Professor Lawrence, in his lectures at the Royal College of Surgeons, 1823, gives us to understand that abundance of hair on the face and other parts of the body, is a characteristic of the white races; and the want of it of the dark ones, or, as he says, the Mongolian, American, and African varieties.

This absence of hair, he remarks, is rendered more striking by the practice amongst these nations of eradicating or destroying the hair, which practice they often extended to the "eyebrows" and eyelashes (Lectures on Physiology, Zoology, and the Natural History of Man, delivered at the Royal College of Surgeons by W. Lawrence, F.R.S., Professor, &c., pp. 308, 309).

Dr. Goldsmith also remarks, in his History of Animated Nature, that the Persians considered "large eyebrows joining in the middle" as a feature of great beauty (vol. i. pt. II. chap. 4).

I may perhaps as well add that, in phrenology, the space between the eyes is occupied by the organ denominated "form," which is greater or less as the width between the eyes is large or small. This organ, when large, is said to comprehend (amongst other things) a power of easily recognising faces, and a talent for drawing.

As the eyebrows are most likely to meet where the space between the eyes is small, persons having such will probably be deficient in these things. For further particulars on the phrenological view of the matter, consult any book on the subject.
W. C. B.

FREDERICK THE GREAT (3rd S. viii. 251.)—The Matinées Royales have been several times printed, with considerable variations in the text. According to Dr. Froude, the editor of the works of Frederick the Great, who stoutly maintains them to be a forgery, they were first printed in 1763. The latest edition (apparently differing from all its predecessors, and professing to be taken from a more trustworthy source) was published in London in 1863. The question of the genuineness of the work was discussed at some length in the Home and Foreign Review, for January, 1863, in an article entitled "Confessions of Frederick the Great" (pp. 152—172), and again in the same Review in October of the same year (pp. 704—711). F. NORGATE.

THE YOUNGER PITT (3rd S. viii. 239.)—MR. BUCKTON says Fox spent all his money, his own and borrowed, at the gaming table. Pitt was also a great gambler. He seems by this manner of expressing himself to place these two persons upon a par in this respect. But what is his authority for calling Pitt "a great gambler?"

MR. BUCKTON speaks somewhat disparagingly of Pitt's taste for the classics. In his speeches he did not often quote them, but when he did his quotations were peculiarly apposite. At one time when Wilberforce was particularly anxious upon some subject, he urged Pitt more than once to make it a cabinet question. Pitt one day told him that Lord Granville and himself were to dine alone that day for the purpose of discussing the question. The next day Wilberforce went anxiously to Pitt to inquire after the result. Pitt's reply was:—

"Nothing; while at dinner one of us made a quotation from some Roman poet; the other disputed the correctness of the quotation. This led to a discussion, and we had soon on the table more classics than dishes. It was two before we had finished our classics, and we thought it then too late to begin discussing politics. So we are to dine together to-day, and classics are to be strictly prohibited."

Wilberforce himself told me this. It would appear from this that Pitt had a taste for, and a knowledge of, the classics. He did not secede from his parliamentary duties and retire into literary leisure, but whether in power or out of power, devoted himself to the interests of his country.

E. HAWKINS.

HAVILAND'S "CAVALRY" (3rd S. vii. 440.)—Captain Percy Smith (late 13th Dragoons) has written to me calling my attention to the query—"Where can I get a History of Cavalry, by Capt. Haviland, of the Queen's Bays?" I beg leave to say that the work I suppose he means is to be found at p. 320 of the Aide-Memoire to the Military Sciences, printed by John Weale, High Holborn: London, 1850. I also wrote Elucidations on Cavalry Movements, which were much noticed at the time, especially by yeomanry, the Worcestershire yeomanry taking one hundred and twenty pounds' worth. I have a copy of that work by me, and will willingly send it to the inquirer.

FRANCIS HAVILAND, Captain unattached, and Captain of North Somerset Yeomanry.

TURNER FAMILY (3rd S. viii. 88.)—In the churchyard of Jarrow, in the county of Durham, is a flat tombstone, on which is inscribed the following quaint specimen of Latinity:—

"Dormit in hoc tumulo mater genitorque Johannis
Turner non humili natus uterque loco.
Filius en tandem præclara hac stirpe creatus
Historicus medicus non moriturus obit.
Eliz. Turner mater obiit Aug. 28, 1683.
Johan. Turner pater obiit Jul. 1, 1693.
Johan. Turner filius obiit Septemb. 18, 1697."

The names occur in the parish register with the prefix of "Mr." and "Mrs." which I presume indicate that the Turners were a family of rank and distinction. Above the inscription is a coat of arms partially obliterated, on which, however, three fers-de-moulin or millrinds appear distinctly traceable. I should be glad of any further information respecting Dr. Turner, as notwithstanding this rather ambitious epitaph, all recollection of him in the neighbourhood seems to have passed away. E. H. A.

MALHERBE PEDIGREE (3rd S. viii. 181.)—The genealogical tree of Malherbe is given without any dates, and I have not the edition of his works which MR. MASSON describes, and must therefore confine myself to pointing out to him the termination given to one branch of the English Malherbe family, that of Tacolneston, co. Norfolk, by the marriage of Amicia, its heiress with John or William De Ovedale. (Vide Surrey Archeological Collections, vol. iii. p. 60.) D. B.

"TO PLUCK A CROW" (3rd S. vi. 524.)—Upwards of forty years ago I heard, near this city, the same reply—"And I have got a bag to hold the feathers"—made to the speech, "I've got a crow to pick with you." M. E. Philadelphia.

SARCUM MISSAL (3rd S. viii. 200.)—The meaning of the terms—"Cum regimine chori," "Sine regimine chori," "Quandocunque chorus regitur"—will be understood if it be recollected that the precentor chose two cantors to be rulers of the choir on Sundays, and feasts of the second class: and four to be rulers for the feasts of the first class. So that the "Cum regimine chori" meant that it was a feast of the first or second class, or a Sunday, when also nine lessons were read at Matins. The office of these rulers of the choir is clearly explained in Dr. Rock's Church of our Fathers, vol. iii. part 2, p. 136. F. C. H.

HERDOCK (3rd S. viii. 205.)—Corn poppies are certainly called, in the Eastern counties, "head-aches." I have in vain attempted to get any explanation from the country people. Forby, in his Vocabulary of East Anglia, contents himself with this very matter-of-fact reason for the name, that "any one by smelling it for a very short time, may convince himself of the propriety of the name." But this would apply to many other flowers; and will satisfy no one, I suspect, but the vocabularist himself. I am quite of opinion that this provincial name is a corruption of hedioke.

F. C. H.

FOREIGN HERALDIC WORKS (3rd S. viii. 207).—Mr. J. A. Montagu, in his Guide to the Study of Heraldry (4to, London, Pickering, 1840), speaking of Moule's Bibliotheca Heraldica, says:—

"There is also [in it] a list of some foreign systems of heraldry, but this part of the work is incomplete: to supply in part this defect, I may mention, among German authors, George Philip Harsdorfer, of Nuremberg, who was the first German who wrote on heraldry; Theodore Hopfing, John Limnaus, and upwards of twenty others. But it is to Philip Jacob Spener, who wrote at the end of the seventeenth century, that the Germans are indebted for their best work on the subject; from his Insignium Theoria seu Operis Heraldici, most of the other writers have taken their information.

"In the Netherlands they have had John Lavens, Thomas de Rouck, and John Christyn.

"The Swedes, too, can name John Ihre and Carl Uggla as writers upon heraldry."

JOHN W. BONE.

41, Bedford Square.

"AMICUS PLATO," ETC. (3rd S. viii. 219).—MR. BUCKTON appears to state correctly that these words are not in Cicero; but his objection to them will hardly hold. The substantive and the adjective amicus are in fact distinct, and so given in Scheller. In the quotation, the magis prefixed almost takes away the possibility of the substantive appearance. The adjective amica is used in a harmless sense in Horace—"amica luto sus," and probably elsewhere: and, lastly, the substantive amica itself—is often used in a good sense, as may be seen in the above Lexicon—"Honi soit qui mal y pense."
LYTTELTON.

Hagley, Stourbridge.

Erasmus, in his Adagia (ed. 1643, p. 48, col. 2), gives this adage in Greek: φίλος πλάτων, ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον ἢ ἀλήθεια. Erasmus seems to be quoting from Galen, in whose voluminous works, however, I have not been able to find the passage.

SCHIN.

WASHINGTON AN INFIDEL (3rd S. viii. 209).—The Rev. Dr. Miller, of Birmingham, some years ago, published a lecture on Washington, in which he said that his researches did not enable him to affirm that Washington, on his death-bed, gave evidence of Christian belief. CYRIL would, no doubt, hear from Dr. Miller on this point if he wrote to him.
LYTTELTON.

Hagley, Stourbridge.

THEOGNIS (3rd S. viii. 200).—I may be allowed to express a little surprise that any one writing from Oxford, should be obliged to ask "N. & Q." for the habitat of words which are in the finest ode of Horace, iv. 4, 33. Sed is omitted between Doctrina and vim.

LYTTELTON.

Hagley, Stourbridge.

W. ALEXANDER (3rd S. vi. 434).—The volume of poems referred to was not a posthumous work. A short biography is prefixed to it. The author was born at Philadelphia in the year 1808, educated at the University of Pennsylvania, kept an academy, and finally became an instructor in the said University. The dramas in the volume are: Ella, or the Prince of Gilead's Vow, and The Fall of Palmyra. In the Philadelphia Library is a volume of his manuscript poems, presented by the author.
UNEDA.

Philadelphia.

TWO READINGS IN "HAMLET" (3rd S. vi. 410.) As to the expression "Disasters in the sun," I think that your correspondent in Berlin will prefer a reading which I proposed a few years ago through the columns of the Gentleman's Magazine, to either of the three amendments which he suggests.

I am convinced that Shakspeare wrote "Did usher in the sun." This makes sense of the whole passage: it is metrical, and it produces a line in analogy with the line beginning with the words "did squeak and gibber."

The words "did usher" might be readily mistaken for disasters, and the compositor's eye may have caught the word stars in the line above.

WILLIAM DUANE.

Philadelphia.

ARCHBISHOP WHATELY'S UNANSWERED RIDDLE (3rd S. vi. 413).—The answer here proposed must be wrong, unless it can be shown that fishes accompanied Noah into the ark. During the Deluge, soles and eels would have fared better outside of the ark than within.
UNEDA.

Philadelphia.

ORANGE TOAST (3rd S. viii. 159, 200).—Being one among the oldest surviving members of the Orange Brotherhood, and having, ever since my admission therein, in 1797, sat at its festivals among the noblest and almost the highest in the land, I claim to say that in not any one of these was the irreverent and ruthless ribaldry which has been stated to CYRIL, or the still worse to MR. REDMOND, or anything accordant with its spirit ever thereat uttered. The "toast" immediately following that of "The Church" and of "The Sovereign," was—totidem verbis—"The glorious, pious, and immortal memory of King William the Third;" unaccompanied with papal pillory, priestly pelting, or any other vulgar brutality.

Such is—not my "version," as CYRIL terms it—but my truthful report of our Charter Toast, which few living men can more fully authenticate. In the year 1813, in my capacity of secretary in England to the Grand Lodge of Ireland, I administered the oath of its Grand Mastership to the Duke of York, and placed its insignia on the royal person. I thank MR. REDMOND for the opportunity which he has afforded me of recording this honour, which my sons will, I trust, ever cherish; and of warning him against the "one of the brotherhood" who has so strangely abused his credulity; and who is either a false, or a sham "brother," I care not which.

I desire to add, that neither in the Orange oath or declaration is there a syllable which any Christian-minded Protestant may not conscientiously take toward God and the Queen.

I enclose my card, which may be shown to CYRIL or to MR. REDMOND. A severe bronchial affection has prevented my earlier communication.

E. L. S.

EPIGRAM ON ST. LUKE (3rd S. viii. 161.)—By the Rev. Richard Lyne, D.D., Rector of Eynesbury, near St. Neot's, 1750—1767. See "N. & Q." 1st S. vi. 507, 615. JOSEPH RIX. St. Neot's.

ATLANTIC CABLE TELEGRAPH (3rd S. viii. 204.) With respect to a quotation from La France, in a note by MR. T. J. BUCKTON, I beg leave, with all deference, to say that I, with many others, have the very best reasons for believing that there never was one word or signal passed between America and England, or vice versa, by the Atlantic cable of 1858. Numerous facts tend to confirm, if not altogether to corroborate, that belief. About two years ago a naval officer made, or offered to make, an affidavit at the Mansion House, that no message or signal had ever passed. Among a host of suspicious circumstances connected with the laying of even this last cable [why use the absurd word cable? it is not a cable in any sense], it should not be forgotten that the directors carefully excluded any independent literary gentleman or reporter from the Great Eastern, when the experiment, for it is nothing more, of laying the wire was in progress. Observe, too, the absurd suspicion held out to the public gullibility, that one of the workmen employed on board of the vessel, had wilfully injured or destroyed the cable, by thrusting a piece of wire through it.

The following words, apparently quoted by MR. BUCKTON from La France, are merely absurd jargon:—"The course from Ireland to Newfoundland was more difficult than the opposite direction, because the voltaism has to contend against the earth current"!!!

I may just add, that no man of the slightest nautical experience can believe, that after the wire was lost, it was ever grappled again.

WILLIAM PINKERTON.

CREAKING SOLES (3rd S. viii. 128, 179.)—An eminent physician once told me that he had found a remedy against creaking shoes, in putting a piece of wash-leather between the two soles of the shoe.

A. M.

THE OCEAN CAVERN (3rd S. viii. 129.)—I have just perceived NOTO's query as to this book. It was published by William Hone, 8vo, London (1820) at 4s. 6d. The poem is in three cantos, and the story which forms its ground-work is to be found in Mariner's Account of the Customs and Manners of the Tonga Islands.

"The tale is beautifully related in the poem, and occasions feelings which a real bard only can raise. The author's name is not affixed. It has been attributed to one who ranks highest amongst the children of song. Handsomely printed in 8vo, uniformly with Lord Byron's poems."

So far the advertisement; si vis decipi, decipiaris. I am not quite sure of the above date; but it was certainly not later than 1820, and therefore antecedent to Byron's poem, The Island, in which the same romantic incident is versified (Canto iv. 6), and which was written at Genoa in 1823, and published in the same year. WILLIAM BATES.

Birmingham.

THE GREAT BED OF WARE (3rd S. viii. 167.)—With reference to the statement that the Great Bed of Ware had been bought by Mr. Dickens, allow me to say, I was present when it was put up by auction, viz. by Jackson, auctioneer, Hertford; and 100 guineas was bid for it, or rather, it was put up at that sum. No one advanced upon it, and, as a consequence, it was bought in. And the Great Bed of Ware remains where it did before the sale, viz. at the Saracen's Head Inn, Ware. I remember it being reported in the sale room, at the time, that Mr. C. Dickens had bought it, but such was not the case. Being at Ware on Thursday, Sept. 14, I made inquiries; and can assure you the bed is still there, not at Gadshill.

CHARLES WHITLEY, Jun.

Hoddesdon, Herts.

BENEDICT (3rd S. viii. 210.)—In accordance with the view expressed in the reply, that we must look earlier than Shakspeare for the original use of the name Benedict, or Benedick, to signify a newly-married man, I trust I may be permitted to suggest what appears to be the true cause and origin of such an application of the term Benedict.

According to the judgment of the primitive Church, no Christian could be married aright without the nuptial benediction ("benedictio nuptialis"), still termed in French "bénédictio nuptiale." Hence we may understand how the "bridegroom" of the morning, ere night, was hailed a "Benedict." The bride did not receive a corresponding title, for a good and sufficient reason. She did not receive her full blessing on the bridal day: part of it, called the "benedictio sponsarum," being reserved for the morrow, or for a subsequent period. The bridegroom, on the contrary, got his complete benediction on the same day he got his wife, and so came out a full-blown Benedict at once.

In our English language, which I believe is the only one that in the present day thus connects the name Benedict with matrimony, we find another trace of the same connection: the sack-posset, taken the last thing on the night of the wedding, being once called "benediction-posset":—

"He and his consort sat in state, like Saturn and Cybele, while the benediction-posset was drunk."—Humphrey Clinker, iii. 265, edit. 1771.

SCHIN.

Is it not probable that "benedict" is derived from the Latin, and means simply the happy man, as a newly married couple is often spoken of as "the happy pair"? By the way, is this last expression to be found for the first time in Dryden's "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day"? W. R.

Edinburgh.

ADMIRAL BENBOW (3rd S. viii. 207.)—A. will find a copy of the epitaph of Admiral Benbow in the Gentleman's Magazine, under the head of "Monumental Inscriptions of the West Indies":—

"Here lyeth interred the body of JOHN BENBOW, Esq., Admiral of the White. A true pattern of English courage. Who lost his life in defence of his Queen and Country, November y^e 4th, 1702, in the 52nd year of his age, by a wound in his leg received in an Engagement with Mons^r Du Casse. Being much lamented." [A slab on the pavement.]

The Admiral lies interred on the right as you approach the altar, and within the railing, of the parish church of Kingston, Jamaica. SPAL.

PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S DICTIONARY (3rd S. viii. 190.)—"Who" in the nominative, as a simple relative, between 1382 and 1523, will be found in The Pilgrimage of the Soul, printed in 1483, which contains the following passage:—

"Who (he that) procureth ony suche alyenation, be wrongeth the Lord". . . . "This was his last will, and who that withstandeth the last will offendeth the lawe."—Chap. xxxi. (in the reprint of 1859, p. 86.)

